One acquires a renewed confidence in the successful venture we call America when he contemplates the deep loyalty and sturdy devotion for God and country as exemplified by the late LAWRENCE LEWIS. The soil of his beloved country is now his physical home henceforth and forever, and his soul is an integral part of the spiritual force that rules the earth and the stars and urges men to walk with humility and good will. So mote it be!

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. THOMAS HENRY CULLEN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, all our hearts were saddened by the passing of our dear friend and distinguished colleague, the Honorable THOMAS H. CULLEN, of the Fourth Congressional District, New York, on March 1, 1944. He was affectionately known to all of us as Tom. For years the dean of our New York delegation, he left a record behind of which any man could be proud. When I came to Congress 18 years ago, he was one of the first men I met. At that time he willingly offered me his good counsel and advice on the intricate legislative procedure of this body. Through the following years of our personal friendship and close association I learned, on countless occasions, the true warmth of his heart and the kindliness of his spirit.

Words are mere phrases and meaningless in attempting to say that which comes to my heart in the loss of one whom I was privileged to know most intimately for many years. He was a public-spirited man, kind and humane. If any of his friends were ill or confined to the hospital, it was nothing for Tom to call on them time and time again and do everything possible for their comfort. His life was full of useful deeds.

He was a good husband, a good father, and a good friend. He has left to his family the heritage of a good name and the record of a statesman upon which the whole State of New York can look with pride. In his passing I have lost a very dear and close friend, the State of New York has lost a devoted son, and the Nation an able and accomplished legislator whose work will long be remembered.

Small Business in the Post-War World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 1 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] over the Columbia Broadcasting System from Washington, D. C., on May 30, 1944. The title of this very able address is "Small Business in the Post-war World."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My talk this evening is on the problems of American small business. In using the term "small business," it is not to be understood that small business is necessarily engaged in any conflict with big business. There are certain basic industries in our country which require big plants and enormous capital through which they are able to accomplish a high rate of production at low costs. These large enterprises have played an important role in the history of American industry and the development of what has come to be known as the American way of life.

At the outset, therefore, I wish it to be understood that there is a place in our country for both big and little business.

During many years, however, we have been witnessing a trend in this country toward monopoly and the gradual elimination of the smaller business concerns through consolidations and concentration of industry in the hands of large industrial organizations. These combinations have a tendency to control prices and stifle competition. It is against this tendency which the Congress is aiming. These larger aggregations are able to direct and control markets and engage in many unfair business practices which drive the smaller concerns from the field. Now, the preservation of small business is essential to our system of free competition and democratic way of life.

The Congress is interested, therefore, in opposing this undue concentration of business and development of monopolies which seek through the exercise of great financial power and unfair practices to drive out of the field the smaller independent concerns and thus bring about a collectivistic or totalitarian economy in our country like they have in Germany.

America was built and grew to its present great power on the principle of free competition maintained through free markets. The wealth of our country has been wrought from her natural resources—her fertile lands, her vast forests, and rich mineral deposits—through our system of free competition carried on by independent business enterprise.

Fifty years ago American business consisted almost entirely of small and medium-sized enterprises. Then America had a truly competitive economy. But the trend toward large combinations and monopolies in industry which I have mentioned began in the 1890's and by the 1930's had grown to such proportions that the continued existence of independent small business was seriously threatened along with our traditional American system of free enterprise itself.

It was the iron necessity of this global war which made us realize the enormous importance of small business to the national welfare. At first the small plants were neglected. They were given no war work and many were compelled to close their doors. It soon became apparent, however, that without fully utilizing the small-plant capacity of the country, our war production goals could not be met.

So it was, that in June 1942, the Congress unanimously passed a lew establishing a Government agency known as the Smaller War Plants Corporation, sponsored by the Senate Special Committee on Small Business Problems. That act gave to the Smaller War Plants Corporation various powers to mobilize the productive capacity of the small concerns in the war effort.

That was pioneer legislation of its kind. Here the Congress recognized for the first time in our history that the Nation's small business has an indispensable part to play in our system of free enterprise. We could not afford to permit it to be destroyed.

I am glad to report to you this evening that the war record of the smaller plants of the country has more than justified the expectations of the Congress.

The highest leaders in Government and industry have paid repeated tribute to the splendid contribution of small plants to our miraculous production record in this war. We have won the war of production largely through the cooperation of the small plants. They have performed thousands of contracts and subcontracts calling for the most intricate parts, components, assemblies and subassemblies. They have shown exceptional aptitude in acquiring the necessary engineering skill and production "know-how."

In this record of performance, the Smaller War Plants Corporation has played a valuable and significant part. Under its present chairman, Mr. Maury Maverick, I am confident that the corporation will prove equal to the urgent problems of reconversion that are now developing as we pass the peak of war production and begin to witness cut-backs and contract cancelations.

The small concerns at the outbreak of the war did not have the resources of capital and credit, or equipment and manpower that their larger competitors enjoyed. They were especially hard hit by the drastic reductions in civilian materials, the shortage of manpower and the many controls which were necessary in the conduct of the war. Shortage of civilian materials forced them out of civilian production and without war work they faced bankruptcy. When given an opportunity, however, as I have pointed out, they made an enviable record in war production. But now those small concerns which converted to war production are confronted with cut-backs and contract terminations with all the resulting hardships and uncertainties. The closing of the Brewster Aeronautical Corporation which you have read about in the papers is an example. This plant has hundreds of small subcontractors affected by the cut-back.

It was to deal positively with these problems that on May 12, 1944, I introduced in the Senate, as chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, a bill known as the Small Business Act of 1944 (S. 1913). Any businessman who wishes a copy of this bill and the accompanying report should address the Senate Small Business Committee, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Let me give you a short summary of the Small Business Act of 1944. First, it extends the life of the Smaller War Plants Corporation to July 1, 1947, to cover the expected reconversion period, and its name is to be changed to the Small Business Corporation. It increases its capitalization from one hundred and fifty million to a billion dollars.

The corporation is to be the Government agency responsible for representing small business interests in Government affairs generally and particularly in connection with the allocation of materials and equipment for the reconversion of small concerns to civilian operations.

The bill also establishes an interpartmental committee of important Government agencies to consult on all policies and procedures affecting small business. It assures proper representation by small-business men on the many trade and industry committees now functioning in the various Government agencies.

It further authorizes the Small Business Corporation to insure loans made by banks and other private financial institutions to small concerns for their reconversion to civilian operations and to reestablish those which have been forced to discontinue by war conditions. In this way, it is hoped to encourage the flow of private capital and credit to small concerns so that they can continue and eventually increase their production and employment.

It will enable small-business concerns to obtain on fair terms a proper share of the estimated $75,000,000,000 of surplus Government war property which ranges all the way from food and clothing to jeeps and heavy machinery. To accomplish this, the surplus disposal agencies are directed to consult with the Small Business Corporation and to fix the types and quantities of these surpluses for disposal to small concerns. Such a provision is essential to prevent these huge piles of surplus property from being disposed of in such a way as to encourage the expansion of larger concerns at the expense of the smaller ones.

The Small Business Act will give to small concerns a fair opportunity to participate in the use of the new industrial techniques and processes which the Government has acquired or developed during the war, including the 45,000 patents which have been seized from enemy aliens.

This Government agency is further authorized to make arrangements for providing small concerns with the research facilities of the Federal and State Governments and of educational and other private institutions.

In the administration of the Small Business Act, all honorably discharged war veterans are to be given suitable preferences according to methods which the Small Business Corporation is directed to work out with the appropriate veteran authorities of the Government.

I have given you a very brief and hurried summary of the Small Business Act of 1944. In my opinion, it is the most important legislation on small business to be introduced during my 10 years in the Senate. It is the result of extensive study by the Senate Small Business Committee and consultation with many experts and businessmen both in and outside the Government.

There are some people, of course, who, while professing undying devotion to the cause of small business, are found attacking this measure as socialistic and paternalistic. They say it would wet nurse and regiment small business.

Of course, it would do nothing of the kind. It is, in fact, the very opposite of socialism or regimentation. Its entire purpose is to preserve that freedom of opportunity which is the foundation of our American system. It seeks to offset the swift wartime concentration of industry and protect the competitive position of small concerns in the reconversion period. It would aid small business without regimentation or interference.

My experience is that attacks of the kind just mentioned are made by those who wish to play politics with the problems of small business and wish to avoid any discussion of its concrete problems on their merits.

These same people did not cry "socialism" or "paternalism" when the Government in 1932, under Mr. Hoover's administration, established the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which doled out billions of Government money to the banks, railroads, and public utilities and saved them from economic ruin. I make no criticism of that program, but it seems to me that when a modest measure of assistance to small business is proposed in the present crisis, it should be given the same consideration that was given to big business in the Hoover period.

I am confident that the many small-business men who have suffered so deeply from the unavoidable dislocations of the war will not be fooled by this misrepresentation of their interests and welfare. Businessmen have demonstrated their support of the bill by a stream of letters to the Senate Small Business Committee. They realize that their own economic survival and the preservation of free enterprise itself require this Congress to adopt measures which will maintain their freedom of opportunity in the trying period of reconversion which lies ahead.

In conclusion, I should like to paraphrase the famous remark of Mark Twain about the weather: "Everybody talks about small business, but nobody does anything about it."

This bill offers a real opportunity to do something about it. I appeal to all American businessmen in their own interest to make the most of this opportunity.

One Hundred and Thirtieth Anniversary of Norwegian Constitution

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me before the United Norwegian Seventeenth of May Commission, at Milwaukee, Wis., on May 17, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Today is the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary of the Constitution of Norway. We commemorate the event when the Norwegian peasants at Eidsvold, in their homespun clothes, swore to maintain Norwegian freedom, "Enig og tro intil Dovre Falder."

I have come from Washington, fellow Americans, to do three things:

1 To pay tribute to that sturdy people—Ibsen calls them "det klippe faste klippe folk"—from whom many of us have stemmed.

2. To join with you in rededicating ourselves as Americans to make Norway free again.

3. To talk to you about some of the things in which we are all interested and which relate to both America and Norway.

It was my privilege as a representative of this country to attend the last meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held at Oslo, Norway, in August 1939. This was 2 weeks before Hitler invaded Poland.

On our way to Oslo, we spent a week in England, visiting London, the Shakespeare country, the lake country, Glasgow, Edinburgh. From there we sailed across the North Sea to Bergen.

Bergen, the city I had heard my father speak of so often. There we visited the fish markets, took the tramway up to the heights, and beheld the magnificent view of the fjords and the islands. The next morning we took the train to Voss where we saw the snow on the mountains reflected in the lake. That evening I visited with some Norwegian soldiers and bought them refreshments.

We motored to Stalheim, passing numerous waterfalls and lakes, and had lunch at the hotel, which is beautifully situated, overlooking the magnificent Narodal Canyon. We proceeded by auto to Gudvangen, there taking a steamer on the Sognefjord to Flaam, and spent the night at the Fretheim Hotel. We continued by automobile through the wild and rugged Flaamsdals Valley to Vatnahalsen, where we were transported by little horses and carriages up to the mountain to the railroad station.

The Inter-Parliamentary Union meetings were held in the Storting at Oslo. On August 18 I had an audience with the King and Crown Prince of Norway. I had luncheon in Nansen's home and stood by his grave. I was privileged to speak in the Norwegian Parliament, to have lunch with our American Minister, Mrs. Harriman, but, most of all, I was privileged to look up the home of my mother and my father.

Mother was 3 years old when her folks left the old country. Her home was located on a mountain top, where Gausdal branches off from Gudbrandsdalen. We found in the sturdy mountain hut an old relative some 90 years of age. I can still see her waving her hand as we left. I can also see in my mind's eye that beautiful valley up which Hitler's forces later marched and ravaged.

I also visited my father's home, which was up in Numedal about 7 miles north of Kongsberg. Some 30 distant relatives were on hand, and I took movie pictures of that gathering. I have since tried to reach some of them by mail but have been unable to do so. Some day, when this terrible war is over and peace has come again, I hope to go back to the Land of the Midnight Sun.

Let us go back for a moment to 1939. At that time the Norwegian Nation was a lighthouse to the world. It had practically solved its economic problems. The people were healthy, happy, and peaceful. They wanted to live at peace with the world.

When I had an audience with the King of Norway I remember suggesting to him the need of the democratic nations banding themselves together. A charged atmosphere existed in Oslo at that time. The King hoped that Hitler would refrain from invading Norway, but, of course, Hitler thought otherwise. Norway hadn't really been invaded since the Middle Ages. Scandinavia's neutrality survived the First World War, but it could not survive this war. Norway was absolutely unprepared. At the end of 3 months she was conquered, but she made Hitler pay a price and now the sons of the Vikings are fighting again. It was their forefathers who, almost a thousand years ago, invaded France and Britain.

So Norway forgot to build an army and navy. She believed in treaties, in cooperation between nations. She believed in the pledged word. And now we are fighting to reestablish the faith of the world in the beliefs which she had.

April 9 was Easter. It was 4 years ago, on April 9, that the peaceful nation of Norway was visited by Nazi ruthlessness. Invading Nazis immediately began a planned campaign to exterminate civilization within these lands. The Nazi campaign has failed. It has never attained its fixed goals. In Norway the light of freedom still shines, undimmed, eternal.

There are over 140,000 Americans of Norwegian descent living in Wisconsin. Almost all of us have some family ties with the motherland. The tragedy of Norway today is painfully close to our hearts. In Milwaukee County there are over 10,000 Americans of Norwegian descent. The entire population of Norway is about that of our own State. It is a small nation as numbers go, but it has had a tremendous effect upon the history of America. The folk songs, the legends, the schools, the music, the literature, the faith and character of the Norwegian people have been closely woven into the fabric of Wisconsin and American life.

The first Norsemen came to American shores around the year 1000, when the storms on the North Atlantic drove Leif Ericson westward. The second Norse immigration came only a few years later. Its purpose, as the saga of Erik the Red states, was to find Leif Ericson's Vinland.

We in America, especially those of us whose homes are located in the great Middle West, know and appreciate the sterling qualities of the Norwegian people. Their contributions to science, industry, finance, literature, and the arts have been recognized in this country. Innumerable Americans of Norwegian descent have become vital parts of the American community, State, and Nation. Americans of Norwegian origin have exerted powerful influence upon the progress of our schools, our free press, our churches, our business, and agricultural life.

It is the wide, general knowledge of Norwegian character which prepared Americans for the manner of Norwegian resistance to the Nazis. Generations of law-abiding citizens had passed on a heritage of staunch devotion to liberty, and, above all, a sense of humor. The Norwegians have utilized these qualities to the fullest possible extent

It is a paradox that sabotage should appear among a people famed for their close observance of law. Yet, sabotage has appeared; organized sabotage. The humorless Nazis have not only suffered from the efforts of these Norwegian patriots; more—they have been made ridiculous.

When the Nazis—after 2 months of bitter fighting—temporarily subdued the heroic efforts of the Norwegian Army—resistance in Norway did not cease. It went underground. A large portion of the Norwegian Navy and the Norwegian merchant marine eluded the Nazis and made their way to neutral or Allied ports. Many Norwegian ships and thousands of Norwegian sailors are serving the cause of world liberation today. Scores of Norwegian pilots, trained in Canada, have taken their places beside their comrades of the U. S. A. A. F. and the R. A. F. in the stepping-up of the air war against the heart of Nazi war industry and transportation. Units of Norwegian ground troops eagerly await the coming Allied invasion of western Europe.

Of equal importance to the military accomplishments of the Norwegians wtihout the boundaries of Norway are the accomplishments of the Norwegian underground and the manner in which the Royal Norwegian Government has established and maintained the best of relations with the Governments of the United Nations.

The Nazis sought through pressures applied over long periods of time to control every phase of Norwegian life. But, they reckoned without the determination of Norwegians to retain their national characteristics, unaffected by the cruelty of barbarous enemies or by the kindness of trusted allies. No more striking instance of the independence of Norwegian thought exists than in the matter of the conscious successful attempt at preserving the purity of the Norwegian language. At home, the Norwegian underground has effectively prevented the Nazis from Germanicizing the Norwegian language by the planned popularization of certain Germanic terms and phrases. In Great Britain and in the United States, where the English language prevails, I have had occasion to observe the manner in which free Norwegians have carefully, courteously—yet firmly—preserved the lingual practices of their nation. Americans admire and respect the Norwegians for their determination to retain every attribute of their nationality.

Within Norway, the Nazis have followed their old technique of using all possible measures to turn individual against individual, profession against profession, and class against class.

How miserably Hitler has failed.

The Nazis sought to turn the Norwegian people against their clergy. By promises of special privileges—and when that failed—by threats of concentration camp and death itself, the Nazis vainly tried to identify the Norwegian clergy with their degraded standard. The Norwegian clergy was impervious to pleas and punishment alike. They not only retained their integrity as a group, but they won the eternal loyalty of their parishioners by their unwavering stand for freedom.

Like assaults on the honor of Norwegian athletes, teachers, lawyers, doctors, legislators, labor and businessmen, met with the same results. Cold contempt. Studied lack of cooperation. Meanwhile, no Nazi or no Nazi military installation or factory or railroad was secure from the organized sabotage of the Norwegian underground. Norwegians receive information on the true state of world affairs from allied radio. Norwegian underground newspapers continue to publish facts. Norwegian sources keep an unabated flow of information in motion to allied military leaders on the situation within Norway. The allies often learn of Norwegian events before the Nazis and the Quislings know that they have taken place.

For 4 long years there has been no slackening of the hate of Norwegians for the Nazis. When Norway is liberated—and Norway will be liberated—each Quisling will be meted out just punishment. There are comparatively few Nazi-collaborators among the Norwegians, but each and every one of them is known to the underground. Moreover, when Norway is free, every Nazi soldier on Norwegian soil will find himself a prisoner of the people.

Norway has endured much from the Nazis. Norway has contributed much toward the certain United Nations victory. Norway has earned—and Norway will receive—an honored place at the peace table.

April 9—the day when peaceful Norway was ruthlessly invaded by the Nazis—will not always be a day of sorrow. When the militarists of Germany are brought down to defeat, April 9 will be an emblem of endurance, a symbol of the spiritual strength of the great and respected peoples of Norway.

In America, we must see to it that we are not tainted in this critical period by a weak faith, a skepticism as to America's ability to meet the issues of war and peace. A period of trial is up ahead, but America knows how to meet trials.

We are Americans, creatures of independence. We—sons and daughters of pioneers, shaped and made self-reliant by the atmosphere of America—hate regimentation. We face the future expectantly, willing to adventure, take a chance. We can smile at tough circumstances, crack a joke in danger.

We love freedom and want to live as individuals. We are practical, but have great dreams. We are a young Nation, full of ingenuity and strength—and rich in resources. And we are dedicated to make our dreams of peace come true.

We are looking hopefully toward the future—toward a resurrected world of peace and good will among the peoples of the earth. And in that picture a resurrected Norway will have a significant place.

The Recent Oregon Senatorial Primaries—Campaign Expenditures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUFUS C. HOLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 1 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, last Tuesday I received a communication from the Senate Special Committee to Investigate the Expenditures of all Candidates in 1944 for the Offices of President, Vice President, and Senator, of which the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is chairman, and the learned and vigilant Senators STEWART, TUNNELL, BALL, and FERGUSON are members. I request unanimous consent to have my reply to that communication printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
May 31, 1944.

HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN,
Chairman, Special Committee to Investigate Presidential, Vice Presidential, and Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, 1944, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I acknowledge receipt of the communication addressed to me as a candidate for nomination as United States Senator in the recent (May 19, 1944) primary election in Oregon, wherein I am required to furnish within a limited time factual data relative to my expenses and the expenses and contributions of others in support of my candidacy. Be assured I shall comply willingly and to the best of my ability with your demands and in every way possible I shall be cooperative in my compliance. I shall so inform those who voluntarily conducted my political campaign in the confident expectation that they, too, will be cooperative with you and your Senate committee in the discharge of your official duties.

May I request that your committee go very thoroughly into all the details of every phase of the subject of the amount, source, and use of funds in behalf of every candidate for nomination as United States Senator in both parties in Oregon. Friends have remarked to me that there may have been more money spent to defeat me and to nominate Professor Morse on the Republican ticket than was spent to elect or defeat all other candidates for all offices on both tickets.

Incidentally, you may be justified in inquiring into what or who prompted the candidacy of Mr. Earl E. Fischer, of Washington County, whose candidacy undoubtedly vitally divided the vote I otherwise most likely would have received.

Very respectfully yours.

C. I. O. Political Tactics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 1 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Senate Inquiry Demanded Into C. I. O. Political Tactics," by Turner Catledge, from the New York Times of today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE INQUIRY DEMANDED INTO C. I. O. POLITICAL TACTICS—BUTLER CHARGES VIOLATION OF CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT—HILLMAN AIDES SAY THEY WILL READILY APPEAR

(By Turner Catledge)

WASHINGTON, May 31.—The Republican effort to counter or nullify the pro-Roosevelt activities of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee was taken into the Senate today with a demand by Senator HUGH BUTLER, of Nebraska, for an investigation of the organization by the Privileges and Elections Committee.

Supporting the attack made against the C. I. O. yesterday by Harrison E. Spangler, Chairman of the Republican National Committee, Senator BUTLER demanded that the Senate take a hand because of the alleged failure of Attorney General Biddle to call the political action committee to account under the Corrupt Practices and Hatch Acts.

He charged that the Attorney General "has gone out of his way" to make excuses for violators of the two election laws, "and as a result Mr. Sidney Hillman's C. I. O. Political Action Committee continues to go its merry way, spending moneys collected from many reluctant union members, in the interests of the fourth term and the election of new dealers to the Halls of Congress.

"This flouting of the election laws of the United States on the part of the political action committee," Mr. BUTLER told the Senate, "threatens the entire structure erected by Congress to guarantee the people of this Nation free and clean elections."

The attitude of C. I. O. headquarters to the thrusts of Senator BUTLER and Mr. Spangler was one of "thanks for the mention." Officials of the P. A. C. said they had nothing to hide, either as to their intentions or their activities. They indicated their willingness to appear at any time before any committee having jurisdiction over such matters, to lay their whole story before Congress or the country.

"Yes, we are in politics," one of them said, "and we are doing our best to organize right down to the precincts. We hope to make ourselves effective in national and State and congressional elections next fall, and in some of the primaries between now and then."

The C. I. O. spokesmen confirmed Mr. Spangler's assertion that the P. A. C. had gathered a fund of about $750,000 from its unions, with which to start the campaign.

They disclosed that, as of May 1, the committee had disbursed about $134,000, of which $15,000 was spent in the unsuccessful attempt to elect the Democratic candidate for Governor of New Jersey last fall. The remaining $119,000, about 85 percent, had been spent for salaries, literature, and promotion, a C. I. O. official said.

"We have nothing to hide," said one of them. "We will be glad to inform Mr. Spangler, or anyone else, of these matters. We opposed an inquiry by the Dies committee because we did not think that body had either jurisdiction or valid interest in what we are doing."

The political action committee claimed another success in the renomination yesterday of former Representative Luther Patrick over Representative JOHN NEWSOME in the run-off primary in the Ninth Alabama District. Full or part credit already had been given to the committee, or claimed, for various results in Florida, Alabama, California, and Oregon, and for the decision of Representative MARTIN DIES, of Texas, not to run for reelection.

The P. A. C. is now engaged in organizing its forces throughout the country for the fall campaign. It has divided the States into 14 regions, with each regional office under a full-time, salaried director.

The work is being carried on under the chairmanship of Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, and under the day-to-day direction of C. B. Baldwin, of Radford, Va., who formerly was assistant to Vice President WALLACE when he was Secretary of Agriculture. Later Mr. Baldwin was Farm Security Administrator. The national offices of the committee are at 205 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

The committee's national job is to campaign for the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt, who, it assumes, will be renominated, and for the renomination and election of Vice President WALLACE. As to Members of the House and Senators, and other officials in whose campaigns it participates, the committee intends leaving the selection largely to its local affiliates.

LABOR RECORD NOT SOLE STANDARD

"We are working on the local and congressional district level," an official explained.

He emphasized that the P. A. C. did not set up a 100-percent perfect labor record as the sole criterion for a candidate receiving its support. He indicated that the committee might support several Members of the House and Senators who, for instance, voted for the Smith-Connally antistrike bill.

In assaying a candidate's virtures, the P. A. C. will take a forward-looking point of view on international questions of paramount importance, committee officials said—on a virtual par with his labor record.

"Of course we will support candidates who have generally friendly attitudes toward labor, but that is not enough," one official said.

In preparation for the fall campaign, the P. A. C. is conducting a sort of correspondence course for its local workers, teaching them how to organize political groups and "clubs," how to ring door bells and stir up interest in candidates and measures, and, above all, how to get their prospective voters registered. One of the principal jobs which the P. A. C. has tackled is that of registering, and otherwise qualifying for voting, the large shifting labor population.

AS TO COMMUNIST SUPPORT

When asked if the P. A. C. would accept Communist support for its candidates and measures, a committee official said:

"We have no Communists that we know of in our organization, but we will accept votes from any source."

As to the suggestion that they had torn a leaf out of the book of the late Wayne B. Wheeler, highly successful lobbyist and political organizer for the Anti-Saloon League, the P. A. C. official smiled and replied that if Mr. Wheeler developed any good, effective political methods, the C. I. O. was in the market for them.

"We are out to be effectitve," he said.

He made essentially the same reply when asked if the P. A. C. intended to work with or use tactics of such organizations as the Kelly machine in Chicago, the Hague machine in Jersey City, or the Crump machine in Memphis.

"We will join forces with these organizations if we are working toward the same end, but we won't get tied up with them permanently," the official said.

The P. A. C. has called a national conference of its officials and regional directors in Washington June 16. The purpose of the meeting is to lay more definite plans for the campaign.

Development of Upper Missouri Valley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 1 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from a recent issue of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch entitled "What We Owe the Upper Valley."

The future development of the river systems of this country demands the coordination of all uses to which water may be put, as well as the coordination of the jurisdiction of the various public agencies, State and Nation, which deal with water uses.

As a representative of one of the States in the upper Missouri River Valley, I welcome the intelligent attitude of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT WE OWE THE UPPER VALLEY

The basic obstacle to development of the Missouri Valley was ably stated in the Post-Dispatch yesterday by E. G. Leipheimer, editor of the Montana Standard of Butte. "We fear the Government bureaus," he wrote in an appraisal doubly valuable for its candor. "They have all been here to investigate our water resources, but always with a view to taking our water away for the use and needs of people elsewhere, far below."

The people of the upper Missouri Valley do not trust the Government bureaus, and—let us not delude ourselves—they do not trust us of the lower Missouri Valley. If we are willing to face all the facts—which is the only way in which we shall ever get anywhere—we must admit that they have good and sufficient reasons for not trusting us.

We of the lower Missouri Valley have not been sympathetic to the needs of the upper valley States for irrigation. We have not bothered to inform ourselves about irrigation. We have stood by without protest when measures to develop the Missouri River for our benefit have proposed to penalize the irrigation of the upper valley.

The first steps that will have to be taken before the two great subdivisions of the Missouri Valley can learn to trust each other are up to us of the lower valley.

First, we must repudiate and demand correction of the inequity of that act of Congress which forbids use of any of the waters of Fort Peck Reservoir for irrigation. It is not enough to suggest, as the Army engineers suggest that, when additional reservoirs are built on the Missouri, the waters of Fort Peck may be used for irrigation. Why should Montana, Wyoming, and the Dakotas have to trade with us for water that is rightfully theirs?

Why should they have to wait on our pleasure for water that is rightfully theirs now?

Second, we must repudiate and demand withdrawal of the efforts of the Army engineers to set aside, by law, a specified amount of the water of the Missouri River for navigation—to take it away, by arbitrary act, from irrigation. Such flagrant disregard of the other fellow can only provoke in him a similarly flagrant disregard for our rights. We need, on both sides, to repudiate the method of grabbing water by congressional second-story work.

When we, of the lower valley, have done these two things, we will have shown ourselves willing to be reasonable. We can then expect our neighbors of the upper valley to be reasonable toward us in response. Until we have performed these duties, it will be idle to talk of cooperation between us, for we have first to justify the trust that makes cooperation possible.

Retirement Refund Delays

REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. JEFFREY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. JEFFREY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the House to a condition that is creating resentment among the people against their Government. That is the inexcusable delay in refunding to former Government employees the money deducted from their pay for retirement purposes. This situation is both shameful and unnecessary.

Mr. Speaker, the matter has been brought to my attention by a succession of complaints from constituents who at one time or another have been employed at Wright Field, or at Patterson Field, both of which are near Dayton, Ohio. These civilian employees of the War Department have had two painful experiences with delay and bureaucratic red tape. One arose in connection with the Government's delay in delivering to them war bonds purchased under a pay reservation plan. The other comes when they leave Government service and try to collect the money deducted for retirement purposes. The first of these I brought to the attention of the House some time ago. The second I wish to emphasize today.

The files at my office show that applications for refunds filed as long ago as September 1942 are still not paid. In fact I know of 15 such cases dating from 1942. There is, of course, a greater number dating from 1943 and the total including 1944 seems to be increasing rather than decreasing. This failure to refund the money rightfully theirs is something the average citizen cannot understand. Many of their letters remark that although the Government requires promptness of the citizen in many matters, there is no promptness required of the Government. To make matters worse some of my constituents have been depending on these refunds to aid them in their daily expenditures.

For example, one applicant is described as badly in need of funds with which to pay debts arising out of the last illness and burial of his wife. Another constituent—a woman—writes:

> We have no other source of income and unless this money is forthcoming soon I shall be forced to break up my home, as I'll lose the furniture.

Also, there was an angry father who wrote:

> When the Government wanted my boy for military service, he had to go on a specified date. When I owe income tax the Government expects it to be paid by a very definite date. When the Government owes me something, they seem to feel that it can be taken care of at their leisure.

Then there was this classic commentary on the way the whole business is being delayed and bungled:

> Attached is a letter—
> A constituent wrote—
> which proves that Wright Field has inefficiency perfected to the *n*th degree. Eleven days to send a completed form to Washington and over 8 months to tell Washington how much they'd deducted from my pay in 13 months. Eleven days to send a request to Washington and 8 months later they send the information necessary for Washington to fulfill the request. May the good Lord have mercy on us if Wright Field handles all their business as efficiently as they've handled the matters mentioned in this letter.

Incidentally, I do not blame the man for being angry; his claim has been pending since November 30, 1942.

Mr. Speaker, responsibility for this shameful situation is not easily fixed. Part of it must rest, of course, with the United States Civil Service Commission, which has charge of the retirement program. Part of it must rest with the War Department. Time after time I receive letters from the Civil Service Commission saying that some man's record has not yet come from the War Department.

Some time ago I paid a call on the head of the Civil Service Commission, Mr. Mitchell. He received me most courteously and listened to me sympathetically. He even urged me to send any hardship cases to his office so he could expedite their handling. In one case I did this, but without any success to date, although that was several weeks ago. The Civil Service Commission points out—and they have the figures to support their statements—that the remarkable increase in the turn-over of Government employees has swamped them with work. On the other hand, I have heard it said on the floor of the House that red tape also contributes to the delays. I do not undertake to tell either the War Department or the Civil Service Commission what administrative steps to take to correct this condition; that is their business. I do demand that they take some corrective action, and that soon.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that a part of our democratic Government is represented by the responsibility of the Government to the people. I think the Government should be as prompt and as courteous in dealing with its citizens as it demands them to be in dealing with it. I realize that the Government is large and that it moves slowly. But even this cannot excuse delays of nearly 2 years.

If any two departments of the Government are under an obligation to be prompt and courteous, these are the Civil Service Commission and the War Department. When I came down to Washington I had a high regard for the Civil Service Commission. I still have a high regard for the principle of civil service.

Mr. Speaker, the Civil Service Commission, which was established to make merit the basis for serving the Government, should set an example of efficiency instead of demonstrating the lack of it. I believe it has that important obligation to fulfill. The same is true of the War Department, but for different reasons. The Army has long emphasized promptness; it punishes severely the soldier who is a few minutes late returning from a week-end pass. Yet it seems unconcerned about a delay of nearly 2 years in returning to its former employees money that belongs to them.

I call these matters to the attention of the House with the hope that the two departments—which seem strangely impervious to individual protests—will take immediate action to correct these conditions.

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the congressional district of New York which it has been my honor to represent these many years has furnished its full quota of heroes in each branch of the service in all wars in which the United States has participated.

I call attention to the heroic exploit of Lt. Dale F. Spencer, of Clymer, Chautauqua County, N. Y., in demolishing in 1 minute four Nazi planes. This display of courage by Lt. Dale F. Spencer is a manifestation of the spirit of the youth of America when called upon to fight for their country's honor and prestige.

My faith in the American youth was established long years ago in witnessing the fighting qualities of our young men in all branches of athletics, and since then this faith has been confirmed over and over again by youthful deeds of valor displayed in the infantry, in the air, on the sea, and wherever duty has called our fighting forces.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include as a part of my remarks at this point an article which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald May 30, 1944:

"MAD PILOT" GETS FOUR NAZI PLANES IN ONE BATTLE

LONDON, May 30.—A "mad fighter pilot," Lt. Dale F. Spencer, of Clymer, N. Y., celebrated his first wedding anniversary yesterday by hurling his Mustang against four twin-engined German fighters and shooting all down in less than a minute, it was revealed today.

The action occurred near Cottbus, Germany, on Spencer's seventh combat mission.

"The first three didn't know what hit them, it happened so fast," Spencer said. "The fourth tried to get away, but he was too late. I went down and took pictures of three of them burning on the ground and then headed home, hoping I wouldn't go into the channel with all of that good film in my plane."

Spencer's wife, the former Miss Arlene Robbins, lives at Corey, Pa.

Flight Officer James Duffy, of Bronx, N. Y., witnessed Spencer's feat.

"That boy had more guts than brains," Duffy said. "He came down on them from behind, seemed to spray them with lead and then go after them one at a time.

"The first two went down in flames. Number three began smoking badly and the fourth twisted down out of control. It happened right after we left Cottbus and plenty of our men saw it if he needs any witnesses."

Importation of Beverage Cane Spirits Into the United States

REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday I unfolded to this House the amazing story of favoritism by the State Department to the Schenley Corporation, one of America's largest liquor importers.

I believe anybody who will examine the speech which I made on that occasion will find justification, sound logic, and reasoning behind the conclusions which I drew.

At the time when I appeared on the floor I gave to the House the benefit of Schenley's side of the discussion, and repeated the denials made by Schenley that there had been no violations or intention to violate on their part. In subsequent press releases from New York the Schenley Corporation made it appear that I had ignored them completely in my address on the floor and had deliberately not presented their side.

Of course the record speaks for itself as to what the true facts are, not only in that instance but in the instance as to who was favored in connection with the issuance of rum permits through the intercession of the State Department.

After I delivered the speech on the floor I made the offer to Schenley, through mutual friends, to put in the RECORD any statement or refutation which that organization would care to make in connection with my representations on the floor of this House. My sense of fairness and a desire to get all the facts to you certainly left me no alternative even if I had desired at any time to hide all the facts surrounding this amazing transaction.

On Tuesday morning I had a telegram from Mr. Lester E. Jacobi, president of the Schenley Corporation, which I ask permission of the House at this time to include in these remarks and which repeats the position of Schenley as I stated it on the floor of the House in my original address.

I urge you to read this statement carefully. It is the statement of the president of the Schenley Corporation himself. After reading it I ask you to decide for yourself whether or not Schenley was shown any favoritism.

In reading the statement of the Schenley Corporation let me direct your attention to the sentence which says:

We made no application to the War Production Board other than the general application referred to above.

As far as I know, and according to the instructions in the original order, individual applications were to be made for specific authorization to import rum. Of my own personal knowledge, and as a matter of record with the War Production Board, all the little fellows who filed applications not only had to prove that negotiations had been entered into before the effective date of the embargo but in addition were repeatedly called upon to furnish documentary evidence that they had suffered financial loss and had issued letters of credit which impaired their financial standing in their banking transactions.

They were repeatedly asked for further evidence and documentary proof. I give you these facts in contrast to what actually happened in the Schenley case where they made an application for a blanket importation permit, quite different from the applications made by these little fellows in distress.

They offered no documentary evidence of loss, yet, admittedly in their own statement, without application or request from the State Department, the State Department gratuitously ordered handed them two authorizations for specific importations of rum.

Obviously, I could continue further to discuss this amazing case in which favoritism has been denied, but why take up the time of the House when the record is so clear in the case?

I might add that I have heard nothing from the State Department or the Department of Justice in connection with these revelations.

I herewith submit to you the statement as telegraphed me by Mr. Lester E. Jacobi, president of Schenley Distillers Corporation, and ask that you read it carefully and consider Mr. Jacobi's explanation in the fullest:

SIR: With reference to your speech in Congress today concerning shipments of rum from Martinique to the United States we desire to confirm the following statements previously made to you. We trust that in fairness you will feel it appropriate to insert these facts in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and that you will take such other steps as you reasonably can to undo the serious damage to our reputation and good will resulting from unfounded charges concerning our company.

The facts are as follows: 1. After March 9, 1943, when the War Production Board's order M-374 was issued, Schenley authorized no shipments of rum from Martinique and Guadeloupe to the United States. To the contrary, we specifically instructed the French West Indies shippers to make no further shipments until permits had been obtained.

2. Schenley, in accordance with War Production Board regulations, on March 27, 1943, filed with the War Production Board an application for authority to import in 1944 a quantity of rum from Martinique and Guadeloupe equivalent to our 1943 importations.

3. On April 19, 1944, Schenley was advised by Messrs. W. R. Zanes & Co., customs brokers in New Orleans that fifteen hundred casks of Martinique rum were arriving at New Orleans consigned to Schenley. We instructed the customs brokers, confirming the advice by writing as follows:

"As explained over the telephone, this shipment was not authorized by us, and we have absolutely no intention whatsoever to claim same on its arrival."

4. We made no application to the War Production Board other than the general application referred to above.

5. Schenley has made no representations whatsoever to the State Department in connection with the matter.

6. On April 26, 1944, Schenley received a telegram from the War Production Board signed by J. Joseph Whelan, reading: "Pursuant to paragraph (C) of order M-374 you are hereby authorized to import fifteen hundred barrels young rum from Martinique now held United States Customs, New Orleans, La. The number of your permit in accordance with paragraph (H), order M-374, is FWIM-1."

7. On May 12, 1944, Schenley received the following telegram from the War Production Board: "Pursuant to paragraph (c) M-374, you are hereby authorized to import forty-five hundred barrels of young rum containing 360,000 proof gallons from French West Indies. The number of your permit in accordance with paragraph (H) is FWI-3."

8. Use of the rum at Schenley's plants was not begun until May 22, 1944.

Respectfully,

LESTER E. JACOBI,
President, Schenley Distillers Corporation.

Can We Feed the World?

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, may I for a few minutes discuss the theme of our capacity to feed the world. Official propaganda promises a new world, with freedom from want for everybody after the war. Apparently all the world is being encouraged to depend on the United States to bring this about.

Does it ever strike you, sir, that if humanity could not in 5,000 years of known history devise means to prevent wholesale starvation among teeming millions of Asiatic peoples; if we could not, even in this the most efficient, the most prosperous of all countries, prevent large numbers of our own people from being ill-housed, ill-clothed, and ill-fed, how shall we hope to achieve freedom from want for all the world as well as ourselves, as a result of long years of world-wide war, with its attendant destruction of the resources of the world?

How can we expect better days than ever before in history at a time when almost every man and woman has been uprooted from his or her peacetime work? Is it not more likely that we in America shall have to start all over again while nursing the wounds of war and having a bitter struggle to reestablish our own economy? The economic problems ahead of us are infinitely greater than have been those of the past few years.

The press reports of May 22, 1944, state that the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations gave this picture of the food situation in Europe:

Austria and Czechoslovakia, the situation remains passable, but food standards are lower than in Germany proper. Poland, much worse than in any other area with the exception of Greece. Liberated Italy, a large portion of the population must continue to depend on imports. Occupied Italy, unsatisfactory due to growing unrest among farmers, and disruption of distribution. France, a 1943 harvest better than 1942 prevented a further decline. Belgium, food consumption remains low with dependence on Axis-controlled areas. Finland and Sweden, better than a year ago. Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, and Yugoslavia, taken as a whole, are in a more favorable position than in 1941-42. Greece remains unsatisfactory, especially in urban areas.

Hence, in the light of all the circumstances, Greece and Poland offer the only great problems of food relief. They must be helped. But we Americans cannot feed all the world. If we solved our domestic problem of assuring every American an adequate amount of food, we should have very little left over with which to help others. Even if we were all willing, because of the magnitude of the world catastrophe, to make great sacrifices, to go on with food rationing for several years, even then our surplus would be but a drop in the bucket. A fine gesture of good will, but very little more.

Experts tell us that it requires 2½ acres of land to feed and clothe the average American. In the world at large, there are but 2 acres of crop land available for each inhabitant and the land is not evenly distributed. Actually, American farmers this year intend to plant 374,000,000 acres of crops, which compares with the 374,000,000 acres in the peak year of 1932. In 1943, the crop yield came from 361,000,000 acres, and the 10-year average was 354,000,000 acres. How difficult it is to expand the average and how impossible it is to do it in an efficient way may be gathered from the plans of the United States Reclamation Bureau for free irrigation of 4,000,000 acres of submarginal land in the upper Missouri Valley. It is called free, but it would be free to the owner of that poor land only. The cost, every dollar of it, would have to be carried by you and every taxpayer in America.

How can we produce a sufficiently substantial surplus to be of much help in feeding the war-devastated nations? One may argue that we could produce more by using more machinery, better fertilizer, and using better farming methods. To some extent this may be true. However our practical experience up to this very day is that the contributions of science, great though they may be, have been fully offset by the deterioration of the natural soil fertility, as has been pointed out recently by Dr. Karl Sax, in an article in the January 1944 Scientific Monthly. He says:

We are little more than maintaining crop yields at a stationary level in spite of remarkable advances in agricultural science.

And he adds that:

We could produce more food by more intensive cultivation and by using more submarginal land, but this could be done only by lowering the living standards of the entire population.

The Office of Foreign Aricultural Relations states:

Up to now the German people have fared much better with respect to food than in the last war, because of seizures of food stocks from occupied countries and due to the efficiency of the Nazi food distribution system. The cumulative effect over the war years of shortages in agricultural manpower, fertilizers, draft power, farm equipment, and machinery does not augur well for crop production this year in Germany.

The same is true in America. Secretary of Agriculture Claude R. Wickard, in a recent Chicago address, stated:

One of the biggest problems facing American agriculture after the war will be to find a good market for all the American farmers want to produce and can produce within the limits of sound farming methods.

Thus we have contradictory views among the experts.

However, America is rapidly approaching an event in her economic history which will be of great consequence to our way of living. We apparently are near the point where we cannot feed many more people at present-day living standards. We have reached that stage of population growth where the annual increase becomes ever smaller, as in the Scandinavian countries, and it will in time be altogether eliminated, as it is in France. Even the other countries, such as Canada, the Argentine, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa consume an ever-increasing part of their abundant food production themselves so that the surpluses available for export are dwindling rapidly.

In Europe and Asia there is but one country, namely the Soviet Union, which has the natural agricultural resources to feed a larger population than she sustains at present. In India, in China, and in Japan, there is no possibility whatever of feeding the people on local farm products. There is little we can do about it. Temporary relief measures are only stopgaps. There is nothing we can do to create in this world a Utopian order, with freedom from want. It is unrealistic and it is unfair to ourselves, and to those we so thoughtlessly deceive with false promises.

I do not desire to discourage generosity and sacrifice in helping those in need, but I do want to suggest that we, along with the other people in the world, will face problems that will be the bitter aftermath of the war. All nations will have these problems, and all will try within their limitations to solve them as best they can. I see no reason why we should bring upon ourselves a world-wide responsibility we obviously cannot carry.

There is another phase of this whole question which must be given careful thought; that is, if we work up a propaganda in this country, calling for the cultivation of all the land under uneconomical conditions of excessive fertilization and other unsound agricultural methods, all to be carried out at the expense of our taxpayers through governmental grants or operation, we might very easily produce a condition of complete depression for American agriculture. In other words, if we attempted free of charge to feed all the war-devastated peoples, it is obvious that we could not continue to do it indefinitely. It is also obvious that those countries will not, in the next two or three generations, have the money with which to pay us for our products. Nor can they produce other products by which to repay us. For years everything we have imported which does not compete with our own producers, has been on the tariff free list. Therefore, we must give some thought to the danger which may arise of encouraging overproduction of agricultural products in this country, and of producing a condition such as resulted in the deflation of American agriculture after World War No. 1.

If such problems were so flexible that they could be made susceptible of a short-term policy of a year or 2 years, or a few months, then we might think about engaging temporarily in an over-expanded agriculture. However, such problems are not susceptible of a short-term policy. We ought not to fool ourselves.

Already many of those who are best acquainted with farming problems in the West are beginning to fear that we may encourage agricultural overproduction on submarginal and other uneconomical land that would lead into a governmental competition with private farming. This could be brought about by the Government undertaking to finance or to farm the uneconomical land at the expense of the taxpayers, in order to give the food away to peoples elsewhere in the world.

This whole problem will have to be settled not by impulses of the heart, but by calm reasoning of the head. We all regret that we cannot wave a magic wand and take the "four freedoms" to all the other peoples in the world—although there are some who doubt that that would be the best thing for some peoples. I have in mind India and Mr. Churchill. However, this is not a question to be controlled by emotionalism; it is a cold, hard question of fact and actual conditions. It is not a question of what we would like to do, it is a question of what we can or cannot do.

It does appear, when viewed from all these angles, that the propagandists are planting a great crop of deception, which will blossom into intense hatreds of us on the part of other nations if we do not begin to make the world understand that ours is not a great productive and inexhaustible horn of plenty which can pour forth a ceaseless stream of food, and raiment, and shelter, for the destitute of all the world.

It has not been so many years since we were called "Uncle Shylock" because we ventured to suggest that solemn obligations of war debts be met by other nations. This time we have not fooled ourselves, except that the false term "lend-lease" should have been designed "give" in the first place, so the American people would understand what is happening.

We in America, of course, want to do all we can to relieve suffering humanity, but manifestly we do not want to turn our own citizens out into the highways and byways destitute of food, clothing, and shelter here in America in order to provide food, clothing, and shelter for the other peoples of the world.

Dedication of Cities Service Plant at Lake Charles, La.

REMARKS

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, an event of national importance last Friday, May 26, 1944, in Lake Charles, my Seventh Congressional District of Louisiana, where I participated, and of which I, my constituents, and the people of Louisiana are duly proud, was the dedication of one of the world's largest 100-octane and butadiene plants.

With this giant plant at Lake Charles, La., Cities Service, in cooperation with the Government, takes a tremendous stride toward meeting two most vital war needs.

Where the pine trees grew on the banks of the sleepy Calcasieu River a few months ago, stands today this mighty symbol of American brain and brawn.

Sired by the necessity of war, the plant means more power to the armed forces, for it turns out great quantities of high-octane aviation gasoline and ingredients for synthetic rubber.

Created from the ground up, it includes the very latest, up-to-the-minute discoveries and inventions; and when peace comes, its efficiency will be devoted to higher standards of living everywhere.

Wholly dedicated to bringing the war to an earlier close, this great accomplishment is an outstanding example of what can be achieved by the winning team of Government and industry, working together, shoulder to shoulder, in the battle for freedom and peace.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in my remarks a few of the high lights about the great Cities Service refinery and butadiene plants near Lake Charles, La.

First. Over 2,250,000 tons of dirt were removed in dredging.

Second. Over 1,200,000 tons of dirt were excavated for foundations.

Third. Over 150,000 cubic yards of concrete and over 3,500 tons of reinforced steel were used.

Fourth. Over 1,500,000 board feet of lumber was reclaimed from the trees cleared from the plant site.

Fifth. Fifteen miles of improved roads are within the plant site.

Sixth. Fourteen miles of railroads are within the plant site.

Seventh. Over 1,500 major high-precision instruments used in controlling operations.

Eighth. Largest two-stage absorption-type refrigeration plant in the world manufacturing more than 6,500,000 pounds of ice per day. This is sufficient to supply ice to several cities such as Cleveland and Baltimore.

Ninth. An electric power plant of 50,000-kilowatt capacity which is large enough to furnish electricity to a city such as St. Paul, Omaha, and Akron.

Tenth. Uses over 43,000,000 gallons of water per day, or more than enough to supply the residential requirement of the city of Chicago.

Eleventh. Processes 100,000 barrels of crude oil per day.

Twelfth. Has over 500 electric motors.

Thirteenth. Will produce 37 intermediate and finished petroleum products all vitally important to the war effort and, as major war products, produces more than 300,000,000 gallons per year of 100 octane aviation gasoline—enough fuel to put 1,000 bombers over Berlin every day.

Fourteenth. Will produce approximately 60,000 tons of butadiene per year for the manufacture of synthetic rubber approximately 10 percent of the pre-war rubber requirements of the United States. Equivalent to approximately 12,000,000 average passenger tires per year which would provide one tire per year for every motor vehicle on the road.

Fifteenth. Over 700 pumps used in the operation.

The dedication, attended by thousands of workers and Government, industrial, and military officials, was held on the site of the actone plant which produces 25,000 barrels a day, with Ford Bond, network radio announcer, as master of ceremonies.

DEDICATED TO SERVICEMEN

The plants, the largest integrated plants in the world, were dedicated to the boys on the front and to Temple W. Tutwilder, president of the Cities Service Refining Corporation. W. Alton Jones, Cities Service Co. president, made the dedication.

Prominent persons seated on the platform and taking part in the program included Admiral Mathews, Brig. Gen. Henry C. Pratt, Mr. Jones, Mr. Tutwilder, Ralph K. Davies, Deputy Petroleum Administrator; Harvey S. Firestone, Jr., president, Firestone Tire & Rubber Co.; George H. Hill, Jr., executive vice president, Defense Supplies Corporation; W. E. O'Brien, Assistant Rubber Director; Gov. James H. Davis; Former Gov. Sam H. Jones; and Henry D. Larcade, Jr., and James H. Morrison, Louisiana Congressmen.

HONOR FIGHTING MEN

In making the dedication Mr. Jones said it was to honor the fighting men and Mr. Tutwiler, who had "dreamed big dreams and as had the ability and capacity to make these dreams come true."

Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to include in my remarks my address delivered at the dedicatory ceremonies in Lake Charles, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, as your Representative of the Seventh Congressional District it is an honor to accompany the high officials of our Government and Cities Service Co. present here today to dedication ceremonies of great war and peace industries built under their supervision. I say war and peace because these industries will not only serve our Nation in war, but also in peace.

All of those who contributed to the location and building of these great industries here are due our thanks. Those who planned and supervised them, those who bought bonds to pay for them, as well as labor who worked so expeditiously and loyally to build them.

Most people are apt to think of Washington, the Nation's Capital, as the source of the country's power and wisdom, but we who represent you there know this is not true. The source of any country's strength and wisdom comes from the farms and hamlets and cities and parishes.

Washington is not the giver of every good gift: It can only distribute what the people provide.

So, today, I realize this truth more than ever as I view these magnificent plants. Just as from the broad stretches of this fair land come the young men and women to defend us when danger impends, so the implements of warfare come from the grass roots and crossroads of the Nation.

That is why I am always glad to steal away whenever possible and visit home. It renews one's faith in our institutions; it arouses the greatest patriotic emotions to see here at home the energy and resourcefulness displayed in translating Louisiana oil into power to drive the planes and tanks and ships our soldiers drive through the jungles and into Hitler Europe on invasion barges.

Together, America's freemen on battle front and home front will gloriously uphold our traditions and thus keep shining a beacon light of hope for the other countries of the world.

Hon. Everett M. Dirksen

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, several months ago my distinguished colleague [Mr. DIRKSEN] from the Sixteenth District of Illinois formally announced his candidacy for the Republican nomination for President of the United States. He has since traveled many thousands of miles, visiting State after State, industrial cities and farming communities. Everywhere he has been enthusiastically received.

The people who have been privileged to meet and hear EVERETT DIRKSEN quickly saw in him what we who have served with him in Congress so well know to be the character and ability of the man. He has convictions and, equally important, he has the courage of his convictions. And, too, he is endowed with the ability to express his convictions persuasively. On many occasions we have seen him win his point here on the floor through the power of his oratory.

It is not simply that he has the ability to speak well on the floor of the House or on the public platform. It is not just excellence in elocution. The power of Congressman DIRKSEN's oratory seems to me to spring from the fact that he fearlessly expresses his convictions, arrived at only after a painstaking examination of facts, without thought of whether the opinion may be popular or may have political repercussions. While we may not always agree with his conclusions, I do not think there is a single Member of Congress—Democrat or Republican—who does not have respect for his views. His sincerity no one can fail to recognize, to appreciate and admire.

When EVERETT DIRKSEN yielded to the urgings of his colleagues in Congress to become a candidate for the Republican nomination for President, he was not seeking to satisfy some personal ambition. He is simply seeking an opportunity to serve the country. If you followed the speeches he has been making you will have noted that he has refrained from personal attacks, has not sought to extol himself, but rather has dealt with the fundamental issues.

Twenty-one out of the 31 Presidents of the United States served in the House or Senate or both. Legislative experience is invaluable for one who would lead the people, and in the difficult reconstruction period, we will need in the White House someone who understands the relationship between the executive and legislative. EVERETT DIRKSEN is such a man.

It may be that he will not be nominated for President, but the Republican Party and the country will still have the benefit of his unusual talents if he is selected as the candidate for Vice President. If Governor Dewey should be the Republican choice for President, I can think of no better combination than Dewey and DIRKSEN—a distinguished State executive and a distinguished national legislator.

The Late Dr. W. T. Lowrey

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the entire South is in mourning over the death of one of her most valuable sons, Dr. William T. Lowrey, of Mississippi, who passed away at the home of his daughter in Waco, Tex., on last Sunday.

Dr. Lowrey was a brother of our former colleague, Hon. B. G. Lowrey, a son of General Lowrey of the Confederate Army, and one of the great educational and spiritual leaders of the South.

He was at one time the head of the Blue Mountain Female College, which his father founded. At another time he was head of Mississippi College, and at another time he was head of the Gulf Coast Military Academy. During his long and eventful career I dare say there was not a man in America who contributed more to the educational, moral, and spiritual uplift of American life than did Dr. William T. Lowrey, of Mississippi.

He was one of the greatest forces for good our State has ever produced.

An editorial in the Memphis Commercial Appeal, which came to my desk today, says:

> Dr. William Tyndall Lowrey died on Sunday morning at the home of a daughter in Waco, Tex. In the length of his life's span—he was 86 years old—he had far exceeded man's usual allotment of time on earth, but even more notably had he surpassed the ordinary in the kindly, constructive, and Christian purposes to which he had unswervingly dedicated splendid talents of mind, heart, and spirit.
> Dr. Lowrey's work for education in Mississippi is written large and clear on the records of the State. He had served with distinction as head of Blue Mountain College, where he wisely directed the institution's destinies for 27 years. He had been of like service to Mississippi College, Hillman College, Clarke College, and Gulf Coast Military Academy. While most of his life was devoted to educational endeavor, he also served Baptist pastorates with fidelity and zeal, especially in his earlier years.
> From the founding of the Baptist Hospital here in Memphis until early this year, Dr. Lowrey had been president of the institution's board of directors, and at all times was a tower of strength and inspiration to it. Particularly was he instrumental in helping the hospital to the firm foundation it now occupies financially as well as in point of service to the community. Dr. Lowrey also wrote clearly, and was widely read all through the South.
> The Christian character of Dr. Lowrey shone through and permeated everything he accomplished to add immeasurably to the intrinsic values of his many contributions to the progress of his State and section. That physical memorials will be raised to honor his memory is certain, but the greatest monument is found in the countless lives he touched, enriched, and influenced for good.

With those sentiments the people of the entire South will agree.

Purchase of Dresses for Relief Purposes Oversea

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 25, on page 5006, a statement was made by my esteemed colleague the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARTLEY] on the question of dresses purchased for relief purposes overseas. I deeply regret that the gentleman did not have the correct information about this matter and I am sorry that the proper department was not requested to furnish the correct data, for a great deal of publicity has been given to these erroneous statements. I have here a letter addressed to me under date of May 29 by the Honorable Leo T. Crowley, Administrator of the Foreign Economic Administration, setting forth the real facts. No dresses have been purchased for distribution abroad by the U. N. R. R. A. Some dresses, averaging a cost of $1 per dress, at the specific request of the War Department, are being purchased under the supervision of the Foreign Economic Administration for distribution by the United States Army to meet vital civilian needs during military operations for the liberation of Europe.

This is an integral part of the military program to furnish an essential minimum of food, clothing, and other civilian supplies necessary to sustain life during the period of active fighting, and, as Mr. Crowley points out, the great majority of these supplies will be distributed through regular commercial channels and paid for.

I sincerely hope and trust that in the future rumors and statements of the sort made the other day will be carefully checked with the proper Government authorities so as to prevent the dissemination of erroneous and misleading information.

> FOREIGN ECONOMIC ADMINISTRATION,
> Washington D. C., May 28, 1944.
> Hon. SOL BLOOM,
> House of Representatives,
> Washington, D. C.
> DEAR REPRESENTATIVE BLOOM: In accordance with your request, I am supplying you, as the Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, with the facts concerning the dresses referred to by Congressman HARTLEY in his statement which appeared on page 5006 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 25, 1944.

No dresses have been purchased for distribution abroad by the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. None will be purchased for this purpose until an appropriation is voted by Congress for the purchase of supplies for U. N. R. R. A.

At the specific request of the War Department, some dresses are being purchased under the supervision of the Foreign Economic Administration for distribution by the United States Army to meet vital civilian needs during military operations for the liberation of Europe. Provision by our Army of the essential minimum of food, clothing, and other civilian supplies necessary to sustain life during the period of active fighting is, of course, an integral part of our military operations. The great majority of these supplies will be distributed through regular commercial channels and paid for.

The total number of dresses up to now placed in procurement at the request of the War Department for this program is somewhat less than 850,000. This figure includes all types of cotton dresses for children, girls, misses, and women. Of this total, there will be less than 250,000 manufactured from the fabric to which Mr. HARTLEY referred as "seersucker." This fabric is a cheaper substitute for genuine seersucker. It is known technically as plisse. It is a printed cloth. Genuine seersucker is woven. Since we have not seen the dress which Congressman HARTLEY displayed, we do not know whether it was made of this substitute material. No genuine seersucker has been purchased for the Army-F. E. A. civilian supply program.

Virtually all of the plisse dresses are manufactured out of goods originally purchased by the Quartermaster General for fatigue uniforms for the Women's Army Corps. These goods were in excess of the needs of the Women's Army Corps and were, therefore, made available for the purposes stated. The cost of these dresses to the Government, including the cost of the fabric, the cost of manufacture and the cost of packing for export (which is necessarily a more expensive type of packing than the usual packing for the domestic market) averages approximately $1 per dress. It is clear that at this price these dresses must be of simple and inexpensive grade.

Congressman HARTLEY displayed two other dresses costing $3.95 and $4.95, which he referred to as the "most expensive seersucker dresses that are available for purchase by American women." Actually, I am informed, such dresses are sold regularly in retail shops in this country of a quality which commands prices up to three and four times the figures Congressman HARTLEY mentioned.

In meeting the requirements of the United States Army for dresses and other civilian clothing to be distributed in connection with our military operations, every effort has been made to tap sources of supply which would yield the needed clothing with a minimum impact against civilian supply in this country. We have been utilizing old C. C. C. and W. P. A. stocks, second-hand clothing from the commercial market and from voluntary donations, military "rejects," obsolete Army goods, and other army clothing which is declared surplus from time to time and which we are having reconditioned for use in the Army-F. E. A. program. The specifications for such civilian clothing as is newly manufactured for the program call for low cost, durability, and practicability.

Our shipments will go to peoples who have been virtually without clothing replacements during the past 4 or more years. The need is acute. Our information indicates that during the past winter deaths from exposure in occupied Europe were at least equal to deaths from starvation.

The total number of garments of all types up to now in procurement under the Army-F. E. A. program for shipment to the peoples of liberated Europe is an extremely small percentage of the clothing which is manufactured for and sold to civilians in the United States. This is, it seems to me, hardly an excessive contribution to make toward providing some of the minimum necessities of peoples who have maintained with unflinching courage and at untold sacrifice their underground resistance to the Nazi aggressors and who will rise to join with us in the battles for the liberation of Europe and the winning of final victory.

Sincerely yours,

LEO T. CROWLEY,
Administrator.

Fair Employment Practice Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LOUIS E. MILLER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 26, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I hope that when the Tarver amendment reaches the floor of the House for a roll-call vote it will be defeated. This amendment seeks to destroy the life of the F. E. P. C. and the protection that it affords the Negro in industry. I am opposed to this.

The order creating the F. E. P. C. contains the following language:

> It is the policy of the United States to encourage full participation in the war effort by all persons in the United States, regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin.

In sincerity I ask, What is wrong with such a policy in wartime or peacetime? The opponents of F. E. P. C. contend that it creates dissension and disunity in plants devoted to making the implements of war. On the contrary, I deny this. Instead, every impartial person must concede that to win this war quickly and effectively we must produce more, faster than our enemies do. You may be sure that such a result will produce dissention, disunity, and ultimate defeat for our enemies and only victory for ourselves.

For months we have heard frantic appeals from the War and Navy Departments, from the Manpower Commission, and from the Director of Selective Service about the manpower shortage and the need to conscript labor, while at the same time there is an abundance of Negro manpower in this country of skilled and unskilled labor who are literally knocking at the door of industry and begging for the opportunity to fill the jobs for which their hands and brains are suited.

Despite the admitted manpower shortage, there have been instances in my home city of St. Louis where Negroes were denied positions in specialized fields of civil service, and cases, too, where the Manpower Commission made no apparent effort to place them in industry. Instead of a Presidential order prohibiting discrimination against persons in defense industries because of race, creed, or color—which has proved to be unenforcible—I favor the passage of the bill introduced by my colleague from Indiana [Mr. LAFOLLETTE], which would make the F. E. P. C. permanent and provide the legislation necessary to insure complete protection to those against whom discrimination in employment is generally practiced, the Negro. For years I have fought against discrimination, intolerance, and bigotry in every form. Wherever and whenever it has raised its hideous head, I have tried to destroy it.

Last September, as a member of the Republican Post-war Advisory Council, at its meeting at Mackinac Island, I proposed the following declaration of policy, which was unanimously adopted by the conference:

> The Republican Party insists upon equality of opportunity for all Americans regardless of race, color, or creed in the economic, educational, political, and military life of the Nation.

That is the creed of my party—that is the American doctrine of fair play—those are the precepts which I have followed in and outside of this Congress.

The opponents of fair play and equal opportunity assert that there is no foundation upon which F. E. P. C. can rest—that the committee is a nondescript collection of individuals acting without authority and contrary to the public policy of the Nation. This argument cannot stand the test of an honest inquiry. Let me remind them that it was Lincoln in his emancipation proclamation who plowed the first furrow for F. E. P. C. when he struck the shackles of bondage from the Negro and led him for the first time upon the high ground of freedom and equality of opportunity. And that is all that I am contending for here today—but that is something which I shall continue to contend for until final victory is assured.

That discrimination does exist in employment, no one can safely deny; that these abuses should be corrected, it must be admitted; and that there is authority, precedent, and national policy for action by this body can hardly be questioned. In fact, in 1870 the first of the civil-rights statutes was passed—Eighth United States Code, section 41—which provided equal security under the law for all races against economic or employment discrimination. Then, in later years, the Congress has consistently enacted legislation concerning relief and public works in which it was forbidden to discriminate against any person because of race, color, or creed. And the same provision has been inserted into legislation dealing with the national defense program and the Selective Service Act.

In searching for precedents for F. E. P. C. or a national policy approving it, let me remind you also that our Federal civil-service system provides that employees shall be selected upon a basis of personal fitness and ability, and shall not be discriminated against because of race or color.

The national policy has been defined and firmly established in numerous decisions of our Supreme Court dealing with the proposition that all Americans are entitled to fair treatment, equal opportunities and equal rights, and that race or color is no excuse for denying to any citizen the protection enjoyed by another citizen.

Again, when large sums of money were appropriated to land-grant colleges and for educational assistance to the States, it was the general opinion of Members of the Congress that all groups should benefit equally and without injustice to any creed, class, or race.

Although Congress provided for the training of defense workers without discrimination on account of color or creed, if after such persons have been trained they are discriminated against in obtaining employment in defense industries, then I contend that Congress is, and most certainly should be, concerned as to whether these provisions of the law are being respected and faithfully executed.

Let us examine the record and frankly determine if there is need for congressional action. I have given some examples within the range of my observation in my home city. What is the picture from a national viewpoint? The most reliable information on the subject reveals that only 7 percent of those employed in defense industries are Negroes. Civil-rights legislation or antidiscriminatory laws mean little if they are merely left idle to mold on the statute books. They must be backed by the power and the will to enforce them.

The legislation which we are now considering provides the funds to ferret out and bring to light the manifold instances of discrimination which have occurred. This amendment would take away the appropriation and destroy the committee whose duty it is to point out cases which violate the laws that have already been enacted. To kill this committee would be very much like shooting the bloodhound upon whom you depended to locate and stalk the felon who has committed a crime.

Let us cast aside sectional shortsightedness and provincial prejudices and focus our vision, our efforts, and our energies upon the all-important and all-consuming task that lies ahead—the job of winning this war, preserving permanent peace, and a sound prosperity for those at home and those who will return home.

It is empty to talk about this Nation becoming the arsenal of democracy unless and until we are willing to employ the sinews and skills of idle thousands of American Negroes who are anxious to show and are just aching for the opportunity to prove that they can man the machines and fill the positions created by the manpower shortage. What the arsenal of democracy does will be felt around the world, but what we do about making democracy work at home will forever afford a test of our faith in the institutions of free government.

Can anyone in this Chamber assert that there is not authority for our opposition to this amendment or cause for the continuance of a program that provides a protection against discrimination in employment? Have you ever considered the bitter ironies that come to American Negroes who serve and die in war planes and ships built in American factories which deprived them of jobs before they were called to the colors? What a pathetic parody upon patriotism if the men and women fighting upon freedom's front should return to find this liberty of action and opportunity is limited by color, race, or creed. We speak of the liberation of the continent of Europe in the coming invasion. I speak for the liberation of men from the prejudices of the past in order that they may enjoy equality of opportunity now and equal protection of the laws in the future. This is a just request and calls for no apology, as it finds its precedent in our public policy and its counterpart in our Constitution and its amendments.

In the reconversion period these principles and precepts will be truly tested and tried. Remember the old saying that "the Negro is the first to be fired and the last to be hired." Following the war we shall see tremendous plants devoted to national defense reconverted to peacetime production. It will take time to retool—this will call for a period of patience—but we must make sure that this will not be used as a pretext for keeping patriotic American Negroes off the pay roll.

If we will but make F. E. P. C. a permanent law and provide it with the authority and force to insure all Americans equal opportunity and equal protection of law in employment, then we can proudly proclaim to the world that those who have died shall not have died in vain, and that at last we have made democracy work in America.

Rehabilitation of Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I include as a part of my remarks an article written by Col. John N. Smith, Jr., director of the Institute for the Crippled and Disabled in New York City, which was published in the Catholic Charities Review for May 1944.

Now that our disabled soldiers and sailors are beginning to return, there is a renewed interest in rehabilitation. It is the duty of our Government to send them back to civil life properly equipped to resume their former civilian pursuits, if possible. If not, then to rehabilitate and train them in some other field which minimizes their disability and will enable them to take their proper place in society.

The manpower shortage has perhaps made us realize more than any other single factor the value of disabled workers. Those who have not been properly rehabilitated are competing with able-bodied workers in practically all fields of commerce and industry.

Colonel Smith's article describes the programs of the armed forces of the Veterans' Administration and the Joint Federal-State program for disabled civilians. Because of his long experience in rehabilitation work, Colonel Smith is able to present a clear definition of these programs as well as the ultimate objectives sought under them.

The article follows:

PUBLIC REHABILITATION PROGRAMS—A SURVEY OF THE FIELD

(By Col. John N. Smith, Jr., director, Institute for the Crippled and Disabled, New York, N. Y.)

Rehabilitation has been defined as the "restoration of a handicapped (disabled) person to the fullest physical, mental, social, vocational, and economic usefulness of which he is capable." If we accept this definition we find many programs under the auspices of Federal, State, and local public agencies which provide some phases of rehabilitation for various classes and groups of individuals and for various specific purposes. This discussion will be confined to the programs of the Veterans' Administration for disabled veterans of World War No. 2; the joint Federal-State program for disabled civilians; and those conducted by the armed forces with a view to returning disabled members thereof to further military or naval duty or assignments within the scope of their remaining physical capacities.

ARMED FORCES PROGRAMS

While the present war is in progress it is essential for the conservation of manpower that no man or woman, trained in military or naval duty, be discharged from the armed forces who can be rehabilitated to an extent that he or she can be assigned to other duties within those forces commensurate with the disability. With this end in view, all of the components of the armed forces have set up rehabilitation programs, generally under the supervision and direction of their medical services. These programs are known under various names but extend from the application of physical and medical measures alone, to include all of the other measures involved in the broad definition of rehabilitation previously quoted.

The effort has been very successful and many men and women who, if serving in the last World War would have been discharged from the armed forces for disability, are now being saved for further military or naval duty. Naturally, however, there are others who cannot undertake these programs successfully because of severity of disability. These are being discharged but not until they have received the best of medical, physical, and other care by the armed forces. After discharge they are entitled to further rehabilitative treatment by the Veterans' Administration dependent, generally, upon whether their disabilities are service connected, whether they received honorable discharges, or whether they meet certain other requirements under existing law. If not entitled to such treatment by the Veterans' Administration, they are, as civilians, entitled to service through the Federal-State civilian rehabilitation program, if they meet the conditions imposed by law for entitlement to that program.

VETERAN REHABILITATION PROGRAM

Under existing law any veteran of World War No. 2, not dishonorably discharged, who has a service-incurred disability requiring such care, treatment, or appliance, or who has tuberculosis or a neuropsychiatric ailment, is entitled to medical treatment, hospital treatment, prosthetic appliances, and domiciliary care by the Veterans' Administration.

In addition, but contingent upon availability of facilities, any veteran of the present war, not dishonorably discharged, suffering from a disability, disease, or defect, who is in need of such care and unable to defray the expenses thereof, regardless of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service, is entitled to hospital or domiciliary care by the Veterans' Administration.

Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved March 24, 1943, provides:

1. That any person who served in the active military or naval service at any time after December 6, 1941, and prior to the termination of the present war;

2. And was honorably discharged;

3. And who has a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which pension is payable under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, or would be but for receipt of retirement pay; and

4. Who is in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability, shall be entitled to such vocational rehabilitation as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to fit him for employment consistent with the degree of disablement.

The courses of training prescribed may not exceed 4 years and may not extend beyond 6 years after the termination of the present war. While the disabled veteran is in training, his pension, unless it equals or exceeds such amounts, is increased to $80 per month, if single, $90 per month if married, with $5 additional for each child and $10 additional for each dependent parent. All expenses of training, including necessary transportation, are paid. Medical care is given as required. In carrying out the vocational rehabilitation program, it is the purpose of the Veterans' Administration to utilize educational institutions and establishments of recognized standing.

In addition to medical and hospital care, prosthetic appliances, domiciliary care, and vocational rehabilitation, the Veterans' Administration provides pensions, disability compensation, and other monetary benefits, insurance, and other services to veterans. Generally, applications for any of these benefits are made to the local Veterans' Administration facility having jurisdiction over the territory in which the veteran resides. There are 53 of these facilities bound, generally, by State boundaries, with some States having more than one. It is suggested that private voluntary agencies obtain the following documents for general information respecting veterans' benefits: Handbook for Servicemen and Servicewomen of World War II and Their Dependents, House Document No. 394, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, United States Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C., 1944; and Veterans' Legislation, House Committee Print, Seventy-eighth Congress, first session, Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C., 1943, printed for the use of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. It is suggested further that voluntary agencies make contact from time to time with the officials in their local Veterans' Administration facilities.

JOINT FEDERAL-STATE PROGRAMS

Public Law No. 116, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved July 6, 1943, known as the vocational rehabilitation amendments of 1943, provides for a comprehensive program of rehabilitation for civilians. The scope of services available to disabled persons includes any services necessary to render them capable of engaging in remunerative employment or to render them more advantag ously employable. These include, within certain limitations, surgical or medical care, hospitalization, therapeutic treatment, artificial appliances, vocational guidance and training, maintenance during training, and placement in employment.

It is a joint Federal-State program where the Federal Government assists the States financially in carrying out State plans for rehabilitation meeting certain standards and conditions set up in the law and regulations made thereunder. At the Federal level, it is administered by the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, Federal Security Agency. Sole responsibility for the administration, supervision, and control of the federally approved State program rests with the State boards of vocational education. Where there is a State commission or other agency for the blind, that commission or agency administers the part of the program pertaining to that group.

The new law broadens the services in the joint program established by the Civilian Vocational Rehabilitation Act of June 2, 1920, principally through the inclusion of the various measures of medical and physical restoration. Medical officers of the United States Public Health Service have been assigned to the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation to organize and administer these new features. It is the expressed intent of the officials in charge that there be cooperative effort not only with other Federal and State agencies engaged in various phases of rehabilitation, but also with the private voluntary agencies engaged in such work, and that these agencies be utilized in the program.

The regulations provide for advisory committees at both the Federal and State levels, composed of representatives of various fields—corrective surgery, physiotherapy, occupational therapy, psychiatry, guidance and welfare agencies, education, labor, management, and the like. A National Rehabilitation Advisory Council at the Federal level was appointed on October 8, 1943. Included among its 26 members are Msgr. John O'Grady, secretary, National Conference of Catholic Charities, Washington, D. C., and Rev. John J. Bingham, director, division of health, Catholic Charities, New York City. It is understood that committees at the State level are now under consideration for appointment by the State boards of vocational education.

It is suggested that agencies interested or engaged in the field of vocational rehabilitation for civilians obtain a copy of the Regulations Governing the Plans and Program of Vocational Rehabilitation, title 45, public welfare, chapter 6, issued by the Federal Security Administrator, Federal Security Agency, dated October 9, 1943, United States Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. An excellent paper entitled "The Administration of War and Post-War Rehabilitation of Handicapped Patients," issued by Mr. Michael J. Shortley, Director, Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, Federal Security Agency, Washington, D. C., February 10, 1944, gives a very clear description of what has been done and what is contemplated under the law. There has recently been published also a section of the Manual of Policies governing the requirements and recommendations for physical restoration services, by the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, F. S. A., United States Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. Voluntary agencies engaged in the field should also make contact from time to time with the rehabilitation services of their State boards of vocational education.

Relief for American Prisoners of War and Civilian Internees in Japanese Prison Camps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, on May 10, 1944, I wrote to Secretary of State Cordell Hull concerning the authenticity of press reports that Japan was now prepared to allow the movement of relief supplies from Vladivostok to American prisoners of war and civilian internees detained in the Far East. On May 27 I received the Secretary's reply and while noting that negotiations were going forward I was disappointed that nothing concrete had as yet been accomplished. I realize the State Department is doing all it can do under the circumstances, but time is the essence in matters of this sort. For over 2 years our people in Japanese prison and concentration camps have been living in hope and praying for relief and deliverance. It is the sincere wish of all of Congress, I know, that the negotiations now being carried on will turn out successfully so that relief supplies can be sent in to sustain our people until their day of deliverance by our forces. We are on the offensive all over the Pacific now and, God willing, we are determined that Japan shall pay for all of her offenses against this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD a copy of my letter to Secretary Hull and his reply and enclosure:

MAY 10, 1944.

Hon. CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I note from press reports that there is a possibility that the Japanese Government will declare its readiness to dispatch a vessel to Vladivostok to pick up United States supplies sent there for the relief of American war prisoners and civilian internees in Japanese hands. According to the newspaper account carried by the Associated Press, "a definite plan for the purpose has been communicated to the United States through the Swiss Minister."

Will you please send me whatever pertinent information you may have concerning this particular situation. As you know, Mr. Secretary, I have been extremely interested in getting assistance to our boys who were taken prisoner by the enemy and who are now incarcerated in Japanese prison camps throughout the Far East, in Japan proper, in Formosa, Shanghai, Manchuria, and the Philippines.

I would appreciate receiving from you at your earliest convenience a detailed account of what is being done and what is contemplated on the basis of this newspaper report.

Thanking you and with best personal wishes, I am,

Sincerely.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 27, 1944.

The Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: I have received your letter of May 10, 1944, in which you refer to recent press reports that the Japanese Government is now prepared to implement the onward movement of relief supplies from Vladivostok to American prisoners of war and civilian internees detained in the Far East. You ask to be supplied with whatever pertinent information may be available to the Department regarding this subject.

As will be noted in section 6 of the enclosed statement summarizing the steps taken by the Department up to March 12, 1944, for the relief of American nationals in Japanese custody, efforts have beeen made for some time past to find a means acceptable to the Japanese Government for forwarding to our prisoners of war and civilian internees in the Far East necessary relief supplies.

A proposal by the Japanese Government concerning the onward movement of relief supplies shipped last fall as far as Vladivostok and those to be sent subsequently via Soviet territory has now been received. Several of the conditions incorporated therein affect the interests of other governments. The matter is being dealt with diligently and it is hoped that in the very near future we will be in a position to reply to the Japanese communication, either accepting the conditions which have been laid down or making an acceptable counter proposal.

The Department has not yet given full publicity to the details of this proposal, believing that to do so at this time would only serve to prevent the attainment of our objectives through possible misunderstanding of our motives at Tokyo and elsewhere.

I may add that an agreement has recently been reached with the Japanese, with the Soviet Government's cooperation, whereby mail may be transported to and from Japan by the Trans-Siberian rail route. This should tend to expedite the exchange of communications between our prisoners and civilian internees in Japanese custody and their relatives in the United States.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

SUMMARY OF STEPS TAKEN BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE IN BEHALF OF AMERICAN NATIONALS IN JAPANESE CUSTODY

1. TREATMENT OF PRISONERS OF WAR AND CIVILIAN INTERNEES

Upon the outbreak of war between the United States and Japan the United States Government, in an endeavor to insure humane treatment for American nationals in Japanese hands, confirmed its intention to observe the Geneva Prisoners of War Convention (convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war, signed at Geneva on July 27, 1929, and ratified by the United States in 1932), and to apply its provisions to prisoners of war and, so far as its provisions might be adaptable, to civilian internees. The Japanese Government, which had signed but had not ratified the convention, thereupon notified the United States Government that it would apply the provisions of the convention, mutatis mutandis, to the treatment of American prisoners of war and to the treatment of American civilian internees so far as its provisions might be adaptable to civilian internees.

The United States Government has also obtained assurances from the Japanese Government that it is applying the Geneva Red Cross Convention (convention for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded and the sick of armies in the field, which was also signed at Geneva on July 27, 1929, and which was ratified by the United States in 1932 and by Japan in 1934).

The conventions named above provide a humanitarian standard of treatment for prisoners of war. Specifically, they provide that prisoners of war shall be treated humanely and held in honorable captivity—not imprisoned as criminals. They establish as the standard for the shelter and diet of prisoners of war the corresponding treatment of the garrison troops of the detaining power and they establish fundamental rights regarding correspondence, medical care, clothing, pay for labor, satisfaction of intellectual, recreational, and religious needs, and the continued enjoyment of full civil status. For persons generally referred to as "protected personnel," that is, doctors, nurses, and other sanitary (medical) personnel, and chaplains, they provide certain special rights and protection.

The Department of State is constantly alert to insure observance of the conventions. Whenever the United States Government learns that the terms of the conventions are not being observed in any respect, it transmits through the Swiss Government, which represents American interests in Japan and Japanese-occupied territories, demands that the Japanese Government take immediate steps to remedy each such situation and to prevent its recurrence.

2. EXCHANGE OF CIVILIANS

In the first exchange of nationals between the United States Government and the Japanese Government, which took place in the summer of 1942, over 1,300 United States officials and nonofficials were repatriated from the Far East. Further negotiations lasting more than a year culminated in a second exchange of civilians late in 1943, resulting in the repatriation of approximately 1,240 nationals of the United States, including a small number from the Philippine Islands, and 260 nationals of the other American republics and Canada.

The Government of the United States, recognizing that all American citizens have an equal right to consideration, did not select individual Americans for inclusion in the exchanges or discriminate in any other way between individual Americans desiring repatriation. Since all Americans could not be accommodated in one exchange, the Swiss representatives in charge of American interests in Japan and occupied China were given broad humanitarian directives for their guidance in compiling passenger lists for the Gripsholm. These directitves gave preference to (1) those under close arrest; (2) interned women and children; (3) the seriously ill; and (4) interned men with preference being given, other things being equal, to married men long separated from their families in the United States. The Japanese Government did not permit even these broad directives to be applied in the Philippine Islands, contending that the provisions of the exchange arrangements were not applicable to Americans who were in the Philippines, Wake, and Guam when those territories were occupied by the Japanese. Only after months of negotiations did the Japanese Government finally indicate that it would return to the United States in the second exchange a small number of civilians from the Philippine Islands. The Japanese Government exercised complete control over the departure of those desiring repatriation and even refused to permit the repatriation from occupied China of a number of Americans whose inclusion in the exchange Swiss representatives in charge of American interests endeavored to arrange on humanitarian grounds.

The Department of State has endeavored to arrange for a third exchange. The Japanese Government has so far refused to discuss further exchanges, contending that it desires first to receive "clarification on certain points respecting the treatment of Japanese nationals in the United States." Spanish representatives in charge of Japanese interests in the United States have been requested to supply the information requested by the Japanese Government and there is reason to believe that they have complied with this request. However, the Department of State is not in a position to offer encouragement for the early repatriation of American citizens in Japanese custody. The Department emphasizes that responsibility for this situation rests not with the United States Government but with the Government of Japan. In time of war an exchange of nationals with an enemy is fraught with difficulties. This is particularly true of exchanges of the magnitude of those that the United States has twice been able to arrange with Japan and hopes to be able to arrange in the future. Such exchanges cannot be accomplished by unilateral action. No matter what efforts are put forth by the United States Government, and they have been many and continuous, an exchange cannot take place unless the enemy is willing to cooperate and deliver on its part the Americans in its custody.

The refusal of the Japanese Government to continue discussions of further exchanges of nationals is not deterring the United States Government from taking all necessary and proper steps to keep the question of such exchanges continually before the Japanese authorities and to make such preparations as may be possible to insure the speedy execution of any further exchanges of whatever character to which Japanese agreement may eventually be obtained.

3. REPATRIATION OF SICK AND WOUNDED PRISONERS OF WAR

Artice 68 of the Prisoners-of-War Convention provides that:

"Belligerents are bound to send back to their own country, regardless of rank or number, seriously sick and seriously injured prisoners of war, after having brought them to a condition where they can be transported.

"Agreements between belligerents shall accordingly settle as soon as possible the cases of invalidity or of sickness, entailing direct repatriation, as well as the cases entailing possible hospitalization in a neutral country. While awaiting the conclusion of these agreements, belligerents may have reference to the model agreement annexed, for documentary purposes, to the present convention."

The model agreement defines the degree of incapacity that shall be considered sufficient to qualify a prisoner of war for repatriation. This Government proposed to the Japanese Government that the model agreement be observed on a reciprocal basis and made insistent demands that the Japanese Government honor the obligation imposed by the convention to repatriate sick and wounded prisoners. The Japanese Government replied, after long delay, that it could not make a favorable response to the United States Government's proposal. The Department of State has formulated, in consultation with other agencies of the Government, further proposals in an effort to induce the Japanese Government to enter into negotiations for the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war. Whenever the Japanese Government agrees to reopen discussions for further exchanges of nationals, these proposals for the repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners of war will be advanced by the United States Government as an integral part of any arrangements to be made.

4. REPATRIATION OF SANITARY PERSONNEL

Article 9 of the Red Cross Convention provides, in part:

"The personnel charged exclusively with the removal, transportation, and treatment of the wounded and sick, as well as with the administration of sanitary formations and establishments, and the chaplains attached to armies, shall be respected and protected under all circumstances. If they fall into the hands of the enemy they shall not be treated as prisoners of war."

Article 12 of the same Convention provides, in part:

"Persons described in article 9 may not be detained after they have fallen into the power of the adversary.

"Unless there is an agreement to the contrary, they shall be sent back to the belligerent to whose service they are attached as soon as a way is open for their return and military exigencies permit.

"While waiting to be returned, they shall continue in the exercise of their functions under the direction of the adversary; they shall be assigned preferably to the care of the wounded and sick of the belligerent to whose service they are attached."

Pursuant to the provisions of article 12 of the Red Cross Convention, it was proposed to the Japanese Government that the repatriation of the personnel protected under the Convention be begun, since facilities for their return to the United States could be made available on the vessels employed for the exchange of civilian nationals. In order, however, not to deprive American prisoners of war of the care that they may require and might not otherwise receive, the United States Government also proposed to the Japanese Government, on a basis of reciprocity, that the right of repatriation be waived for protected personnel needed and permitted in prisoner-of-war camps or hospitals to render spiritual and medical assistance to compatriots who were in the care of that personnel at the time of capture. This Government further proposed that the selection of protected personnel to be repatriated be made by the senior officer of the unit captured.

The Japanese Government agreed in principle to the repatriation of protected personnel in connection with exchanges of civilians but reserved to itself the decision whether the retention of that personnel was necessary for the care of American prisoners of war and civilian internees under Japanese control. The department accordingly requested the Swiss Government to endeavor to arrange for the accommodation of American protected personnel in future American-Japanese civilian exchange operations.

Although it repatriated five nurses from Guam at the time of the first civilian exchange, the Japanese Government apparently did not find that it had in its power surplus American-protected personnel available for repatriation in the second exchange as no such personnel was included in the lists for that exchange. However, the Department intends, when conducting negotiations for further exchanges of civilians, to convey again to the Japanese Government the expectation of the United States Government that protected personnel whose repatriation proves possible shall be included in future exchange operations.

5. EXCHANGE OF ABLE-BODIED PRISONERS OF WAR

There is no customarily accepted practice among nations nor provisions of international law or conventions for the return or exchange during hostilities of able-bodied members of the armed forces of one belligerent who may be captured by the forces of an opposing belligerent. In the circumstances, there is no prospect of obtaining the release and return to the United States of able-bodied members of the American armed forces taken prisoners of war by the Japanese.

6. SHIPMENT OF RELIEF SUPPLIES TO THE FAR EAST

Early in 1942 the American Red Cross in conjunction with the interested agencies of the United States Government made efforts to find a means acceptable to the Japanese Government for forwarding to our prisoners of war and civilian internees in the Far East necessary supplies of food, medicine, clothing, and comforts such as are regularly sent to American citizens in corresponding circumstances in other enemy-held areas. A neutral vessel to carry such supplies to Japan was obtained and chartered in the summer of 1942. The Japanese Government, however, refused to give it safe conduct for the voyage of the vessel to the Far East. In response to repeated representations the Japanese Government indicated that it was unwilling for strategic reasons to grant any non-Japanese vessel safe conduct to move in Japanese waters and that it had no intention of sending one of its own vessels to any neutral area in order to pick up relief supplies for United States and Allied prisoners of war and civilians as was suggested by the United States Government. Upon the recepit of this Japanese reply the United States Government pointed out its expectation that the Japanese would modify their position as soon as strategic reasons would permit, and suggested for the interim the immediate appointment of International Red Cross delegates to Japanese-occupied territory who might receive and distribute funds in behalf of American nationals. This suggestion was eventually accepted by the Japanese only for Hong Kong and certain areas in occupied China. They have not accepted it so far for the Philippine Islands, Malaya, and the Netherlands Indies. Efforts to induce the Japanese Government to abandon its position against the use of neutral ships to carry relief supplies into its waters were continued and new avenues of approach were fully canvassed, including the possibility of sending relief supplies in transit through Soviet territory. One suggestion proposed the sending of supplies by air to some point where the Japanese might lift them, with particular reference to medical suplies which might be scarce in Japan. No reply to this particular proposal was ever received. Another proposal was that the American Red Cross would provide a cargo ship to go to some point in the Pacific where a Japanese crew might take it over in order to conduct it to the ports where relief cargo should be discharged. This proposal was rejected by the Japanese. Numerous other proposals were considered but were either abandoned because of obstacles interposed by other enemy governments or were found to be otherwise impossible of accomplishment.

In March 1943 the Japanese Government, in response to repeated representations stressing its responsibility to cooperate in solving the problem, stated that strategic reasons still prevented neutral vessels from plying the Pacific waters but that it would explore other means of permitting the delivery of relief supplies. In the following month the Japanese Government stated that it might consent to receive supplies overland or by sea from Soviet territory. There have ensued since that time long and complicated negotiations with the Japanese and Soviet Governments. Each detail of the negotiations had be dealt with through a long and complicated procedure involving the handling of communications at Tokyo, Bern, Washington, and Moscow and in reverse direction through the same channels. Despite these difficulties, it has now been possible with the Soviet Government's cooperation to create a stock-pile of prisoner-of-war relief supplies on Soviet territory. Moreover, the Soviet Government has given assurances that it will facilitate the transit through the Soviet Union of such relief supplies on a continuing basis when a satisfactory arrangement for the onward shipment of these supplies is reached between the Japanese and American Governments. In spite of the Department's repeated endeavors to bring this matter to a conclusion, the Japanese Government has not thus far indicated the means by which it is prepared to receive these supplies. The Department will not relax its efforts to induce the Japanese Government to agree to an arrangement for the movement of relief supplies on a continuing basis to interned American nationals in its custody.

While the foregoing negotiations have been in progress it has fortunately been possible to take advantage of the two exchanges of civilians with the Japanese Government, one in July 1942 and the other in October 1943 to send to our nationals in the Far East an important quantity of relief supplies by means of the exchange vessels.

Reports of the distribution of relief supplies which left the United States on the first exchange vessel in 1942 were in due course received from the Far East. There was placed on the motor vessel Gripsholm when it left this country to effect the second exchange of civilian nationals another large cargo of assorted relief supplies, American Red Cross standard food parcels, next-of-kin parcels, and mail for distribution to American prisoners of war and American civilians interned in the Philippine Islands, occupied China, Hong Kong, Japan, the Netherlands East Indies, and Malaya. Valued at over $1,300,000 and weighing 1,600 short tons, these supplies included 140,000 food parcels of approximately 13 pounds each; 2,800 cases of medical supplies, including surgical instruments, dressings; 7,000,000 vitamin capsules, and so forth; 950 cases of comfort articles for men and women; 24,000,000 cigarettes; from 20,000 to 25,000 next-of-kin parcels; and important supplies of clothing for men and women. This entire cargo was transferred to the Japanese exchange vessel at Mormugao and dispatched eastward. Information has been received to the effect that this shipment has arrived in the Philippine Islands and in Japan, and it is hoped confirmation of distribution in the camps will be received.

In addition to the shipment of relief supplies on the exchange vessels, and the other measures above-mentioned, the Department of State and the American Red Cross are continuing to give close attention to all other phases of the subject.

7. PROVISION OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO AMERICAN NATIONALS IN THE FAR EAST

Since the Trading with the Enemy Act as amended prohibits, among other things, individual remittances to enemy and enemy-occupied or enemy-controlled territory, unless licensed, and since the issuance of such licenses is contrary to the policy of the Government, the Department of State, shortly after this country's entry into the war, made provision for the extension of financial assistance from public funds in the form of loans to Americans in such territories through representatives of the Swiss Government representing American interests there. Appended to this memorandum is an information sheet explaining how such assistance is extended and how funds so advanced may be reimbursed to the United States Government. With certain exceptions in territories occupied or controlled by Japan, the enemy governments have permitted payments to be made to qualified American nationals in the manner described. The Japanese authorities, however, have thus far refused to permit the Swiss Government's representatives, in certain areas under Japanese control, to extend financial assistance to American nationals in those areas on the same basis as elsewhere. The Department, therefore, has had to find other means of making funds available to Americans in such areas.

At Hong Kong, where the Swiss Government has not been permitted by the Japanese Government to act in behalf of American nationals, the International Red Cross delegate has been authorized to provide assistance to qualified American nationals there from public funds made available for the purpose by the Department.

Immediately after the fall of the Philippine Islands, the Department endeavored to arrange for the extension of financial assistance to qualified American nationals there. In June 1943 the Japanese Government permitted the transfer of $25,000, representing a contribution by the American Red Cross, to be made to the executive committee of the Santo Tomas internment camp at Manila, and later allowed the transfer of a second Red Cross contribution of $25,000 for the relief of American nationals interned in Manila.

It was not until July 1943 that the Japanese Government indicated that it would agree in principle to permit payments to American nationals interned in other ports of the Philippine Islands, and to allow further payments to the internees at Manila. Accordingly, the Department in August 1943 authorized the Swiss Government to make remittances, in accordance with the need and the number of eligible individuals, to the executive committee of the American internment camps in the Philippine Islands beginning with the month of August or as soon as feasible thereafter. Funds delivered to the executive committee under this authorization may be used (1) for the purchase of available supplies considered necessary to supplement the diet provided by the Japanese authorities, (2) to pay for essential services obtained outside of camp, (3) to provide each internee with a small amount of money for personal use, and (4) to advance funds, against promissory notes if possible, to indigent internees for delivery to such members of their families as may be at liberty.

The Japanese Government has recently consented to monthly transfers of United States Government funds to the Executive Committee of the Santo Tomas internment camp to be used for the relief of American nationals at Santo Tomas, Los Banos, Baguio, and Davao which, according to latest available information, are the only civilian internment camps now maintained by the Japanese in the Philippine Islands. These transfers are now being effected from such funds on deposit with the Swiss Government for the purposes mentioned above.

The Department's standing instructions to the Swiss representatives in charge of American interests in enemy-held areas are that funds provided by this Government may be made available to American prisoners of war as well as to interned American civilians for necessary personal expenditures in accordance with their established needs over and above the food, shelter, and other necessities provided them by the detaining power. Such assistance has already been made available through the local International Red Cross delegates to American prisoners of war near Shanghai and Hong Kong. The Department of State is pressing for the extension to American prisoners of war in the Philippine Islands of the system of financial assistance referred to above which the Japanese have agreed to make available to civilian internees.

8. INTERNMENT STATUS OF AMERICAN NATIONALS IN AREAS UNDER JAPANESE CONTROL

Article 77 of the Prisoners of War Convention of 1929 reads, in part, as follows:

"Upon the outbreak of hostilities, each of the belligerent powers, as well as the neutral powers which have received belligerents, shall institute an official information bureau for prisoners of war who are within their territory.

"Within the shortest possible period, each of the belligerent powers shall inform its information bureau of every capture of prisoners effected by its armies, giving it all the information regarding identity which it has, allowing it quickly to advise the families concerned, and informing it of the official addresses to which families may write to prisoners.

"The information bureau shall immediately forward all this information to the interested powers, through the intervention, on one hand, of the protecting powers and, on the other, of the central agency provided for in article 79."

In accordance with the provisions of the article quoted above, the Prisoners of War Information Bureau, Office of the Provost Marshal General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C., was established as the official agency of this Government to handle matters of this kind. The Bureau exchanges lists of prisoners of war and civilian internees with similar bureaus in enemy countries and transmits to the next of kin and to those persons in this country who have indicated their interest such information as it receives with respect to the internment status of Americans detained by the enemy.

If they have not already done so, persons who desire to ascertain the internment status of American nationals in areas under enemy control may make appropriate inquiries of the Prisoners of War Information Bureau and record their names and addresses with that Bureau.

9. TRANSMISSION OF MAIL BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND AREAS UNDER JAPANESE CONTROL

It is understood that at the present time the Post Office Department is sending mail to the Far East via the Soviet Union. According to reports received from the International Red Cross Committee at Geneva, this mail is reaching the Far East, although it is, of course, subject to the delays and uncertainties of war and once it has reached the Far East its delivery to Americans is dependent upon the cooperation of the Japanese authorities. Mail to and from the Far East has also been exchanged during each civilian exchange operation and in the event of future exchange operations provision will be made for the carriage of prisoner of war and civilian internee mail. The United States authorities are continuing actively to explore the possibility of developing more expeditious channels of transmitting mail to the Far East.

Letters to American nationals who have been officially reported to the Prisoners of War Information Bureau as under Japanese detention may be sent through regular mail channels but must not exceed 24 words in length since the Japanese Government has indicated its intention to refuse to pass letters of greater length. There is no limit on the number of such letters which may be sent; however, owing to censorship difficulties in Japan, the number should be kept to a minimum.

It is ordinarily not possible to communicate through regular mail channels with Americans in enemy or enemy-controlled territories who are not officially reported to be prisoners of war or civilian internees by the detaining power pursuant to the provisions of the Geneva Prisoners of War Convention of 1929. Special arrangements have been made, however, for the acceptance of mail addressed to persons in the Far East who have been reported to the Prisoners of War Information Bureau as prisoners of war or civilian internees by persons who returned from the Far East on board the exchange vessel Gripsholm. Letters should be addressed to Americans so reported at the place of internment or address of record in the files of the Office of the Provost Marshal General, War Department, Washington 25, D. C.

Communications to American nationals who are not known to the United States Government to be interned by the Japanese may be sent only through Red Cross facilities. Persons who wish to send communications to American nationals in this category should make inquiry of the nearest chapter of the American National Red Cross for information in this regard.

10. SENDING OF INDIVIDUAL PARCELS TO AMERICAN NATIONALS INTERNED BY THE JAPANESE GOVERNMENT

No means of transportation are currently available for the sending of any supplies to American nationals in Japanese custody. In the event the Government's further efforts to arrange for the shipment of such relief supplies as those discussed in section 6 of this summary should be successful, the Department would expect the Japanese Government reciprocally to accept and to deliver next of kin packages sent by the same means of transportation for delivery to interned American nationals, both military and civilian, in Japanese hands.

The Office of the Provost Marshal General, War Department, has jurisdiction over the issuance of labels permitting next of kin to send parcels to American nationals in enemy custody whenever facilities for this purpose are available. All persons desiring to be provided with such labels, in the event facilities for shipment of individual packages to the Far East should become available, are advised to communicate with that Office for information in this regard.

11. PRISONERS OF WAR CONVENTION AND RED CROSS CONVENTION

Any person who wishes to obtain the complete official text of the Prisoners of War Convention or the Red Cross Convention may do so by writing the Superintendent of Documents, Washington, D. C., and enclosing 10 cents for each copy of the Prisoners of War Convention and 5 cents for each copy of the Red Cross Convention. The Prisoners of War Convention is Treaty Series No. 846 and the Red Cross Convention is Treaty Series No. 847.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 12, 1944.

PROCEDURE TO BE FOLLOWED IN EXTENDING FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO AMERICAN NATIONALS IN TERRITORIES WHERE THE INTERESTS OF THE UNITED STATES ARE REPRESENTED BY SWITZERLAND

The Department of State has completed arrangements for financial assistance to American nationals in territories where the interests of the United States are represented by Switzerland.[1] Those able to qualify for such assistance will be entitled to receive from the Swiss representatives monthly payments corresponding to their established needs and the prevailing cost of living in the country concerned. All recipients will be limited to the monthly payments established for their place of residence, regardless of their ability or the ability of others interested in their welfare to repay amounts greater than the sums advanced. It is realized that a limitation upon the amount that American nationals may expend in enemy territory, even from their own resources, will entail some hardship. The conservation of foreign exchange, however, is an essential factor in the present economic policy of the United States, and it is expected that Americans everywhere will willingly share with those in the armed forces the sacrifices that must be made in winning the war.

Based upon the latest ascertained cost of living in the various countries concerned, the maximum monthly payment for the head of a household will range from $60 to $130, with smaller allowances for additional members of the household. The monthly payments are subject to revisions from time to time to meet changing living cost. In addition, the Swiss representatives are authorized to make special advances for such extraordinary expenditures as may be essential to the health or safety of American nationals for medical, surgical, or dental care, for hospitalization, for reasonable legal defense against political or criminal charges, or for a decent though modest burial where such is not provided by friends or relatives locally nor by the local authorities.

Wherever prisoners of war and interned civilians are supported by the detaining power, it is expected that payments made to them will generally not exceed a small sum sufficient to provide spending money for miscellaneous personal needs not supplied by the detaining power. However, no payments will be made to officers or to persons of equivalent status held as prisoners of war, who receive pay under the convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war, signed at Geneva on July 27, 1929.

Swiss representatives charged with the representation of the interests of the United States will explain to the recipients that such financial assistance should not be considered as public bounty but as loans from public funds to American nationals finding themselves in an abnormal position by reason of war. It is accordingly expected that all sums advanced will be repaid either by the recipients themselves or by relatives, friends, business associates, employers, or legal representatives in the United States.

Receipts embodying promises to repay without interest the sums advanced will be taken for all payments. Private deposits to reimburse the Government for sums advanced shall be made with the Department of State. Persons wishing to make such deposits should indicate the names of the beneficiaries and should remit by postal money orders or certified checks payable to The Secretary of State of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Memorial Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Lawrence Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass., on May 29, 1944:

MEMORIAL DAY

Memorial Day, in all its great sentimental significance, will be observed tomorrow throughout the land, yes, throughout the world because wherever there is an American following the colors there will be a Memorial Day observance, even though it be only a silent prayer.

Memorial Day has grown and developed into one of America's greatest institutions of democracy. In parades behind the colors, to great amphitheatres and to beautifully kept cemeteries, along country roads, to quaint old burying grounds and even along wooded trails to single graves, Americans, high and low, rich and poor, strong and weak, young and old, will join the throng.

At those graves of departed heroes, men and women of fame, and those less known whose memories are kept alive by those who are staying on just a little while longer, garlands of flowers will be placed, eulogies will be delivered, services will be held, prayers will be said, and memories revived with an intensity that grows with each year. Americans from all walks of life will march to those hallowed places and kneel side by side at those graves. They will pray and pay the tribute to those whom they loved and honored in life as they know others will do at their graves after their call to the Great Beyond has been sounded.

Memorial Day is essentially a day of memories, and from those memories America draws strength for the hard task of war. America is not really a remembering nation, coddling the past, but it does have abiding gratitude for those who, in national crises of the past, offered everything to their country, not counting cost. That gratitude gave rise to the custom of paying tribute to the hero dead and, as years passed, to all our dead. That day set aside for remembering the hero dead became known as Decoration Day and Memorial Day. It manifests most emphatically that America as a nation, and Americans as individuals, continue to harbor in their breasts love and sentiment, faith and religion, courage and patriotism, and that human element that nurtures tolerance and understanding.

This year those who assume the responsibility for the military part of the program will see to it that those who are the latest to join the ranks of the silent heroic dead are not forgotten. There will be fresh flags and fresh markers on the graves of those of tender age who have already joined the ranks of men who have paid the supreme sacrifice for the honor and glory of their country, the heroes and casualties of World War No. 2.

As morning dawns tomorrow there will be activity in many homes and at the headquarters of all veteran organizations preparing for the sacred tasks of love and memory that lie ahead. Music will be heard, as will be the chant of prayers, and tears of sorrow and of pride will be shed as America pays tribute to her honored dead.

As dusk comes, taps will be sounded, and the line between the living and the dead will once more be drawn, the hours of communion will have passed, and the living will return to their homes to precede their well-earned rest with prayers for the eternal rest and happiness that God is asked to grant to their beloved dead.

What American Democracy Means to Me

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article:

WHAT AMERICAN DEMOCRACY MEANS TO ME

There is not a day in my life in which I have not enjoyed some benefit of our Constitution. American democracy influences my thought, my actions, my plans for the future, and even my daydreams.

I have the right to think for myself with unhampered access to the truth. No Hitler can tell me that I must think that Jews are devoid of all virtue and ability at the same time stopping me from hearing Mendelssohn music or reading Heine or Thomas Mann so that I will not doubt his word. I can read both Mein Kampf and the Communist Manifesto, and then Browder. I may read and hear all viewpoints discussed for my country believes that no group of men is superhuman enough to have the ability to tell other men what the unprejudiced truth or correct way of thinking is.

I am at liberty to act on my own convictions and spread them. I may speak and write about anything. I may go to any church I wish to—or none at all.

No labor conscription can force me to work unwillingly in times of peace. All my adult life I am free to do what I wish. The Government will not interfere as long as I do not hurt my fellow citizens nor act seriously against the good of the whole.

Under American democracy I can plan and look forward to the future with assurance. I know that those I love will be justly treated because the Constitution and the Bill of Rights protect each citizen against any bullying majority. My friends and relations cannot be imprisoned unless an impartial court judges them guilty of a crime defined by law. Through my vote I can influence the policies of the Government under which I live. I know what I have rightfully earned will not be arbitrarily taken away. The Government can never take away without just recompense that little shack in the woods which I hope to have someday.

My future depends upon my own efforts. If I work hard and intelligently, I can rise. America gives help in the upward struggle by furnishing a free education. One born in a farmer's or a laborer's family does not have to stay a farmer or a laborer. Anyone is free to change his own position through hard work and ingenuity. More wonderful still, the average citizen respects and admires the self-made man.

I owe to our Constitution freedom of expression and thought; the right to struggle and hope for what I desire; and security of future justice. Is it any wonder that I believe that our Constitution and the American democracy which it sustains are the most important forces in my life and that I love them accordingly?

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the last break the New Deal has had was when the Senate voted to postpone the Kimmel-Short trial to December 7.

Increased money by millions is asked for O. P. A. to step up its enforcement program and to simplify price controls What a paradox.

Sewell Avery will be compelled to walk into the hearings here June 6. He will have no such service as the Army afforded him in Chicago.

A recent broadcast of an historic play, O. K.'d by F. C. C., treated the Revolutionary War as a civil war—not a war for independence from a foreign country.

Winchell criticized Churchill severely Sunday night, Eleanor slightly on Monday, and Franklin on Tuesday. What have I told you about that week-end liaison?

The big impetus communism has received in this country in recent years comes, sorry to say, from the joint occupants of the White House, our own White House.

The present leaders of the Farmers Union, the New Republic editors, the C. I. O. chieftains, and the New Deal "Yes" men are all drinking now from the same gourd.

Half of the people who attended Decoration Day in Arlington were those who took part, and it was a perfect day. Do we care less or is it just another cemetery now?

Flag Day will soon be here, but the Stars and Stripes will not be so conspicuous as in days gone by. The Fourth of July is receiving dwindling attention in recent years.

Constitution Day was scarcely mentioned last year. However, the old Thanksgiving Day has come back, Christmas is still Christmas, and Easter is hallowed yet.

America Speaks to the Common Man

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by James Truslow Adams.

"This long almost empty land," we might imagine her as saying, "is for you, the poor and the oppressed, the weary and the heavy laden. It is not for those who would live softly and easily or from the toil of others. America is not a pampering land. You must have fortitude, high courage, and willingness to work. You and your families may have to suffer and take great risks, even to your lives. You may have to forego much that has made life seem normal and safe and pleasant in the homelands from which you and others may come, but in exchange you will find a new life, a life of freedom to be yourselves, to make the most of yourselves that you can, to win perhaps great prizes, and, above all, to take your place as free men and women in the building of a better life for all than has yet been dreamed of in the war-torn and shackle-bearing nations of the past. I welcome you with open arms to my wide expanse, 3,000,000 square miles of woods and mountains, of fields and prairies and plains, of riches unthinkable. Take me and use me for yourselves and all humanity. Yours is the opportunity of all the ages. Use it well and a new heaven and a new earth may dawn for man. Misuse it, and man's last hope may break. For you—and you—and you—the chance has come."

At first the prospect held little cheer. Moreover, the blueprint planning for the colony by the theorists at home had included the idea of communism, which has never worked in a civilized community but which crops up every now and then to allure certain types of minds which ignore the realities of human nature. The colonists were to work not for themselves as individuals but for a common store into which the results of their labor were to be placed and from which they would draw for their necessities. The experiment went on disastrously for some years. Without the incentive of personal gain for personal thought and work, ambition disappeared and the morale of the community fell to almost zero. Anything more different from the wisdom of Queen Elizabeth in enlisting the energy of every man in the state by allowing the able and adventurous to reap the full rewards of their energy and daring could not be conceived.

When under the rule of Sir Thomas Dale as governor a new course was taken, and each man was allotted three acres of his own and, as John Rolfe wrote, they could sit under their own "fig tree in safety, gathering and reaping the fruits of their labors with much joy and comfort," the effect was instantaneous. Capt. John Smith commented that "when our people were fed out of the common store, and laboured jointly together, glad was he (sic) could slip from his labour, or slumber over his taske, he cared not how, nay the most honest among them would hardly take so much true paines in a weeke, as now for themselves they will doe in a day: neither cared they for the increase, presuming that howsoever the harvest prospered the generall store must maintaine them, so that wee reaped not so much corne from the labours of thirtie as now three or four do provide for themselves."

A man could at last work for himself and his own. The free winds of America were blowing.

Responsibility and Cooperation in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a most interesting and engaging article written by Mr. Walter P. Armstrong, of Memphis, Tenn., former president of the American Bar Association. Mr. Armstrong is one of the Nation's foremost students of government and this article, which appeared in the June issue of the American Bar Association Journal under the title "The Kefauver Resolution," will be of interest to Members of Congress and everyone interested in improving the relationship between the executive and legislative branches of our Government:

The separation of governmental powers in our Constitution was in part due to what has been called "the brilliant misconception of Montesquieu." The Frenchman thought that he perceived this separation in the British Government of his day and, although he realized that it was incomplete, he apparently expected its further development. Precisely the opposite happened at least as to the executive and legislative departments. The king has become a symbol, the executive is the instrument of the legislature and the Prime Minister and other cabinet members merely agents of the House of Commons. Confronted by an adverse vote of the House, the Cabinet has no alternative save dissolution or resignation.

Even under our system the separation was from the beginning incomplete. The Senate participates in the executive process by confirming appointments by the President, ratifying or rejecting treaties, and Congress must implement many executive powers.

The President is performing a legislative function when he proposes action by Congress and when he signs or vetoes bills.

DEVELOPMENT OF EXECUTIVE LEGISLATION

In recent years the separation has become even less marked. Congress has passed many acts which are but the framework of a complete legislative scheme. These acts authorize the executive or his agencies to complete the scheme, and thus in effect to legislate. This delegation of legislative power has to a large extent been sustained by the Supreme Court so that not infrequently the final form of a law depends upon executive legislation.

The most noteworthy change, however, has been the fact that strong executives have assumed the leadership of their parties. They are not content to leave to Congress the initiation of legislation and to consider themselves as having the single function of executing the laws. They formulate a legislative program and personally and through party leaders in the two Houses urge its adoption. No one is left in doubt as to what pending bills are administration measures.

The great advantage of this development is that it not only provides leadership, but centralizes responsibility in one who is accountable to the nation as a whole and not merely to a single constituency.

However, if the work of Congress and the executive is to mesh, a primary essential is that each be fully informed as to the work of the other and that the people be cognizant of the functioning of both.

SOURCES OF INFORMATION

Available to the executive department and to the people is adequate information as to the work of the Congress. Both its sessions and committee hearings are public. They are reported fully enough at least to put all interested on notice as to what is being considered and additional information is always accessible.

It is, however, extremely difficult for either an ordinary citizen or a Member of Congress to be adequately informed as to the working of the Executive branch. This branch consists not only of the President and the members of his Cabinet, but of multiple departments and agencies.

The ordinary sources of information are: the messages of the President, the reports to Congress of Cabinet members and of departments and agencies, appearances before committees, press releases, and conferences and interviews between Members of Congress and department and agency heads.

INADEQUACY OF PRESENT METHODS OF COMMUNICATION BETWEEN CONGRESS AND THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

No one of these and the sum total of all do not furnish adequate information either to the Congress or the public. Obviously the messages of the President do not and cannot deal with the minutae of the conduct of the departments and agencies. It is impossible even for a Congressman, pressed for time, to read all the reports, and frequently significant facts are either not dealt with or are buried under a mass of irrelevancies. Appearances before committees are often unsatisfactory. Ordinarily a committee is concerned with only a single phase of concrete legislation. Its proceedings may not be publicized nor come to the attention of other Members of Congress. No one of its Members may be qualified to elicit information which would be valuable to Congress as a whole. Different committees may be interested in a single department and separate appearances before them mean an increasing waste of time of the witness or witnesses. Press releases are mere ex parte statements, usually of little value. Press conferences are but little better. The reporter has no definite public responsibility and has primarily in mind the news value of the information he seeks. Frequently he does not have the experience and information necessary for the formulation of pertinent questions. In dealing with him the executive officer is not dealing with a responsible coordinate branch of the Government and is free to give or withhold information. The content of conferences between Members of Congress and department and agency heads is not only not known to the public but sometimes their occurrence raises the suspicion that some sinister deal is being worked out.

Many statesmen and publicists have recognized the inadequacy of the present methods of communication between the Congress and the executive branch as a defect in our governmental structure and have suggested changes. Among them are William Howard Taft, Chief Justice Hughes, Elihu Root, John W. Davis, James A. Garfield, Woodrow Wilson, Justice Story, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler and Dr. Charles A. Beard.

QUESTION PERIOD "TO PUBLICIZE THE WORK OF CONGRESS" AND THE CABINET

The most recent as well as the most constructive proposal has been made by Representative ESTES KEFAUVER, of Tennessee. Mr. KEFAUVER has offered in the House of Representatives a resolution which would amend the rules of that body by providing that there shall be at least once every 2 weeks, and not oftener than once a week, a question period during which heads of independent departments and agencies shall be requested to answer orally, written and oral questions propounded by Members of the House. Attendance by the executive officials will be voluntary. Written interrogatories will be submitted in advance, but may be supplemented by oral questions, one-half of the "question period" being reserved for this purpose.

Mr. KEFAUVER's resolution has been enthusiastically received by the press and is now pending before the Rules Committee of the House. Its merits are obvious. Indeed, the resolution is entirely in line with what should have been the logical development of our form of government. The founding fathers envisaged some such consultation between Congress and the executive department. President Woodrow Wilson's personal appearance before Congress was not an innovation, but the return to a practice that had been inaugurated by Washington and discontinued by Jefferson. The statute organizing the Treasury Department, passed in 1789, made it the duty of the Secretary to make reports and give information to either branch of the legislature in person or in writing—as he might be required. During the first Congress there are about 14 recorded instances where a Cabinet member appeared before the Senate, and 8 of appearances before the House of Representatives.

The Constitution of the Confederate States was in some respects, when dealing with subjects which were neither divisive or controversial, an admirable document. The men who drafted it had one advantage over the members of the original constitutional convention. From personal experience and their reading of history they knew how the Constitution worked in actual practice and thus learned how it was susceptible of improvement. Profiting by this experience, they wrote into the new constitution this provision: "Congress may, by law, grant to the principal officer in each of the executive departments a seat upon the floor of either house, with the privilege of discussing any measures appertaining to his department." Although this plan was actually practiced under the provisional government of 1861, because of the exigencies of war, it was never fully carried out.

Mr. Kefauver's proposal does not go nearly so far as the practice contemplated by the Confederate constitution which would have permitted a Cabinet member to appear at his pleasure and participate in any debate that concerned his department. The resolution requires an invitation from the House which may be accepted or declined. If accepted it is followed by a brief period of questioning not by a debate participated in by the executive. It is much further removed from the British Parliamentary system under which each Cabinet member is a member of Parliament not only with full privileges of debate and vote, but with the responsibility of defending his department at all times on the floor. Under our Constitution, it is not possible, even if it were desirable, to put into effect the British system. The President is not accountable to Congress as the Prime Minister is to the House of Commons. He is responsible to the people. If the House of Commons fails to sustain the Prime Minister as to any single major measure, he must either resign or submit his case to the people in a general election. Had the House of Commons differed with Mr. Churchill on a tax bill in the way in which Congress did with President Roosevelt, the Prime Minister would have had the choice either of resigning or dissolving Parliament and calling an election for a new House of Commons. The tenure of the President, however, is unaffected by any number of adverse votes of both Houses.

The Confederate plan, while it gave full recognition to the separation of the legislative and executive branches, embraced some of the merits of the British system.

It is not in the public interest that there should be a rift between the legislative and the executive, especially when the President and a majority of both Houses of Congress belong to the same party. This condition makes for a stalemate. The public business goes forward to the best advantage when the President formulates a definite legislative program about which Congress is fully informed, which is constructively criticized and on which substantial agreement is finally reached. Because of the nature of his office it is perhaps not practicable for the President to participate in such a program other than by formal messages delivered either in writing or in person. There is, however, no reason why members of the Cabinet should not be permitted full participation in debate. In addition to the advantages of such a practice already suggested it would tend to enlarge the caliber of appointees to the Cabinet.

Even strong Presidents have not always had strong Cabinets. Perhaps they have not felt the need for them; possibly they have been willing "to bear no brother near the throne." In the last half century there have been few Cabinets which have not contained at least two or three members who did not measure up to their responsibilities. As President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia has said: "Were such a custom established an almost certain result would be the selection as heads of the great executive departments of men of large ability and personal force—men able to explain and to defend their policies and measures before the Congress of the United States in the face of the whole country." There can be but one answer to President James A. Garfield's questions: "Who does not know that the enactment of such a law will tend to bring our ablest men into the Cabinet of the Republic? Who does not know that if a man is to be responsible for his executive acts and also be able to tell why he proposes new measures, and to comprehend the whole scope of his duties, weak men will shirk from taking such places?"

The rule proposed by the Kefauver resolution, though more limited in scope, would tend to have the same effect. The heads of departments would not participate in debate, but they would be subjected to both written and oral questions. Their answers to the latter would necessarily be extemporaneous. Cross-examination is a ready detector of incompetence and ignorance. One who is called upon before a full House to answer a relevant and significant question put by a responsible Member is on his own. He cannot shield himself behind a written statement prepared by a so-called expert of his department.

Much of the legislation which touches the people most closely is shaped neither by the President nor any Cabinet member and is enacted piecemeal, without Congress as a whole ever coming in contact with and sometimes without that body being aware of the identity of those responsible for its form.

PROPER REGULATION OF BUREAUCRATIC AGENCIES

So true is this that but one illustration need be given of the value and desirability of Mr. KEFAUVER'S plan. The greatest menace to our form of government is bureaucracy—evidenced as it is by the virtually uncontrolled conduct of administrative agencies.

The result of the method in which these agencies have been created is little short of chaotic. The representatives of one agency have appeared before one congressional committee at one time and the representatives of other agencies before different committees at different times. The only unity has been the persistent and insistent desire of each agency to obtain a maximum of power and a minimum of supervision. With this in view they have urged that they be given blank checks—that the legislation creating them be in the broadest and most general terms and that they have delegated to them by Congress the power later to write the act by filling in the blanks. They have advocated the unimpeded selection by themselves of all employees. They have resisted adequate review of their conduct by the courts and whenever possible have insisted that the action be subjected to no review whatsoever.

They have usually obtained what the particular committee was at the time willing to grant. These bills have been voted upon at separate times and Congress, largely dependent upon the report of its committees, has enacted them without relation to and frequently without knowledge of prior legislation. There is such a wilderness of this legislation that the most competent lawyer in general practice is unable to keep abreast of it and small law firms in medium-sized cities find it necessary to add to their staffs a specialist who devotes his entire time to these subjects.

The proper regulation of these agencies will be one of the major post-war domestic problems which will confront the Nation. If it is to be solved the factual background must be brought to the attention of the whole Congress and the situation visualized in its entirety. Few if any Members of Congress are thoroughly familiar with all phases of the subject. All Members know something of the harassment caused by the exaction of redundant and often useless information, of the overlapping and grasp for power by these agencies and of their fondness for promulgating minute, multitudinous, and complex regulations. Few realize the extent to which they have managed really to write the laws under which they function by filling in, supplementing, and sometimes extending the acts creating them. Nor do many understand how almost completely the courts have been ousted of jurisdiction to review their findings, with the result that they cannot be checked when they act as investigator, prosecutor, and judge.

Mr. KEFAUVER, who is now serving his third term, is one of the most competent and diligent Members of the House. Yet he has stated that his realization that he is not fully acquainted with the organization and operation of these bureaus is one of the reasons why he offered his resolution.

If Congress, which created them, lacks information as to the organization and operation of these agencies, how much greater is the need of the public? True, almost everyone knows something of the practical working of a few bureaus for there are not many citizens so fortunate as to have their lives regulated by only one. But the people should have exhibited to them the picture as a whole, for upon them as upon all other problems in this country final judgment will be pronounced by public opinion.

If the House adopts the proposed rule and uses it to deal with this subject, the public will then too be informed. This is true because one of the greatest merits of Mr. KEFAUVER'S resolution—one not yet sufficiently stressed—is its value in acquainting the people with the work of Congress.

Under the present practice the messages of the President constitute the public's only authentic source of information as to communications between the Executive and the Congress. It is impracticable for the people to familiarize themselves with the voluminous reports made to Congress or even with the committee hearings. Such private conferences between department heads and Members of Congress as are publicized are reported in such a fragmentary and uncoordinated way as not only to be of no practical value, but frequently so as to arouse apprehension as to the methods being used. If the consultations between the heads of the departments and the Members of Congress are dramatized, as they would be under the new rule, the attention of the entire country would be focused upon them. That this is true is demonstrated by the extent to which even in this country the Question Hour in the British House of Commons is reported and the interest which it attracts.

The result of enlisting the attention of the people to the business of Congress would be an alert and informed public opinion such as is now impossible.

What has been said about the use of the proposed rule in dealing with the bureaus has been largely illustrative. There are many other phases of the business of the House to which it would be equally applicable. But if this were not true and if the only function it could perform would be to make a contribution to the eradication of some of the evils of a swollen bureaucracy, this alone would abundantly justify the adoption of the Kefauver resolution.

The Army Engineers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, while no one with any knowledge of the facts wishes to detract from the outstanding work of the Seabees—a service that cannot be too highly praised—it is well to remember that other branches of our services are equally devoted and efficient. And, therefore, since I have some personal knowledge of operations in Alaska, it gives me pleasure to offer for the RECORD the attached copy of letter written by Robert Sherrod, of Washington, D. C., and printed in the American Mercury. I believe that every statement concerning the engineers embraced in Mr. Sherrod's letter is amply justified:

SIR: This is not to detract from the Seabee—heaven forbid!—for he is a marvelous fellow who can do almost anything with the tools of the construction trades. But my friend William Bradford Huie's article in the January 1944 American Mercury prompts me to say a few words for a poor fellow who apparently has no advocate—the muddy, sweaty Army engineer.

All those things Mr. Huie says about the Seabees are true, but, understandably, Mr. Huie is guilty of a few errors of omission. Of Attu Mr. Huie says: "On the tenth day after we got there, we had movies in a prefabricated mess hall, our cats had ripped off 6 feet of tundra and opened up a road system; and Fortresses could land on our steel mats." Mr. Huie neglected to mention that, while it was the Seabees who built the Navy mess hall, it was the Army engineers (who were still eating emergency rations) who built the road ystem and the air strip. Mr. Huie tells about the Seabee who killed a Jap sniper. O. K., but when a thousand Japs broke through our front lines on May 29 and headed for our rear installations, it was a battalion of Army engineers who stopped them. They killed several hundred Japs, and the spot where they killed them has been named Engineer Hill. The Seabees, through no fault of their own, were still back at the beach building the mess hall.

Adak is another case in point. Mr. Huie says: "The roadbuilders reached Adak 9 months ago to find a treeless, tundra-matted mountain top jutting out of a thousand fathoms of icy water. * * *" True, but those roadbuilders were a battalion of Army engineers under the command of young Lt. Col. Carlin Whitesell, who got a medal for his ingenuity in floating roads on top of tundra—on Adak the tundra is so deep that a bulldozer could scrape until 1950 without reaching hard surface.

Last summer when I was in the Aleutians somebody sent a clipping of a picture titled: "Adak Airfield—Before and After the Seabees Got There." The picture showed great mounds of mud which are characteristic of the Aleutians, then it showed a fine, steel-matted runway. The only trouble with this picture was that the Army engineers built the airfield. I chided the Seabee publicity man about it—the engineers had no publicity man—and he said: "I didn't do it; I swear some overzealous guy in Washington must have released that one."

The Seabee is an expert before he joins up. The Army engineer is just an average guy named Joe who got drafted. But Joe learns, and he, too, has accomplished some near miracles of construction, and of fighting, in this war. I just hate to see him neglected.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Facts About the Helicopter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, much confusion has arisen in the minds of certain people in their consideration of the Lea civil aviation bill, H. R. 3420, which bill is now before the Rules Committee awaiting action, as to the place which the helicopter will fill in civil aviation during the next 10 years or so.

For the information of all Members of Congress I insert herewith certain extracts from an article written by Col. H. F. Gregory in the Saturday Evening Post of May 27, 1944. As the Saturday Evening Post said in a boxed headline:

There has been a good deal of fiction about this air-age marvel. Here are the facts from the Army's top helicopter authority.

Distorted stories and distorted testimony was presented to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on this subject. I am sure every Member of Congress will be interested in reading the following extracts from Col. Gregory's article:

These are the helicopters you thought were in existence, but which only now are coming out of the factory—still new, still with many bugs in them.

Contrary to beliefs, the helicopter will never replace the automobile as a common conveyance. * * * No true parallels can be drawn in comparing it with the automobile * * *. Flying a helicopter is and always will be a specialized art. * * *

A great deal of schooling will be necessary to teach the embryo helicopter pilot the technique. * * *

The helicopter, in its present state, is much more difficult to control than the conventional airplane. * * * It must be flown by a specially trained pilot, and that means schooling far more extensive than merely teaching a man how to drive a car or fly a light plane.

I was completely worn out after the flight from Washington to Dayton. * * * It demanded a perfect sense of equilibrium, which some people never have, and perfect coordination.

Records show that only qualified airplane pilots have mastered the helicopter. * * * Landings in small places * * * require precision flying. Helicopter pilots who can negotiate these ins and outs require precision training. As of this writing, the Army has less than 20 qualified helicopter pilots. * * *

The element of uncontrollability eliminates the helicopter from the "U-drive it" category. Likewise it is assured that the skies will never blacken with windmill planes, as some people have visualized, since getting an operator's license will be as difficult as getting a private pilot's license. * * *

Furthermore, the helicopter, by the very virtue of its whirling rotors, creates a powerful downdraft of air * * *. It would cause a small hurricane on the street or roof top when it landed.

This is one undesirable feature of the helicopter, and it is often forgotten entirely by the prognosticators, who would have you believe that the helicopter can just land anywhere. Actually, the downblast from the big rotor or rotors is so strong that you feel that you are bucking a 40-mile-an-hour gale when you stand near the ship as it takes off. The same is true in landing. * * *

Because of the terrific downdraft, it naturally would not be wise to operate a helicopter from a small space littered with objects that could be blown about. * * * The helicopter could land * * * provided the ground is specially prepared. * * *

The helicopters in existence today must have many little mechanical difficulties smoothed out before they will be practical for general use.

Eskimos as Fighting Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, so little is known about the Eskimos and the part they are taking in the war that I am happy to present the attached copy of an article appearing in the New York Times of May 30, 1944.

The Eskimos, as well as other Alaskan natives, are 100-percent loyal. Not a single instance has been found of disloyalty, sabotage, or even indifference among them, a record that can never be surpassed and is seldom equalled in any nation or among any race:

ESKIMOS CALLED TO WAR—ALASKAN VILLAGERS, TO LAST MAN, RESPOND AT ONCE

EAST ALTON, ILL.—The story of how war came to an Alaskan village is told by Charles E. Gillham, former Government biologist, explorer, and big-game hunter.

It is the story of Hooper Bay, brine-swept little inlet on the Bering Sea. The Japs had attacked Pearl Harbor, were fanning out in all directions. By amateur radio to adjoining Eskimo villages went the word that the men, all men of draft age, must register for service.

The response was an amazing demonstration of loyalty to America. Afoot and by dog team, wading or swimming the swollen rivers, the silent, sloe-eyed Eskimos streamed into Hooper Bay for registration at the schoolhouse. They said simply:

"We come help Uncle Sam fight Japs. When we start?"

Gillham, now on the game restoration staff of Western Cartridge Co., said registration of the Eskimos was a considerable task. Hardly a half dozen knew their ages. Many with gray hair—and an Eskimo rarely grows gray before 50—blandly told the draft board interpreter they were "about 20."

Finally, two or three to whom names had been given in the mission school were chosen as "gages." By the use of the mission Eskimos, with older Eskimos as "referees," approximate ages for most were established.

Unable to cope with Eskimo names, Alaskan traders had given some of the registrants English equivalents many years before. Solemnly, they gave these names in registering.

H. R. 1649

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the June 1944 edition of the All Veterans News, in regard to H. R. 1649:

OFFICIAL PUBLICATION

To the EDITOR, ALL VETERANS NEWS:

The article Jobs For Veterans Still the Problem, in the May edition of All Veterans News, is one of the most thought-provoking items ever published in your valuable paper.

To provide permanent jobs in private industry and adequate medical care for all our soldiers after this war, is the primary duty—and privilege—of this grateful and indebted Nation. However, as commendable and desirable as this responsibility is, it is not enough if we are to preserve the American principles for which our soldiers have sacrificed so much. It is the patriotic duty and responsibility of us here on the home front to find ways and means whereby all ablebodies citizens can find steady employment in private industry, after the shooting stops, if our American system of free enterprise and individual initiative is to be saved for posterity. Our American way of life cannot survive half free enterprise and half public-work programs.

Because American genius has solved the problem of production through the application of power, science, and chemistry, unemployment has become a dangerous national problem. It is not a local problem and, therefore, it cannot be successfully solved by solely local means.

The problem of Nation-wide unemployment must be attacked on a national unified scale and with the same patriotic determination as that which we manifested on December 8, 1941, when this aroused Nation went to war. Anything less will eventually prove disastrous.

It is more regretable that our present enthusiasts for "more production * * * better goods * * * lower prices" after the war cannot—or will not—recognize the vital truth expressed in the following paragraph taken from the above-mentioned article: "Let's remember that no factory will employ veterans to produce goods that can never be sold. There will be no security for veterans in agriculture if farm products must be left to rot in the fields because prices are too low. No manufacturer will employ veterans as salesmen if his jobbers refuse to buy or if the public lacks the necessary purchasing power." During the early 30's America possessed a superabundance of everything. Our goods were the best in the world. Prices were the lowest in many decades. Net results, the longest and most devastating depression in our Nation's history. We never have had, and never will have, full employment and prosperity when things become too cheap. Nevertheless, that is the very post-war program that many are deliberately planning now.

In 15 long years—during both Republican and Democratic administrations—our industrial leaders, economic specialists, tax experts and politicians could not—or would not—provide us with a sound workable solution for the twin economic "cancers" of unemployment and poverty, although we are living in the richest, most productive, and scientific Nation on earth. The greatest tragedy is, these gentlemen still have no sound or permanent solution for these economic ills, once the war ends.

It should be obvious, therefore, that some new economic course must be pioneered. A sound and permanent solution must be immediately found and adopted if we are to avoid eventual economic chaos in America. Regardless of what others may say or think, there is only one way to solve this problem of unemployment in our modern America, namely, through the scientific control of buying power, placed in the hands of all adult citizens.

How can this be done? By the simple demand of the American people that the Congress of the United States tax this buying power into existence * * * that Congress adopt a scientific pay-as-you-go tax program for the specific purpose of creating and permanently maintaining this vital buying power.

Impossible? Fantastic? It can't be done? Here is undeniable proof that buying power has already been greatly increased by scientific taxation; some 30 years ago our automobiles were greatly limited and harassed because of our old mud roads. The highway department had very little money to build good roads. In 1919—after many years of bitter opposition—our scientific pay-as-you-go gasoline-tax program was adopted and put into operation. That year the revenue from the gasoline tax was only $1,022,000. However, this tax program proved so successful that 6 years later 38 States had adopted it. In 1941 the gas-tax revenue was approximately $1,200,000,000. In other words, we taxed into existence, for the highway department in 1941, a buying power that was approximately twelve hundred times greater than it was in 1919. What State would now abolish this great constructive tax program? Destroy the gasoline tax and what would happen to our great highway system, automobile, oil, and rubber companies, tourist trade, etc.? The unparalleled success of the gasoline-tax program should forever silence those skeptics who proclaim that, "* * * you can't increase buying power by taxing one group of citizens and giving the revenue to another group of citizens to spend." It all depends upon the conditions involved and the scientific principles used.

Now we must construct another great highway in post-war America. An economic highway of buying power over which our manufactured goods, farm products, medical services, etc., all the necessities and conveniences of life, can travel uninterruptedly to every home and consumer in America. This can only be successfully done by the use of another scientific tax program on a national scale. In other words, a Federal insurance program protecting every American citizen, 18 years old and over, from the loss of his or her buying power when overtaken by chronic illness, permanent disability, old age, or left a widow with one child, or more, to support.

Congressman CANNON'S Federal insurance bill, H. R. 1649, now pigeonholed by the Ways and Means Committee in Congress, embodies the scientific pay-as-you-go principles that will tax into existence this vital civilian buying power. This bill merits the immediate consideration and support of every American veteran and his organization. The time for united militant action is here. Cooperation with proponents of this bill is urgently and respectfully requested now.

Federal Communications Commission

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, it has been often charged that Mr. Fly, of the Federal Communications Commission, uses the licensing power of the Commission to control the broadcasting industry, and to influence the editorial policy of newspapers engaged in broadcasting. It has been charged that he is striving to bring all media of communication under the same kind of despotic control that it is generally admitted he holds over the radio industry. It was not, however, known to me until a few days ago that he is also engaged in the endeavor to control freedom of the press generally, including magazines of national circulation.

Recently the committee investigating the F. C. C. made an astounding revelation. It developed the fact that Mr. Fly, through the use of intimidation, suppressed the publication of an article in the Reader's Digest, one of the Nation's most popular and powerful magazines.

This article had been carefully written by Mrs. Gretta Palmer, a staff writer for the Reader's Digest, and, as she said, at the suggestion of Wendell Willkie.

Knowing that this article was being written, Mr. Fly, on December 29, 1943, addressed a letter to the editor of Reader's Digest, which was as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., December 29, 1943.

Mr. DEWITT WALLACE,
Editor, Reader's Digest,
Pleasantville, N. Y.

DEAR MR. WALLACE: I have been more than shocked recently to receive word that one of your writers, Mrs. Gretta Palmer, has been assigned the task of "doing a job" on me.

She has made it clear to me and to others that the writing which she is doing will be based upon information and documents collected by the Cox committee. This committee has attained a Nation-wide reputation as being the most notoriously unfair of all the so-called investigative committees that purport to do constructive work on behalf of the Congress. I am reluctant to believe that by treating with this one-sided subject matter you would have the Reader's Digest brought down to this lowest of levels.

I want to advise you that, although this disreputable effort to "get" me has been going on for a number of months, neither I nor the Commission has ever been permitted to put a witness on the stand, to ask a single question of any witness, to offer a single document in evidence, to correct the record so that the deleted portion of documents are reinstated to refute charges wrenched from context, or to answer by document unfounded and irresponsible charges that literally have been forced into the record. In short, no word of ours has been permitted to be uttered or placed in the record; our files have been culled for the dirtiest masses that innuendo could contrive; countervailing evidence studiously avoided. Thus you have the most serious and scandalous of charges thrown out publicly and with the sole aim to destroy without any respectable or responsible evidence to back any of them up and without the slightest opportunity extended to me to disprove them. While the title of this committee is the Select Committee to Investigate the Federal Communications Commission, the record is replete with examples which conclusively prove that it is I, and I alone, that this committee and its counsel set out to destroy.

The procedures of the Cox organization and of its unscrupulous counsel have been condemned on a wider scale than in the case of any other congressional committee within my knowledge. Despite all of this the present counsel (although not the new chairman) is determined to do a destructive job upon me by any and all devices regardless of the low character these devices might ultimately assume. One of the effective ways of accomplishing this is to use a respectable publication of the widest circulation like the Reader's Digest to give the charges repeated currency and through countless repetitions a seeming validity. I understand that counsel for the committee has cooperated most graciously with your Mrs. Palmer. With his ends clearly in mind, why not?

It is true that Mrs. Palmer offered to talk to me. However, you, she and the Reader's Digest must bear in mind that it is quite impossible for me in the course of a few hours or even days to lay out before her the oral testimony, the voluminous documents, and the great bulk of evidence which eventually will be submitted by me and the Commission to utterly disprove every one of the serious and unfair assertions. This proof, I can assure you, will be overwhelming. The committee and the committee counsel have spent this past year raking among disgruntled and disappointed persons who have had dealings either with me or this Commission and you must readily appreciate the physical impossibility of my meeting this case in any other way than by having my day in court; only the forum where these charges were initiated can be the proper forum where they will be of a certainty proved false. I must hereby notify you that all charges will be met and will be met fully and convincingly in the course of months when presumably we shall be given the opportunity to put our evidence into the record.

In fairness to myself and in fairness to you and the Reader's Digest, I am obliged to warn you of the complete falsity of these charges and of my confidence in affirmatively disproving each and every one of them. It cannot be sufficient for your purposes under these circumstances that you rely upon the word of this lawyer or that you rely upon the rumors or hearsay statements put into the record or that you rely upon any single document or seeming authority written or spoken by some disgruntled individual. Wherever there is a written or spoken word seeming to give any basis for the scandalous charges of this lawyer, they can be traced back either to irresponsible rumor or hearsay. The best the committee's counsel has had to offer to date has been one superdisgruntled individual who for that very reason was an irresponsible person and witness. I want to repeat that when we get an opportunity to put our case in before the committee, neither you nor the Reader's Digest will have any doubt as to the falsity and the extreme scandalous character of these numerous charges and statements.

I am indeed reluctant to assume that you have known anything about this project. I am even more reluctant to assume that you would knowingly become a party to any such undertaking. I am certainly not conscious of the fact that the Reader's Digest has ever, with full knowledge of the facts, set out to spread a series of grave libels against any person. I think, too, that you will readily appreciate the fallacious legal foundation for your promotion of such libels. Even the record thus far, so obviously incomplete and one-sided and publicly recognized as unfair, cannot be used as a screen to hide behind by anyone as a privilege in destroying me.

Pending word from you I choose to assume that you and the management of the Reader's Digest have not known what is afoot. I shall appreciate word from you at your earliest convenience.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES LAWRENCE FLY,
Chairman.

Mr. Speaker, is this the language of a brave man? Just what is it that makes Mr. Fly's "heart knock on his ribs"? Was it the fear of truth that "shocked" him into threatening the Reader's Digest and abusing the committee of Congress investigating his commission? If the record that he has made is bad, must it forever be suppressed and kept from public notice in order that Mr. Fly be not "shocked"? What is Mr. Fly but the hired servant of the people?

The documented story that Mr. Fly was trying to suppress was as follows:

ONE BUSINESS OUR GOVERNMENT RUNS NOW

(By Senator Blank Blank)

Wreaths and garlands, laid at the feet of Free Enterprise in recent months, sometimes carry a poignant suggestion that these may be funeral offerings. In chamber of commerce resolutions and in letters to newspapers, American businessmen express their fear that our traditional system of competitive business may never rise from the sickbed to which wartime Government controls have brought it. Some businessmen have even begun to question whether the patient should survive. Would a greater peacetime supervision of business from Washington be, necessarily, an evil thing? Would the "planned economy" of the New Deal, after all, offer a richer way of life than the free enterprise it would replace?

A convenient preview of business run by Washington is at hand, for our consideration, there is one group of businessmen, radio broadcasters, who have been forced, since 1927, to look to Washington for consent to stay in business. As a result of the acknowledged need for a Government agency to allot wavelengths among applicants, every owner of a radio station must win the consent of the Federal Communications Commission to start his business. Once granted a license by the F. C. C., he must return, at least once every 3 years, and prove his fitness to have the license renewed. If he displeased the F. C. C. he may be put on his good behavior with a "temporary license," good for from 3 to 6 months. In the 2-year period ending in the spring of 1943, 457 of the 900 stations were, actually, reduced to a "temporary license" basis.

Any transfer of control, expansion of services, or even replacement of materials for a radio station must be approved by the Commission, headed by Chairman James Lawrence Fly. This seven-man body derives its powers from Congress, but its members are personal appointees of the President; on the present Commission only one man—T. A. A. Craven—had any significant experience in the radio field before his appointment. Mr. Craven has consistently opposed the decisions of the majority.

The F. C. C. is the shadow cast before it by a post-war planned economy; it is sometimes a very dark shadow, and its shape may offer a warning to men in business not yet subject to Washington's decisions in time of peace.

How does it work? Let's see:

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS FAVOR THE POLITICALLY FAITHFUL?

In 1937 two groups of local businessmen applied to the F. C. C. for a license for a radio station in Watertown, N. Y. Hearings were held and the F. C. C. decision read: "Public interest, convenience, and necessity will be served by granting the application of Black River Valley Broadcasts, Inc., and will not be served by granting the application of Watertown Broadcasting Corporation." The former company, granted a construction permit, spent over $12,000 in erecting a tower and preparing a building. They felt safe in doing this—a District of Columbia court had ruled that receiving a license to operate a radio station is a "necessary consequence" of receiving a construction permit.

Six weeks after construction began (on December 2) Marvin McIntyre, White House secretary, forwarded to the F. C. C. a letter from Howard H. Vrooman, a Watertown citizen. He had written President Roosevelt that several of the Black River stockholders were Republicans. "What," he asked, "will that mean to the future of the Democratic Party in northern New York? Your seaway and utility program has been fought from the very start by these same birds to whom you are now giving this radio station. It is inconceivable. I don't think you know these facts or you would not permit such a mistake to go through." Another letter to the President, from F. S. Rodenhurst, had also been forwarded to the F. C. C. by Mr. McIntyre. It urged that the Watertown license be revoked "to assist those who are working for the seaway and other parts of your program."

On December 3—the day after the F. C. C. received the Vrooman letter—Black River Valley Broadcasts got a telegram from the Commission saying that their license had been set aside. No explanation was given then or later. A license has since been granted the rival applicant, Watertown Broadcasting Co.—of whom the F. C. C. examiners first reported that "the record does not justify a finding that the applicant is legally qualified." This company is operating in Watertown today.

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS PUNISH MEN FOR THEIR POLITICAL BELIEFS?

The F. C. C. is subject to the Communications Act of which Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter has said: "Congress did not authorize the Commission to choose among applicants upon the basis of their political, economic, or social views."

In Wilkes-Barre, Pa., the holder of the license WBAX was put on a temporary license basis in 1938 and definitely refused a renewal on March 31, 1942. The Commission gave him to understand that this was due to alleged misrepresentations in his required financial report. While the licensee (John Strenger) continued to operate WBAX on a temporary license, hearings were held before the F. C. C. to decide which of the several applicants should be granted the Wilkes-Barre license instead. On April 27, 1942, after full hearings, the Commission declared in favor of Northeastern Pennsylvania Broadcasters, Inc., whose president, Robert J. Doran, Jr., is a local businessman active in American Legion affairs. Mr. Doran owned 10 percent of the stock of the station.

Appeals from decisions of the Commission may be made, by interested parties, within a limited period; during the last possible days, an appeal was entered (on August 4) by the Wyoming Valley Victory Committee, a union labor group with no apparent radio connections. This group did not ask for a license; it merely protested the granting of a license to Mr. Doran's company.

The F. C. C. prepared to hold new hearings, and its preparations were interesting. F. C. C. Agents Marcus Cohn, Philip Baker, and Raymond Lewis visited Wilkes-Barre and interviewed 125 persons as to Mr. Doran's political beliefs. (He was chairman of the local Legion Americanization committee). These agents seized Mr. Doran's files, including a large collection of anti-Communist pamplets he had gathered in his Legion work. A memorandum from the F. C. C. to a local labor leader (item 396, p. 182) suggests that he dig up evidence to offset the fact that Mr. Doran, as a liberal, had once negotiated a 40-hour week for a brewers and soft-drink workers union. F. C. C. agents even visited New York to check the political beliefs of Homer Chaillaux, whose sole connection with the Wilkes-Barre case lay in the fact that he was national chairman of the American Legion Americanization committee and, therefore, occasionally corresponded with Mr. Doran.

Hearings were held in Washington; they lasted from the early autumn of 1942 through January of the following year. Mr. Doran, called to the stand, was asked to define "pink"—to explain why he had opposed having Norman Thomas speak in Wilkes-Barre—to tell whether he had opposed having peace councils march with the Legion in an Armistice Day parade. Mr. Chaillaux was also summoned and was asked his opinion of the Sacco-Vanzetti trials and whether he considered Oswald Garrison Villard a radical.

It is now 3 years since the F. C. C. first concluded that Mr. Strenger was unfit permanently to operate WBAX; he is still operating the station under temporary license. The Commission, specifically forbidden to consider the political or social views of applicants for licenses, has several thousand pages of data on the political and social views of Mr. Doran and Mr. Chaillaux, gathered at the expense of the taxpayers of America and used, apparently, to withhold a permanent license from Mr. Doran's company.

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS REWARD ITS POLITICAL FRIENDS?

Certain of the broadcasters have "played ball" with the present chairman, helping him to build up rival trade associations to challenge the National Association of Broadcasters, which has fought his politics. Among Mr. Fly's supporters has been Walter J. Damm, general manager of Station WTMJ, Milwaukee, Wis.

In 1941 Mr. Damm launched an impressive plan—the building of a "radio city" in Milwaukee; before construction had proceeded far, he ran into conflict with the defense program, which limited the u. of steel to pressing military uses. Mr. Damm appealed to Mr. Fly who answered, in a letter dated November 2, 1941, that Government priority officials had refused Mr. Damm's request. "They say," Mr. Fly added, "that even an application to construct a hospital 25 percent complete has been turned down * * * You might proceed with all construction which does not involve priorities and file separate applications after you have proceeded further. You will then be able to show a higher percentage of completion of the project."

It seems unlikely that Congress set up the F. C. C. to advise chosen broadcasters on how to circumvent the rulings of Government agencies preparing the country for war.

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS RESIST INVESTIGATION FROM CONGRESS, FROM WHICH ITS POWERS ARE DERIVED?

Senator WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr., of Maine, active minority leader and the ranking radio-legislation specialist in Congress has said in Senate hearings to the F. C. C. chairman: "I am surprised, even shocked, that the commission feels it appropriate to oppose the study * * * I have been in Congress quite a while * * * and this is the first time so far as my knowledge goes that a regulatory body of the Government, a creature of the Congress itself, has felt it appropriate to challenge either the wisdom or the right of a committee of Congress to review its acts and the policies which it is undertaking to put into effect" (June 2, 1941).

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS ENTER INTO SECRET AGREEMENTS WHICH ENDANGER THE PUBLIC WELFARE?

In June 1940 the F. C. C. required all radio operators of American merchant ships to file fingerprints with the Commission. This had resulted from Navy concern over Communists abroad. In September of that year J. Edgar Hoover requested of Mr. Fly that these be turned over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which had been designated by the President (September 6, 1939) as the clearing-house for "all investigative information pertaining to the national defense." For the next 21 months repeated requests from Mr. Hoover and, later, from Attorney General Francis Biddle, failed to induce Mr. Fly to surrender the fingerprints; his excuse was that he had agreed with the radio operators' labor union representatives that these should not be used to check the possible criminality of the holders.

On December 7, 1941, Pearl Harbor was attacked, and the United States entered into a state of war. On January 2, 1942, Mr. Biddle wrote to Mr. Fly: "You explained that you had obtained the prints under a promise that they would be kept confidential"; he reminded Mr. Fly that the labor leaders to whom the promise was made were to be asked to "release" him. Mr. Biddle went on: "The evidence is strong that messages have been surreptitiously transferred to our enemies by radio and that military attacks upon the territory of this country may have been furthered thereby." This strong plea brought no satisfactory results; Government in business defied the F. B. I. and the Attorney General.

On May 6, 5 months after Pearl Harbor, Mr. Fly wrote to Mr. Biddle: "I am today drawing the matter again to the attention of the labor leaders." Eventually, and under protest, Mr. Fly transferred the fingerprint records to the Department of Justice June 26. The Nation had then been 6 months at war; 21 months had elapsed since the F. B. I. first undertook to weed out dangerous men from the ranks of the radio operators. The F. C. C. Chairman had chosen to take advice from civilian labor leaders rather than from the men in whose hands the security of the Nation rested.

(There has been testimony before the select committee that over 3,000 of the radio operators were found to have criminal records; 45,575 of the 200,000 fingerprints were returned to the F. C. C. by the F. B. I. as worthless, because of the inadequate technique used in recording them.)

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS PUNISH GROUPS POLITICALLY OPPOSED TO THE ADMINISTRATION IN POWER?

In the 1936 Presidential campaign only 34.5 percent of the country's newspapers supported Mr. Roosevelt (Editor and Publisher). In 1937 it was suggested that newspaper owners be restrained from owning radio licenses. At that time the F. C. C. general counsel, Hampson Gary, reported that the Commission lacked authority for such a ruling. His opinion was further supported (March 16, 1938) when the United States Court of Appeals ruled, in the Tri-State case, that discrimination against newspaper owners, as a class, would be illegal.

In 1940 another Presidential election was held; this time only 20.1 percent of the newspapers endorsed Mr. Roosevelt's candidacy. Angell, counsel of the Council for Democracy, the first of these was given to Gordon

In early March 1941—6 weeks after the inauguration—Mr. Fly broached the matter of newspaper ownership, and his Commission voted against considering the matter. On March 19, Mr. Fly visited the White House. The next day he again brought up the matter in a Commission meeting and this time he was able to win a vote to investigate "whether or not joint control of newspaper and radio broadcasting stations tends to result in impairment of radio service under the standard of public interest, convenience, and necessity."

The matter was, and remains to this day, of doubtful legality; but the Commissioner has consistently refused to appeal to Congress or to the courts for a clarification of the point; instead he has proceeded with the investigation. Discrimination in this case has been branded, by minority members of the F. C. C. itself, as "tantamount to saying that carriage makers cannot go into the business of manufacturing automobiles, and the automobile manufacturers may not make airplanes."

In early 1941, 300 of the 890 broadcasting stations had some newspaper affiliations; since the Communications Act says (sec. 307A) that renewals of licenses must be granted on the same basis as original grants, all newspaper owners were unnerved by the new resolution.

Hearings were announced and applications from newspaper owners for radio licenses were, from then on, placed in the "pending" file of the Commission, to be considered after the newspaper ownership controversy had been decided. They rest there today. At least 65 such applications are still pending, and 65 communities are deprived of the radio service they might have enjoyed.

Hearings on the matter were announced in 1941. A 14-page questionnaire was prepared and sent to all radio stations, many of whom were forced to hire special accountants to fill it in. It included such queries as: "Give a listing of the personnel who perform, arrange, write, or create program material who are in any way connected with a newspaper." (The F. C. C. is specifically restrained, by law, from censoring the program content of radio broadcasting.)

Field investigators descended on widely scattered and politically unsympathetic radio-newspaper offices and rifled the files. In Des Moines, Iowa, the files dating back 6 years were taken away from the Cowles station. (Mr. Gardner Cowles, Jr., had been a close associate of Wendell Willkie in the 1940 campaign.) Other stations whose files received particular notice included the Hearst radio, which operates four stations, and those of the Kansas City Star, WDAF. These questionnaires were never introduced into the hearings nor, indeed, mentioned by the Commissioner during the past 3 years.

In the hearings the attempt of the F. C. C. to discriminate against newspapers was branded by Arthur Garfield Hays, counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, as raising "a problem of free speech and a substantial one." The legality of the movement was questioned by Dr. Roscoe Pound, dean emeritus of Harvard Law School, by Ernest Angell, counsel of the Council for Democracy, and other legal experts.

The arguments of the Commission centered around the possibility that pipe lines to the public might become concentrated, within a community, within the hands of a single group of men if newspapers and radio stations were jointly owned. But the F. C. C., in granting several licenses within a single community to a single licensee, had already brought such pipe lines into the hands of favored applicants in Boston, New York City, Buffalo, Cleveland, Albany, Fort Worth, Dallas, Cincinnati, Chicago, Des Moines, Fort Wayne, Lincoln, Denver, Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle, Spokane, and several smaller towns.

Two and a half years after the newspaper-ownership hearings were closed 3,500 pages of testimony had been received, 52 witnesses called, 407 exhibits introduced, and a quarter of a million dollars expended. Yet, by the end of 1943, no decision had been reached and no action taken on the scores of applications in the pending file. Newspaper applicants have been deprived, for several years, of what many legal experts consider their rights—and with no chance of redress by the courts of the land.

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS DECEIVE THE CONGRESS?

In 1942 the Appropriations Committee granted the F. C. C. an additional $254,000 for the specific purpose of hiring 148 additional persons subject to "clearance with the Bureau of the Budget"; the F. C. C. hired only 31 additional persons and diverted the rest of the money to increasing the salaries of 172 old employees.

When Mr. Fly appeared before the congressional committee to ask for these additional funds he based his plea on the need for expanding the work of his Commission in "shaping foreign and military policy" and "countering enemy propaganda." Within a week of receiving the money, one of the Commission's chiefs announced that it happily provided funds for "personal reorganization." Some of the salaries raised were in the Publications Division—far removed from "shaping military policy."

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS EXEMPT CERTAIN "TEACHER'S PETS" FROM ITS OWN RULINGS?

In early 1942 all newspaper applications for radio licenses were being thrown into the "pending file"—even when the newspaper owned a small minority interest in the broadcasting company.

But in March 1942, John W. Clarke, a Chicago investment banker, applied for permission to buy the Chicago station WHIP. He admitted that $150,000 was to be raised by giving debentures to Marshall Field III, publisher of the Chicago Sun, a newspaper militantly sympathetic to the New Deal. Mr. Field has also received a stock interest. Editor and Publisher, in reporting the sale, said, "The purchase represents a personal investment by Mr. Field * * * the Chicago Sun will be one of the largest users of time on WHIP for promotional purposes." This statement was introduced into an F. C. C. hearing and was used as an argument, by one Commissioner, against approving the transfer. Nonetheless, Messrs. Field and Clark won their license. Soon the "Chicago Sun Hour" was one of the programs on WHIP.

Applications of newspaper corporations for frequency-modulation permits have been habitually put into the pending file for 2½ years. A few PM permits have nonetheless been granted to newspaper owners; the first of these was given to Gordon Gray, owner of both the Winston-Salem Sentinel and of station WSJS in that town—and a heavy contributor to the Democratic campaign funds in 1936 and 1940. Further exceptions were made in favor of KTRH, the Houston, Tex., Chronicle station (in which Secretary of Commerce Jones has an interest), and WTMJ, the Milwaukee Journal station of Walter J. Damm, a supporter of Mr. Fly.

IS GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS CARELESS ABOUT FINANCIAL IRREGULARITIES?

Ralph W. Horton, owner of the largest single interest in the only morning newspaper in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., 27 percent, applied for F. C. C. permission to buy the local station WFTL. This was granted him on July 1, 1941 "on assurances that he had divested himself of all newspaper association." Let's see how Mr. Horton carried out this Commission order.

Mr. Horton, in June, took $9,000 worth of notes executed by the newspaper and placed them in the Barnett National Bank of Jacksonville in trust for his daughter. He "sold" his interest in the newspaper to a lawyer friend for three vacant lots, which later reverted to him, without further cash transactions, and on which he has paid taxes. He continued, in 1942, to pay the debts of the newspaper of which he had "divested" himself. * * * He deposited $1,500 on September 10, 1941, and $750 on June 11, 1942, in the paper's account in the Broward Bank & Trust Co.

Or take the case of J. Frank Burke, owner of KPAS, Pasadena, Calif., supporter of F. C. C. policies who recently testified at hearings on the White-Wheeler bill at Mr. Fly's suggestion. Mr. Burke admitted, under questioning, that he no longer owned the 1,025 shares of stock of his station which F. C. C. records showed in his name, and that he had not reported the transfer, as the law requires. He had only 125 shares left, having "given stock to people who helped put the license through." Mr. Burke—a member of the Democratic State National Committee in California—received a permit to double the power of his station, in February 1943, 9 months after a stringent freeze order forbade such increases to save materials; this was granted Mr. Burke without a formal hearing.

In the case of WORL, Boston, F. C. C. records in 1941 showed that the license holder was Greoge Crockwell, attorney for Natalie Whitwell, who had lost all stock interest in the station 4 years earlier. Much of this was transferred to Harold LaFount, a former F. C. C. Commissioner who had been made president of WORL's corporation without F. C. C. consent, in 1937 (as required by law). F. C. C. records in December 1943 did not show that Mr. LaFount had also, 3 years before, acquired the stock interests of Robert A. Nordbloom, whose name was still carried on the F. C. C. records. The legal department of the F. C. C. had recommended, in 1941, that the financial affairs of WORL be investigated; nothing was ever done through December 1943 at which time attorney for an elderly spinster, Miss Natalie Whitwell, testified that she had been defrauded of over $60,000 by a former licensee.

Or look at Station WGKV, Charleston, W. Va., whose licensee, Worth Kramer, was approved by the Commission 2 days after his application was made and before a Dun & Bradstreet report had been received. Mr. Kramer stated that he would finance purchase of the station through $10,500 borrowed from the Park National Bank of Newark, Ohio (which never lent him this or any other sum). Instead, Mr. Kramer received the money from John Kennedy, owner of several other West Virginia stations—and the money has been traced through cashier's checks and odd-amount withdrawals, by a congressional committee. Stock in the station was transferred from Mr. Kramer to Mr. Kennedy 4 days after issuance, but Mr. Kennedy's name does not appear in the F. C. C. records of WGKV.

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS VISIT REPRISALS AGAINST THOSE WHO SPEAK AGAINST IT?

Mark Ethridge, of the Louisville Courier-Journal and of Station WHAS, was asked by President Roosevelt to make a study of the radio licensing situation in 1941. Mr. Ethridge, a Democrat and a supporter of the New Deal, reported (December 1941) (hearings, 1941):

"Here is an industry that was born of regulation. The Government was its midwife: It has certified in granting licenses to the legal, moral, and financial responsibility of everybody who runs radio stations. * * * If there be monopolies, the Government made them, frequently by granting licenses to favorites. * * * I know of three instances in which the Commission laid down principles, or had the determination of principles under consideration, and violated them by almost immediate action in favor of people who were not unfriendly to the administration. There has been a breach of faith, and I am perfectly certain that it can be pinned directly upon the Commission majority. The Commission resorted to sharp administrative practices."

The F. C. C. granted a license for a new radio station in Louisville to Emmanuel Levy, a local leader at loggerheads with Mr. Ethridge (November 1941) (Louisville, a city of 308,000 was already served by four local stations * * * the same number as Cleveland, whose population is 900,500).

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS PERMIT LEAKS?

James Alfred Guest, senior field attorney for the F. C. C. New York office admitted under oath that he sometimes sent copies of his confidential reports on Italian-language broadcasts to a civilian Harvard professor, an Italian; these reports were United States Government property.

DOES GOVERMENT IN BUSINESS SEEK TO MAINTAIN POWER BY DEFYING THE MILITARY COMMANDERS?

Since Pearl Harbor the F. C. C. has been repeatedly urged to surrender its monitoring activities to the Army and Navy for reasons of national security. The testimony of one admiral, now on active duty, states, "The F. C. C. is a very amateurish outfit. * * * All they are doing is annoying us." He has testified that, having no ships at sea, the F. C. C. cannot give the triangulations necessary to establishing the source of enemy broadcasts; in one case the Navy, acting on F. C. C. information, spent days trying to find a Japanese "ship at sea" from which radio reports were emanating. It turned out to be a station on the mainland of Japan.

Commissioner Craven of the F. C. C. has testified that the whole Pacific Fleet was once set to chasing a Japanese ship at an appallingly wrong spot because of F. C. C. bearings. He has also stated that "illegal" stations detected by the F. C. C. monitoring services included (1) a station rigged up by schoolboys on a radiator in Omaha and (2) a Long Island station conducted by our own F. B. I.

Moreover, Commissioner Craven has sworn that Mr. Fly's pressure on the Secretary of the Navy effected the "cashiering" of Admiral D. C. Hooper, who was, for 25 years, top radio executive in the Navy and its representative, until recently, on the intergovernmental radio committee.

"F. C. C. reprisals against members of the armed forces," he said, "are a well-known fact."

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS RISK THE NATIONAL SECURITY?

On February 8, 1943, President Roosevelt received a letter signed, jointly, by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. This stated that 5 months earlier the Joint Chiefs of Staff had been asked to study the radio monitoring situation and that after "thorough and comprehensive study" they recommended that "participation of the F. C. C. in radio intelligence should be discontinued. Radio intelligence activities of the F. C. C. tend to be less and less progressive as the art progresses. This is due to integration into proper radio intelligence systems of large quantities of secret military information, which for obvious reasons cannot be disseminated to an agency such as the F. C. C.

"The attempted duplication by the F. C. C. of work that is being more effectively done by the military has in fact endangered the effectiveness and security of military radio intelligence. In view of the foregoing it is concluded that better prosecution of the war will be served by terminating all military and quasi-military radio intelligence activities of the F. C. C. and confining such activities to the Army and the Navy. The foregoing conclusions are supported by the views of the Army and Navy commanders on the field who are charged with the responsibility for military action based on radio intelligence."

The normal run of private businessmen would retire from the radio intelligence field, at such a request. But Government in business took its quarrel to the White House and—after 7 months—won a letter from Mr. Roosevelt suggesting that such disputes between Government agencies be submitted to the Board of War Communications, of which Mr. Fly is chairman.

IS GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS EQUIPPED FOR THE CULTURAL REQUIREMENTS OF ITS JOB?

Several years ago the F. C. C. informed owners of Station WTCN, Minneapolis, that its application for a license renewal would be granted only after a hearing to discuss complaints received 2 months earlier that it had broadcast "profane" language. (This station was a network outlet, also newspaper affiliated.) Investigation showed that the offending program had been Eugene O'Neill's Beyond the Horizon, a book used as a text in 200 public schools and a play 3 times presented, at Government expense, by the Federal Theater.

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS USE ITS POWERS SO THAT ITS FRIENDS MAY AIR THEIR VIEWS?

Since the F. C. C. was first set up by Congress, only four licenses have been taken away from specific individuals for cause. In each case the charge was that the radio station was being used as the mouthpiece of an individual's own personal views.

When Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia, of New York, asked the consent of the Commission to have the municipal station WNYC operate at night, his application was denied on the grounds that this would infringe on the rights of Station WCCO, a "clear-channel" station on the same frequency, serving a very wide rural area. Three weeks later, and without hearings, Mr. LaGuardia was granted the right to use WNYC for night broadcasts; this was done by means of a "special authorization" from the Commission, a type of licensing never before granted for an unnamed period of time. This "special authorization" has not been withdrawn, in spite of the fact that Mr. LaGuardia, once a week, uses the facilities of WNYC for voicing his personal and political views, going so far, in the winter of 1943, as to blame James A. Farley for the victory of a Republican Lieutenant Governor in the State, and to state that Franklin Roosevelt could, if he ran, carry New York City.

DOES GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS USE EXTRA LEGAL MEASURES TO GET ITS WAY?

The only Government agency empowered to censor radio programs is the Office of Censorship, according to the United States Attorney General; the only wartime agency known as the authority with power to investigate individuals for subversive activities is the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Public records show how the F. C. C. has apparently invaded these two fields.

Robert Richards, of the Office of Censorship, reported the technique to a congressional committee. He quoted a conversation with Sidney Spear, F. C. C. attorney, who said: "We worked it this way. If Lee (Falk, of the Office of War Information) found a fellow he thought was doing some funny business, he told me about it. Then we waited until the station applied for a renewal of license. Say the station was WBNX, and the broadcaster in question Leopold Hurdski. Well, when WBNX applied for a renewal we would tip off Lee and he would drop in on Mr. Alcorn, the station's manager. He would say, 'Mr. Alcorn, I believe you ought to fire Leopold Hurdski.' Then he would give Mr. Alcorn some time to think it over.

"After a couple of weeks Mr. Alcorn would begin to notice that he was having some trouble getting his license renewed. After a couple of more weeks of the same thing he would begin to put two and two together and get four. Then he would fire Leopold Hurdski and very shortly after that his license would be renewed by the Commission. We can cooperate in the same way with you."

Speaking of such railroading of a number of foreign-language broadcasters, to whose loyalty the F. B. I. and Office of Censorship agents had certified, one F. C. C. Commissioner said, "We gave them no fair hearing whatsoever." Reading that testimony, I doubted very much that this is America.

DOES GOVERNMENT (IN A BUSINESS DEALING WITH PUBLIC INFORMATION) THREATEN FREE SPEECH?

Both the first amendment and the Communications Act (sec. 326) prohibits the F. C. C. from censoring program content. In a Senate hearing in late July 1943 Commissioner Fly admitted the limitation.

In July 1941 Mr. Fly summoned to his office representatives of the three networks—Columbia, National, and Mutual—and of the press services which sell news to radio stations. He "suggested" that they should not use the phrase "Stalin line" on the air.

Joseph Lang, former head of the Foreign Language Radio Wartime Control Committee, has testified that Mrs. Hilda Shea, of F. C. C., visited him to urge that his station—WHOM, Detroit—make no mention, in its Polish-language broadcasts, of the alleged killing of 10,000 Polish officers by the Russians. At the time of the visit the power to recommend renewal of WHOM's license rested in the hands of Mrs. Shea.

Editor and Publisher has described the O. W. I.-F. C. C. tie-up to influence program content as near blackmail, and has said, "If one Government underling can assume and get away with the power of gagging a radio speaker, we can be sure that others will try the same schemes in other directions." The New York World-Telegram has commented, "In ordinary business dealings the squeeze play by the O. W. I. and F. C. C. would be regarded as a highly objectionable form of blackmail and the perpetrators of it would lay themselves open to criminal charges of conspiracy."

In spite of the acknowledged fact that the F. F. F. has no control over specific program content, the Yankee Network application for removal of Station WAAB (September 10, 1940, Docket 5640) states its plans "covering news, news comments, and political broadcasts" and adds that these policies are described "to conform to the wishes and request of Hon. J. L. Fly." In the hearings to discuss transfer of the Blue Network to Edward P. Noble, the president of Mr. Noble's company testified, at some length, his unwillingness to sell radio time to groups who wished to air controversial matters. Later in the hearings Mr. Fly told Mr. Noble that the Commission would insist upon a statement of policy on this matter before acting on the transfer. The statement, preceding the granting of the license, reversed Mr. Noble's avowed position as to the sale of time for controversial issues. Why?

Of the 191 notices for hearings on applications for expansion or new stations heard by the Commission since late 1939, in 98 of the cases the applicant was asked questions as to his type and character of program content.

Yet, the F. C. C., by law, cannot interfere with program content.

Commissioner Craven has said, "Freedom of speech and freedom of the press are, in simple terms, merely freedom from fear of Government reprisals for what is said or printed or for what is not said or printed * * * The real freedom of the press guaranteed by the Bill of Rights is freedom in the true sense to criticize the Government without fear of reprisals.

"If the Bill of Rights is to mean anything for radio it should mean freedom from Government reprisals or pressures administered by the radio licensing authority, namely the F. C. C."

There are other cases of Government in business—its wastefulness, its favoritism, its willingness to set itself up above the law of the land. There is the case in which WFTL was granted a license to increase its power by 10 times, and was awarded the necessary materials, in the face of a recognized shortage of materials. There is, in contrast, the case of the man who was not allowed to replace a worn, 13-year-old transmitter with new equipment, already in his possession, because of the "lack of critical materials."

But these things happen with monotonous regularity when the power to prevent a man from earning a living is granted a political appointee.

Is there any man big enough to resist the temptation such a situation offers him? Should any man—his authority dependent on keeping an administration in power—see dangled before him a dozen chances a month of forcing businessmen to operate to the benefit of that administration?

It is not the Federal Communications Commission (nor Fly) which is responsible for the shocking invasion of individual rights of which his department is accused. The real evil lies in giving too much power to government—in awarding to any single bureau the life-and-death power over any business. The threat is always sufficient to gag and control men who must come, hat in hand, and ask permission to earn their livelihoods.

Those in other lines may take warning from the broadcasters' plight: Government in business would be no boon to them in times of peace.

Mr. Speaker, with the story Mrs. Palmer furnished certain explanatory notes, which were as follows:

EXPLANATORY NOTES

This article was first suggested to me by Wendell Willkie, as Mr. WALLACE knows, and not by anybody connected with the select committee. Mr. Willkie sent me to Bill Paley, of C. B. S., with an introduction. I talked to Paley and Paul Hollister, of C. B. S.;

Niles Trammell, of N. B. C.; Lou Weiss, of the Don Lee Co.; Neville Miller, of N. A. B.; Sol Taishoff, of Broadcasting magazine; and Louis Caldwell, lawyer for the Mutual chain, before I ever approached Eugene Garey or any member of the select committee.

I have not taken Mr. Garey's word for anything, but have demanded documentary proof—letters, photostats of checks, bank statements—for every case cited. I have, besides, spent over 30 hours with the various staff members of Broadcasting and have checked specific cases with Commissioner T. A. M. Craven; John McKay, of N. B. C.; and Robert Bartley, of N. A. B.

I sincerely wish that I could have got the F. C. C. version of every case cited. On my first trip to Washington I called Fly's office and told his secretary I should like to meet him, at any convenient time; she was to call me at the Carlton and leave a message. When 3 days passed, with no message, I sent a telegram to Mr. Fly, repeating the request. This brought results. Mr. Fly's secretary called and said he'd talk to me, on the telephone, at exactly 5 p. m. The conversation was a peculiar one. He said the Reader's Digest had turned down an article he had submitted, and why should he help out another writer?—the insinuation was that we were working the same side of the street. I said, "Look; your rejection slip is not the point. I have been given what looks like damaging evidence against your Commission. I think you owe it to yourself to see me and explain these charges." He said he wouldn't—that he disapproved of our running anything on the F. C. C. until his own witnesses had all been heard. He told me to tell my editor my ears would be very red if I printed anything now. This I did.

I still thought Fly ought, in justice to himself, to be induced to see me so I unsuccessfully stalked him from the New York end, taking Morris Ernst to lunch. Morris is a White House supporter of Fly. The other day I also had a 4-hour session with Commissioner C. J. Durr, a Fly man, to whom I made every appeal short of cheesecake for cooperation from the F. C. C. in checking specific cases. He said, "No."

I wish it were possible to get the broadcasters to open up to me directly, but they are a timid lot and tell me they fear reprisals if they talk. Anyway, getting complete, lawyer-proof documents from them would take time and if we want to make the next issue we had better use data already cited in the hearings, even if this annoys Mr. Fly. I've done all I can to give him a fair break.

Some of my sources think Fly's strategy with us is one of delay, on any pretext, until new radio legislation is passed by Congress. He now urges that we shall print nothing until after all his own witnesses have been heard; he can arrange, I think, that this procedure lasts until the new law is in effect. Then he can reasonably protest against our printing an article by saying, "Why dig up what we did under a law no longer in effect?" Such tactics can effectively prevent our ever printing anything about the F. C C.

My job, of course, is to get the facts and print such of them as are of interest to the public, whose taxes support the F. C. C., and whose Congress granted this Bureau its powers. If the immense licensing powers of Fly are being used improperly, the public ought to know. Some broadcasters insist to me that a license to operate a radio is the Washington equivalent of a local politician's Thanksgiving turkey—that it is given out to reward the politically faithful and withheld from any businessman who has fought the administration. If that's true, it's a real threat to freedom of the press.

But of course we mustn't let ourselves be influenced by the prejudices of broadcasters who feel they are Mr. Fly's victims—that's one reason why I've been so insistent on documentary proof. Let the facts speak for themselves; if they eventually prove that Fly is the mugging artist of the radio industry, O. K. But I refuse to condemn this man in advance or to assume, with Garey, that he is a termite eating away at the Bill of Rights.

The great, unsolved puzzle—which I may be able to solve before the final draft—is how Mr. Fly has won to a position in which he can win arguments, in the military field, against Knox and Stimson—and can even refuse to give out fingerprints to the F. B. I. on request? Even if he were the business-hating, power-loving, table-thumping radical his enemies say, the central question remains unsolved. That question is: Is Fly really the Frank Sinatra of the inner circle New Deal?

Mr. Speaker, does further proof need to be offered to show what is happening to free speech, free radio, and free press at the hands of the man who heads the Federal Communications Commission?

Farm Labor

REMARKS

OF

HON. HATTON W. SUMNERS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have received today a communication from the executive committee of the Dallas County Farm Labor Committee, under date of May 29, 1944, setting forth the farm-labor situation in Dallas County, and something with reference to the general situation. It sets forth a serious situation which should challenge the attention especially of committees of Congress and agencies of the Government responsible for dealing with the economic interests of agriculture and for preserving its productivity so that it may be able to meet the food requirements of our fighting forces and of our civilian population.

Agricultural production during this war period and its difficulties have been dramatized as has the production of the implements of war, though materials for food and clothing are as essential to the conduct of the war as are guns and ammunition. The achievement of agriculture last year, despite the decrease of farm labor, reduction of farm machinery and implements, is one of the most remarkable in the history of our production. From the beginning of the national-defense program in 1940 to the middle of the summer of 1943 over one and one-half million farm workers and potential farm workers left the farm, and probably another million remaining on the farm took other jobs. Between 1939 and 1943 there was an increase of 24 percent in farm production. In my section of the country excessive rains tremendously hindered planting this year. I was home for a few days last week. Much of the grain ready for harvest was falling in the fields.

This communication which I shall include herein sets forth a situation that has developed in no small degree as a result of governmental policy which permitted industry to outbid agriculture for labor required to cultivate and harvest this crop. I make that statement not in criticism but as indicating governmental responsibility and duty in the premises if we are to preserve a proper balance in our productivity. This communication states that the business people of the community are not able now to contribute labor for the harvesting of the crops, as they did last year.

I know there is a sort of general disposition on the part of the people to say that the farmer is always complaining; but when one considers their courage, their achievements, their continuation on the job in the face of hazards of the seasons, droughts, and excessive rains, hazards of the elements generally, hazards of insect pests, uncertainty of the volume of production and uncertainty of price, it must be conceded that probably no other group of our people would do more or complain less.

I happen to know each of the persons who signed this communication. They are high-class, patriotic people; men of sound judgment and public spirit. The communication is as follows:

FARM-LABOR SITUATION IN DALLAS COUNTY, MAY 29, 1944

Farmers are facing the most acute labor shortage in their history. In fact, labor is so short that there is a possibility that many Dallas County farm crops will not be cultivated and harvested in 1944.

Due to the heavy induction in the armed forces during the past year, there are far less farm boys on the farm now than there were a year ago. And labor was short a year ago. Able-bodied labor has been inducted into the armed forces from industry and other occupations at an increased rate during the past year, thereby leaving a much smaller percentage of labor for all occupations.

Dallas business concerns and public utilities who subsidized farm labor last year by sending their paid employees to the farms in this county for a period of from 1 day to 1 week at a time are not inclined to do the same thing again in 1944. Because these concerns point out that their regular employees have more work per man to do now than they did a year ago and they cannot replace or add to their labor supply because all sources of able-bodied labor is extremely limited. It seems to be the sentiment among the concerns who helped furnish agricultural labor last year that if farm labor is to be subsidized, the expense of such a subsidy should be borne by the Federal Government.

Recent action by certain employees of the United States Employment Service in Dallas suggesting and pointing the way whereby building contractors might pay above the wage scale in order to obtain more labor is, in effect, a Government subsidy for the building contractors. We understand that the building contractors by the subterfuge of classifying all common labor as semi-skilled labor were able to increase the rate of pay from 55 to 70 cents an hour. This practice, we have been advised, is in effect now. This office has been advised by able-bodied labor that worked on the farm last year that they would work on the farm this year if the farmers would pay them 75 cents an hour, the wage they are now receiving working as common laborers on construction work.

The practice of paying above the wage scale in order to get more labor when such contractors who are guaranteed by the Government a certain percent of profit has the effect of draining all able-bodied labor away from the farmers.

The War Labor Board contends that they have nothing to do with setting the price of farm labor and that the prices of farm labor are set by the Secretary of Agriculture under the directives from the President. This is true. The War Labor Board has not set farm labor prices and neither has the Board mentioned farm wages in their recent discussions and interviews. Yet, the effect of the practice of the War Labor Board in permitting the building contractors to pay above the wage scale gives a decided advantage to these groups in hiring labor. The wage price is continually raised until it is attracted to the laborer irrespective of the cost to the contractor because the Government is paying the bill.

If it is good business for the Government to guarantee building contractors a certain profit and insure them against losses, it seems by the same process of reasoning, it would be good business for the Government to make it possible for the farmers through a direct grant or subsidy to pay a higher wage scale, thereby enabling the farmers to compete on the labor market for able-bodied labor.

Isn't it just as fair for the Government to subsidize the farmers in some manner in order that he might be able to pay an attractive farm wage to able-bodied laborers to help cultivate and harvest vital food and feed crops as it is for the Government to subsidize building contractors to build houses for war workers to live in.

Which is the most important, building houses for war workers to live in, or producing food, feed and fiber for all people to eat and wear?

The executive committee of the Dallas County Farm Labor Committee is desirous of calling this maladjusted practice to the attention of all people and putting them on notice that unless the farmers receive an adequate labor supply from some apparently unknown source, or receive a Government labor subsidy enabling them to compete on the labor market for able-bodied labor, then it is highly probable that much of the present grain crop that is already matured will not be harvested and farmers generally will have to curtail their farm operations and many of them may have to completely go out of business.

The foregoing, in the opinion of the labor committee, is definite proof that farm commodities should be on such a price level as to enable the farmer to compete in the general labor market on an equal basis with other industry, because the present prices for farm commodities are based on labor rates much lower than those now in affect.

Memorial Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a radio address that I delivered on Memorial Day, May 30, 1944, over radio station WLAW, Lawrence, Mass. This program was sponsored by the American Legion Auxiliary, Department of Massachusetts, and directed by Mrs. Katherine E. Harty, of Methuen, Mass.:

On Memorial Day, May 30, 1922, in the city of Washington, a beautiful building was dedicated to the memory of a man, who brought hope and inspiration to millions of his fellowmen.

To visit this memorial is an unforgettable experience. One leaves the bright Washington sunshine to enter the silent shadow of a huge chamber. The babble of the city is left behind. One stands in awed reverence. For in this chamber there is but one object and the simplicity of it is overwhelming. Out of the shadows a light falls gently on the brooding, tragic figure of Abraham Lincoln, the martyred President.

On the marble wall behind is an inscription, reading: "In this Temple, as in the hearts of the people for whom he saved the Union, the memory of Abraham Lincoln is enshrined forever."

A temple wherein we commune with a great heart and a noble character. To ourselves we say: this is the faith that is America. This is the belief in freedom and justice and charity that will sacrifice life itself to promote the common welfare. This is the spirit of America immortalized in solemn beauty.

Abraham Lincoln did not die in vain. Nearly 80 years have passed; but any man, woman, or child who visits this memorial will feel the nearness of Lincoln and will be a better American because of it.

For this is the meaning of Memorial Day. Across time and space we touch in spirit with those who have traveled onward. And from this communion with the dead we draw renewed faith to go forward, as they once did, to build a better world.

As I journeyed from Washington to my home city, I could not help but think of the freedom that Americans enjoy, even in times of crisis. Not once was I stopped or questioned. No domestic passports or identifications were required. From my train window I saw freemen working in the factories and farmers tilling the soil. The streets of cities were filled with busy people, well-dressed people, and the countryside was green with life and hope. For a moment it did not seem that we were at war.

My eyes shifted back to the newspaper in my hands and to the news story of the shock experienced by veterans who have been transferred too suddenly from the battle fronts to the home front. From a fox hole to a night club. A bewildering, sometimes bitter reaction as the veteran compares the life he sees here—with the life of his buddies over there. Why this inequality of sacrifice?

Today, in the temple of our hearts, let us try—try to correct this inequality. Let us think and feel for our men out there. Let us be worthy of them.

On the streets and in the factories I have heard some men talk against our allies. I have listened, wondering when they would put first things first and speak out against our enemies Hitler and Tojo, and the evil that they symbolize. But they kept on talking against our allies.

I have heard men whisper, setting race against race, and religion against religion, here in America while our soldiers and sailors are fighting and, yes, even dying to save all of us.

It was then that I recalled the just and patient leadership of Lincoln. There were those in his day who spread hate and suspicion unwittingly serving the enemy's cause. But Lincoln, together with men and women of firm faith and high resolve, saw the Nation through to victory and unity and peace.

In that tradition, we too must back up our men and women on all our fighting fronts. To do that, let us on the home front keep faith with our American ideals. There is no place here for racism, there is no place for bigotry. In this stern test there is room only for righteous anger against the forces of brutality and enslavement. This solemn hour calls for singleness of purpose. Let us mobilize every resource of mind and spirit against the common enemy. Let us show him that even at this late hour he cannot divide us from without or within.

The morale of our men on the fighting fronts is affected by what we feel and say and do here in America. Let us fortify that morale by showing our soldiers and sailors that we are with them to the very limit of our capacity; with the work of our hands, the sincerity of our hearts, and the inspiration of our prayers.

Only in this way can we help to bring this war to a swift and victorious conclusion. By our unity of purpose we will help to save the lives of many thousands of our men and women.

And in the peace to follow, we must have unity of purpose to make certain that the peace is a true and lasting one.

Looking back to the years between the wars and to the words men spoke on this day of requiem, one finds, repeated over and over again, these words of complaint: "We fought in 1917 and 1918 to make the world safe for democracy. We won the war, but we were betrayed by the peace." And so America retired to her cynical shell of isolationism.

She would set herself apart from the world and its problems. She had oceans to protect her. She need not prepare. But that illusion died forever on the cold dawn of December 7, 1941.

Out of the present agony and the realistic lessons it has brought home to us we know that America, after the last war, failed to carry her share of the responsibility for maintaining the just peace.

That must never happen again!

America has come of age. Her irresponsible childhood has gone. And being of age, she must assume the responsibilities that go with it. She is no longer set apart by herself alone. Science has swept away the space and time that once separated her from her neighbors. Today she is a member of the community of nations. She and they must find some way to get along together. The family, the town, the State, the Nation—all of these have developed a system and a sense of community responsibility. Now, it is the world's turn.

If the sacrifices of the present are to have meaning, we must face this fact. I feel certain that the men who are dying for us would have it this way. If they could speak to us, they would say, "In the world of tomorrow, the great power of science must be used to free men, not to enslave them. Never again must these powers fall into the hands of gangsters, domestic or foreign, to be used for human exploitation. Decent men and women every here must develop the moral and spiritual qualities that will direct this power for the good of mankind. If this be done, we shall not have died in vain."

No matter how brief the hour, it is a rare privilege for you and me and all of us to be living in this time of crisis. The challenge is squarely put. It calls to the best that may be in us. In spite of the exertions and sacrifices, we know that we are living through one of America's finest hours. There is no time for pretense, no room for false values. Here we consecrate ourselves to devotion and sacrifice, in order that we may be worthy of them.

A great American philosopher once wrote on the subject entitled "The Moral Equivalent of War." He wondered, as you and I must wonder today, why it takes a war to bring forth this spirit of devotion and sacrifice in men. And he wondered why we cannot mobilize and sustain those qualities for the great and constructive responsibilities of peace.

Our patient wounded do not cry, "Me first." The sailor whose companion has gone down with the ship; the soldier whose pal did not come back from patrol or from a bombing mission; he's not thinking of himself. He will glare at the man who wants to take his picture or to question him about "heroics." That soldier or sailor is interested only in his buddy, the buddy for whom he would have given his life to save. We bow our heads in all humility before this selfless devotion. And somehow we think of a child waking in terror in the night to be shielded and comforted by a mother's love. And then we think of the all-embracing love of God and feel the mystic pulse of eternity.

In the normal times a man dies and is mourned by a few friends and relatives. Today men are dying for our Nation and its cause. Today a nation mourns.

Our hearts go out in tender solace to the parents of our soldier dead. In the pain of their loss they are giving, many many times over. A grateful Nation dedicates itself to the task of carrying on for them.

As we raise our heads from requiem we know that the hour of decision is at hand. For this is not a routine Memorial Day. Great and tragic events are unfolding which will determine the course of life for millions of human beings. Even greater sacrifices lie just ahead.

If the dead could but speak, perhaps they would say, "Make this a living day. Remember us—and with us in your memory and because of us—consecrate yourselves to the urgent tasks before you. Part of us still lives in you to work and fight for the victory and the peace. With courage and justice go forth to save and develop your American civilization for the good of all mankind. In God you trust."

A Sharp Rebuke on Ward Seizure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH M. PRATT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. JOSEPH M. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer of May 27, 1944:

A SHARP REBUKE ON WARD SEIZURE

If a Senate judiciary subcommittee that has been investigating the Montgomery Ward case has its way, there's going to be an end to suspending the Constitution and ignoring the Bill of Rights in wartime.

For it's the subcommittee's opinion that President Roosevelt had "no constitutional or statutory authority" to issue the Executive order under which Ward's Chicago mail-order house was taken over by the Army.

Furthermore, the Judiciary Committee group takes a hearty slap at Attorney General Biddle, who assured the President he had authority to issue the order; at Secretary of Commerce Jones, who called for troops to take over the plant; at the conciliation services of Madam Perkins' Department of Labor; at the W. L. B. and the N. L. R. B.

The subcommittee's finding isn't a plot concocted by hide-bound, reactionary Republicans. The subcommittee's chairman is Senator MCCARRAN, Nevada Democrat. He was joined in his opinion by Senator REVERCOMB, Republican, of West Virginia. The other Democrat, Senator MCFARLAND, of Arizona, refused to sign the report because he didn't think the subcommittee, which hadn't held hearings, should have based its conclusions solely upon documentary evidence and the findings of investigators who had been sent to Chicago.

In all fairness, it seems to us that the subcommittee should have held hearings and that Attorney General Biddle and Secretary Jones should have been permitted to say their say. When the report goes before the full committee there should be direct testimony.

But the fact is that Attorney General Biddle, who, following the Ward seizure insisted that "no business or property is immune to Presidential order," already has appeared before the House Select Committee in its Ward case hearings. So has Chairman William H. Davis of the War Labor Board.

And did Mr. Biddle boldly defend against all comers his earlier position that the President had the right, not only under law but under vaguely defined wartime powers, to seize a retail, nonwar business? Well, hardly. He seemer to retreat.

Although defending his contention that the President had the power to act as he did in the Ward seizure, the Attorney General told the House committee headed by Representative RAMSPECK that it mightn't be a bad idea for Congress to change the War Labor Disputes Act to say precisely what a producer is, and that if Congress feels the President exceeded his powers under the law it should more clearly define his authority.

If that wasn't a tacit admission by Mr. Biddle of doubt about the Executive's asserted legal rights and about his own interpretation of the law, what was it? And isn't it just barely possible that the Attorney General had discovered that the totalitarian goings-on in Chicago were a pretty serious political blunder?

Whatever the curious workings of Mr. Biddle's mind in this affair, Chairman Davis, when before the Ramspeck committee appeared to have misgivings about the War Labor Board's role in the Ward case. He said that if Congress thought anybody's constitutional rights were in danger it should tell the W. L. B. what to do and it would obey.

It is now plainer than ever that Attorney General Biddle made a very grave error in advising the President that he had authority to take over the Ward plant and in not taking the matter to court before the Army was called in.

It is also plain that to prevent a civilian goods distributor from being mistaken for a war producer; to clarify the President's wartime rights and to define the War Labor Board's exact function, the War Labor Disputes Act should be promptly revised.

National War Labor Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD W. SMITH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Cecil B. Dickson:

AS OF TODAY

(By Cecil B. Dickson)

WASHINGTON.—Nearly 5 months ago the Nation was warned by special committee of Congress of the activities of the National War Labor Board, and the members of the committee were not surprised when the Government seized Montgomery Ward.

In January, the special House committee, headed by Representative HOWARD W. SMITH Democrat, Virginia, submitted a report on its investigation of W. L. B., in which it said:

"The National War Labor Board has not confined itself to labor disputes in war industries but has assumed jurisdiction over all types of business, no matter how remotely they may be removed from any connection with the war effort.

"The War Labor Board has compelled employers and employees to agree to submit disputes to arbitration. Compulsory arbitration which requires the parties to abide by the arbitrator's decision is in violation of the constitutional rights of the parties and was so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States."

The committee then recommended that Congress enact a law limiting and defining the powers of the W. L. B. to prevent it from using almost any pretext for taking over plants, whether they are war-connected or not.

It pointed out the W. L. B. adopted the policy that "in the determination of a wage dispute the question of the financial status or ability to pay of the employer is irrelevant and immaterial and that any employer whose business does not justify the payment of what the Board in its judgment or generosity regards as a decent standard of wages is economically inefficient and ought not to be permitted to remain in business."

"The Board," the committee said, "takes the position that it has the right not only to fix future wages but to render a money award for back wages for services already rendered and paid for without affording the employer an effective right of judicial review."

The committee said the W. L. B. had placed no limitation upon itself in the exercise of this assumed power and that it was probable the W. L. B. could drive employers into bankruptcy under its policy.

The committee noted that the W. L. B. had promulgated and "enforced a new legal doctrine to the effect that it has the power and the authority to compel the parties to execute a contract to do anything that the parties might voluntarily do, irrespective of whether there is any legal or contractual obligation on the parties to do so."

The Smith committee charged the W. L. B. had engaged in devious reasoning to justify its conclusions in forcing firms like Montgomery Ward to insist that employees maintain their membership in the labor unions and submit to the check-off of union dues as a condition of employment.

The warning that the committee issued was this:

"If one Federal bureau can with impunity destroy the essential legal components of a contract; can, without review by the courts, render money awards for unlimited sums for past services rendered and already paid for; and can establish the principle that the ability of the employer to pay any wages that the fancy of the board may dictate is immaterial and not to be considered; it is obvious that such policy, if unrestrained and exercised by biased agencies not concerned with the judicial elements of a fair trial, may and probably will make serious inroads into our constitutional system of judicial determination and destroy the elementary rights of private property and private enterprise."

The committee had this to say about the W. L. B.'s action on the maintenance of unions, an issue in the Montgomary Ward case:

"In a large number of instances labor unions began to demand of employers contracts containing a provision for a closed shop as well as check-off of union dues by the employers. In practically all instances the employers were opposed to both provisions being inserted in any contract which might otherwise be agreed upon. When disputes such as these began to reach the National War Labor Board, that Board conceived the idea of ordering and directing employers to insert in their labor contracts a clause providing its idea of a modified form of closed shop by what is termed 'maintenance of union' and providing also that the employer check off union dues."

The committee pointed out that until the enactment of the War Labor Disputes Act on June 25, 1943, when Congress overrode the President's veto on the Smith-Connally anti-strike bill, that the W. L. B. had no statutory authority but acted under orders and directives which were in violation of the Constitution, which provides that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the Congress of the United States."

"It is the contention of the members of the War Labor Board that they are acting by direction of the President and that the President has delegated such authority to them by reason of his war powers under the Constitution," the committee said, adding:

"The President does not possess war powers which authorize him to compel an employer, whether engaged in war work or not, to release workers who do not maintain their membership in a private labor union. * * * The Constitution nowhere confers upon the Executive authority such as the National War Labor Board purports to exercise. The Constitution was not designed to subject to the arbitrary will of civil appointees of the President the liberties guaranteed to all citizens under the Constitution."

The committee was well aware of the activities of the W. L. B. in the Montgomery Ward case long before the mail-order house was seized and occupied by soldiers at the direction of the Washington Government. As far back as January, the committee had this to say on the Montgomery Ward case:

"Since even the most capricious ruling of the National War Labor Board may be enforced by a plant seizure, there are but few employers who have not been subdued by even a mere threat of coercive measures. Thus Montgomery Ward & Co. ultimately complied with an order to accept a maintenance-of-membership clause when the President personally ordered it to do so. The National War Labor Board has assumed jurisdiction of this labor dispute in spite of the fact that this company's activities could in no sense be classified as necessary to the prosecution of the war. Nevertheless, Montgomery Ward complied because, on the one hand, further recalcitrance would have meant seizure, and on the other, refusal to obey an order of the President would have seemed unpatriotic, and consequently, would have damaged the public good will which the company had built up over a long period of years."

Fish and Wildlife in California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, to be forewarned is to be forearmed. Approximately 30 years ago, during construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad along the Fraser River in British Columbia, the great salmon industry centered around Puget Sound was almost wiped out.

It happened this way: In excavating the right-of-way, huge boulders, rocks, and debris fell in the river and filled many of the deep pools. Salmon coming in from the Pacific Ocean and making the long, hard trip up the Fraser to spawning grounds in northern British Columbia, were accustomed to rest in the large pools in the lower Fraser. Workmen constructing the railroad noticed the salmon falling back, unable to find shelter in the pools. By heroic efforts, under supervision of the Province fishing authorities, the stream was partially cleared, and fortunately, a sufficient number of fish got through so as to preserve the industry.

In California, we have not for years been canning salmon commercially, but our citizens rely heavily on salmon as an important item of fresh fish. Exactly as in the Fraser, Columbia, Klamath, and other Pacific streams, millions of salmon return each year to the headwaters of the Sacramento to spawn.

Engineers in charge of the Central Valley project should constantly have this proposition in mind and protect the salmon spawning areas.

All the salmon reaching streams in the Central Valley come in from the Pacific Ocean through the Golden Gate, and all traverse the waters of San Francisco Bay.

Latest available statistics for salmon caught in San Francisco Bay show as follows:

	Pounds
1937	2,181,300
1938	1,778,300
1939	935,100
1940	2,692,700
1941	1,220,700

Quoting release signed by Dr. Robert Lorentz, chairman, Conservation Committee of the San Francisco Tyee Club:

The entire Central Valley project will affect the salmon runs adversely unless they are all planned with the idea in mind of conserving our fisheries resources. At the present time a new dam is planned for construction at an early date at Table Mountain, on the main Sacramento River, about 6 miles above Red Bluff.

Everyone should be interested in saving the Central Valley's salmon runs.

I also quote as part of my remarks, an article by Dr. Lorentz entitled "The Central Valley's Project and Salmon." In addition to the article, I also submit a letter dated, San Francisco, April 29, 1944, signed by Dr. Lorentz and addressed to Col. R. C. Hunter, Corps of Engineers, United States War Department, regarding the salmon proposition:

Unless the many dams and diversion canals now planned for post-war construction in the streams flowing through the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys are designed and constructed with honest and sincere planning for the welfare of the salmon, steelhead, and other anadromous fishes, it is highly probable that the runs of these species will be killed off in the Central Valleys area.

Two dams of the Central Valleys water project are now completed, or practically so: One at Shasta on the Sacramento, located about 10 miles north of Redding, the other at Friant on the San Joaquin River northeast of Fresno. Both of these dams block salmon runs from their former spawning grounds.

In the early stages of construction of Shasta Dam it was suddenly decided that some provisions might have to be made to care for a large run of salmon that would be blocked by such a structure. The upstream migrants counted at the A. C. I. Dam at Redding proved that from forty to sixty thousand adult salmon would have to be accommodated each year.

These salmon may be divided roughly into two groups according to the time of year they leave the ocean and run up into the rivers. The spring run enters the rivers and arrives in the neighborhood of Redding in May. This migration reaches its height in June, then tapers off until the fall-run fish begin coming upstream in late August and September to reach the peak of their run in October or November.

Under normal conditions the spring-run fish migrate through the lower valleys during the snow-run-off when the streams and rivers are still cool. They migrate into the upper reaches of the tributaries where they can find deep cool pools in which they spend the hot summer. In July and August the lower rivers are too warm for the salmon to survive unless they can move through quickly to cooler water. This is an important and troublesome fact which required the costliest part of the salvage program which was devised to care for these fish.

Because of the high temperature of the main river water during the summer, the spring-run Chinooks have to be moved out of the area below Shasta Dam and into cooler streams. A hatchery costing around one and one-quarter million dollars was constructed on Battle Creek above Red Bluff to take care of 90,000,000 eggs. This represents the spawning capacity of only 12,000 females.

Since the number of fish migrating into the river during and before the warmer temperatures occur could be expected to include more than this number of females, some other provision also had to be made. Moreover, the success of hatchery reared salmon in terms of adult fish has never been proven, and it was considered advisable to have an alternate plan to take care of part of the spring run in case the other failed. This alternate was the transfer of adult salmon from the main river into Deer Creek where cool water could be found in the headwaters throughout the year.

Seven trucks, each with a 1,000-gallon aerated and ice-cooled tank, were provided at a cost of $9,000 each. Traps were constructed at Keswick Dam below Shasta to catch all fish that got up that far; and another trap and rack were built at Balls Ferry near the mouth of Battle Creek to take fish there when the river was low enough to permit it.

The fall-run fish, arriving after the river temperature cools below 68° F., are easily accommodated by merely distributing them between racks in the main Sacramento River below Keswick Dam. The 35 miles of river between Keswick and Jellys Ferry holds plenty of good spawning gravel to accommodate these fish.

Last year the salvage program had its first real test in handling the fish. About six thousand salmon were trucked from Keswick Dam the 60-mile run to Deer Creek and dumped there. As might be expected some bugs had to be ironed out, but in general these transfers were a success. So were the transfers later made into the holding ponds at the Coleman Hatchery on Battle Creek. Later the fall run spawned very successfully in the main river. This success was proven by the wide distribution of the fish over the spawning riffles and by the healthy eggs and fry that were later dug out of sampled nests to determine the success of the spawning. Moreover, healthy young fry have been taken in fyke nets in the river near Balls Ferry Rack.

As far as handling the adult fish is concerned, the salmon-salvage program below Shasta may be considered successful. With experience and better equipment it should work efficiently. Its success in terms of returned salmon, or in terms of the fishermen's catch is yet to be determined. It looks very promising.

With the salvage operations just beginning to function, we find, however, that another dam is now projected for early construction at Table Mountain. This lies about 5 miles downstream from Jelly's Ferry, and about 10 miles below the mouth of Battle Creek.

As originally proposed, this is to be a dirt-filled structure, to be built in two stages. The first stage is a small dam about 100 feet high. This dam would block the salmon runs from their last remaining spawning areas in the main river. There would be no object in building ladders to get the adults over the dam; for even though 40 percent of the spawning riffles were left unflooded, the young salmon could not be taken downstream again safely. The $1,250,000 hatchery at Coleman would be rendered useless because fish could be brought in only by trucking, and the hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in racks and traps at Balls Ferry and Keswick would be useless.

To complete the destruction of the salvage programs, these original plans for Table Mountain specify that the first stage or low dam is only to be a foundation for a bigger structure to be built over the smaller one as soon as it becomes consolidated and settled. This final dam is to be 200 feet high, and will back water right up to the base of Keswick Dam. With water backed up to its normal pool level, behind this dam, Coleman hatchery would be covered by about 60 feet of water. The salmon salvage program would be finished, and so would the salmon of the up-river area.

There is no possibility of salvaging salmon below Table Mountain Dam. The few streams that would be available are not large enough to hold all the fish that would come up to the dam. The job would involve handling about twice the number of fish now accommodated in the main river spawning riffles and Coleman hatchery. Moreover, the temperature of the reservoir water would undoubtedly make things too hot for the fish, anyway. If this plan of tight dams is adopted, there is no hope for the salmon that now spawn in the upper Sacramento River.

Fortunately another proposal has been made to build a small dam at Table Mountain for flood-control purposes only. The plans for this dam are still not public, but as briefly described at a recent meeting of the State reclamation board in Sacramento they look hopeful. Everyone interested in the preservation of our salmon and steelhead runs in the Central Valley's area must urge that this plan be adopted if it can be proven that it will not harm the fish.

At the other end of the Central Valley's, Friant Dam on the San Joaquin has blocked the salmon run that formerly spawned in the headwaters of that river. No salvage program was developed here, and probably it is fortunate that it was not undertaken. With water flowing through the dam all summer, 10,000 spring-run Chinooks migrated up the San Joaquin River and spent the summer in excellent condition in the pools below the outlets. When they were ready to spawn, they dropped downstream and spawned very successfully in the 30 miles of good gravel below the dam. The success of this spawning is attested by the thousands of fry that have been netted on their downstream journey from these beds.

The results of this involuntary experiment in the care of salmon below impassable dams are really profoundly significant. They show that where adequate spawning grounds exist below the proposed dams, as they do in most streams in the Central Valleys area, if sufficient water is provided at the right time of year, the salmon will survive and spawn to produce succeeding generations of salmon. The basic problem is to leave enough good spawning gravel accessible to the adults where the young fish can get back downstream, and then to insure plenty of water at the right time of the year.

Adequate flows are not yet assured below Friant since the United States Bureau of Reclamation has not yet committed itself as to what the operating schedule of this dam will be when its two diversion canals are completed.

We can expect that the entire Central Valleys program of water development for flood control, power, and irrigation will eventually be completed. The dams proposed that will affect salmon include the 680-foot Bidwell Bar Dam blocking the middle and south forks of the Feather River, the enlarged upper Narrows Reservoir on the Yuba, the four proposed dams on the American River which will stop all salmon at Folsom, Nashville Dam on the Cosumnes, Tullock Reservoir Dam on the Stanislaus, and a higher Don Pedro Dam on the Tuolumne. If the Sacramento and San Joaquin salmon runs are to continue, these dams must be planned to provide water and spawning gravel for them. We must not allow them to be planned and construction started before the fish are even thought of. It is then far too late.

Moreover, the numerous diversion and connecting canals transferring water from one river to another and diverting it into storage reservoirs to be used later to supplement the supply in drier parts of the valley must be designed to go over or under the streams they cross.

The spawning beds below the main dams must be kept open to fish. They must not be made death traps for old or young fish.

Fishermen have no desire to hinder the fullest development of State's resources, but in this development they insist that proper foresight be used so as not to destroy the great fish runs which have existed since the beginning of time on the Central Valleys rivers. With intelligent planning these runs cannot only be saved, but may even be built back to somewhere near their former abundance.

SAN FRANCISCO TYEE CLUB,
April 29, 1944.

Col. R. C. HUNTER,
Corps of Engineers,
United States Engineer Office,
Sacramento, Calif.

DEAR SIR: The San Francisco Tyee Club, representing over 500 sportsmen interested in the conservation of salmon, for some time has been following the Central Valley irrigation, power, and flood-control developments. We view with alarm the plans now being considered for the construction of a multiple-purpose dam at the Table Mountain site. Construction of such a dam at this location without doubt would mean the end of the salmon runs into the upper Sacramento Valley.

The Federal Government already has spent over $2,000,000 in the salvage of salmon that were blocked from the upper reaches of the Sacramento River by Shasta Dam. These salvage operations are just now beginning to operate. While their success cannot be determined until the adults begin to return several years hence, reports of results of handling the adult salmon and the eggs and young in the Coleman hatchery indicate that the operations have been successful. The salvage of salmon that would be blocked by a multiple-purpose dam at Table Mountain would be practically impossible. Not only are there no streams or facilities available into which the fish can be transferred but there are no spawning grounds below this point in the main river. Moreover, approximately twice as many fish would have to be handled as are now handled below Shasta.

It was reported to our organization by one of our members who attended a recent hearing of the State reclamation board in Sacramento that a plan was discussed there for the building of a dam at Table Mountain which would be used only for flood control. From what little information has been obtained, it is our belief that such a structure is the only type that would have any chance of being adaptable to the needs of the farming communities in the lower valley. We urge you, therefore, to adopt the latter plan and to formulate it in cooperation with the various fisheries agencies concerned with salmon conservation in this State in such a manner that the salmon runs in the upper Sacramento Valley will be preserved. The San Francisco Tyee Club does not feel that destruction of this valuable resource is justified since it is apparent that the principle objective of a flood-control dam at Table Mountain can be attained without harm to the salmon.

Yours very truly,
ROBERT LORENTZ, M. D.,
Chairman, Conservation Committee.

Art of Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of May 30, 1944:

ART OF POLITICS

Prompted by a University of Denver survey indicating that almost five out of seven Americans think it virtually impossible for a professional politician to remain honest, Mayor LaGuardia has sprung to the defense of "the art of politics." In a recent radio address, inspired by a New York Times editorial on the subject, he suggested that he might some day launch a campaign to bring politics into better repute as a profession or vocation. In our opinion there is no kind of publicity work that would pay higher dividends. Exaggerated ideas of the extent of political corruption have undoubtedly been fostered by the featuring of political scandals and attacks on dishonest politicians. The press and other organs of public opinion are to be praised rather than blamed for concentrating attention on political abuses with a view to exposing and expelling the scamps and scoundrels who hold public office. Nevertheless, this one-sided emphasis has resulted in too little attention being given to the valuable services performed by honest public servants.

The work of enlightenment might well begin by giving the people more information about the activities of Members of Congress. Most of the hard and grueling labor performed by our national legislators is transacted behind the scenes or in committee hearings, with only a handful of people present. Casual tourists visiting the Capitol listen to Congressmen and Senators delivering speeches from the floor to empty seats or amidst a conversational din. They go away believing that their Representatives are playboys, not even interested in the oratorical extravagances of their colleagues.

If these same tourists knew how many hours of mental labor and how much physical effort are expended by Members of Congress in attending committee meetings and holding hearings preliminary to reporting out countless bills, they would revise their opinion of the caliber of the National Legislature. For that matter anyone with the stamina to read without prejudice debates on important issues reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will almost certainly conclude that the art of politics, as practiced in this country, has brought into Congress many men of keen minds and public spirit.

The public often does injustice to professional politicians by failing to understand that willingness to compromise an issue does not necessarily imply lack of integrity. There is a vast difference between making concessions to secure needed support for a favored measure and bartering away one's principles for the sake of selfish political advantage. Minor compromises have to be made by any man who aspires to hold political office; indeed, compromises must be made to keep the legislative machinery from stalling.

Political reputations also suffer because the public is inclined to put a premium on show-off qualities that handicap the sober, conscientious man who may be inclined to hide his light under a bushel. As a result many politicians seek votes by trying to satisfy the public taste for the bizarre or the spectacular. The remedy for this situation lies obviously in elevating public standards of taste and education. That is a long-time process, but we can and should begin right now to give the public more information about the positive contributions that practitioners of the art of politics make to the national welfare. That is essential not alone in the interest of the unjustly maligned but as a means of preserving public respect for democratic institutions.

Message to Parents, Wives, Children, Brothers, and Sisters of Men and Women in Our Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the matter of allotments and allowances for dependents of men and women in our armed forces is not as complicated as many people feel, and I sincerely hope that the citizens of the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota, which I represent, will not have any hesitancy in writing me should they encounter any unusual delays or have any problems in connection with the payments which they do not understand.

The immediate dependents of any enlisted man or woman, or aviation cadet, are entitled to dependency benefits if they are substantially dependent upon the soldier. I repeat, this applies to dependents of women in our service forces as well as those of the men.

I hope all dependents will read this article and save it for future use.

There are three principal classes of dependents to which this dependency benefit law applies and their allowances are as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife $50; a wife and one child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife with one child, $72; a divorced wife with each additional child, $20. Note: A wife separated or divorced from a man in service will get no more than the amount fixed in a court order or decree in case of alimony. If the divorce or separation order does not call for alimony or separate maintenance she will not receive any allowance.

Class B dependents: A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37. Note: Class B dependents, it must be clearly understood, are dependents who are only partially dependent upon service men and women for support. In other words, if the dependents are dependent upon men or women in service 50 percent or less, but are still substantially dependent, they come under Class B. Only $37 is allowed no matter if there are one or even four or five more partially dependent. Those who make application for family allowance, therefore, should be very careful to show the full degree of their dependency. This is important.

Class B–1 dependents: One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $11. Two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $79; two parents and each additional brother or sister, $11; a brother or sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parent, $11.

HOW TO GET THE ALLOWANCE

Wherever possible, as soon as a man or woman enters service, application for the allowance should be made. They should do this immediately when they are inducted. The allowance payments do not go back. The payments begin with the first of the month in which the application is filed. Therefore, if the man or woman in service waits a month after induction before an application is filed—1 month's allowance is lost. The longer they wait to file an application the more money is lost. It is important that they file an application for this allowance within 15 days after they are inducted.

The man or woman in service should submit the application on a form which they can get from the commanding officer. In filling out this form it is good to be careful to spell all names correctly and give exact information as to marriage, dates of birth, and so forth. Many of the troubles dependents have in getting their allowance are due to the fact that the service man or woman is careless in filling out the blank. An extra minute in filling out the blank may save several months' time in getting the allowance approved. The application, after careful study and filling out, should then be handed to the commanding officer.

If the service man or woman for some reason or other fails to make application, or is in a position where he or she cannot make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. If there is any question as to where or how to apply just drop a letter to your Congressman. The Army requires their regular application blank to be filled out. The Navy requires merely a letter giving the name of applicant's wife and children, dates of birth, and so forth. Therefore, if any class A dependent does not know for certain just how to apply, he or she could well write a Member of Congress and ask for instructions.

If the man or woman in service with class B or B–1 dependents declines to make an application for a family allowance for them, no other person can apply. Class B and B–1 allowances are granted and continued only at the will of the man or woman in service. They cannot be forced to make application. Wherever the service man or woman with class B or class B–1 dependents is overseas and fails to make application, and these dependents are reasonably sure that he will approve it, they can make application. However, the permission of the man or woman in service will have to be obtained before application for family allowance is approved for class B or B–1 dependents.

Family allowances are compulsory only when applied for for class A dependents.

PARENTS AND BROTHERS AND SISTERS CAN RECEIVE ALLOWANCES AT THE SAME TIME AS WIFE AND CHILDREN

It is also important to know that parents and brothers and sisters can get an allowance even if the serviceman's wife and children get one. In other words, if men or women in service have parents and brothers and/or sisters dependent upon them as well as a wife and children—all of these dependents can get a family allowance. For example: If there is a wife and child dependent on the man in service they get $80. If this same man in service has two parents and a sister, also dependent upon him for chief support, they, too, can get $79 a month also. This is important: To get this extra $79 only $5 more is taken out of the serviceman's pay. The balance of the $74 is paid by the Government. If the parents and brothers or sisters are only partially dependent, that is less than 50 percent dependent but still dependent to a substantial degree, they can get $37. Because a serviceman has a wife and children getting an allowance does not prevent his parents and brothers and sisters dependent on him from getting an allowance also. If you have any questions on this write your Congressman and he will explain how to go about it.

PARENTS CAN GET ALLOWANCES FROM MORE THAN ONE SON OR DAUGHTER IN SERVICE

If parents are dependent upon more than one son or daughter or both in service, they can get more allowance. For instance, if two parents are greatly dependent upon a son in service, they get $68 per month. Now, if another son or daughter in service helped support these same two parents, they can get another $37 from the second son or daughter.

YOUR CONGRESSMAN OFTEN CAN HELP YOU

It is a Congressman's function to help with such matters. He is your Representative in Washington. If you have any difficulty at all in this respect, your Congressman is the person to take it up with. Your Congressman has already cooperated and assisted in several hundred cases.

If any questions arise regarding where to get application blanks or how to make an application—or if for any reason any eligible dependent is not now receiving the allowance—or if for any reason you know of any dependent having any difficulty getting the allowance, write to Congressman HAROLD C. HAGEN, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Bill To Create Commission To Study Trade and Tax Barriers Among States and Federal Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have this day introduced a joint resolution to create a committee on Federal and State relations. In the language of the resolution, "It shall be the duty of the committee to make a full and complete study and investigation of the relations between the Federal Government and the governments of the several States and their political subdivisions with a view to determining what steps should be taken to bring about better coordination and cooperation among the various levels of government and thus eventually to solve, among other matters, such problems as interstate trade barriers and conflicting and multiple tax levies."

The problems of interstate barriers and conflicting and multiple tax levies are not academic ones. They are real, they obstruct the flow of trade from State to State; they stifle industrial development; they impede an honest union among 48 States. The trade barriers, particularly, are children of the depression of the 1930's. It was then that the various States raised trade barriers against each other primarily for the purpose of obtaining increased revenue. It, however, proved so harmful to domestic commerce that when the United States entered the war it became necessary to do something to erase them. It was then that the Council of State Governments arranged an agreement among all the States which became effective June 30, 1942, for uniformity in regulation having to do with trucks, but such agreement was to be for the duration only.

Does that mean that after the war we shall continue with such absurdities as I outline below?

First. Florida keeps out California oranges for fear of a long-vanished brown rat, and California retaliates by barring Florida oranges and lemons because of a nonexistent citrus canker.

Second. A truckload of lubricating oil headed for Baltimore where it was due aboard a ship transporting war materials, was detained 6 hours at Wilmington for violating a regulation peculiar to the State of Delaware.

Third. Many of the States had established "ports of entry" where motor trucks were stopped, measured, and inspected, weight registered and taxes as to gasoline mileage and weight of pay load. For example, Kansas had 66 of these so-called "ports of entry," Nebraska 31, Mexico 22, and California 14.

Fourth. At Medford Oregon, trucks from California were stopped and their loads shared with other trucks to conform with Oregon's lower load limit.

Such "Balkanizing process" has led to rivalries and jealousies that mar the structure of the Union. The petty bickering, the retaliatory gestures are not a pretty picture and, more than that constitute a menace to our commercial and domestic development. The post-war world which gives so much promise of accelerated production in consumers' goods must not be hampered by internal economic rivalry.

It has been our pride of many years to think of the United States as the greatest free-trade area in the world. We cannot afford to be otherwise. It is actually a war between States.

Thousands of pieces of idiotic legislation in the various States throwing up barriers at State borders against one product after another produced in neighboring or distant States have put commerce and industry into 48 kinds of straitjackets and divided the Nation into 48 unneighborly small countries.

This situation is further highlighted by a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court. It concerns itself with national aviation. The State of Minnesota levied a tangible personal property on a Northwest Airlines fleet in service between the Pacific Northwest and Chicago. The planes were constantly flying across State lines but only a few of them come down in Minnesota at any one time. The company paid a proportionate tax to each State on its equipment. The Supreme Court of the United States held that Minnesota could impose and collect a tax on the entire fleet, because the home company was in St. Paul. This despite the fact that all the ships of this company never at any one given time were in the hangars, or on the ground in St. Paul or any Minnesota airport.

The decision was a close one—5 to 4. Six other States are involved, because the planes of this company fly over their terrain. It is possible that these six other States will demand the same sort of tax. Suppose the six other States placed a proportionate tax in addition to the full tax validated for Minnesota. Whether the Minnesota tax is an exclusive tax is still debatable. Are the other six States free to impose a comparable tax on the same property? If so, an insuperable burden is placed on interstate commerce. Something must be done about it.

Furthermore, under the present conditions, each State could set up its own policing arrangement over aircraft flying overhead, just as they did concerning autos speeding along its roads.

Aviation should be fairly free at this present stage of development from throttling restrictions. Frankly, policing and taxing of airlines, it seems to me, should involve a far greater degree of national direction in the interest of uniformity. The powers to police and tax are the powers to destroy. Unless the solution is found, the aviation industry will die aborning.

The conflict between State and Federal Government likewise has troubled the calm that was supposed to exist among members of the United States Supreme Court. Three of these Justices have been insisting upon a more "harmonious" application of the laws in conflict involving Federal and State powers. They have clearly indicated that the interests of the individual States should be blended with those of the national wherever and whenever possible. Strangely enough, that demand for harmony has given rise to a considerable degree of feuding which has cropped out among the Justices of the Bench.

We are thus approaching a very dangerous situation. The Justices of the Supreme Court cannot generally agree thereon and the States cannot agree. It is high time for Congress to step into the breach.

OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter as published in the National Independent May 1944:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1944.

Mr. GEORGE J. BURGER,
Publisher, National Independent,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. BURGER: The National Independent and you should be congratulated upon your third anniversary because of the distinguished service rendered to the cause of independent and small business in America.

The future of small business in post-war America can be either brilliant and prosperous—or dull and declining, dependent entirely upon whether it is free or regimented.

War controls have caused many to contemplate the risk of compromising with some form of post-war regimentation or governmental supervision. This is dangerous to the future of small business. Small business, in my opinion, is the keystone in the arch of a free competitive enterprise—and the more units of small business operating in America—the more secure is the American way of life.

If this be true, then it follows naturally that anything that tends to stifle free competition, chokes off the opportunity for small business to prosper.

There are two great dangers against which we must continually fight if small business is to prosper. First, the danger of private monopolistic encroachment. Against this danger, the Federal anti-trust laws should be strengthened, and in many cases State laws should be strengthened. Second, the danger of the paternalistic hand of government, which means eventually governmental supervision and regimentation.

We must guard carefully against the temptation to extend war controls for any period of time longer than necessary to taper off and liquidate such agencies. Governmental agencies which have been protective in their service to small business during war could serve no other purpose than to become regimental tools in peace time. A heavy paternal hand of government means eventual death to the prosperous free operation of small business.

All small business needs and wants, therefore, is protection against private monopolistic encroachments which are destructive by their very nature and freedom to operate.

Warm personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

WALTER C. PLOESER.

The Milk Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., May 30, 1944.

The Honorable ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SABATH: I am writing in connection with your recent comments as they appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Monday, May 22. You talked of the current temporarily flush milk supply and raised some questions about the dumping of milk by plants which allegedly were unable to obtain sugar for condensing purposes. I should like to give you a brief explanation of the way in which our program operates along these lines.

As you know, we do not handle any allocation of milk. We are, however, responsible for the rationing of sugar and, indirectly, through our sugar orders, may affect the ultimate course of milk processing operations. We are, therefore, greatly concerned that every step possible be taken to assure the complete use of all available supplies of milk. Consequently we have endeavored to make certain that adequate supplies of sugar can be obtained for milk condensing purposes.

Under our regulations most of these plants have already filed reports showing their total capacity in the manufacture of cheese, powdered milk, and other products which do not require the use of sugar. They already have established specific allotments of sugar for the manufacture of ice cream. In order to obtain additional sugar for condensing purposes a plant files with us an application giving its estimate of total milk receipts for the coming month. This figure is compared with the previously filed data showing capacity for using milk in the manufacture of ice cream and of non-sugar-consuming products. The balance which remains when this comparison is made is considered equal to the amount of milk available for condensing purposes. We then allot to the plant sufficient sugar to permit condensing of that quantity of milk.

From this explanation I think you will agree that the matter of obtaining sufficient sugar to permit condensing of any surplus of milk is a very simple one from the standpoint of the condenseries. There is no justification for any claim that surplus milk need be dumped because sugar is not available for processing.

I indicated above that most plants had already filed reports of their capacity for the manufacture of cheese, powdered milk, and other products of that type. There are a few, however, which had not done so for various reasons, and we have thought it necessary in these cases to grant liberal provisional allotments of sugar upon receipt of the initial request and pending the actual processing of the application. In this, I think, we have been extremely liberal, and we are, in fact, receiving a certain amount of criticism for making sugar so readily available for the condensing operation.

During the course of the discussion on the floor last Monday, a point was made about an O. P. A. order which restricts the plants processing milk to 75 percent of production during the base period. I think the reference here was intended to apply to an order which we issued affecting only the May allotment. Actually the situation was this: We were at that time reviewing the whole sugar-rationing program, and for the month of May we made an initial allotment of sugar equal to 75 percent of the full amount requested. Subsequently, on May 8, we granted the additional 25 percent so that at no time did this 75-percent limitation really amount to a limit on production.

I hope that these comments will give you some explanation of the actions of this Office along these lines. If you have any further questions, I should be glad to hear from you.

Sincerely,

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator.

Mineral Leasing Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD with reference to a bill I have introduced today entitled "A bill to extend the mineral leasing laws to lands acquired by the United States," which, in my opinion, is very important to the people of my district in Montana particularly, and to the country generally.

At this time in the history of our country when much genuine concern is being expressed over the amount of oil available for our future use it is of course of paramount importance that new fields should be continuously brought into operation. At the present time there is unusual activity throughout the Nation, and particularly in my own district, the Second Congressional District of Montana, among people who are interested in developing lands for oil and gas. By the act of February 15, 1920, commonly referred to as the Oil Leasing Act, Congress has encouraged the exploring of lands for the production of oil and gas.

When Congress enacted this statute and subsequent statutes, Congress assumed that all lands owned by the United States that may produce oil or gas or have prospective value for oil or gas should be administered by the Secretary of the Interior. However, this is not the case.

In pursuance of the Resettlement Administration program and also the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act and some other acts, the Government purchased large acreages of submarginal lands. Some of these lands were purchased subject to preservation of mineral interests and particularly any oil or gas contained therein, and all lands purchased were committed to the Secretary of Agriculture for management and administration. My district in Montana has many thousands of acres of land purchased under the above acts.

Much confusion has arisen because of the two standards and requirements for obtaining oil leases on these lands. The Secretary of Agriculture on the one hand will only lease any of these lands for oil and gas after advertising for bids and then lease only to the highest and best bidder.

The Secretary of the Interior on the other hand leases unimproved oil or gas lands without competitive bidding to the first qualified applicant. Thus it is very easy to see that the procedure of the Secretary of Agriculture in leasing to the highest bidder gives large and powerful oil companies and individuals a virtual monopoly of the development of these lands for the oil and gas they contain. The Oil Leasing Act was enacted to promote the development of lands having possibilities of oil and gas without any intention to profit from the granting of permits or leases to develop them. Such a situation is not only retarding but is actually blocking development of lands having potential possibilities for the production of oil and gas. One seeking to acquire a solid block of acreage on a structure, so that drilling the test upon the structure will be more easily financed or inviting to captial, is not only faced with the difficulty but with the uncertainty of obtaining leasing of lands with respect to which the Secretary of Agriculture claims jurisdiction.

I have therefore introduced a bill entitled "a bill to extend the mineral leasing laws to lands acquired by the United States" which would place the leasing of all these lands acquired by the Government under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Interior. I think that at this time when the Government very much desires to see the production of oil increased such a bill will tend to promote the exploration of lands, owned by the Government, not within a known oil producing structure. The rules and regulations and requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture, as they apply to the leasing of oil and gas lands, have not only discouraged exploring lands for oil and gas but without question prevent the exploration of lands for oil and gas or the development of structures in which they lie.

To the end that the law may be made certain and uniform it appears to me that a statute should be enacted whereby only one department is vested with the authority to lease lands owned by the United States for oil and gas and other minerals. The department I think best suited because of its experience and set-up to do this job is the Department of the Interior.

Fair Employment Practice Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. ABERNETHY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, the Fair Employment Practice Committee has no place in an orderly democratic government. It is doing nothing but stirring racial strife under the guise of effecting complete utilization of the Nation's manpower for the war effort. Furthermore, there is no authority, statutory or constitutional, for such a committee.

The F. E. P. C. has charged many employers with discriminatory practices in that they have inequitably distributed employment among the races. It was not so long ago that it endeavored to force certain southern railroads to dismiss many of their white conductors and engineers with seniority rights of long years' standing and replace them with Negroes. Of course, the railroads refused to comply with the order because it was none of the F. E. P. C.'s business who they employ. The racial personnel in your plant, shop, store, or office is none of the Government's business. It is your business and yours alone. This is no monarchy. It is a democracy. Oddly enough, the Fair Employment Practice Committee is the most flagrant violator of the principle it has laid down. On its pay rolls throughout the country are 61 negroes and 45 whites. In its Washington office it employs 35 negroes and 13 whites. The administrative office of its chairman is staffed with 11 negroes and no whites. Within this committee's own offices it fails to practice the principle which it so ardently embraces. While I do not know of any self-respecting white person who seeks employment within this crackpot organization, the fact remains that the F. E. P. C. is discriminating against the white man within its own offices. And now, of all things, it has the temerity to direct others to discontinue alleged racial employment discriminations while it most flagrantly violates the principle. Its general activities are not only an insult to the white people of the South but of the entire Nation.

A few weeks ago I learned that the Committee on Labor would soon conduct hearings on three identical bills to establish a permanent Fair Employment Practice Committee. As a member of the Labor Committee, I let it be promptly known in no uncertain terms that I was opposed to hearings on the bills, which I believed to be asinine and undemocratic. I predicted that F. E. P. C., then a side show, would eventually replace the anti-poll-tax movement as the main attraction for the rabble-rousing race disturbers. Much sooner than expected the prediction has come true. I stated then and now repeat that the F. E. P. C. was conceived in sin and born in iniquity. I stated then and now repeat that it is a rotten, vile, and communistic infested Government agency. I stated then and now repeat that it was doing nothing but fanning the flame of race hatred, dividing our people when the very soul of this Nation is at stake in a colossal war. This committee is unnecessarily regulating our people, or attempting so to do, at a time when they are so superfluously regulated that their nerves have very nearly reached the revolting point. I confess, as a result of war, that many of the Government regulations have unquestionably served good purposes. On the contrary, many have not and those issued by the F. E. P. C. fall within that category. The American people, as a body, are sensible and patriotic. As free people they expect and demand democratic treatment. When the war effort necessitates the imposition of reasonable restrictions upon business, agriculture, or civilian standards of living, the best cooperation is obtainable by laying the hand on lightly. Big-stick methods, of which the F. E. P. C. is an example, are resented and revolting. I warn you again that the people are tired—very tired—of unnecessary regulations and Government meddling. The old mantel clock no longer beats a soothing, restful tick-tock, tick-tock, but a rapid regulate, regulate, regulate, regulate. And this business of the F. E. P. C. further regulating the people must be stopped.

If private enterprise, or even governmental agencies, can be forced to employ a certain percentage of negroes, or a certain percentage of any minority group, irrespective of seniority rights or qualifications, then in the not too distant future will we not be confronted with forced proportionate employment of minorities within a minority group, such as so many blacks, browns, tans, yellows, or so many half-bloods, or even quarter-bloods? If this is lawful, then those of the various religious faiths could demand equitable distribution of employment among their respective sects and there would follow the forced hire, in every business, shop, and office of a certain percentage of Protestants, Catholics, Hebrews, Mormons, Mohammedans, Buddhists, atheists, Sun Worshippers, Moon Gazers, and so on. Why even Communist Russia and Hitlerite Germany would bow in shame at such dictatorial orders.

I now direct my remarks to those of you, especially on the Republican side of the House, who have been rather vociferous and quite firm in your criticism of this administration. You have charged it to be a government by man rather than by law. I must confess that insofar as the origin, purposes, and activities of the Fair Employment Practice Committee are concerned, you are correct. It was given life by Executive Order on May 27, 1943. The Congress had nothing whatever to do with its creation. To it we have never appropriated one single dollar. It is not a child of Congress, and in view of its meddlesome, dictatorial and big-stick activities, Congress should refuse to nurture it. Its high-salaried employees are being paid from the executive emergency fund. Now, since it appears that restrictions may be imposed against the use of this fund for the F. E. P. C., it has called on Congress for the direct appropriation of one-half million dollars of the taxpayers' money that it may continue its nefarious activities.

Mr. Speaker, unity is desirable at all times, but more especially during time of war. The boys at the front are entitled to our best efforts. The best is unattainable without unity. The fact cannot be successfully disputed that the F. E. P. C. has engendered ill feeling, promoted race hatred, and bred disunity, as well as wasted thousands of dollars of Government funds. Its continuation would be a mistake. Its offices should be closed.

Native Sons of the Golden West Resolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions which have recently been adopted by the Native Sons of the Golden West at their annual convention in San Jose, Calif.

In view of their importance at the present time, I commend them to my colleagues for consideration:

Whereas the Native Sons Committee on Japanese Legislation has under consideration a proposed initiative measure to be submitted to the electors of 1944 to amend the alien land law of the State of California by making persons of Japanese ancestry or any other ancestry ineligible to citizenship under the laws of the United States who have dual citizenship, amenable to the provisions of said act, and from acquiring possession, leasing, chartering, enjoying, or transferring of any watercraft or interest therein by any such person; and

Whereas certain American-born Japanese have announced their allegiance to Japan and have demonstrated their disloyalty to this country; and

Whereas the War Relocation Authority has evidenced its incompetency in dealing with disloyal Japanese in Tule Lake war relocation center; and

Whereas the presence of Japanese in Tule Lake relocation center constitutes a menace to the safety and welfare of the Pacific coast: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we pledge our support to the Native Sons Committee on Japanese Legislation in the furtherance of the initiative measure to be submitted to the electorate of the State of California; and be it

Resolved, That we ask our Representatives in Congress to enact legislation revoking the citizenship of disloyal Japanese and to exert their influence to aid in the deportation of these people; and be it

Resolved, That we request that the war relocation centers be placed under the control of the Army or the Department of Justice; and be it

Resolved, That we support an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which amendment shall provide that persons born in this country of alien parents ineligible to citizenship shall not become citizens of the United States merely by virtue of their birth therein.

Resolved, That the Sixty-seventh Grand Parlor of the Native Sons of the Golden West petition the President of the United States, Congress, the State Department, the Department of the Interior, and all other agencies or individuals having jurisdiction over any of the following to exert their influence and to strive diligently and without compromise toward the consummation of the following:

1. That there shall be no negotiated peace with Japan or the other Axis Powers except one based upon all of the following conditions:

(a) Unconditional surrender.

(b) Relinquishment by them of all mandated territory and other lands acquired by aggression; and

(c) Their complete and permanent demilitarization.

2. Vigorously to support the policy of the United States of exchanging civilian as well as military prisoners with Japan and other Axis Powers.

3. The immediate enactment of appropriate legislation for the deportation of:

(a) All enemy aliens not eligible to naturalization under our laws.

(b) American-born descendants of Japanese who have or shall refuse to disavow all allegiance to Japan or who have or shall in any manner show themselves to be disloyal to the United States.

4. The placing of the war relocation centers under the jurisdiction of the United States Army and the retention of all descendants of Japanese in said centers for the duration of the war.

5. The enactment of legislation to forbid the maintenance of the foreign-language schools where in the instruction causes or materially tends to cause either disloyalty to the United States or loyalty to a foreign country.

6. The enactment and strict enforcement of appropriate legislation to prevent the immigration of any person not eligible to naturalization into the United States or any of its territories or possessions.

7. The amendment of the first sentence of section 1, article 14, of the United States Constitution to read as follows: "All persons born of citizens of the United States or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

8. That any person of any extraction who has volunteered for military service in the United States forces shall be exempt from any of the provisions herein above provided.

Whereas the cession to Japan of the Marshall and Caroline Islands after the First World War created a grave menace to the security of the United States and its possessions, and made it possible for the treacherous attack by the Japs on Pearl Harbor, resulting in the death of thousands of Americans and the almost complete disabling of our Pacific Fleet; and

Whereas in the present war our forces have recaptured many of these mandated islands from the Japs and will eventually take possession of all the Japanese mandated islands; and

Whereas certain influences are now planning to deprive our country of the security of these islands by placing them under alien control; now, therefore be it

Resolved by this Grand Parlor of the Native Sons of the Golden West:

1. That this Grand Parlor opposes the surrender of the Marshall and Caroline Islands taken by our forces from Japan, to any other power or combination of powers.

2. That the best interests of our country require that we retain exclusive control of these mandated islands and that any surrender would be detrimental to the best interests of the United States and constitute a perpetual menace to the Hawaiian Islands and our Pacific coast.

3. That the sentiment of the people of the United States is overwhelmingly against any surrender of our right to retain control of the Japanese mandated islands.

4. That we urge the President of the United States, the Department of State and the Congress to refrain from making any commitments with any foreign powers or group of powers by which our country may be deprived of the sole control of the Marshall and Caroline Islands.

5. That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, our Representatives in Congress, and the chairmen of the appropriate congressional committees.

Whereas the policy of the Federal Government in the acquisition of lands in the State of California and in other States of the United States is resulting in a marked decrease in the taxable lands of the various counties therein, thus denying to said counties the full property tax base; and

Whereas this national trend of the Federal Government in annually acquiring hundreds of thousands of acres of privately owned land, which, when so acquired, is exempt from taxation, reduces the property tax base and increases the tax rate on the remaining private property; and

Whereas for national forest purposes alone, the Federal Government has acquired over 16,000,000 acres of land, located in 31 States and in 335 counties, and contemplates the purchase or other acquisition of hundreds of millions of additional acres; and

Whereas for other purposes not purely governmental and not for local benefit, vast acreages are being acquired or withheld in the various States, to the distress of the local taxpayers of the counties in which such lands are situated; and

Whereas Federal ownership of lands within the State of California has increased in the past 5 years from 39 percent to over 43 percent of said State of California; and

Whereas this policy of Federal acquisition of the lands and resources of the States which necessarily reduces the tax base of the local counties will eventually wipe out many counties of California as political subdivisions of the said State of California unless such acquisitions cease or the Federal Government by appropriate congressional action provides for the payment of taxes on the lands held by the Federal Government in its proprietorial capacity; and

Whereas the destruction of counties in which the Federal land acquisitions are continuing will destroy the oldest and soundest type of American government, to wit, county government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Sixty-seventh Grand Parlor, Native Sons of the Golden West, That the Federal Government be urged to recognize the fundamental rights of the people of the State of California and of the other States in the United States to continue the county form of government and to this end that the Congress of the United States enact appropriate legislation providing for payment to the counties of taxes on the lands held by the Federal Government in its proprietorial capacity so that these lands so held by the Federal Government shall bear their fair share of the tax burden.

McKellar Amendments to T. V. A. Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ZEBULON WEAVER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I trust most sincerely that the membership of this House will vote to defeat what are known as the McKellar amendments to the T. V. A. Act.

Both of these amendments, the one requiring all receipts from its operations shall be immediately deposited in the Treasury of the United States and that its operations shall depend entirely upon annual appropriations, as well as the one requiring confirmation of all employees to be confirmed by the Senate, will undoubtedly operate to slow down and hamper greatly the splendid work which this great enterprise has been performing.

I am especially interested because the district which I represent lies entirely within the jurisdiction of the T. V. A. As a matter of fact my district probably gives birth to more rivers than any one district in the United States. These rivers are born high up under the stretches of the Blue Ridge and within the great Unaka Range of the Appalachians, and contribute very largely to the waters of the Tennessee River.

The French Broad River on the eastern side of my district drains a number of counties and is a great river itself. The Pigeon, on the westward, and the Tuckaseegee, uniting with the Little Tennessee, contribute vast floods of water. To the extreme west, the Hiawassee and all of its tributaries again contribute a mighty flood to the Tennessee.

I wish, in this short statement, to call the attention of the House directly to some of the great things the T. V. A. has accomplished, and is now accomplishing, and especially in the splendid manner it has contributed to farming, soil conservation, schools, and hundreds of other enterprises of great value to our local interests.

High in the mountains of North Carolina a towering dam is being rushed to completion today. Within the next few months it will be finished, and a majestic barrier made by man will hold back the tumbling waters of the Little Tennessee. The power of the river will begin to work for men. It will go to war, carried out on high transmission lines to keep great war-production plants going at accelerated speed.

Fontana Dam will be the highest dam east of the Rocky Mountains. The mountain lake behind it will provide a recreation area unmatched in beauty from coast to coast. It will be an asset to my State and to the Nation, as it takes its majestic place in the T. V. A. system. This is not the first dam T. V. A. has built in western North Carolina. It is the fourth and largest. Already Hiawassee and Apalachia Dams in Cherokee County and Chatuge in Clay County, all on the Hiawassee River, have been built as parts of the T. V. A. system which now controls the waters of the Tennessee and its tributaries. Fontana is the only one now under construction.

Almost 5,000 men are working up in the mountains to finish this vast structure. It is in a remote section. A town had to be built, living and recreation facilities and medical attention provided. T. V. A. builds its dams by "force account." They are not let out under contract. The Board of T. V. A. is responsible for every step of progress. They design the dams, buy the land, purchase the materials. They select and train the employees. They do the total job. Congress and the people can hold them responsible.

We do hold them responsible. They have met every test. That is why I want to add my voice to the mighty chorus saying "the McKellar amendments shall not pass." I am against these amendments; my people are against them; the country is against them, because they would destroy the magnificent organization of the T. V. A. It would no longer be administered down in the valley, close to the people, as it is now. It would be managed from up here in Washington. Its staff would no longer be chosen, as it is chosen now, solely on merit. Think of this result. If the McKellar amendments were adopted, on July 1 every single engineer working on Fontana Dam would be relieved of his responsibility if he earns more than $4,500 a year. His services would be terminated. And completion of one of the world's most spectacular feats of engineering, essential to the prosecution of the war, would be in jeopardy while the men who are running the job courted the favor on which patronage is granted. No such proposal will ever be agreed to by this House. It is outrageous that it is even presented for consideration of the conferees.

I do not know the States in which those men were born and reared, where they were educated, where they vote, or whom they vote for. I know the job those men are doing. They are doing it under enormous difficulties, and they are a credit to the Government service. They are responsible for the safety of the men who are engaged in this most hazardous undertaking. They are responsible for the future safety of the people living in the area below the dam. The way that job is done is very important. It is important that when the construction crews pull out of the district I represent, when the land buyers have finished their job, and the engineers have gone—it will be important then that the building of that dam shall have contributed to the well-being of the community and shall not have sapped its vitality and strength. We know what to expect from T. V. A. Local labor is always used where it is available.

When T. V. A. comes into a district to do any sort of job, the Member who represents that district can be assured that from the smallest unit upward there will be a resurgence of vitality in local government. The roots of democracy will be nourished. Let no man underestimate the importance of what I am saying. There is nothing more important for our Nation's future than to discover ways in which the National Government can so carry out its policies that local government is strengthened. Every Member knows that this is not always true of Federal projects—even of projects which are essential and in themselves of very great potential value. It is no uncommon thing that such confusion and irritation develops in connection with a Government program of land acquisition that the citizens immediately concerned are weary and disheartened. It is no uncommon thing to pay a price for Federal benefits by weakened muscles in local units of government.

That does not happen when T. V. A. goes in to do a job. Every Member from the Valley is proud of the imposing dams and beautiful lakes the T. V. A. has made. The whole Nation is proud of T. V. A.'s record in war production. But those dams might have been built and operated, the power system might have been created, and the agricultural program might have been carried out in such a way as to impair the fundamental basis of democracy—the participation of the people in the decisions of their Government. That is what excites my special pride in T. V. A. I am proud of the way this agency of Government has worked with the people. No wonder it has the people's support.

In 1933, in the basic act, Congress authorized the board of T. V. A. to cooperate with local agencies. That has been done with magnificent success. Let me use some of the activities in connection with the building of Fontana Dam to illustrate exactly what I mean. When T. V. A. had to recruit almost five thousand men to build this war project in a remote area, it had not only to provide living facilities, but to take care of their health and welfare in such a way as to guarantee sustained production and maximum efficiency.

No one would have criticized the Authority if it had done the job alone. Such services are a part of every construction job, a part of its cost. It is easier usually for the responsibility management to do those things alone. The difference between the way T. V. A. handles such problems and the way they are usually managed is because to T. V. A. the construction of a dam, no matter how magnificent, is never an end in itself. T. V. A. is not building dams. It is building a region. The dams are only one means to an end.

T. V. A. recognized that local health problems would be created by the building of Fontana, beyond the routine and emergency health problems of its resident employees. So they entered into a contract with the North Carolina Health Department. Our State and local health officials were not shut out. They are made a part of the Health and Sanitation program of T. V. A. When the dam is finished, they will be stronger, their services more efficient, than before the T. V. A. began its work.

Schools had to be built for the children of the men who came to work there. If T. V. A. had followed customary procedure, had built and operated a school while the dam was under construction, to tear it down when the job was done, it would have been a legitimate cost of construction. But it would not have helped our local institutions at all. This is what T. V. A. did. It built a building, just as any construction company would have had to do. It is a combination elementary and high school, and more than 800 children were in attendance this year. But that school is operated by the Graham County Board of Education and the State of North Carolina under a contract with T. V. A. Children from the immediate area attend. T. V. A. provides a supplement to the funds available from State and county sources for teacher salaries and improved instructional materials. State and local educational services will be improved when the men who built the dam pull out. The area will be stronger. The expense to the Federal Government is no more, and the benefit to our local institutions is incalculable.

Even the extensive program of employee training is conducted at Fontana Dam in cooperation with the Graham County Board of Education and the State department of education. It includes craft apprenticeship, by which unskilled workmen are trained for journeymen positions, and a variety of training activities for public safety officers, craft journeymen, clerical employees, engineering employees, typists and stenographers, waitresses, and other groups. It is a wonderful experience for that county board to have. Graham County will profit in the future.

T. V. A. proceeded the same way with library service. Instead of providing books for the men who work on the dam and taking them away when the men are gone, T. V. A. entered into a contract with the Nantahala Library Board, located at Murphy, N. C. Funds from Federal, from State, and local sources were pooled to provide library service not only at the site of construction, for which T. V. A. was solely responsible, but in the six county rural areas in which the employees are located. I am confident that when the dam is finished, this fine rural library service will continue to be maintained, supported by local funds alone. That has been the experience in other reservoir areas. Local public services have been improved, the lives of citizens have been permanently enriched because these dams are built the T. V. A. way.

This strengthening of local institutions goes all the way through the T. V. A. program. Contracts have been entered into with the State department of conservation and development to assure the maximum development and full utilization for the people of the recreational potentialities of this great program. Joint surveys of mineral deposits have been undertaken with the same State agency. Roads have been relocated, trees planted, parks developed, and a great agricultural program has been undertaken, all in cooperation with State and local agencies.

In 64 North Carolina counties, 3,175 individual farmers are participating in the test-demonstration program inaugurated by T. V. A. In addition, 3,184 farmers are participating in area demonstrations. They are trying out the improved types of fertilizer produced by T. V. A. at Muscle Shoals. They are changing their whole farm management, adopting practices which will increase their food production, raise their incomes, and at the same time improve their soil. The program is sponsored jointly by T. V. A., the United States Department of Agriculture, and the North Carolina State College.

T. V. A. might have gone about this program in another way. It might have done it in such a way that soil fertility was improved but the responsibility of the people was diminished. They went about it the right way. All over the country farmers met together. The program was explained to them. One of their own number was selected to be the demonstrator. He took a risk. T. V. A. agreed to supply the fertilizer free, but the farmer had to pay the freight and to agree to purchase the other minerals recommended for his soil. The State and Federal agencies agreed to furnish him the best farm management advice available, to help him meet his individual problems. The farmer agreed on his part to follow that advice, to take some acres out of cotton and corn, to plant them to pasture. He had to build fences, buy livestock, borrow money sometimes. He had to agree to keep books, to let his neighbors use his farm as a schoolroom.

Such programs are going on now in 28 States. Members from Texas to Minnesota, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, have seen results in their district. Measured in increased land fertility, food production, and farm income, the program has been overwhelmingly successful. I want to measure it in other terms. I want to point out what it means to this democracy that State and local agencies had a full share of participation, that the cooperating farmers took responsibility for the job themselves.

This program could have been done another way. It could have been done for, not with and by, the farmers. The results to the land might have been the same. But the results to democracy would not have been alike. Every farmer who took the risk of participating in the program initially did it not only for himself but to benefit his neighbor and his Nation. He took public responsibility for so conducting his private business that his community and his country might be enriched. I think this is the greatest demonstration in democracy I have ever seen. Our sons and their sons will profit. A new sense of responsibility, a new sense of the relationship between an individual citizen, his neighbors, and his country as a whole has been developed.

This is a bigger dividend than any soil-conservation program has ever paid before, fine as those programs have been. T. V. A.'s unique contribution to our democratic history lies in this essential. It has given a demonstration of how the people and local institutions can be made stronger, and not weakened, when a Federal program is undertaken. Because I believe so deeply in democratic principles, I will fight these McKellar amendments. Of course, they will be defeated. If they were adopted, the keystone of the arch supporting T. V. A. would be gone, and this great experiment in decentralization would be destroyed.

We must never destroy it. We must study its methods and urge their application elsewhere. In the future, as at the present, I want the letters T. V. A. to stand as a symbol of honest, efficient Government administration, a symbol of what can be accomplished in a democracy when the Government and the people work together.

Servicemen Should Have Priority Rights in Securing Surplus Equipment of the Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN B. BENNETT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to give returning servicemen priority rights in acquiring surplus equipment of the armed forces, such as jeeps, trucks, tractors, bulldozers, and other items of material which can well be adapted to civilian uses. In my judgment, such a measure will add materially to the practical readjustment in civilian life of those veterans whose occupations or pursuits require the use of such equipment. Heretofore, it has been the policy of our Government to dispose of excess equipment and supplies in large blocks to commercial bidders and dealers who would in turn peddle it to the public at a tremendous profit. None of us want that situation to develop after this war. Furthermore, we do not want such materials turned over to foreign governments for the use and benefit of the citizens of those countries. The boy who used a jeep in defense of his country ought to have first right to acquire it when he returns. That is the basic philosophy of this bill.

When the House World War Veterans Committee, of which I am a member, was considering the so-called G. I. bill for returning veterans, I proposed an amendment which would have accomplished this result. It was thought, however, that the subject matter could best be covered in separate legislation which is the reason I have taken it up in this manner. The benefits extended thereunder would be alternative to those provided under title III of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944.

The procedure necessary to carry out the provisions of this measure is comparatively simple. Each serviceman will be given a credit of $40 per month for each month of service in this country and $60 per month for each month of service outside the continental limits of the United States. The maximum credit in any case will be $1,500. As a practical matter it would work as follows: If a man served 10 months in this country, he would have a credit of $400 and could obtain equipment up to that amount by merely presenting his credit certificate. If the property he wanted cost more than that amount, he could obtain it by simply paying the difference.

It will be noted that credit and priority between veterans are given on the basis of length of service with additional credit for time spent overseas. This is the only fair method of computing such credit. It should be clearly stated at this point, however, that this is not a plan for adjusted compensation nor is it to be considered as a substitute for adjusted compensation. It is simply a sound and sensible arrangement to dispose of the excess equipment of the armed forces by giving the veterans who used such equipment during the war the first chance to use it after peace is declared. Furthermore, it protects the returning soldier from the profits of the dealer and the speculator, who would otherwise buy this material for resale knowing that the serviceman would be in the market to take it off his hands.

Mr. Speaker, there is hardly a farm boy in the services today who would not be tickled to death to take a jeep or a truck back home with him. It is something he can put to practical use the day he gets home if he so desires. There are thousands of servicemen who left businesses which they will want to reestablish when they get back and there are any number of items of material of this type which he can use advantageously in making a fresh start. The boys who use the equipment for business or agricultural pursuits should, of course, be given the first opportunity to get it. After that there is another class of serviceman who should not be overlooked, namely, the boy who simply wants an item of this equipment for his own personal use and enjoyment when he gets back home.

This legislation merely provides for one additional phase of the readjustment program which Congress ought to provide for veterans returning to civilian life. This program ought to be completed before the war is over so that immediately upon discharge a veteran will be able to immediately adopt that part of such program which best fits his plans for the future.

Congress should have no hesitancy in passing this legislation at the earliest possible moment.

Freedom, a Priceless Heritage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. EDGAR CHENOWETH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein a Memorial Day address delivered by the Honorable GEORGE A. DONDERO, of Michigan, at Ford's Theater, now known as the National Lincoln Museum, under the auspices of the National Capital Parks and the Lincoln Group, of Washington, D. C.:

The recognition accorded me to be your speaker on this memorable occasion in this historic place is acknowledged and greatly appreciated.

It is springtime again. The beauty of flowers fills the land. The flag is at half mast. It is Memorial Day—a day of memories. With heads bowed reverently and respectfully, Americans gather today to honor the Nation's dead and recall the unselfish devotion and sacrifice they rendered that the Nation might live.

Yonder on the inspiring dome of the Nation's Capitol, kissed by the sun of day and watched by the stars at night, floats the unconquered flag of the land our honored dead preserved for us. The real significance of Memorial Day is to remind us of the ideals and principles for which they gave their lives, and rededicate ourselves to those principles. They are sacred to us. They will remain so as long as each succeeding generation of Americans honor the supreme virtue of manhood.

It was the report of Mrs. John A. Logan to her husband General Logan, Commander in Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, of her visit to the battlefields near Richmond and Petersburg, Va., in 1868 from which Memorial Day originated. In the church yard near Petersburg she observed the graves of Confederate soldiers upon which were faded Confederate flags and withered flowers, placed there by loving hands in memory of their dead. She informed him that she had never been so touched as she was by that scene. General Logan said it was a beautiful revival of the custom of the ancients in thus preserving the memory of the dead, and thereafter issued the first order for decorating the graves of Union soldiers.

"If other eyes grow dull and other hands slack, and other hearts cold in the solemn trust, ours shall keep it well, as long as the light and warmth of life remain in us." So read the order for the first Memorial Day, May 5, 1868, and which has since become national policy by law.

It is most fitting and proper that we should hold a memorial service here in historic Ford's Theatre, a national shrine, where the immortal Lincoln gave his life that the Nation might live. More than four score years ago he posed a question at Gettysburg which prompts itself again to us today, in this day and generation. It wrung the hearts of men in his day, and they died willingly to answer it.

"Can a nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal, long endure?"

A crucial test was at hand when that question was asked. More than 80 years have passed since then. It is 1944. A crucial test is again at hand. The destiny of our Republic and the future of the world may be hanging in the balance. D-day is awaited with anxiety, dread, apprehension, but with a feeling of ultimate victory.

We are now engaged in the most colossal struggle the world has ever seen. Our day is filled with momentous and stirring events, both at home and abroad. On every sea and every continent the wide world round our heroic fighting men and women are yielding the last full measure of devotion in the hope of answering the question that Lincoln asked at Gettysburg in 1863, namely, can a nation conceived and dedicated to freedom long endure?

When Lincoln spoke at Gettysburg I do not believe he thought this Nation would be destroyed from without. Could it endure from within must have prompted the question he asked. We may well wonder whether he foresaw down the corridor of time a day when certain people would band together in this country, under a political label, as they have, to overthrow the Government conceived in liberty by force, violence, and bloodshed, if necessary.

Here where the torch of liberty was ignited and lifted so high that its blessed ray spread over the earth and held out hope to the oppressed of all the world, it is incredible that people could enjoy its safety, protection, and opportunities, and at the same time plan its destruction from within. It is difficult to understand the human equation which can share the privileges, protection, and safety of a free government and at the same time work to overthrow the institutions that benefit them.

That the Nation may long endure, we are now laying upon the altar of freedom our entire resources. Everything we possess as a people has been pledged to the winning of the war. In our war effort labor and industry, agriculture and business have achieved results far beyond our expectations and to the amazement and consternation of our enemies. Every bond issue has been oversubscribed and the coming Fifth War loan will receive the same generous response from our people. Everything will be done that can be done to end this war quickly and successfully. We cannot do more. We shall not do less.

Today our Nation faces the gravest danger since it gained its independence. This is the greatest war in our history. Should Germany and Japan win and establish their "new order," our Republic will be but a memory and freedom will have vanished from this earth. In Hitler's dream, the rights of the individual and minorities do not exist. The state is supreme. The principles set forth in our Constitution are null and void and men are not endowed with certain inalienable rights and governments do not derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

This conception of power is not new. The enslavement of people was old in the reign of David, King of Israel. In the Book of Psalms will be found the following:

"The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his annointed, saying

"Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us." (Psalms ii: 2–3.)

And the Lord spake unto David, saying:

"Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.

"Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." (Psalms ii: 8–9.)

"For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous; but the way of the ungodly shall perish." (Psalms i: 6.)

This scriptural reference should strengthen our faith, renew our courage and assist us in facing the great task remaining before us; and that task is answering Lincoln's question,

"Can a nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal, long endure?"

Thus we renew our pledge today to our heroic fighting men wherever they may be, that this Nation under God shall long endure. America makes a solemn vow today that the Star Spangled Banner will be waving over the same institutions of freedom, justice, and opportunity when they return as it did when they marched away. Let us, like Lincoln, have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us dare to do our duty as we understand it. Let Americans pledge anew today that they will be on guard against any and all subversive groups within our gates by whatever name they are known in any attempt by them to change or destroy our heritage of freedom.

The underlying idea of our Government does not need change, for truth is always unchanging and eternal. This was so when the morning stars sang together and will be so when time shall be no more. Our form of government is a republic from the bottom up and not from the top down. We are witnessing a dangerous trend to forget that. Eternal vigilance is still the price of liberty. the truism in that phrase has been applicable so many times in the history of this Nation that the frequency of its usage has made it trite. As a free people we must recognize and assume our responsibilities at all times in war and in peace. The people must not be complacent.

That we have a Government where the people rule is no guaranty that we will always have it unless the people so resolve and courageously defend it. Despite the fact that human freedom is guaranteed in our historic Bill of Rights, it is necessary today to remind our people again to be on guard against a growing threat to their liberties, a threat from within as well as the attack from without. To lose at home what our brave and heroic men are fighting and dying to preserve while struggling abroad would mean that this seventy-sixth Memorial Day celebration might be the last one. It would mean that the Nation's dead had died in vain. It would mean that a nation like ours, conceived in freedom, could not long endure. It would mean that government of the people would vanish from the earth. It would mean that we, the living, had broken faith with the dead.

To save our liberties and our homes, we, therefore, ask a just God to use us as his instrument in "trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored." Let this be the battle hymn of today.

May this Republic never forget the blood, tears, and suffering of those we remember today for preserving intact for us every principle of freedom and justice embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. If the time should ever come when we no longer remember what they did for us, in that day the Republic will no longer deserve preservation and the last and best hope of man—freedom to rule himself—will have perished from the earth.

We are living in dark days of great danger to our Republic. Peril still confronts us. We should be thankful that the present hour is not as black as it was. Our enemies have won battles, but the United Nations are winning the war. England has boasted that "the sun never sets on the British Empire."

That statement is true. It is also true that today and hereafter the sun will never set on the graves of our heroic dead. They sleep on every continent, on the islands of the sea, and beneath the waves—that we, the people, may enjoy freedom and govern ourselves.

I repeat, we are living in critical days. Generations before us also lived in critical days. The Nation has had other critical periods in its history. In more than 150 years that have passed since our beginning, we have met and mastered every crisis and national emergency. It is true we have had our Valley Forges, but Yorktowns always followed. In this global war we had our Pearl Harbor, but we are having our notable victories in Africa, Europe, and in the Pacific. Hours of national darkness have been followed by the dawn of triumph because our cause has been the cause of righteousness and unselfishness.

Although there have been times when the "plow stood still in the field of promise and the brave began to fear the power of man and the pious to doubt the favor of God," our heritage of liberty has thus far been preserved.

The first three words of the preamble to the Constitution of the United States are "We the people." Not only must we, the people, shoulder our duty and responsibility to the service men and women of the Nation in giving them united support in their efforts in the present colossal conflict but let we, the people, be ever alert and vigilant when this war ceases to bring about a peace which will insure to future generations their existence without the horrors and burdens of war.

We can well paraphrase Lincoln's Gettysburg Address with seeming fitness for this occasion:

Now we are engaged in a great global war; testing whether this Nation, or any nation, conceived and dedicated to the proposition that all men (and women) are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights that make them equal in the sight of a just God can long endure; testing, perhaps forever, whether representative government is but a pleasant dream or an enduring realism. Our meeting in this hallowed hall today is to pay tribute to the memory of our noble dead who suffered and died that you and I might live under that realism.

But in a larger sense it is for us the living to be dedicated anew to the unfinished task thus far so nobly advanced.

It is for us the living again on this Memorial Day to take increased devotion to the cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion.

It is for us, the living, to again highly resolve that these honored dead in every clime and country on earth shall not have died in vain.

Memorial Day is and should be a solemn occasion for all of us. We implore a merciful God that our hero dead shall not have died in vain; that this priceless legacy of liberty and self-government, inherited by us from those who have gone before, may in like manner be handed on by us to our posterity, neither weakened by neglect nor harmed by violence, in order that freedom's flag may wave forever

"O'er the land of the free
And the home of the brave."

Soldiers, living and dead, we shall keep faith with you in order that here on this Western Hemisphere liberty shall be preserved and the Constitution shall be revered. In God we trust.

God helping us, may our Republic bloom forever, the symbol of justice and equality, of honor and integrity, and of virtue and righteousness until time shall be no more.

"Go back to sleep, heroic men;
We shall keep faith with you."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from the Antigo Journal, of Antigo, Wis.:

DEMONSTRATED FITNESS

Perhaps some of us may have forgotten it, or even overlooked it, but it was not until our local vocational school began its program of retraining older workers and training younger ones that the problem of unemployment began to abate in this community. Up to that time the W. P. A. and N. Y. A. had their projects of various kinds, but the employment they could give was of the stopgap variety for the most part, and no progress was being made by them toward getting men and women into private employment. In their final phases these organizations did participate in financing the expenses of those taking training, but it was possible to continue it without their participation.

What we observed here in Antigo went on, to a greater or lesser degree, all over the country later on. It is now generally admitted that the vocational schools have done and are doing an excellent job, and one which contributes mightily toward victory. One could ask no better endorsement than the fact that the war industries themselves have entrusted a large part of their training program to these schools, paying the students while learning.

At the close of the war retraining of another kind, for employment in peacetime industries and occupations will be essential to solving the problem of demobilized soldiers and war industry workers. Here again the vocational schools are the best equipped for the task, not counting, of course, preparation for the professions and other callings requiring collegiate standards.

Their students will have to be not only those who have certain skills, but also those who have acquired none and "got by" in holding down jobs because of the labor shortages. After the war the labor market will again become competitive, and the inefficient, indifferently prepared worker will not be able to find any but the least desirable jobs. The public will not tolerate low standards in merchandise when they can get better, so the employer cannot afford to keep workers who produce only substandard goods.

Training of this kind should be offered and accepted before the day of demobilization. It should expand as rapidly as training for war work abates, and the vocational schools, not some new political plum-tree organization should be the ones to provide it.

This editorial offers a suggestion well worth considering. Schools must prepare now for a post-war training program. The vocational schools have contributed much toward our war production program by training men and women for skilled war work and these same institutions have the facilities available for training people to take their proper places in the post-war era. The importance of vocational training for business, industry, and security in the future merits the consideration of the Congress in connection with educational legislation.

Moorhead, Minn., Scene of Largest Output of Onion Sets in the World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, when thousands of victory gardeners in the United States plant their onion beds this spring, they will be using onion sets produced in the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota, which I am privileged to represent in Congress.

I say this because we boast of having in our district the largest individual growers of onion sets in the world. This big farm is just outside the city of Moorhead, Minn., and is operated by our fine citizens, Charles Peterson and his sons Henry and Robert, more affectionately known as Hank and Bob.

Because of the astounding production of onion sets on the Peterson farm, the press recently sent a writer there to look over this industry, since throughout the United States the people are not only crying with onions when they can get them, but because of the scarcity they are crying for onions.

The following article, describing this unusual enterprise, recently appeared in the Fargo (N. Dak.) Daily Forum:

Enough set onions to supply 175,000 Victory gardens have been shipped from Moorhead in the past 2 months. That's a lot of onions.

But there are that many left and they'll be distributed throughout the Red River Valley and the Northwest.

The product comes off the Charles Peterson and sons truck farm at the outskirts of Moorhead. They claim to be the largest individual growers of onion sets in the world.

HAVE THE RECORDS

That's covering a lot of territory, but the Petersons show you the records.

True, Moorhead isn't the largest shipping point in the world for set onions, but you'll not find any individual farm anywhere that can approach the 25 acres planted and harvested in 1943 by the Petersons, unless their records are in error.

The Dutch Valley Growers Association of South Holland, Ill., ships about 300 carloads a year. But the acreages of the individual member growers run from 3 to 10.

There are other areas in the United States, too, where set onions are grown, but these also comprise farms of relatively small acreage.

FIRST FROM MOORHEAD

Here's how the Petersons figure that the four carloads they have shipped (incidentally they were the first such shipments from Moorhead) will supply 175,000 Victory gardens.

The shipments totaled about 175,000 pounds and the average Victory gardener purchases about a pound for his needs. Those set onions are the ones that supply those tender young onions that grace your table in season.

On the 25 acres planted last year the Petersons harvested approximately 10,000 bushels, or an average yield of about 400 bushels to the acre. They are specialists in their line. The land is scientifically fertilized and a water system helps keep the soil in prime condition—that's the answer to the big yields.

Such a crop must be cared for scientifically, for the seed that goes into the ground isn't bought for nothing—it costs $4.50 a pound. Figuring about 40 pounds to the acre, that means an investment in seed alone of $4,500.

JOB NOT DONE

But the job doesn't end there. Some 200 to 250 toppers were employed in the field—they pull the onions from the ground and remove the tops—the harvest taking about 2 weeks. The onion sets are placed in bags and left in the field for a time to cure. Then they are trucked to the warehouse and spread thinly in trays, each tray containing from ¾ to 2 bushels. The trays are stacked and left to dry.

Beginning in January the job of cleaning and sacking the sets began.

The Petersons have a large seed cleaning machine, electrically operated, in the warehouse. The trays are dumped into a hopper and the onions are carried up a conveyor through a blower, where the dried skins, dirt, and other chaff are separated and the sets are dropped through small chutes into open-mesh 32-pound bags.

EIGHT MEN ON MACHINE

Eight men are employed in the crew operating the machine. Two of them, one on each side, fill the sacks. Then two others tie the tops of the bags, taking three stitches with a large needle. They must work fast, for the machine will fill two sacks every 15 seconds.

This job done, the sacks are piled in the warehouse awaiting shipment.

Many things can go wrong between planting time and the sacking operations—yes, even after the onions are on their way to their destination. But it has proven a profitable operation and the Petersons will expand the business 50 percent in 1944.

PLAN YEAP AHEAD

You've got to plan far ahead, too, for the right kind of seed is not easy to obtain. The Moorhead growers purchase their seed on contract a year ahead—they already have the 1945 supply on hand. Their seed comes from California and is composed of the Australian Brown and Ebenezer strains.

One carload of sets was shipped to Chicago earlier this year, another went to Billings, Mont., and two were dispatched to Kansas City, Mo. Another carload will be shipped soon.

And after the war the Petersons may try a new wrinkle. Then, when you buy your onion sets for your peace garden you'll probably find them packed in neat cellophane bags—1 pound to the bag.

Appropriation for Fair Employment Practice Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY P. JEFFREY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 26, 1944

Mr. JEFFREY. Mr. Speaker, the appropriation for the Committee on Fair Employment Practice should be approved.

Many of the practices of the present Committee have been of questionable value. Indeed, in many instances it is perhaps true that the activity of the Committee has been harmful rather than helpful.

Nevertheless, the principle involved is both fundamental and right. It is the function of this Government to promote the welfare of all of its citizens. Such activity must include the interests of every group, race, and creed within our population.

It is useless to blink the fact that a problem exists for members of the colored race. Political freedom cannot long exist without economic freedom, and freedom for the entire Nation is endangered so long as freedom for a few is denied or impaired.

The problem of full opportunity for employment is not serious at the present time. All of us hope that at the conclusion of the war, widespread opportunity to work will remain. But now is the time to plan for the post-war period and one important phase in such planning must be full and free opportunity to work for all of our people.

Legislation cannot cure all of the difficulties which exist. But legislation honestly and wisely administered can point the way and help to remove some of the difficulties which beset us today.

To help plan for the adjustments which necessarily will arise in the post-war period, I urge the appropriation of funds for this Committee.

General Logan's Order for Memorial Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. W. (RUNT) BISHOP

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of General Logan's order for Memorial Day as published in the Murphysboro Independent which sets out the fact that Carbondale, Ill., was one of the first towns to observe a Memorial Day:

GENERAL LOGAN'S ORDER FOR MEMORIAL DAY

The first informal Memorial Day exercises for the dead of the Civil War were held in Carbondale but many do not remember that the first official order for the Nation to honor the memory of its heroes was the order of the day that Gen. John A. Logan issued as commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic.

General Logan issued the following order in 1868 to the departments of the organization:

HEADQUARTERS, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1868.

GENERAL ORDER NO. 11.

I

The 30th day of May 1868 is designated for the purpose of strewing with flowers or otherwise decorating the graves of comrades who died in defense of their country during the late rebellion and those bodies lie in almost every city, village, and hamlet churchyard in the land. In this observance no form or ceremony is prescribed, but posts and comrades will in their own way arrange such fitting services and testimonials of respect as circumstances may permit.

We are organized, comrades, as our regulations tell us, for the purpose among other things "of preserving and strengthening those kind fraternal feelings which have bound together soldiers, sailors, and marines, who united to suppress the late rebellion." What can add more to assure this result than by cherishing tenderly the memory of our heroic dead, who made their breasts a barricade between our country and its foes? Their soldier lives were the reveille of freedom to a race in chains and their deaths a tattoo of rebellious tyranny in arms. We should guard their graves with sacred vigilance. All that the concentrated wealth and taste of the Nation can add to their adornment and security is but a fitting tribute to the memory of her slain defenders. Let no wanton foot tread rudely on such hallowed grounds. Let pleasant paths invite the coming and going of reverent visitors and fond mourners. Let no vandalism of avarice or neglect, no ravages of time testify to the present or to the coming generations that we have forgotten as a people the cost of a free and undivided republic.

If our eyes grow dull and other hands slack, and other hearts cold in the solemn trust, ours shall keep it well as long as the light and warmth of life remains to us.

Let us then, at the time appointed, gather around their sacred remains and garland the passionless mounds above them with the choicest flowers of springtime; let us raise above them the dear old flag they saved from dishonor; let us in their solemn presence renew our pledges to aid and assist those whom they have left among us a sacred charge upon the Nation's gratitude—the soldier's and sailor's widow and orphan.

II

It is the purpose of the Commander in Chief to inaugurate this observance with the hope that it will be kept up from year to year, while a survivor of the war remains to honor the memory of his departed comrades. He earnestly desires the public to call attention to this order, and lend its friendly aid in bringing it to the notice of comrades in all parts of the country in time for simultaneous compliance therewith.

III

Department commanders will use every effort to make this order effective. By command of

JOHN A. LOGAN,
Commander in Chief.

America—1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER C. PLOESER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, at the request of Mr. George J. Burger, publisher of the National Independent, I extend an editorial published in the third anniversary issue:

AMERICA—1944

A TRIBUTE TO THE NATION'S CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES ON SMALL BUSINESS AND A SALUTE TO SMALL BUSINESSMEN OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENT ENTERPRISE

For more than 150 years independent business enterprise has been serving and building and making America big and strong and great as a nation. Down through the years millions upon millions of American small businessmen have struggled through and survived frequent wars and panics and catastrophic business upheavals. Independent enterprise has survived all the pitfalls of the past because America is free and independent. It will continue to survive all man-made disasters as long as America continues as a free and independent nation.

In the prosecution of America's cause, in the present world-wide struggle, every man, woman, and child has a duty to perform, and a stake in the war and the peace to come. Likewise, men and women of industry and business—big and small—have a stake in the wartime industry and business of America, and in the post-war opportunities.

The stress and strain of the present war have placed big business in virtual control of the Nation's production line. Without authority from the people—or the Government—big business has seized upon this wartime opportunity to confiscate the industry and the business of the country. Working behind the scenes, while serving in the war effort, big business is charting its own future course at the expense of the Nation's independent business enterprise, resulting in a state of confusion unprecedented in the entire history of the country.

On account of the tactics used by big business in manipulating the industry and business of the Nation while engaging in the war effort, fate is forcing small business to fight for survival, while it also is making generous contribution to the war's successful prosecution. Small business is doing this in an efficient, upright, and an honest manner. In fact, the straightforward way in which the Nation's small business is cooperating with all branches, all departments, and all agencies of the Federal Government is a genuine credit to the country's small businessmen—and a shining, clean-cut example of the will and the resourcefulness of American independent enterprise.

Millions of America's men and women are off to the four corners of the earth fighting to the death, fighting for the permanent preservation of America—"Land of the Free, Home of the Brave." Millions of men and women are fighting to save big business, fighting to save small business, fighting to save every man, woman, and child.

If the Nation is to come out of the war a winner, fair play all around is a prime necessity. It is the duty of big business, it is the duty of small business, it is the duty of every man, woman, and child in America to protect and preserve those American institutions which millions of men and women are now fighting and dying to protect and preserve. These are fundamentals that cannot be denied.

What is fundamental is one thing and what is practiced is quite another thing. It is true enough that big business is in virtual control of the Nation's production line. It is true enough that big business is helping in the war effort. And it is true enough that big business is helping itself at one and the same time.

On the other hand, it is evident that big business, instead of helping, is hurting small business; instead of protecting, is destroying American institutions such as it deems no longer necessary to its selfish scheme of things; destroying in particular the 150-year-old institution of American independent enterprise.

This is America-1944 on the home fronts of industry and business. At this very moment big business is planning gigantic post-war projects taking into account conquest of national markets in the America of tomorrow. The post-war plans of big business, as announced in the public press, openly declare its intention and determination to forge ahead along its own self-determined lines, regardless of what may happen to the stake of small business, regardless of what may happen to the stake of every man and woman of the Nation's armed services, regardless of what may happen to the stake of every man, woman, and child in America, the stake of "all for one and one for all," in the war and in the peace and in the future opportunities of life.

Although the wealth and power and resources of American independent enterprise greatly exceed the wealth and power and resources of big business, the small businessmen of the country cannot adequately cope with the existing situation because they are not adequately organized to combat such gigantic and unexpected onslaughts as big business is piling upon them. Therefore, the immediate hope of small business for its survival almost entirely lies in the hands of the Congress of the United States.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice are both lawfully constituted agencies of the Federal Government—charged with the responsibility of protecting small business in the same manner they are obligated to protect big business—both of these Government agencies have decreed that nothing can be done (until peacetime conditions return) to halt the steady march of business concentration now being dictated to the people of the Nation and to the Federal Government by manipulators of big business.

If it were true that nothing can be done to stem the tide of big business concentration, and if it were true that there was nothing else to do, then American independent enterprise—really and truly—would be doomed to destruction forever. However, since Pearl Harbor enough has happened to the small businessmen of the tire industry, and to other independents of other industries—to make it clear that it isn't the war but the monopoly of war that is destroying American small business, and wiping out the Nation's independent enterprise.

Had it not been for the fact that the Senate and the House Committees on Small Business—with the help of America's tire independents—made an extensive study and investigation of the rubber situation resulting from the war (January-March 1942), the Nation's motor-transportation system might have collapsed completely and endangered the whole war effort, at great sacrifice of the Nation's armed forces.

Had it not been for the fact that the Senate and the House Committees on Small Business approved a resolution (February 1942) recommending the channeling of sales and repairs of tires through independent tire dealers and rebuilders, it is likely that the dominant factors of the tire industry would by now be in complete and absolute control of all the Nation's retail tire markets—north, south, east, west—throughout the length and the breath of the land.

Had it not been for the fact that the Senate and the House Committees on Small Business recommended remedial legislation for the tire industry and sponsored enactment of the rubber-tires bill (June 1942), it is probable that many of the independents of the tire industry still open for business would have been forced to close up shop long, long ago.

As defenders of American small business, the Senate and the House Committees on Small Business are performing a great work and service for the country in a grave emergency. On this, its third anniversary of publication, the National Independent takes occasion to pay high tribute to the ability, the efforts, and the accomplishments of all the Members of Congress who also are members of the Senate and the House committees and who are diligently laboring day in and out, under tremendous handicaps, for the protection and the preservation of American small business and a continuance of American independent enterprise.

At the same time, in starting with this issue on the fourth year of its life, National Independent salutes America's tire independents and all the independents of all industries who are giving their support to the Nation's congressional small business committees and who, in doing so, are likewise rendering a great service in a grave emergency to the 136,000,000 people of America, to millions of the Nation's fighting men and women, and to the fair and just cause of American independent enterprise. How long it may live all depends on how well all small businessmen of America support the Senate and the House Committees on Small Business and how thoroughly all men of American independent enterprise are able and willing to stand up and fight.

Servicemen's Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following press statement:

WASHINGTON NEWS

(By Congressman WILLIAM H. STEVENSON)

SERVICEMEN'S BENEFITS—DEPENDENCY CLASS KEY TO PAYMENTS

Recently Congress voted an increase in allowances to be paid to veterans' dependents. Since there is considerable confusion as to how these payments are made and who is eligible, I want to help clarify some of the problems of the dependents of veterans.

In general any dependent of a man or woman in the service, being paid $138 a month or less, is eligible to receive a dependent's allotment or allowance from the Government. This act applies only to the dependents of men or women in the service whose base pay is $138 a month or less. Those who get more than $138 a month come under an other system. This new act provides for monthly allotments as follows:

Class A dependents: A wife, $50; a wife and child, $80; each additional child, $20. A divorced wife, $42; a divorced wife and one child, $72; a divorced wife with each additional child, $20. In case of alimony, a wife separated or divorced from a serviceman will receive no more than the amount fixed in a court order or decree. If the divorce or separation order does not call for alimony or separate maintenance she will not receive any allotment.

Class B dependents or where the dependency on the serviceman is less than 50 percent: A parent, $37; two parents, $37; a parent and any number of brothers and sisters, $37; two parents and any number of brothers and sisters, $37. It is important to make mention that class B dependents are classified as such because they are only partially dependent upon the servicemen or women for support. In other words, if the dependents are dependent upon the servicemen or women, 50 percent or less, they come under class B. Only $37 is given in such cases and applicants have to prove that they are dependent upon the enlisted man or woman for support.

B-1 dependents or where the dependency on the serviceman is 50 percent or more: One parent, $50; one parent and one brother or sister, $68; one parent and each additional brother or sister, $50 plus $11 for each brother or sister; two parents, $68; two parents and one brother or sister, $68 plus $11 for each brother or sister; a brother and sister but no parents, $42; each additional brother or sister without parents, $11.

Here also it is necessary for the applicant to prove 50 percent or more dependency. If the proof given is not sufficient, the dependent comes automatically under class B and gets much less. Thus, the dividing line, above or below 50 percent dependency, has an important bearing as to the amount of the allotment.

Now that many of the married men are being called into service, it is important that they make application for all allotment upon induction. The allotment payments are not retroactive, but only begin on the date that the application is filed. As a result, if the enlisted man waits 1 or 2 months, or even more, before filing his application, his dependents automatically lose that many months' allotment money. It is highly desirable that the serviceman file for his dependents' allotment the day he is inducted so that his family can be properly provided for.

If any questions arise regarding where to get allotment blanks for allotment pay, or how to make application for allotments, or if for any reason any serviceman's dependents are not now receiving their allotment from the Government, or if you know of any dependents of a serviceman who are having trouble getting their allotment, have them see the county veterans' service officer, or write me, Congressman WILLIAM STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Our Departed Colleagues

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. ELMER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

Mr. ELMER. Mr. Speaker, this is the second memorial service I have attended in this House. Both were impressive. I listened to the eloquent addresses of a year ago and of today, and I observed to myself, how fitting.

I knew our deceased colleagues for only a short time and cannot appraise them like those who have known them longer. I accept the appraisal of their worth, made by their people who sent them here on the mission to serve our common country.

On the surface, it sometimes seems, there is more strife than unity, and when one falls by the wayside his place is so quickly taken by another, we forget the comrade of yesterday, in greeting the one of today. But not so. The greatest thing, in this House, is the fellowship among its Members, and their respect for each other. The strife comes from the earnestness of each to serve his country in his own way. Such fellowship cannot exist in any body of 435 Members which does not have a common purpose. If all were melted into one mass, and poured into one mould, there would emerge the image of Uncle Sam—the symbol of our united country. We remember them day by day, and on this annual occasion, show to our fellow Americans we have not forgotten.

When Columbus discovered America, he saw a light burning on the shore. It was a signal from the New World to the Old, symbolical of the light of liberty that has burned here ever since. God had erected in our country His great lighthouse of freedom—ever more. It has sent its rays to all parts of the world. It has never lost its power, but has grown increasingly bright and strong as the years roll by.

Our deceased brothers, when alive, stood guard over this gift of God, and, with us, have kept the lamps trimmed and the lower lights burning along the shore. They must be kept here else freedom and liberty would be extinguished from the earth.

Address of Hon. Brooks Hays, of Arkansas, Before Arkansas Bankers' Association Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BROOKS HAYS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Arkansas Bankers' Association, Saturday, May 24, 1944, at Hot Springs, Ark.:

The invitation to speak at your annual convention was especially pleasing to me since it enables me to discuss with you the work of my legislative committee, in which you have such a vital interest.

I am aware that there was little justification in my background and experience for my selection as a member of this important committee, but I accepted the appointment as an opportunity for service to the financial institutions of the State, many of which are in my district, where banking and commercial interests converge. Always with recognition of the fact that I have no expert knowledge of banking problems and can hardly aspire to it, I have undertaken to be helpful to you and to the hundreds of thousands of citizens with whom you do business.

Trends in Federal legislation was chosen as my subject because it is broad enough to embrace all of the problems with which I wish to deal.

An expression which has rich significance to lawyers is that of "due process of law." Our confidence in government depends almost entirely upon the repect which those in authority manifest for this principle. It has come to have rather a limited and technical meaning in a judicial sense but has broader implications with which the country is becoming increasingly concerned.

Due process should include the making of laws, as well as their execution. The process by which laws are made has never received the attention that it deserves. If the procedure by which legislative proposals are advanced, considered, and acted upon is inadequate, the results cannot be satisfactory.

I am thinking not only of the parliamentary requirements in lawmaking, but of the ferment of ideas, the exchange of thoughts among the people themselves, which must precede legislative enactments. Statutory law is not really law without this preliminary process. Sir Henry Main must have had this in mind when he said, "Social opinion must always be in advance of law, and the greater or less happiness of the people depends upon the narrowness of the gulf between them." Genuine law—good law—evolves from the judgments of the people. We must be on the alert, and strive to eliminate any lag in the legislative declaration that a public judgment has been reached upon an issue.

But to get down to specific legislation—the Seventy-eighth Congress has enacted few measures directly affecting banking operations. Omitting the appropriations, less than a half dozen bills affecting banks and the agencies of government subject to our committee's jurisdiction were passed in 1943. From your standpoint, I assume that the bill relieving you of insurance assessments upon deposits resulting from the sale of Government bonds is most important. From the standpoint of our total economy I should say that legislation dealing with price control is of chief interest.

The Brown bill which would have the effect of nullifying regulation Q promulgated late last year by the Federal Reserve Board was recommended by our committee, was passed by the House and is now pending in the Senate. I shall make no predictions concerning possible action on the bill, but I am prepared to defend the House's action. Our approval of the measure illustrates that practical, as distinguished from theoretical, considerations often determine a decision. The effect of regulation Q upon country banks of the South and certain States in the West was graphically presented to the committee, and we were convinced that its enforcement would work extreme hardship upon hundreds of these institutions.

The committee members fully appreciate the place that the country bank occupies in the economic life of the communities. We know how important it is that the banks be given every possible assistance in maintaining their earnings, and it was evident from the testimony presented to us that enforcement of regulation Q would mean a reduction in earnings for these banks and, on the other hand, that the suspension would not prove a hardship to anyone. We cannot do for the country banks all that some might hope for, yet we are very desirous of helping in a material way. The almost unanimous approval of Mr. Brown's bill evidences a friendly and cooperative attitude toward the smaller banks.

Our committee's biggest responsibility is that of passing upon the extension of the Price Control Act. We have been conducting hearings for more than a month and have covered the entire subject of inflation controls and their impact upon our economy. No group appreciates more than you do the imperative necessity of continuing the price-control law without substantial change.

At the outset the committee assured everyone that opportunity would be given all groups to present their views. It can truly be said that we have fully explored the effects of the law and the O. P. A. regulations. While we do not feel that many changes should be made, many of us believe that some amendments are necessary and that it will be possible to improve and perfect this legislation as we proceed with the war program. The extension will probably not be for more than another year, although it is universally agreed that price controls will be required for a period after the war.

We must be mindful that the peak of World War No. 1 inflation was not reached until 2 years after the armistice. However, periodical extensions will give Congress an opportunity to study administrative weaknesses and to investigate fully the agency's activities.

I think I can safely predict that this year we will make some improvements in court procedures authorized by the act and that some of the oppressive and unnecessary burdens will be eliminated. I want to make it clear, however, that many of us (a majority, I hope) are determined that the control shall not be weakened—that the line will be held—for the duration of the emergency

This will involve inconveniences and disappointments for some commodity interests which feel that administrators of O. P. A. have not been properly considerate of their problems. I do not doubt that some of these groups have just cause for complaint, but neither can I forget that their inconveniences are petty in comparison to the sacrifices of several millions of our citizens, who are risking lives and careers and families, as well as businesses, for the freedom that can only be realized in a world at peace.

In a program of the magnitude of O. P. A., it is impossible to avoid inequities. We would make a grave mistake, however, if we undertook to deal with these maladjustments legislatively. We can accomplish a great deal through our investigatory powers and our conferences with the administrative staff, but I am convinced that it would be impracticable to deal with specific commodity problems through direct Congressional action, that any attempt to do this will mean a breakdown in the whole program.

This is one of those situations that defy legislative treatment, it simply must be done administratively. Similar situations have developed in the field of tariff policy and transportation rates.

Congress in each such instance has had to delegate the authority to fix rates and schedules Real price control can be adjusted only by granting authority to the Administrator to deal with the problem. I cannot reiterate too strongly, if we fail to recognize this, if we undertake to make exceptions of specific commodities, price control will be a farce.

Bankers know, better than anyone else, of the threat of potential inflation. You are conscious of the increase in deposits in the Nation's banks from $68,225,000,000 on December 31, 1939, to $117,659,000,000 December 31, 1943. The deposits in Arkansas banks during that period went from $201,000,000 to $484,000,000.

The tremendous rise in farm income accounts for much of the growth in bank deposits. National farm cash income totaled $19,765,000,000 in 1943 compared with $11,742,000,000 in 1941. Arkansas's share in 1943 was $322,114,000—30 percent above the 1941 cash income Net income of farmers of the Nation has advanced at an even greater rate. It climbed 21 percent from 1914 to 1918, 82 percent from 1939 to 1943—this in spite of the fact that prices received by farmers went up 73 percent in World War No. 1 and only 71 percent between 1939 and 1943. Consider, too, that prices paid by farmers rose 46 percent in 1914–18, and only 21 percent in 1939–43.

This has been possible because of the phenomenal production by farmers. In World War No. 1, total farm production was off 1 percent between 1914 and 1918. It was up 19 percent between 1939 and 1943. Cotton production, down 24 percent in 1914–18, increased 12 percent in 1939–43; meat production, up 25 percent in 1914–18, rose 28 percent in 1939–43; dairy production, up a meager 4 percent in 1914–18, rose 14 percent in 1939–43; chicken and egg production did not increase in World War No. 1 but has been increased 20 percent during the present war.

An amazing record—but still a contributing factor to the inflation danger. It's an old story now that there is not sufficient civilian goods to absorb the spending surplus. This enormous oversupply of money will not bring on uncontrolled inflation unless we cause people to lose confidence that their savings will buy just as much, or more, in the future as they would today. If prices get out of line and engage in a race with wages, economic and political disaster will overtake us.

Congress cannot escape responsibility in this situation The history of disastrous inflation proves that the psychological factor is as real as other factors which produce this threat. If Congress should indicate by any one legislative act that we desire a general price rise, nothing can possibly stop a buying spree. All we could do would be to wait for the perilous consequences.

I don't think that will happen. It must not happen. Those in charge of price control have acted firmly and on the whole wisely. It is generally felt that Mr. Chester Bowles, the Administrator, is doing an excellent job. He has encouraged simplification (O. P. A. is using 14,000 tons less paper this year than last), and he believes in flexibility and in giving maximum authority to local offices.

There are some definitely encouraging symptoms in the current situation. Farmers—others, too, but I am using agricultural figures since they have greater significance for our State—farmers have been paying off their debts, and they have been borrowing less. They are getting in shape for the postwar era. For this, I think the wise counsel of their banker friends and associates is largely responsible.

Consider this contrast: In the middle of 1918, approximately the same stage in World War No. 1 as the present time in World War No. 2, agricultural loans of commercial banks, excluding loans on farm real estate, amounted to $2,507,000,000, just about three times what is now held by banks. Between December 31, 1942, and that date in 1943, such loans declined slightly. In Arkansas, commercial banks short term, or collateral agricultural loans, excluding those covered by repurchase agreement with the Commodity Credit Corporation, aggregated $10,986,000 at the start of 1944, compared with $11,391,000 a year earlier. This is only 15 percent of the $72,135,000 of such loans held by Arkansas banks in 1920.

This brings up the subject of Government agricultural credit. Government credit is intended for those to whom commercial loans are not available. Your American Bankers Association's able president, Mr. A. L. M. Wiggins, is authority for the heartening statement that 80 percent of agricultural lending is still by private institutions. If the trend were decidedly in favor of Government loans, that percentage might not give you much comfort, but my impression is that Government lending will not exceed the 20 percent—much of this not eligible for commercial loans—and that a proper balance can be maintained. That, assuredly, is a "consummation devoutly to be hoped for."

Some proposals pertaining to agricultural credit originate with the Committee on Agriculture but they are of vital interest to all Arkansas Congressmen. The Agriculture Committee at this time is struggling with the so-called Cooley bill to consolidate in the Farmers' Home Corporation credit facilities of the Farm Security Administration, Farm Credit Administration, and regional agricultural credit corporations, and to provide for closer congressional supervision. Out of this study, I am confident, will come a worthwhile piece of legislation. Mr. Wiggins and spokesmen for farm organizations recently were heard by the committee, and revision of the bill is under way.

It would leave the inflation picture incomplete to disregard the upward trend in farm real-estate prices. I shall not take up your time with suggestions for cautious granting of credit—I know they are not necessary, but we shall do well to watch the situation closely. A Department of Agriculture study up to March of this year revealed an increase of 52 percent above the 1935–39 average in the market price per acre of Arkansas farm land. For the Nation the average increase was 38 percent. During the year ending March 1 the increase was 15 percent for the United States, 18 percent for Arkansas. Our recollection of the financial wreckage that came in the wake of the last war's inflated land values is too fresh surely for us to permit another such catastrophe to fall upon us.

Arkansas farm operators reduced their mortgage indebtedness $900,000 in 1942, the total dropping to $78,405,000 from $79,305,000 the year before, this decrease being the first for Arkansas since 1937, although for the country as a whole a decline in mortgage debt has been shown each year since 1927. Between 1923 and 1943 the Nation's farm mortgage debt decreased 43.3 percent, Arkansas's 33.4 percent. It is probable that Arkansas's farm mortgage debt was reduced substantially more in 1943 than in 1942. Preliminary estimates for the United States place total farm mortgage indebtedness at $5,650,000,000, 8 percent below the January 1, 1943, figure, and the lowest of any year since 1917.

Do you acquiesce in the opinion that these figures indicate that farmers generally are putting their financial house in order, in preparation for whatever the end of the war may bring?

Let us assume that we shall have the foresight and fortitude to survive this period with our savings unimpaired in value. What then?

The answer is up to us—to business, to labor, to Government.

The perils are many but the opportunities are great. All over the Nation, communities are laying their plans for after-the-war activity. Bankers are among the leaders in these programs. They have a stake in the use to which wartime savings are put in the future. Unquestionably, there will be a great demand for credit in financing purchases of civilian goods not now available. At the same time, there will be the problem of maintaining a favorable balance of payment between out-of-county purchases and sales. You doubtless are already pondering ways and means of averting a sudden drain of your customers' reserves without compensation in the form of incoming funds.

Of one thing we can be certain. We shall stand or fall together—business, labor, and Government (note that I say Government, not administration).

If all bankers are of the disposition of you in Arkansas, I believe it can be said that your profession has recognized the possibilities of benefit from working with and through the Government. I don't think I am mistaken in regarding your relationship with the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation generally satisfactory and helpful. I daresay you don't have their personnel in mind when you speak, perhaps disdainfully, of "bureaucrats."

Frankly, I become disturbed at a tendency on the part of some elements in our economic life to wage a sort of war on Government, as though it were an enemy. It is far better that Government be accepted as a partner and utilized to aid business. Any who want to change administrations will have an opportunity in November to order it done. In the interim, it behooves us, as invasion day draws nearer, to stand solidly behind the only Government we have, or can have, for carrying on the war. Regardless of the outcome of the forthcoming election, put political and personal animosities aside, accept the result in good spirit, and with faith in God and His creatures, our fellow men, and combine our efforts to safeguard freedom and to maintain peace.

I am a politician, conscious that the connotations of the word are not all good; you are bankers who can remember when the word "banker" was spoken with the sometimes more—sometimes less—good-humored contempt with which we hear "bureaucrat" uttered today. We all know that general condemnation of bankers was never deserved. And I am willing to vouch for the statement that not all bureaucrats are bad. I hasten to add that I agree we should have as little bureaucracy as we can get by with—in Government, in business, and in labor organizations.

Both as citizens and as bankers you can influence the trend toward or away from another war which, beyond question, would mean the end of the freedom we treasure. Don't think for a moment that your ideas and your votes don't contribute toward the Nation's decisions.

One phase of post-war planning has to do with the maintenance of an international bank, and our committee has begun work on this problem. Some of you have been kind enough to write me your ideas on the subject. We have had some preliminary conferences with Secretary Morgenthau and Dr. White, consultant to the Secretary, but plans are admittedly nebulous and conversations with other governments largely exploratory. The subject is highly technical and to some extent controversial and months or even years will be required to make a beginning; nevertheless, it is imperative that plans for a permanent peace must be accompanied by a sound program for currency stabilization and we must extend our fullest cooperation in this field.

The economic aspects of the peace problem have been fully exploited and, while I think sometimes that this phase has been overemphasized in analyses of the cause of war, it is, nevertheless, a very real source of national fears and rivalries upon which violence feeds.

You are doubtless familiar with the proposals to use the international banks for loans to member governments and private agencies both for rehabilitation and productive enterprise. Without some arrangements of this kind there will be stagnation in many parts of the world and this would be a great misfortune to regions like our own which produce exportable crops and are consequently interested to such a vital extent in world trade.

This is a subject upon which I would welcome advice and counsel by those of you who are in a position to study the details, and I will be grateful for your help as we undertake to develop a sound policy.

Our committee is also considering post-war legislation dealing with the disposition of surplus property and will have responsibility for many phases of the public works program.

I wish that I had been able to give preparation for this appearance before you, the time it merited. This is a first draft of remarks that I should have liked to go over more than once. But I am sure you will be as considerate of me here as you have been in Washington.

The attitude of your organization has been a source of extreme satisfaction to me. Your approach at all times has been reasonable and sympathetic. Yours has been a good example for business to follow. I have implicit trust in your intentions and your judgment, and hope that I have given you cause to believe in my sincerity of purpose.

Resolution of Holy Trinity Parish and the Association of American Polish Organizations of Hatfield, Mass.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. CLASON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago many Members of the House were privileged to pay tribute to the great Polish Nation by appropriate remarks on the floor of this Chamber on the occasion of the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the Polish Constitution, adopted on May 3, 1791.

At that time I called the attention of the Congress to the contributions which men and women of Polish extraction, in the Nation in general and in my district in particular, have made to the cultural, industrial, and agricultural progress of the United States, and to the heroic sacrifices which Poland's sons have made in the cause of liberty through service in the armed forces of the United States in all our wars.

In the lovely little town of Hatfield, Mass., rich in the traditions of the struggles of the first settlers of Massachusetts to found a new nation dedicated to liberty and freedom, many families of Polish extraction now live. They are honest, God-fearing, and industrious, and filled with a consuming love of America, a devotion which is characteristic of their people. They are, in fact, typical of the fine Americans of Polish descent everywhere in the United States.

I commend, therefore, to the Members of Congress the following resolution, adopted by the members of Holy Trinity Parish and the Association of American Polish Organizations at Hatfield, Mass., at their meeting on May 14. Let those who are charged with the negotiation of the peace which will follow this war be mindful of the sentiments expressed in this resolution, so that Poland, first to resist the Nazi tyrant in this war, may once again take its place among the nations of the world as a free and independent country.

Whereas 180 of our men and women are serving our country in the armed forces in the greatest conflict in all history; and

Whereas we at home are contributors to a full measure by the purchase of War bonds and unbridled production, both agricultural and industrial; and

Whereas this war is being waged to establish justice and economic survival for all peoples; and

Whereas Poland has stood first and always against the forces of tyranny; and

Whereas Poland stands today as the key to the future organization of the world: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we Americans of Polish ancestry, representing the Holy Trinity Parish and the Association of American Polish Organizations of Hatfield, Mass, assembled in Memorial Town Hall this 14th day of May 1944, to pay tribute to mothers and to commemorate the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of the constitution of May 3, 1791, unanimously and whole-heartedly pledge ourselves to greater efforts in order to assure a speedy victory for our beloved country, the United States of America, and our allies; and further, be it

Resolved, That we endorse the fulfillment of the principles of the Atlantic Charter; and further be it

Resolved, That we stand without reserve with the Polish Government in London, and further be it

Resolved, That we sincerely implore our representatives in Government and our fellow Americans to give full consideration to Poland's stand in this war and take action to insure its sovereignty, thereby assuring a world based on democratic principles in which peace will reign and all peoples will know the true meaning of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and further be it

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to our Congressmen, our Senators, and to the Secretary of State.

A Refutation of Charges in the Butler Report as to Our Expenditures in Latin America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. RICHARDS

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, the so-called Butler report, which was published in the Reader's Digest some time ago, and which has on numerous occasions been refuted as being inaccurate and incorrect, still continues to be used and quoted from.

Illustrative of this the East Texas Chamber of Commerce Tax Letter for March 21, 1944, quotes various excerpts from Senator HUGH BUTLER'S irresponsible and inaccurate article which appeared in the Reader's Digest for December 1943, under the sensational title of Our Deep Dark Secrets in Latin America. The Tax Letter also refers to the equally inaccurate second and third Butler reports, which appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but summarily dismisses the investigation made by the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

The Reader's Digest article captures attention by opening with the fantastic statement that:

Our good-neighbor policy—backed by 6,000,000,000 United States dollars—has widely become a hemispheric hand-out that is neither good nor neighborly.

The most simple and direct answer is that there is not one word of truth in that statement. Following its publication the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee immediately obtained reports from all branches of the Government operating in Latin America on their actual expenditures, which showed that Senator BUTLER'S absurd guess of $6,000,000,000 was 95 percent wrong. The word "guess" is used advisedly. It was not until after the Digest article appeared that Senator BUTLER wrote to the various affected agencies requesting information on their expenditures. Although that very information was supplied to the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Senator MCKELLAR, and the reports appear at pages 10572–10575, 10579–10594 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 13, 1943, Senator BUTLER nevertheless brushed the facts aside and 1 month later brought forth a supplemental report. This latest report differed from the prior ones in some details, but preserved the techniques of lumping unrelated items, repeating the same items several times, and using wholly inconclusive and unreliable sources in an effort to arrive at the original $6,000,000,000. It was topped off by the famous phoney "accountant's certification," which should not have fooled an average grade-school pupil. Translated into simple English that certification does little more than say that the 115 items selected and supplied by Senator BUTLER in fact add up to the total set forth in the report. A spokesman for the accounting firm admitted that no effort had been made to verify the accuracy of Senator BUTLER's items.

Before concluding these introductory remarks, attention is called to Senator BUTLER's statement on the floor of the Senate on February 2, 1944, that—

> I have said repeatedly that as to the bulk of the expenditures no criticism could be made. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1072.)

That from the man who launched the "malevolent fantasy"—to use the words of a prominent Habana newspaper—that our wartime expenditures in Latin America had widely become a hemispheric handout and boondoggle running into "six thousand million United States dollars."

A few examples selected at random from the Butler report of November 26, 1943, should suffice to demonstrate its wholly irresponsible, sensational, and inaccurate character.

First. Lend-lease is listed in the report at $800,000,000. This item is padded by Senator BUTLER by nearly $720,000,000. The facts are that the value of military supplies or supplies with a military end use—the only lend-lease shipments to Latin America—aggregated $93,646,000 for 1941, 1942, and 1943. Contrary to all other lend-lease agreements those with Latin American countries by their terms require certain partial cash payments for aid supplied. During the same period we received $6,193,000, and no country is in default on its agreement.

Moreover, this aid, which was and still is vital to the defense of the Panama Canal and essential sources of raw materials, is untruthfully made to appear as a gift by Senator BUTLER. In fact, in the text of the report he states that the United States Government "made a present of 12 subchasers to the Cuban Government." The facts, as reported by the Navy Department, are:

> These vessels were sent as a loan, not a gift. * * * These vessels have been actively engaged in patrolling and escorting convoys under the general direction of United States naval officers. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for December 13, 1943, at p. 10587.)

The report lists the same figure of $146,345,970 twice as alleged expenditures under the Sugar Act of 1937, making a total of $292,691,940. Entirely apart from the duplication, the Senator is 100 percent wrong in this connection. The fact is that not one cent is or can be spent in Latin America under the Sugar Act. See Seventh United States Code 1137; CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 13, 1943, at pages 10593–10594.

Third. The report lists Export-Import Bank loans for an alleged 3-year period at over $800,000,000. The Senator's padding here runs to over $700,000,000. The facts are that as of November 30, 1943, the total amount outstanding on all loans made in connection with Latin America since the creation of the bank in 1934 was $104,898,571 15, no part of which was in default. The report further makes no reference to repayments on loans to that date amounting to $107,284,391.37 nor to the fact that the bank has realized net earnings of $30,000,000. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 13, 1943, at page 10581. In short, far from being a "boondoggle," the bank is a successful banking institution showing net earnings.

Fourth. The report lists expenditures in Puerto Rico and the Panama Canal Zone aggregating some $136,968,169. Every cent of this is padding, since these are United States territory and no more a part of Latin America than the State of Texas is.

Fifth. The report lists expenditures of $881,755,711 in connection with purchases of sugar from Cuba. Over $840,000,000 of this is padding; $289,755,711 is duplication, and the balance has been or will be recovered when the sugar is sold to domestic refiners. By having the Government act as a broker and centralizing all foreign purchases, the price of sugar to housewives has been held down to an average of 6.8 cents per pound during this war, whereas it ranged from 9.3 cents in 1917 to 19.4 cents in 1920 as a result of the lack of control during World War No. 1 The only expense entailed in bringing about this favorable situation arises out of the Government absorbing a part of the increased transportation costs. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 13, 1943, at pages 10576, 10593–10594.

Five items alone out of a total of over 80 in the "recapitulation" to the Butler November 26, 1943, report show padding of over two and a half billion dollars. Can anyone take the report seriously in the face of such a showing?

One or two general comments, apart from the padding pointed out above, may be helpful.

First. The report is basically misleading in attempting to lump outright expenditures with items such as loans, lend-lease, purchases of strategic materials and other items upon which the Government is getting or will get a cash return.

Second. The report severely criticizes amounts spent for health and sanitation work essential to protect our own troops against malaria and other tropical diseases. Apparently the Senator has forgotten what happened on Bataan, and also that while the danger to the Canal is not as imminent as it was right after Pearl Harbor, it is still necessary for us to maintain these advanced bases.

Third. The report goes out of its way to insult friendly powers who have welcomed and quartered our troops on their soil, opened their ports to our transports and warships, devoted their energies and resources to making up the sources of supply we and the United Nations lost to the Axis in 1942, made land available without cost for bases and airports essential to us, cooperated in defending the Panama Canal and guarding convoys, broken up rings of Axis spies and saboteurs, closed up businesses important to their economy, and either declared war on or severed relations with the Axis. We should never forget for one minute that when most of these countries acted right after Pearl Harbor they were not climbing on any bandwagon, but were honoring prior international commitments to us at a time when our cause was anything but bright.

On December 13, 1943, after obtaining factual reports from the agencies accused of boondoggling by Senator BUTLER, the truth was brought out on the Senate floor by Senator MCKELLAR. Those reports showed total over-all disbursements for 1941, 1942, and 1943 in the amount of $1,426,822,000, of which $1,102,637,000 represented the cost of strategic and critical materials essential to our conduct of the war. Of the balance of $324,185,000 over $93,000,000 represents lend-lease transfers for a portion of which we will be repaid in cash, $158,000,000 represents essential military and naval expenditures, and over $7,000,000 represents the cost of health and sanitation work mainly around airports and bases to protect the lives and safety of our own troops.

These reports showed clearly that there was nothing deep, dark, or secret about our expenditures in Latin America, and moreover that the true amount was about 5 percent of Senator BUTLER's guess.

Thereafter, with the facts of record, Senator BUTLER willfully disregarded them and wrote a new report in which he says he was talking about a different 3-year period, 1942, 1943, and 1944—the tax letter referred to at the outset comments on the fact that what 3 years were involved was not clear until this latest Butler report—introduces a revised set of items in an attempt to justify his original guess of $6,000,000,000, and tops it all off with an illusory and meaningless "accountant's certification."

What 3 years are to be taken is not vitally important since that was covered in the agency reports placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Senator MCKELLAR on December 13, 1943. It is there stated on page 10571:

> It is estimated that the total expenditures and cash loans for the fiscal year 1944 will approximate $1,000,000,000 primarily for strategic materials, and subsequent expenditures under existing and possible future agreements are dependent upon the progress and duration of the war.

We will receive value in the form of these urgently needed strategic materials, which hardly puts such expenditures in the "hemisphere hand-out" category.

Turning to this trick accountant's certification, it reads:

> We hereby certify that the source material referred to in these lists (Senator BUTLER's figures) has been examined by us and that the amounts are correct according to the source information.

In short, the figures in Senator BUTLER's lists have been correctly transcribed from Senator BUTLER's sources. A spokesman for the accounting firm admitted under questioning that the sources had not been checked, that the firm had not dug out the figures and that no attempt whatever had been made to check Senator BUTLER's figures against the agency reports given to Senator MCKELLAR.

This certification is, therefore, utterly worthless and a palpable hoax if intended to lead anyone to believe that Government records of expenditures had been audited by these accountants. That apparently is exactly what Senator BUTLER intended.

We are, therefore, left with the question of the authenticity of Senator BUTLER's source material. This includes Budget requests, appropriation bills, committee hearings, news releases, annual reports, letters, corporation financial statements, magazine articles, and in one or two instances the reports of actual expenditures which Senator MCKELLAR had placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Senator BUTLER's sources lead to an enormous amount of duplication and repetition of the same figure to be added up in order to arrive at the total of the certified report. For example, three items for the naval station at Guantanamo, Cuba, are repeated twice, once in a reference to the budget request to Congress for an appropriation, and again in identical form in a reference to the appropriation act, neither of which are expenditures but steps which must be taken before the money is even available for expenditure. As though this duplication were not enough, the Senator includes again in total expenditures of the Navy the amounts actually spent from the appropriation. Again he quotes from a news release an expenditure of a corporation created by the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, then quotes the total capitalization of the corporation from a report required to be filed with the Treasury Department, and includes the original expenditure a third time in total expenditures of the Coordinator's Office. In connection with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, he quotes an over-all total amount for the Corporation and its subsidiaries from one letter, then quotes again from another letter individual items for subsidiaries already included in the over-all total, and repeats another three individual items already included in over-all total which items appear in an annual report.

Under such a system the same figure can be included as many times as it appears in print or in writing, and still an accountant could certify the laws, reports, news stories, letters, and so forth, in which it appears actually to exist and have been correctly quoted, which was all the accountant certified in this case. The total could just as well have been run up to twenty-five or fifty billion dollars under such a system, but all that the Senator apparently wanted was to get it up to his original guess.

Nor is this repeated petition of the same figure the only flaw. Large sums spent for military and naval bases located in British Colonies near the Panama Canal which have nothing to do with Latin America have been thrown in to swell the total. Also, although the report purports to cover a 3-year period, the Export-Import Bank figure covers nearly 10 years and then is incorrectly quoted in that it fails to take any account of loans repaid and includes loans authorized but later canceled before any money was ever lent.

Perhaps the most fantastic item of all is one of some $12,500,000 taken from the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Far from being an expenditure, this item is a cash payment to the United States, a receipt.

It would serve no useful purpose to cite further errors. What has been said is more than ample to show that this so-called "certified report" is really worse than the original one it was designed to bolster—worse because the true facts had already been made a matter of public record and were willfully ignored, and worse because of the use of a phoney certification to mislead the public.

Before concluding, brief reference will be made to one or two matters in the East Texas Chamber of Commerce tax letter.

First. It quotes Senator BUTLER as saying "In the Dominican Republic the prevailing wage—for common labor—is 70 cents a day. We pay the Dominican $3 to $5 a day." Just who the "we" refers to is not clear, but there have been three types of projects in the Dominican Republic: (a) Health and sanitation work near the airport and where our troops are stationed, (b) a short section of highway to transport vital freight overland when the waters were jammed with Axis submarines, and (c) airport construction as a part of the route by which planes were ferried to Africa, European, and Asiatic theaters of war. The best evidence is that the prevailing wage was paid on the first two, and the Engineer Corps of the Army has informally reported that whereas the prevailing wage for unskilled labor was 8 cents an hour it was necessary to pay 9 cents an hour to get the labor to rush this work to completion. The differential is thus 10 cents a day for a 10-hour day. For skilled labor, to which Senator BUTLER did not refer, the average differential was 50 cents a day for a 10-hour day.

Second. The tax letter quotes a statement that "we paid for a fish survey in the ocean adjacent to Panama." Following Pearl Harbor thousands of our troops were sent into the Caribbean area, and at the same time ocean-borne food supplies on which the region was dependent were cut off by the submarine war. It was necessary to find ways to feed the people, and offshore fishing was apparently one excellent way of providing animal proteins. To test this the survey was necessary, and its cost for the entire Caribbean area—not just Panama—was approximately one-millionth part of Senator BUTLER's $6,000,000,000 "guess."

Third. The tax letter also refers to a Honduran road project "designed to tide a banana-growing area over an unemployment crisis." This is a dangerous and misleading half-truth. Following the curtailment of banana exports due to lack of shipping, thousands of Hondurans were thrown out of work and Axis agents got busier than ever trying to foment political unrest in this area practically next door to the Panama Canal. At the urgent request of the American Embassy work on a badly needed link of road essential to communication between the Caribbean and the Pacific was undertaken.

Fourth. The broad general conclusions of Senator BUTLER quoted in the tax letter as "facts" do not stand up when compared with the actual facts reported by the State, War, and Navy Departments and other agencies, which appear at pages 10579–10594 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 13, 1943.

Fifth. The remarks of Charles Beard on our "irresponsible government" quoted in the tax letter show a total lack of comprehension. Within the remarkably short space of 3 weeks of Senator BUTLER's charge a complete record of expenditures by many branches of the Government in an area many times larger than the United States, parts of which are 5,000 and 6,000 miles away, was made available and made a matter of public record on the floor of the United States Senate. This job had to be fitted in with vital war work. That Senator BUTLER chose to disregard and ignore these facts is no reason to assail either the legislative or the executive branch of the Government.

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Memorial Day address delivered by me at Veterans' Home, Rocky Hill, Conn.:

> It was with a great deal of pleasure that I accepted Colonel Gates' invitation to participate in your observance of Memorial Day. What more fitting spot could be found to commemorate the services of generations of brave American men and women who have served in all of the wars in which the United States has engaged.
> Through the corridors of this home have walked veterans of the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, World War No. 1, and men now serving in the present war. The beautiful buildings and grounds that make up this home stand as a memorial to the sons and daughters of Connecticut who served their country in time of war, and they stand as a symbol of Connecticut's determination that no Connecticut veteran shall ever want.

Sunday afternoon I sat down to try to decide just what kind of a message I could bring to you today. Memorial Day is a day very dear to the hearts of all veterans, men and women. It won't mean as much to those who are now serving in our Army and Navy as it does to the veterans of the Spanish-American War and World War No. 1 but, as each year comes and goes, Memorial Day will mean more to each of you. It will mean more and more to you each year as your list of comrades who have passed on to their reward grows longer.

Undoubtedly every person in this hall has on previous Memorial Days heard the services of the men of 1861 to 1865, of 1898 to 1900, of 1917 and 1918 extolled as they should be. There is little I could add to the tributes that have been said year after year on each May 30. Stories of the valor displayed at Gettysburg, at Manila, at Belleau Woods, and in the Argonne, and it is fitting that these brave deeds should be recalled and related year after year. However, this Memorial Day when we find ourselves in the midst of the most terrible war in all history, it seems to me appropriate that as a part of this year's observance of Memorial Day, thought should be given the tremendous problems that must some day, and I hope soon, be faced by the more than 10,000,000 men and women now serving on the far-flung battle fronts all over the world.

Two weeks ago I was hopeful that today I might be able to tell you the details of the Federal Government's plan for the rehabilitation of the veterans of this war. Many of the provisions of this over-all plan are to be found in the so-called G. I. bill of rights recently passed unanimously by both the House and Senate. There are some differences in the bills as approved by the Senate and House. These differences are now being ironed out by a committee of conferees composed of Senators and Representatives, and I am sure this legislation will soon be ready for the President's signature.

Before discussing the details of the G. I. bill I would prefer to tell you something about laws now on our statute books providing benefits for those who have been or who will be disabled during this war. All agree that the care of the disabled, the widows, and orphans comes first. Perhaps I can best express it by telling you that with one or two minor exceptions the veterans of this war who suffer disability in line of duty are and will be entitled to every benefit from the Federal Government that has been granted to the disabled of World War No. 1. These benefits include hospitalization, compensation, and vocational training.

In addition to provisions for the disabled, Congress recently provided mustering-out pay for all service men and women. This mustering-out pay amounts to from one to three hundred dollars. Some citizens, as well as some Members of Congress, felt these amounts were too small. If this was all our Government intended to do for its veterans, they would be too small. It is my considered judgment that this mustering-out pay will save the taxpayers millions of dollars over a period of years. I was determined that if I could prevent it, no soldier or sailor would be discharged without money enough in his pocket to buy needed civilian clothes and have enough left to permit him to relax for at least a few weeks.

In 1919 men were discharged with hardly enough money to buy the necessary civilian clothing they needed. The result was that many were forced to go to work, if they could find work, the same week they were discharged. That was true if they intended to eat the next week. Such a short-sighted policy cost the Treasury millions of dollars. Thousands of men broke down nervously and physically who would not have collapsed if they could have had a reasonable time to make the necessary adjustments between civilian and military life. Except for those who have gone through the experience, few can realize what an adjustment must be made when the serviceman returns home. The human body, the human mind, our nervous systems were never intended to withstand the terrific strain of modern warfare. The effects of jungle fighting remain to be seen. Compared to Bougainville and Guadalcanal, Belleau Woods was a city park. Compared to a P-38 the Spad was a slow freight. If a man comes to the surface suddenly from the depth of the ocean, he dies. A human body just can't come from the hell of modern war to the quiet of Main Street without feeling the effects of the change. Mustering-out pay will permit a little time in which to make the necessary adjustments.

Now for the G. I. bill of rights. First of all title I provides for the building of all needed hospitals; it further provides that no disabled man shall be discharged to the Veterans' Administration until his Army or Navy records are all correct and complete.

Title I also provides something that we should have had years ago, an agency or commission empowered to correct mistakes made in issuing discharges from the Army or Navy. Too many veterans have been given discharges other than honorable who should have had honorable discharges. This new commission can correct the discharges issued to peacetime veterans, veterans of World War No. 1 as well as from the present war. Title I further provides that all those whose formal education was interrupted will be given a chance to go back to school and finish their course. If they were graduated from a medical school, a dental school, or a law school, they can take a 1 year refresher course and thus prepare for the examination they must take in order to practice their profession. All veterans will be entitled to a 1-year court of vocational training or schooling they may desire to take. If they do satisfactory work they may continue up to 4 years, 1 year for each year in the service. While taking such training a single veteran shall receive in addition to all tuition, books, supplies, etc., $50 a month. If he or she has a dependent the allowance will be $75 per month.

Title 3 provides loans for veterans up to $2,500 for the purchase of homes, farms, farm equipment, and small business property.

Title 4 sets forth the intent of Congress that there shall be an effective job counseling and employment placement service for veterans.

Title 5 provides what amounts to unemployment compensation in the amount of $20 per week for 26 weeks. The Senate version provided these payments for 52 weeks, or 1 full year. It was felt in the House, however, that Congress would be in session during the 6 months following the war's end, and if conditions indicated the need of extending these payments, it could be done very quickly.

Title 6 provides improved administrative procedures to speed up adjudication of veterans claims.

There may be some changes in the legislation before it becomes law, but it will pretty much follow the outline I have given you.

A great deal has been said about the cost of this legislation. No one knows what it will cost. It may be six billion, it may be sixteen billion. Whatever the cost, it will be money well spent if the law is well administered, as I am sure it will be. The American people will insist on good administration of veterans' legislation. In all probability there will be 15,000,000 ex-service men and women by the time this war ends. If that be true, it is well to bear in mind that every time Congress approves a payment of $100 per veteran it will mean one and a half billion dollars added to our national debt. The cost of the G. I. bill depends on the conditions that exist in the United States following the war.

The returning soldier and sailor will not be satisfied with unemployment compensation. They will not be satisfied with vocational training unless there are to be jobs for them when they complete their training. As a matter of fact, all the post-war planning we do, all of the bills Congress passes that involve huge sums of money, are going to have a very real bearing on the final cost of the G. I. bill in that they will affect our future economy.

I have corresponded with a large number of servicemen during the past 15 months. I have corresponded with fathers and mothers of men who have died in action, with others whose sons or husbands are in enemy prison camps or perhaps missing in action. I think I know what these men and women are looking forward to when at last the war ends. They want a sound economy. They want to return to all the freedom guaranteed us in our Constitution and Bill of Rights. They want jobs at a decent wage. They want an opportunity to provide an education for their children. Most important of all they want to live in a world over which the threat of future wars has been greatly, yes very greatly, reduced.

Some day, God willing, I hope some day soon, there is going to be another armistice day. When that day comes I am sure the fighting men of this war will react about the same as the fighting men of 1918. Oh how well I remember November 11, 1918. What a day it was. What a night of celebration with each one celebrating according to his own desires. We had won the war that was to end all wars. The world was safe for democracy. But the next day it was different. By the evening of November 12 we were practically all thinking of the same thing. When were we going home? What did the future hold for us individually? In my squadron were represented just about every economic level from nothing to a million but each of us was thinking of home and a job; either the job we left or another that we hoped would be just as good. The less said about the heartaches and disappointments that followed, the better, but history must not be allowed to repeat itself.

The returning serviceman must have a job and every time the present Congress passes a bill, whether it be legislation or a tax bill, Congress must ask itself what effect this will have on our economy. Will it lessen or increase the likelihood of the returning serviceman's finding a job and security?

I that post-war era we are going to need unity just as much as we need it today. In addition to international unity which I hope to have time to touch on in a few minutes, we are going to want domestic unity. If there is to be unity of purpose here in the United States when our soldiers and sailors come home we, on the home front, must so conduct ourselves during the war that our actions will merit the approval of the returning veteran.

As has so often been said, this is a war of production. The industries and farms of America have produced the food and the materials of war in greater quantities and qualities than many of us ever thought possible. Both management and labor have done a marvelous job, yes, almost a miraculous job. Unhappily there have been a few minor exceptions. There have been a few glaring exceptions. There have been a few who have willfully profited unreasonably from our war effort. A few who for blood money have been willing to sell defective equipment to our Army and Navy. Some are now serving time in a traitor's cell. Others will follow them. There have been some who have walked away from their benches, some who have been willing to leave their own sons and brothers without planes to fly or without ammunition to fire. The American people, yes the American Congress, have been lenient with those who have quit their important and vital jobs in war industries, in an effort to get more money for their labor. I am sure that the patience of an overwhelming majority of our citizens has come to an end. I think that your Congress is about ready to deal harshly with those who from now on quit their jobs and go on strike. We face the greatest military operation in all history, the invasion of Europe. Until this war is brought to its victorious conclusion there must not be, there cannot be any further stoppages in our war industries. We all know the penalty for running away from the battle front. There must be penalties for refusing to produce the material needed at the fighting front. Ninety-nine percent of those who labor in our war industries will approve of severe penalties. The 1 percent or less who object must be ignored. If there is to be domestic unity following the war all interruption in our wartime production must stop. Now just a few minutes to consider post-war international unity.

I was one of those who thought in 1919 that a league of nations could be made to work. Perhaps if we had been insistent enough the details could have been worked out to the satisfaction of all. That is all history today but we must soon make some very important decisions here in the United States. Our decisions are going to have a far-reaching effect on the future of this civilization.

A Member of the House, Congressman JUDD, of Minnesota, recently suggested that we are at the crossroads. There are four main paths before us, each being advocated by some as the way to security and peace.

The first way, of course, is to try to go back to isolationism. That has been tried and proven a failure. The separation by oceans is gone. The airplane has destroyed distances.

The second possible path is American imperialism. Some say we can't escape the world; we must run it. We must get control of the key air bases, the strategic islands, the main arteries of trade. We must build up such a huge Army, Navy, and air force that no group of nations will dare oppose us. Can we continue to spend $20,000,000,000 a year on our Army, Navy, and air force after this war? Maintaining American imperialism will not be easy. After all we are a nation of only 130,000,000 people. Remember there are 200,000,000 Russians, 450,000,000 Chinese, and they are aflame with the desire to be free. There are 375,000,000 awakening in India. There are 150,000,000 in South America, restless and uneasy. And some say America with 130,000,000 people should rule the world. That certainly is not the path to peace and security.

The third path is that urged by those who say if we can't escape the world, if we can't rule the world, maybe we can buy the world. We are to feed, clothe, and provide shelter for all the peoples of the world. Then surely, say some, the world will love us and we will be secure.

Well if we can't escape the world, if we can't rule the world, if we can't buy the world, what is there left for us to do? It seems reasonable to think we can cooperate with other nations of the world.

This is the path that appeals to me—an Association of Nations determined to live peacably with each other plus the creation of a World Court to pass on questions of international law.

We all know the answer to the question, What price war? We go to war and we give unselfishly of all we hold dear—our material wealth and the lives of our loved ones.

The people of the United States must now decide what price peace? What sacrifice are we willing to make for peace and security? The answer must be found and made soon. Let us hope and pray that by next Memorial Day the correct answer will be found and we will be going down the path toward peace and a happy, contented future. Only by so doing can we say, "Those honored dead whose memories we revere today have not died in vain."

Education of District of Columbia Children of Deceased Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. ABERNETHY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the national legislative committee of the American Legion and the Department of the District of Columbia of the American Legion, I am today introducing a bill which will amend Public Law 435 of the Seventy-third Congress. This bill will extend and give to the District of Columbia children of deceased veterans the same educational opportunities they would enjoy if they resided in certain States of the Nation.

Gen. P. C. Harris, director of the committee on education of orphan veterans, has prepared an explanatory statement on this bill and I ask unanimous consent to insert the same in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. His statement is as follows:

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT

A BILL TO AMEND THE ACT OF JUNE 19, 1934 (PUB. LAW 435, 73D CONG.)

The Act of June 19, 1934, authorizes the appropriation of $3,600 annually for the fiscal years 1935 to 1943, inclusive, from funds to the credit of the District of Columbia, for aid in the education of children (between the ages of 16 and 21, who have had their domicile in the District of Columbia for at least 5 years) of those who lost their lives during the World War. The act provides that not more than $200 shall be available for any one child in any 1 year.

The act of June 19, 1934, is substantially the same as the acts, generally known as war orphan scholarship acts, of 37 of the States, which were passed in response to appeals of the American Legion and in furtherance of a well-rounded program to provide educational opportunities for the sons and daughters of those who sacrificed their lives for the country during the World War.

Realizing that the children of those who were killed or died during the World War, would soon be too old to be eligible for the State scholarships, the American Legion in national convention at Cleveland in 1935, at Chicago in 1939, and at Boston in 1940, adopted resolutions requesting the legislatures of the State to extend the provisions of their war orphan scholarship acts to the children of those who have died since the World War of war service-connected disabilities.

Nineteen of the States—California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Vermont, Virginia, and West Virginia—have to date amended their scholarship acts as requested in the American Legion convention resolutions, and others will no doubt fall in line when their legislatures meet again. The scholarship acts of 14 of these States—California, Connecticut, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, New York, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Vermont, and West Virginia—were last year further amended so as to include orphans of veterans of the present war.

This bill extends the provisions of the act of June 19, 1934, to the children of veterans who have died since World War No. 1 of war service-connected disabilities and to orphans of the present war. It thus gives to the District of Columbia children of deceased veterans the same educational opportunities they would enjoy if they resided in one of the States named above or in any other State that may hereafter similarly liberalize its war orphans scholarship act.

MAY 1944.

In Memory of Vincent F. Harrington

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the annual memorial exercises of the House of Representatives held on yesterday, I rise today to pay my tribute of honor and respect to the late VINCENT F. HARRINGTON, of Iowa. After several years of service in this House he resigned from the Seventy-seventh Congress to enter the service of his country and was a major in the Army Air Corps when he died in England last November. Though his name is not listed among those of the Seventy-eighth Congress whose memory we honor on this occasion, it is only fitting and proper that we refer to his passing at this time.

It was my privilege to know VINCE HARRINGTON well. No man in these Halls was more devoted to his constituency. He was a man with many sterling qualifications and a man of the highest integrity. The respect and esteem which he deserved and enjoyed from his colleagues might well be the envy of any Member of the House. It was his general friendship and sincerity of purpose that won VINCE HARRINGTON his wide host of close friends in Congress.

He added much to a needed balance between liberals and conservatives and always cast his vote without fear or favor and in accordance with his convictions. He had his country at heart and the people of the State of Iowa and of his own congressional district quickly learned that he was a stanch and loyal friend in whom they could repose every confidence. In the untimely death of VINCENT F. HARRINGTON the State of Iowa has lost one of its finest citizens. All those who remember him will have cause to be grateful for having known such a wholesome American.

REMARKS

OF

HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I brought to the attention of the Members in a general way, the extremely serious and fraudulent operations uncovered in the Cleveland offices of Office of Price Administration and Office of Defense Transportation wherein coupons for huge quantities of gasoline, food, and other rationed items were fraudulently being issued and placed on the black market. The inability of the enforcement agency of the Office of Price Administration, and the lack of any enforcement branch within the Office of Defense Transportation, have been recognized by the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Defense Transportation, who have made requests to Mr. Biddle and Mr. Hoover to have the Federal Bureau of Investigation enter the case and conduct a thorough and complete investigation.

At least two indications that the investigative staff of the Office of Price Administration is not competent to conduct an investigation of such breadth and scope, are that after coupons for 538,000 gallons of gasoline were found to be illegally issued, the Office of Price Administration did not broadcast serial numbers of the coupons until a month after the detection of the fraud. Also the investigative force of the Office of Price Administration is not well trained, as is pointed out in yesterday's article in the Cleveland Press, which I am inserting in the RECORD.

The successful prosecution of the war, and the maintenance of high standard of morale on the home front is of such great magnitude and importance that any formal policy of any agency not investigating another, which does not obtain with reference to the Office of Defense Transportation, should be dispensed with.

I have today introduced a bill to provide for the investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of black-market operations in the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Defense Transportation in Cleveland, Ohio. The Department of Justice has so far refused to step into this entire situation, and I trust that the Members of Congress, zealous for the protection of members of the armed forces and those on the home front, will speedily enact this bill into law.

[From the Cleveland Press of May 26, 1944]

QUIT THIS BUCK PASSING—CLEAN UP THOSE GAS FRAUDS NOW

Most people are honest. Most people are patient. Most people understand that in war they can't have all they get in peace. Most people know the armed forces come first and what's left is to be rationed fairly among the rest of us.

Most people are patriotic. Most people will neither chisel nor cheat. Most people sacrifice and work. Most people respect the law and their country's emergency.

But, by the same token, most people—and among them count us—are sick, tired, and disgusted with the disgraceful negligence, ineptitude, indifference, buck-passing, and inertia which characterize this whole O. P. A. mess of graft and corruption stemming from downtown board No. 6 and which, we are convinced, involves a lot of others in this O. P. A.-O. D. T. set-up.

From the very start, the Press has vigorously supported O. P. A., recognizing the soundness of even-handed treatment of all citizens in time of limited supply. The Press has urged the people to respect it, uphold it, live under it. It does so today, because a system is not proved unsound by the dishonesty of some individuals.

Right now, however, this newspaper, in common with the vast majority of greater Clevelanders, is boiling about this whole O. P. A. mess, and boiling in particular over the lazy, stupid, inexcusable exhibition of intended or unintentional cover-up.

The O. P. A. is fast on its feet when some individual receives more gas than entitled, buys black market coupons, or when a station attendant dishes out gasoline he shouldn't.

Well, what's the matter now, with a real scandal on its hands—one involving not hundreds or thousands of gallons, but perhaps millions of gallons?

O. P. A. officials knew this for 6 weeks or more. Nothing happened. Not even closing of the board. Not until Police Inspector Frank Story, assisting them, arrested the board's chief clerk for theft did they move.

Why did O. P. A. move so slowly in this case, so speedily at other times—so speedily after the little fellow, so slowly after the big grafters?

Now, at this late date, Regional Director Birkett Williams is asking action. Both he and the public know O. P. A. enforcement officers are not trained detectives. The public wouldn't, and shouldn't, be satisfied with an O. P. A. investigation of itself.

O. P. A.'s supreme command at Washington, Chester Bowles, is asked help. He sends one man. This man probably is not much better qualified to do this job than the young attorneys and ex-businessmen in O. P. A. here.

In the last analysis, the crimes must finally be prosecuted by United States District Attorney Don Miller. His office has no detectives. It relies on other departments. It would expect in this case to get F. B. I.'s help.

But F. B. I. says "No." It won't act. Out of its jurisdiction, it says. Rationing, says F. B. I., is O. P. A. enforcement division's responsibility. F. B. I. ignores the fact that the people already arrested are not accused of rationing but of theft—of Federal property—a crime normally within F. B. I. jurisdiction.

As United States Attorney General, Francis Biddle, is F. B. I.'s head. He has not reversed F. B. I.'s stay-out attitude. Maybe he hasn't been asked.

But Mr. Biddle has been sounding off lately about his unlimited powers. We think Mr. Biddle has powers to order F. B. I. to find out whether two Government agencies are full of graft and corruption. Surely, this is not too much from a man who has been saying, "In time of war I can do anything."

F. B. I. might not want this job because it's tough, because it would be starting late, because all kinds of people have been trampling over and around it, because, figuratively, it is all messed up with irrelevant footprints and fingerprints. The criminals are being given time to destroy records and agree on lies.

Sure it's a tough case. That's why the best trained, most experienced, most disinterested corps of United States investigators should get on it.

Mayor Lausche has asked F. B. I. to get into it. District Attorney Miller, too, should bear down on Attorney General Biddle until he orders F. B. I. into it.

Right now the whole mess is where the grafters want it—in a morass of buck passing, twilight jurisdiction, official inertia, of unsightly ducking and dodging.

This newspaper holds no brief for O. P. A., O. D. T., F. B. I., District Attorney Miller, Attorney General Biddle, or anybody else.

What, however, it wants to know is, Who is going to clean up this mess? Who is going to ferret out the higher-ups, the master minds, the tie-up between the O. P. A. and the underworld?

Failure to clean up this mess seriously impairs O. P. A.'s prestige, and belief of people in it. Further, to the extent officials who ought to clean it up are not, it reflects directly upon them.

There is no law for rich and another for poor, no law for big grafter and another for little one—one law for the little fellow who is caught getting away with a couple gallons he wasn't entitled to and another to protect the big guy who gets away, with the help of crooked officials, with millions of gallons. For our part, the press part, we are going to help get this mess cleaned up, with all of the resources at our command, wherever it leads.

But what of these officials, these Government agencies, these people officially charged with the responsibility of protecting the public's interests?

What of them?

[From the Cleveland News of May 19, 1944]

ACTION NOW

The gasoline frauds at ration board 6 have shocked the community.

A greater shock is the lackadaisical attitude of Federal officials faced by the scandal.

There are no excuses good enough to explain why O. P. A., O. D. T., and the United States district attorney have not thrown every ounce of energy into swift and complete investigation.

If Attorney General Biddle eventually is reached decorously through proper channels, the F. B. I. may take over. It may be too late. In the meantime evidence will be disposed of and stories dovetailed.

If local officials were on the job, the F. B. I. would have been in here long since, even if they had to go to Washington and personally light a bonfire under Mr. Biddle.

The handling of this case has been a mess, leaving only two possible conclusions: That Federal agencies here do not want the truth to come out, or that they do not understand the seriousness of the fraud, and the indicated other frauds.

We dismiss the first possibility, because we believe the Federal administrators here are honorable men.

We conclude the second is fact, since nothing else can explain failure to slash away red tape and plunge into action.

If they do not know it, we say to them now that the evidences of cheating, carelessness, racketeering, and politics that appear on the mere surface of the investigation have done damage to community support of rationing that will be difficult to repair.

O. P. A. had better get going, and get going fast, to redeem itself. Detective Inspector Story so far has done all the work and uncovered everything that has been uncovered. The city has him to thank for prompt aggressive action as far as his authority extends—all the action, in fact, that there has been.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer of May 29, 1944]

F. B. I. SHOULD ACCEPT

The Plain Dealer believes with Thomas Emerson, deputy administrator of the Office of Price Administration, that the Federal Bureau of Investigation should make the Cleveland ration scandals its business.

Soon after irregularities at board No. 6 came to light the F. B. I. was invited to investigate them, first by Birkett L. Williams, regional O. P. A. administrator, and subsequently by Mayor Frank J. Lausche. On the representation that the matter was one of personnel and administration, the F. B. I. turned down the requests of Williams and the mayor. The F. B. I. took the position, furthermore, that inasmuch as the O. P. A. has facilities for investigation in its own office, the F. B. I. is without jurisdiction.

To the Plain Dealer Thomas Emerson's answer to the F. B. I.'s representation is a valid one, namely, that the public might be skeptical of the findings of an investigation of the O. P. A. by the O. P. A., and furthermore since the Office of Defense Transportation, which has no investigating facilities, is also involved, the F. B. I. ought to make a complete investigation.

Such an investigation by an authority, in which the public has full confidence, and which has the means at hand for bringing to light all the facts in this case, in our opinion, imperative. In the first instance the facts must be ascertained in order to punish the guilty and to protect the agencies concerned here and throughout the Nation against abuses in the future. But furthermore the facts must be ascertained and revealed because the impression is abroad that some persons in Government circles are afraid of them and of their possible political significance.

Fortunately, this is not true of the O. P. A. From the beginning the regional administrator here has sought by every means at his disposal to get to the bottom of the scandals. There is, however, everything to indicate that he has received full support of the head office of the O. P. A. in Washington and of Chester Bowles, its administrator.

It is clear, of course, to Bowles and his associates that a great deal more is involved in a proper disposition of these Cleveland scandals than the punishment of guilty persons and the plugging of leaks. Because the rationing of scarce commodities touches every family and, in fact, every individual, it must be done in a manner which commands the fullest public confidence if it is to win the public cooperation which is so vital to its success.

It goes without saying as a result of facts which have already come to light with respect to the operations of one Cleveland ration board that the public is skeptical and is saying that the revelations there may be only the beginning.

The Plain Dealer entertains no such opinion. It believes that rationing has been administered on the whole by men and women who are not only implicitly honest but conscientious at the same time, men and women who have sought to conform with the spirit of the regulations. But our point of view will be challenged, and properly so, if any basis in fact can be established for the charge that a superficial investigation would be more pleasing to certain important persons than an F. B. I. investigation which left no stone unturned.

Again we urge the F. B. I. to investigate the local ration scandals.

[From the Cleveland Press of June 1, 1944]

Failure of O. P. A. in tracing the distributors of the ration coupons that poured into the black market from ration board 6, O. D. T., frauds can be attributed to the almost complete lack of experienced investigators on the O. P. A. staff. It is known, however, that most of the sixty-odd investigators in the Cleveland district office were recruited from occupations having little or nothing to do with detection. William Derry, the chief investigator, who hires and instructs the others, was a bond salesman. The staff includes former insurance men, merchants, clerks, and as is the case throughout the O. P. A. organization here, a large sprinkling of automobile salesmen. Men from the automotive industry came into key and minor positions following Birkett L. Williams, regional administrator, and Clinton M. Fiske, district director, both auto dealers.

Congress, the Guardian

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER A. RAMEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial, Congress, the Guardian, which appeared in the May 30, 1944, edition of the Toledo Legal News:

CONGRESS, THE GUARDIAN

We have drifted into strange paths under pressure of war conditions, but basically ours is still a government of laws and not of men. The laws are made by Congress and administered by the executive department. In wartime we found it necessary to delegate certain powers in the interest of speed and flexibility, but there should be no weakening of the basic principle. Congress, representing the people, is still the guardian of all the powers it has delegated.

Veteran Reemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, something new in employment procedure, and this time for our returning service men and women has been set up in Glendale, Calif., by a gentleman who has long made it his hobby to counsel and guide people seeking jobs. He is giving his time and efforts at the present moment to the local selective-service system as reemployment chairman. He is concentrating on developing a simple plan where all people in the community can serve, to some extent, in helping our service men and women as they return home. These boys and girls need a lot of advice and counsel, and particularly do they need to feel the personal interest of the people at home in their welfare. They need to be taken back into the home community family, in order that they may reorient themselves into civilian life.

Mr. C. Vere Standiford, whose regular business is life insurance, has been making a genuine contribution to our returning veterans—and setting an example that might well be followed all over the country.

Following is an article by Mr. C. Vere Standiford, which appeared in Calivada March 1944, published by the California-Nevada District of Kiwanis International:

STANDIFORD'S HOBBY SERVICE

(By C. Vere Standiford, Kiwanis Club of Glendale)

The hobby started 11 years ago with a thought of giving 20 minutes a day for the other fellow without compensation.

Since my business is one that gives me contacts with the heads of business firms and I also contact the employees, I decided to use this 20 minutes a day to secure positions. We had millions of unemployed at that time, so it was a fertile field.

I counseled with the heads of business firms as to what they needed in employees and many times made suggestions of certain men and women whom I thought would be able to pay them a profit if employed, and calls started to come to my office for certain people.

The 20 minutes a day in a very short time drifted into hours per day, and later I set aside 1 day, Tuesday, as hobby day. As time marched on, the demand for people grew and thousands of people needed counsel and guidance to find their proper niche in the business world.

At the present time at least 65 percent of all my time is given to this hobby service. We are in war and we must all serve in our respective fields, and this is one endeavor that is so vital at this time.

We have placed over 8,000 people in this service, and positions range into the higher brackets, for outstanding businessmen need counsel just as do men seeking minor positions.

Our greatest problem and duty at present and in the post-war program is to assist our men in the United States armed services in securing positions and helping them adjust their lives. Counsel is needed more than anything else, and all good Kiwanians should appoint themselves a committee of one to serve in this worthy cause.

My own personal business? Larger than ever, for business firms and individuals direct it to my door.

The following article by James E. Dunne, is from the Insurance Index of April 1944, and concerns Mr. Standiford's work:

A THREE-REWARD HOBBY—IN 11 YEARS C. VERE STANDIFORD, OF GLENDALE, CALIF., HAS PLACED MORE THAN 8,000 PERSONS IN JOBS

(By James E. Dunne)

What happens to a job placement hobby when jobs are very easy to get? Is there some good use to which the hobby still can be put, or must it be laid away in moth balls?

C. Vere Standiford, general agent at Glendale, Calif., for the Midland National Life of Watertown, S. Dak., can answer the question.

About 11 years ago when jobs were on the scarce side, Mr. Standiford originated "Standiford's Hobby Service," whose function was the ferreting out of occupational vacancies and the placing of unemployed people in them.

This unusual pursuit—a free employment agency—eventually brought its designer a good bit of national attention. It also led to like undertakings by others, both in and out of life insurance, in other parts of the country.

To date the box score shows that Standiford's Hobby Service has placed more than 8,000 people in jobs. What had started out as a 20-minutes-a-day proposition, now takes about 65 percent of the service head's time.

An outstanding triumph was the guiding of a young man from Glendale into a $10,000 job.

The returning soldier is perhaps the principal beneficiary of the service's current efforts. Work Finder Standiford regards this activity in behalf of dischaged veterans as highly important. He has been named reemployment chairman of Glendale Draft Board No. 184.

Second on the list is that now prominent little individual, the juvenile. In the hobby service's view, a job for a youngster is an antidote to delinquency. So the service keeps going, performing in a purposeful manner even if idleness virtually has been wiped out by a high rate of wartime employment.

C. Vere Standiford was a stranger in a strange community when he first marketed his patent for the cure of idle hands. Somewhere on the road to Glendale, to which he was driving with his wife to make his stand for the Midland National Life, the thought occurred to him to give "20 minutes a day to the other fellow" without any compensation.

Once established in Glendale and calling in the capacity of general agent on business heads as well as employees, he was not long in settling on what to do with the daily 20 minutes. Knowing something of the problems of both management and workers, he decided that in doing for the other fellow he could best serve both by securing jobs for people.

In setting up shop Mr. Standiford spent considerable time in contacting the bosses at leading business concerns.

REACTIONS OF EMPLOYERS

"It was interesting," the Midland National's general agent recalls, "to see the reaction when I informed the president of some company that I wanted to talk to him about my hobby.

"In most cases, after the first shocks, the bosses seemed to realize that I had contacts with efficient people who perhaps could make him a profit. Many good jobs were created in this way, and I also made personal contacts with good businessmen that brought rewards as the years drifted by."

In the first few years all jobs had to be created, that is, what vacancies existed had to be found personally by the job hobbyist and people on his list put in the way of them. The "20 minutes a day" was short lived. Soon it was running into hours each day. Later Mr. Standiford called Tuesday "my hobby day" and spent the whole day interviewing people and directing them into jobs.

With a war on, Mr. Standiford has personally classified his avocational endeavor as "essential", and he now gives the aforementioned 65 percent of his time to its prosecution.

His hobby has been endorsed by the Kiwanis Club, the chamber of commerce, and the American Legion.

As a draft board reemployment chairman, he inherits soldiers returning to their home communities, mostly on medical discharges. They are not from his board alone, but from all over southern California. Mr. Standiford feels that this is a vital work and ventures the opinion that "everyone should serve to the best of his ability to assist our boys who have given up so much to fight for us."

According to the Standiford experience, it is not a job that is needed at first, but good counsel, as the mustered-out fighting man is frequently in a confused state and requires proper guidance. It is true, he needs a job, "but let it be a job where he has a future, and assist him in all the other things worth while."

Mr. Standiford is prone to urge affiliation with the American Legion, "which can help him," and directs applicants to their churches and proper young people's groups, etc.—"otherwise he may develop into a radical and another one of our problem boys."

On the question of the returning warrior, the father of the hobby service makes an appeal. "If a soldier or any other individual is directed to you for a job, do not give him the 'brush off' if you cannot use him. Take a little of that so-called valuable time to counsel with him and direct him with your card, after you've found out a little about his qualifications, to some man you know that may hire him.

"Call that friend up a little later and tell him what you are doing, and instruct him to direct the applicant to someone else if he can't hire him. This is the chain system, of course, but the fourth party needs him badly, is grateful to receive his services, and all have profited.

"It is just a little system that everybody can put into practice under the Golden Rule."

In exploring the whys and wherefores of hobbies, General Agent Standiford is open to three questions: (1) Is a hobby worth while? (2) What does it accomplish? and (3) What is the reward?

He answers categorically as follows:

"First. I think it is worth while because it helps you to make lifetime friends, and for some reason they all want to direct business your way, so you need have but little fear about your success in business.

"Second. What does it accomplish? We will just take a few illustrations, for I have boys—also men and women—in upper age brackets that have been worth money, but one bad business deal and they find they are broke. So your counsel, proper guidance, and a job put them bask on the upgrade, and they become good citizens and taxpayers. The juvenile situation alone is worth while, for when you let one boy in your community get away from you and start on the crime route he is a first-, second-, and third-time loser, and just from a taxpayer's standpoint it costs $30,000 before that individual lives out his life. Why not put him on the profit side instead of among the liabilities? The money matter is minor, though. Also to be considered are broken homes, disease, heartaches of all kinds left along his trail. Put that boy on a job that he likes, get him with good organizations, and you will have a winner. Just recently I placed a young man from Glendale in a $10,000 job. He is just a youth, but he took advantage of the other route. He has counseled with me for the past 9 years and we still have plans for his future. This is what is accomplished by your effort.

"Third. What is the reward? Through this hobby service in the past 11 years, we have placed more than 8,000 people in jobs. They are under no obligation to us and we make no charge, but our business continues to grow, and, although we give the company—the Midland National Life—our best efforts with the balance of the time, it is gratifying to know that in personal production I have been among the top 10 men in the United States for 11 years, and 6 of them at the top of the list. Reward? Good business, happiness in the knowledge of helping the other fellow—and a world of friends."

Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, a considerable number of our service personnel who are being returned to civil life at this time are suffering various degrees of what we used to call shell shock. These lads need, above all, the careful personal guidance of a sympathetic and understanding man. They need the guidance of one who cannot only assist them in reorienting themselves, but who can also help in making sure that the jobs in which they are first placed will be jobs that are conducive to rehabilitation as well as giving employment. To place a shell-shocked young man abruptly into a job that of itself is in the midst of noise and confusion, might be just the wrong thing to do. The lad himself would likely become confused, distraught, and perhaps exhibit temperament. He will need encouragement and the feeling of fellowship. He might even need to be placed in a sort of transition position first, in order that he might begin to forget the sounds and sights of battle.

I know from my own experience following the last war that boys returning from the battle fronts to civil life have sounds and sights in their minds and hearts that are not easily forgotten. Visions return suddenly to them that they do not like to talk about. In the middle of the night, they will awaken from horrible dreams. In the daytime, sounds or circumstances may recall things they want to forget, but will not forget for years to come, although the nightmare of it all will soften in time.

They will not want to talk about these things—nor will they want to be questioned too closely. They will want to think happy thoughts and experience happy things to help them forget. Pleasant and friendly associations at home and at work, and the feeling that those at home are interested in them and love them, will do more to rehabilitate them than almost anything else.

To those who have offered their lives for our country on land and sea and in the air all over the world, we can do no less than hold them close to our hearts, and help them forget while they reestablish themselves. Mr. C. Vere Standiford is a real friend and a wise counselor to the returning veterans and to all who will help them.

Pilots and Instructors Getting Raw Deal From Army Air Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 18, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the American Aviation Daily, April 1944, and the Aero Digest of March 1944:

[From the American Aviation Daily of April 6, 1944]

INSTRUCTORS PROTEST ASSIGNMENT TO NON-FLYING JOBS

A telegram from 122 instructors in the civilian-contract primary-school program has been sent to the President, the Assistant Secretary of War, Senators, and Congressmen and from California and Nevada with the following message:

"We are among the civilian flying instructors who have trained the greater part of America's combat pilots in United States Army primary-contract flying schools. We have been informed that our services will no longer be needed in the Air Forces after a few weeks due to curtailment of the training of Army pilots.

"The majority of us are members of the Enlisted Reserve, Army of the United States. With our employment as flying instructors terminating we have been told that we will be placed on active duty as nonflying enlisted men or we may choose to resign from the Enlisted Reserve as a result of the solicitation of the Army Air Forces. At the time of this solicitation we were told: 'If the occasion should arise when you would be placed on active duty it would only be as commissioned flying personnel.'

"We are cognizant of the fact that the United States Army is training thousands of women pilots. It is our claim that it is not only unfair to the men who have assisted in building the present Air Force but it will be very detrimental to the war effort to discard the talents of the finest American airmen and at the same time train inexperienced women to serve as commissioned pilots for the Air Forces. Our ages range from 20 years upward. Our flying experience ranges from several hundred hours to thousands of hours. We are desirous of Army flying activity of any type from instructing to combat.

"It is our recommendation that corrective measures be taken whereby our past experience and knowledge can be utitilized in the Army Air Forces. We earnestly solicit your interest and efforts to correct this situation.

"Respectfully submitted on behalf of the 122 civilian flying instructors employed by the Hancock College of Aeronautics, Santa Maria, Calif., U. W. Army Air Forces Primary Flight Training Contractors."

WASHINGTON IN FORMATION

One thing that is beginning to bother Congressmen who have sponsored aviation training is the spectacle of continuing the use of women as ferry pilots for military planes while there are plenty of experienced men pilots fairly itching for the jobs. As one Member summed up the situation, it seems downright stupid to train more than 1,000 young women a year at an estimated cost of $6,000,000 while there are 5,000 experienced men pilots looking for jobs as a result of the liquidation of the C. A. A.'s pilot-training program. Also it is pointed out that the C. A. P. has a force of 25,000 men pilots on tap, at least 10,000 of whom would be available for ferry work with very little transitional training.

When graduated, the girl flyers are scheduled to be enrolled in the WASP—Women Air Service Pilots—a civilian group organized by Jacqueline Cochran. There are rumblings that the Army is none too satisfied with this arrangement and would like to disband the organization. On the other hand, it has been revealed that a legislative attempt will be made to give the WASPS a flull-fledged rating as members of the A. A. F.

No one in Congress or elsewhere questions the pluck or ability of these girl pilots. It is conceded without stint that they are doing a wonderful job. Nevertheless, it is felt that it is wasteful to continue to train them when there are so many pilots already available. Another point about all this that is puzzling probing Congressmen is the dearth of information as to fatalities and accidents in the flying activities of the WASPS.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER A. RAMEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by Mrs. Ethel V. McWillians, wife of our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Connecticut, the Honorable JOHN D. MCWILLIAMS, which appeared in the May 22 edition of the Washington Times-Herald:

QUESTION TIME

I am the wife of a freshman member of Congress from the Second District of Connecticut. The views I express here are my own, but I know my husband agrees with them in general, at least.

What I want to say is that I resent very deeply the fact that we and many other members of Congress are being made victims of a situation here in Washington not of our own making.

The whole country is angry and critical as it continues to read about high official parties and receptions in Washington, with foreign embassies lavishing champagne and caviar.

I don't blame anybody who criticizes such things. Tremendous amounts of American food and other lend-lease materials are being flown around the world. Our boys are streaming blood and sweat on every continent, and they not only lack champagne, but even beds.

It is only natural that people will want to know why our good neighbors, who need so much help from America, can still find the money to throw the kind of parties that continue to go on here.

But I think it is time the country also knows some of us in official life are against that sort of thing, too. When I came to Washington I was told to forget protocol and not to make formal calls on embassies, to help hold down useless social activities in wartime. I think that was a good rule, and I have obeyed it.

Now, because some of our good friends and allies are blowing in great sums of money on parties, we in congressional life who have tried to live as we should in these times are suffering criticism along with those who deserve it.

I think it is time the country knew the facts, and I intend to help give them.

ETHEL V. MCWILLIAMS.

Important Message to Next of Kin of Men and Women in Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, war casualties are an unpleasant subject, yet wars are not fought without bloodshed and as much as we dislike to discuss the topic, it is only fair to the families of all service men and women that they be made aware of the benefits Congress has provided for them in the event it should be necessary to change the blue star in the window to one of gold.

Overcome with sorrow, the next of kin frequently neglects to apply for certain benefits which after all are only a token payment by the Government for the great sacrifice the service men or women have made on the field of battle, or in the patriotic unselfish service of our Nation.

The next of kin might be eligible for one or more of four different monetary benefits that are available.

First. A 6-month gratuity payment: This payment is automatically paid to a wife or, if there is no wife, to a child or children. If there is no wife or child, this gratuity goes to dependent parents or other dependent relatives—grandchildren, brothers, sisters, or grandparents—who have been named by the soldier to receive this gratuity pay. If there is no wife or child or dependent relatives named by the soldier, this gratuity is paid to any dependent relative if they are shown to have been dependent upon the soldier before his death. The amount of this payment depends upon the amount of pay the soldier was receiving at the time of his death—not including rental and subsistence pay. The beneficiary receives six times this monthly payment.

Second. Monthly insurance payments: This insurance is not paid in a lump sum. It is paid on a monthly basis, depending on the age of the beneficiary. The older the beneficiary, the higher is each monthly payment. On a $10,000 policy a beneficiary under 30 years of age will receive $55.21 a month for 240 months. A beneficiary over 30 years of age will get a guaranteed 120 equal installments—and if they survive beyond 120 months it is paid for life. The amount of monthly payment, if the beneficiary is over 30, depends on the age of the beneficiary. Under a $10,000 policy a 50-year-old beneficiary will get $53.90 monthly. Under the same policy a 70-year-old beneficiary will get $85.10 monthly, and so forth.

It would do well to have parents and next of kin check with the men and women in service to see that all insurance policies are in order and a certificate in the hands of the beneficiaries. An insurance policy taken out by men and women in service can name any of the following as beneficiaries: Wife, husband, child, stepchild, illegitimate child, parents, brother, or sister, including those of half blood.

All dependents and next of kin ought to check the insurance policy now. See that everything is in order now. It might save a lot of grief in the future. Negligence has caused many a beneficiary to lose out. A little care can avoid a lot of trouble should anything happen.

Third. A pension: This pension is paid automatically to a wife and children. All children under 18 are eligible. Children up to 21 are eligible if they are in school up to that time. If a child marries before 18 or 21, it is not eligible for this pension. Parents who have been dependent upon the deceased man or woman in service are also entitled to a pension. Parents who have been dependent upon a deceased soldier can get a pension at the same time his wife and children are getting a pension. The amounts of the monthly pension are as follows:

One parent, $45 a month. Two parents, $25 each. Widow but no child, $50; widow with one child, $65, with $13 for each additional child (subject to apportionment regulations); no widow but one child, $25; no widow but two children, $38 (equally divided, with $10 for each additional child (total divided). Total pension as to widow, child, or children not to exceed $100.

Note: The fact that a widow, a child, or parent gets insurance does not prevent them from getting a pension also. They can collect insurance and get a pension besides.

Fourth. Arrears of pay: When a casualty occurs, that service man or woman who has become a casualty may have back pay coming. For instance, if the casualty occurs on the 27th of the month, he had 27 days' pay coming. If the casualty occurs on the 15th of the month, he had 15 days' back pay coming. Then, too, when soldiers are at the front in actual combat they may miss several pay days. All of this back pay is paid to the nearest heir. The nearest heir of the deceased serviceman should inquire about and collect this arrears of pay if the serviceman or woman becomes a casualty.

SUMMARY

Should there be a death casualty in your family, remember there are four payments due the dependents: First, 6 months' gratuity payment; second, insurance; third, a pension; and fourth, arrears of pay. If there are any questions, or should you know anyone having difficulty getting their payments from the Government, it would do them well to take it up with their Congressman. He will be glad to handle the case for them. Citizens of the Ninth District of Minnesota can write Congressman HAROLD C. HAGEN, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Czechoslovakia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me on May 27, at Julia Richman High School, Second Avenue and Sixty-seventh Street, New York City, at the celebration in honor of the sixtieth birthday of Dr. Edvard Benes, the President of the Czechoslovakia Republic:

Czechoslovakia was the first country to be invaded when Hitler went on the march. She was also the first country to bear the brunt of an appeasement policy by which the nations of Europe thought that they could avoid destruction if they allowed Czechoslovakia to perish.

In this year of 1944 the American public and the nations of the world know a great deal more about international affairs than they knew in 1938. In 1938 no one suspected that Hitler was only biding his time to pounce upon the other countries of Europe and destroy them one by one.

I feel very keenly about this matter because I cannot forget that it was my feeble voice which was raised in 1933 and 1934, warning the people of the United States of the schemes of conquest which Hitler had prepared.

I knew that Hitler's aim was not to unite the German people, because the German people had been united for many years before Hitler was ever thought of. I knew that Hitler did not criticize the Treaty of Versailles because of its unfairness to Germany, since all the unfair provisions of the treaty have been gradually eliminated by the powers which sought to preserve the peace of Europe.

I knew that Hitler did not begin his anti-Semitic career in order to destroy the small Jewish minority of Germany, but he did it for the purpose of uniting, in hatred, the people of Germany so that they should continue to hate all nations of the world and eventually destroy them one by one.

Czechoslovakia was situated in a peculiarly vulnerable position. She was surrounded by the Germans on all sides, on the north her neighbors were the Prussians and Saxons and on the south, Austria. As long as Austria was allowed to maintain itself as a Republic, no danger of any kind threatened Czechoslovakia from that quarter, but when Hitler overran Austria and compelled its government to surrender to him, Czechoslovakia was doomed unless the nations of Europe would band themselves together and fight for her continued existence.

But in Europe Czechoslovakia had really only one friend left, and that was Russia. Her immediate neighbors were watching their opportunity to grab for themselves slices of Czech territory whenever opportunity should present itself.

Nor were they long in waiting. Hitler knew that the best way to appropriate Czechoslovakia for himself would be by weakening her so that she would be unable to resist. He also knew that her neighbors were greedy and that they would sacrifice Czechoslovakia any time if offered slices of her territory.

Hitler established a fifth column in Czechoslovakia which operated very successfully both in the north and in the south of that country. In the north this fifth column was centered in the Sudetenland, which was inhabited by German-speaking individuals, and therefore legitimately German prey. In the south Hitler tried to build on the feeling by the Slovaks that they were different from the Czechs and should be made independent of them.

Czechoslovakia was made the first victim of the policy of appeasement which our western powers sought to follow, with the view of preventing a world war. No such thing happened or could have happened. Hitler's aims were not confined to the conquest of Czechoslovakia, and this was merely the first step in the career of the German Fuehrer, who used the resources of Czechoslovakia to arm Germany to an extent never rivaled before in the history of the world.

And, so, after Czechoslovakia came Poland, and after Poland came Norway, Denmark, Belgium, Holland, and France, and finally an attack was made upon Russia, and, due to the valor of Russian arms and the patriotism of its people, this is where Hitler was first made to taste defeat.

In December 1941 came Pearl Harbor, and then this country entered the World War, and we have now been engaged in this bloodiest of all conflicts, pouring out money and treasures and the lives of our sons and daughters on the field of battle.

Through it all the people of Czechoslovakia, even though staggering under the blow which was inflicted upon them by Germany, and which was more or less condoned by the complacency of the people of Europe, kept up their national spirit and the motto has become "We shall live again."

The President of Czechoslovakia, Edvard Benes, stood as a real pillar of devotion for his country and nation. Driven out of Czechoslovakia by Hitler's cohorts, he established a government in exile and the Government set itself for its aim the restoration of Czechoslovakia to its rightful place in the family of nations.

It was not an easy task for the people of Czechoslovakia to maintain its identity through the persecution to which they were subjected by their German masters. Every town and village of Czechoslovakia was conscripted to service for the German war machine and every place in Czechoslovakia was obliged to interfere with the German war machine in its own way and in its own manner, so that while all of them would work together for the Czech people by way of impeding and interfering with the German war machine, each had to do it in a different manner. In some places it was possible for the Czech patriots to sabotage Germany by turning out inferior weapons. In other places, suddenly one would find a dead German policeman or a Gestapo man.

Every Czech is fighting in some way to destroy the German military power and we on this side of the ocean, as well as the Czech Government in exile, wish to encourage the work of the Czech patriots at home until such time as Czechoslovakia will regain her independence and its Government will be restored on its own soil.

Czechoslovakia was a republic built on the same principles on which our republic is built—that is, life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness.

Under the constitution of that country there never was any discrimination because of race or creed. The many racial units of Czechoslovakia lived side by side peacefully with one another and religious tolerance was a basic principle of its government.

When Czechoslovakia fell, the slogan of that country was "We shall live again," and on this occasion, the sixtieth birthday of the President of that Republic, I can think of no more fitting motto than that of devoting our energies to the task that Czechoslovakia should really live again.

Address of Ignatius Nurkiewicz

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Ignatius Nurkiewicz, president, Federated Merchants Organization, Buffalo, N. Y., on May 30, 1944:

Mr. Chairman, reverend monsignori, members of the clergy, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, I am pleased to accept the invitation of the chairman, to address the members of this congress this morning on behalf of the merchants and businessmen of Polish origin, who are members of the Federated Merchants Organization of America—composed of Polish-American industrialists, bankers, wholesalers, and tradesmen in America. Our organization could not allow this important congress of Poles in America to take place without giving it our wholehearted support. I am proud to say that our organization and the Polish businessmen in America are represented here by a number of delegates at this congress.

As president of the Federated Merchants Organization of America, I am speaking on behalf of all American businessmen and manufacturers of Polish descent. Our participation in the economic life of our country is of great importance, and is steadily increasing. A partial survey recently made shows that American Poles at the present time are listed as owners of 318 factories, 87 banks and insurance companies, 324 wholesale corporations, 38,550 retail stores, and 7,640 trades.

During the last years we have noticed a considerable expansion of these Polish-American owned businesses—especially in the industrial field.

The retail and wholesale establishments which survived the last depression find themselves in somewhat difficult position at the present time. The shortage of material, as well as the small margin of profit allowed by the Government through O. P. A., etc., along with increasing overhead, costs, and steadily mounting transportation and distribution difficulties, cause financial hardships, against which retail and wholesale businessmen must fight in order not to liquidate their establishments.

Hard work and honest realization of his duties gives the Polish merchant courage to stay in business. By increased effort—he is able to contribute to the war effort by supplying all defense war workers and their families with necessary food and merchandise.

In the field of industry we have noticed an increase in the number of establishments organized and managed by Polish manufacturers. These factories, efficiently managed and properly operated, are turning out products for the Allied armed forces and receiving due recognition and citations from our Government.

As we witness the steady increase of the commercial and industrial establishments managed by Americans of Polish extraction we become aware of the necessity of organizing all of those concerned in order to enable them to play a more important part in the economic life of our country.

Thrifty because they are industrious and patriotic, our Polish merchants and manufacturers are doing much for the war effort. Due recognition and credit of this has been given to the Federated Merchants Organization of America by the Treasury Department, the American Red Cross, and other service organizations in the form of certificates of honor for their excellent cooperation. In this way we are contributing toward the goal of victory.

When we speak of victory we are aware of the uncertainty which post-war economic conditions may develop. We fully realize that winning the war alone will not bring about security and employment. Only victory with the assurance of a long and just peace will prevent another depression.

During this war America has increased her war production beyond all expectation. However, maintenance of the present level of business activity cannot be sustained by domestic markets alone. To maintain it we shall have to increase our pre-war foreign market exports by regaining all our old markets and promoting new ones. We shall have to find safe investments for our vast American capital. That only can be accomplished in a world of free, independent and democratic countries. Among foreign markets the European one is of most vital importance to America.

But the countries now under the heel of the Nazis must be organized on democratic principles which will allow the United States of America to enter with them into normal trade relations.

With this in mind the American Business World must become fully aware of the danger that the steadily increasing autocratic Soviet influence upon the foreign market will bring to our country. European nations subjected to this influence will undoubtedly cease to be markets for American trade.

The populations of the countries will not be in a position to become prospective consumers of our products. Nor can we safely invest our capital in these countries.

If this is true concerning Europe it is particularly true concerning Poland, where we warn our fellow Americans that any curtailment of her boundaries will have a definite detrimental effect on the economic life of the United States.

Poland has enjoyed increasing trade relations with us. Poland was buying 10 times more from America than she was selling to us. American capital had all the possibilities of safe investments on the Polish market. It is obvious, therefore, that should the eastern territory of Poland be annexed to Soviet Russia half of the Polish market will be lost to American trade. American cotton, for instance, will no longer be shipped there, as Russia would bring it from Turkestan. American capital would no longer be placed in Polish oil fields and all pre-war investments there would be lost. Millions of people, prospective consumers of American articles would not be in a position to buy from us.

Russian domination of any part of Poland would only enable the Soviet economic system to flood the world markets more effectively with products manufactured by forced labor and at prices which will disrupt American industry.

The United States would not be able to compete on these markets with Soviet goods, as the price of our products is based on the element of fair wages to labor and the Soviet methods are based on forced labor. We would never be able to cope with this competition. We would lose not only the European markets, but the Near East, Far East, and South American trade also.

That is why we are warning the American business leaders of the danger of Soviet expansion. Europe can again become the market for American economic expansion only if European countries—free of Soviet influences—can again freely improve their standards of living. Accomplishing the purposes of the Atlantic Charter, which guarantees "four freedoms," will secure this. By any other eventuality Europe will be lost to American business and will become a dangerous element in the world economy.

All we say is vital to the American businessman. It is vital because we must provide the millions of veterans of this war with proper employment. We cannot allow them to return from the battlefields to a lower standard of living.

We cannot allow this opportunity to pass to call to your attention as businessmen and women of this country that Poland needs not only spiritual help, food, and medical care for her people, but also financial and industrial rehabilitation.

We should take the lead among the United Nations in this respect. This is not so because there are 6,000,000 of us in this country but because the character, honesty, and integrity of the Polish Nation are a guaranty of the safety of American investments. Our organization is working on post-war planning in this respect, which will be submitted to our Government, and we shall at some future date ask your support in obtaining favorable action on it.

In closing, allow me to again thank you for this opportunity to address you. On behalf of the Federated Merchants Organization, I pledge our untiring energy in the war effort, so that this terrible world conflict will be brought to a speedier and victorious end for the Allied Nations, to be followed by a just, honorable, and enduring world peace for all our allies, with an independent Poland—the land of our forebears.

The Federated Merchants and Industrialists Organization wishes you every success in your deliberations, and hopes that your efforts will be fruitful of beneficial results for Poland.

Why Guam Was Not Fortified

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following comment by Raymond Lonergan from the editorial page of Labor of June 3, 1944:

WHY GUAM WASN'T FORTIFIED

A retired army officer of real distinction is authority for the following:

"Congress is frequently berated for its alleged failure to fortify Guam, a tiny dot of land way out in the Pacific. Lots of people believe the President urged an appropriation, but that isolationists and pacifists in Congress turned him down.

"Our military engineers have known for 50 years that it would be a waste of money to fortify Guam. The plain truth is the island can't be defended. It has a tiny harbor which doesn't cover more than a square mile. It would cost considerable money to dredge it, and when the job was finished, we wouldn't have anything worth possessing. An enemy could stand off shore and blast ships in the harbor.

"It's about the poorest place in the world to be when a typhoon comes along. Therefore, it isn't of much value in peacetime, except as a landing place for airplanes or a stop where passengers may stretch their legs when traveling between the United States and Asia.

"There are a good many other places in the Pacific we should have fortified, but not Guam. That's one 'crime' no one familiar with the facts will charge up against Congress."

Minnesota Norwegians Hope for New Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday June 2, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, it was with heavy hearts that Minnesota's citizens of Norwegian birth or ancestry observed recently the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary of Norway's independence. It was not a joyous independence day, but through the clouds of Nazi oppression we all see bright hopes of an Allied victory ere another Norwegian independence day arrives.

Throughout the world and even in the prison camps of Norway under the watchful eye of the Gestapo were said prayers that soon another day of freedom will come when the Axis hordes who have overrun the land of these brave seafaring people will be routed so this peaceful democratic nation can again go about its honest pursuits.

Dr. Richard Beck, of the University of North Dakota, recently paid tribute to Norway and his remarks appeared recently in the Grand Forks (N. Dak.) Herald. I am pleased to present them here to remind us of another of the great nations whose people are fighting with us to make us all free. His statement follows:

PAY TRIBUTE TO NORWAY ON INDEPENDENCE DAY

(By Dr. Richard Beck, University of North Dakota)

This May 17 marks the one hundred and thirtieth anniversary of Norway's Independence Day. It was on that day in 1814 that the chosen representatives of the Norwegian people formally signed the constitution of Norway, thereby safeguarding the freedom of its people and laying the foundation for its remarkable progress in later years.

The Norwegian people at home will, to be sure, be denied the privilege of celebrating this historic anniversary officially; they will, nevertheless, commemorate the day in their hearts, silently, reverently, and gratefully.

And throughout the free world, wherever Norwegians are found in any numbers, the day will be fittingly observed, with friends and admirers of Norway among other nationalities joining in paying tribute to a brave people whose unswerving faith in democratic ideals and heroism have kindled the imagination of freedom-loving men everywhere.

Contemplating the significance of Norway's Independence Day, we recall with admiration the patriotism of those leaders of the Norwegian nation, who at that time fought fearlessly for its freedom and self-determination. The historic importance of their undertaking looms larger in the light of the tragic circumstance that the Norwegian people, through no fault of their own, has today been called upon to fight for its very existence as a nation, politically and culturally.

QUOTES POET

Or as the American poet Joseph Auslander puts it in a tribute to the people of Norway on this anniversary of its independence day:

"This day, as when your fathers stood
At Eidsvold on that fateful day,
You stand firm in your faith and blood
This sacred seventeenth of May
This seventeenth of May the same
You stand in bitter bonds, but still
Your spirit feeds an inner flame
No brutal enemy can kill."

And that is the glorious fact to record on this Norwegian anniversary—the undying spirit of the Norwegian people on the home front, where they keep on fighting passively and actively, according to the means at their disposal, against cruel persecution, fire and sword, literally speaking.

FIGHT FOR FREEDOM

Equally admirable is the great and many-sided contribution which the Norwegians are making to the common cause of the United Nations, far out of proportion to their numbers. Gallantly they are fighting the foe on land, in the air, and on the sea.

The example of the brave people of Norway, counting no cost too great in the fight for freedom, is an inspiration to others engaged in the same fight on far-flung battle fronts. Or to hark back to Auslander's tribute:

"To hunted men throughout the earth,
The starved, the beaten, the reviled,
Brave people whose unswerving faith
That is not free and undefiled."

It is the sincere prayer, hope, and belief of friends of Norway throughout the world that its brave men and women will be able to celebrate next May 17 once more in their free and democratic land of yesteryears.

Freedom of Speech Suppressed in Puerto Rico Under the Dictatorial Administration of Gov. Rexford Guy Tugwell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BOLÍVAR PAGÁN

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2 1944

Mr. PAGÁN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I present a speech which was to be broadcast by the Honorable Cayetano Coll Cuchi, president of the board of commissioners of the city of San Juan, and former speaker of the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico. This speech outlines the sort of centralized and autocratic government in Puerto Rico under the despotic administration of Governor Tugwell. The radio broadcast of this speech was prohibited. While thousands of Puerto Rican boys are fighting throughout the world, in all war fronts, for certain principles among which is the freedom of speech, in Puerto Rico, under Governor Tugwell, freedom of speech is arbitrarily suppressed. The speech is as follows:

During the last 3 years an anti-American system of government has been under organization in Puerto Rico, openly contradictory to all the fundamental principles upon which the Constitution and the Government of the United States rest with the knowledge and sufferance of all the people, who see it, who feel it, and who consent to it because of an inexplicable inertia, through an incomprehensible lack of civic firmness to prevent it. Among the less educated classes, who in Puerto Rico form the great mass, that government is justified by demagogical means, which carry with them promises of great generosities which later apparently are translated into reality by means of individual acts which do not affect, nor can ever affect, the great majority of our population. The rest of our people, the educated and conscientious, who, here as well as in all parts of the world, carry on their shoulders the responsibility of public life, by inexplicable cowardice consent and try to take advantage of the situation, when it directly touches their interests, limiting themselves to insubstantial protests or cries of pain when they see their money in danger. It is a spectacle which would dishonor our people if it were not because it has already been repeated in other much larger and more powerful peoples than ours.

The people of Puerto Rico enjoy a limited sovereignty by virtue of the provisions of the constitutional organic act but, after all, enjoy their sovereignty. That rickety Constitution of ours contains a series of principles and guaranties which are basic in the structure of every democracy. If, while we are striving for a more extensive sovereignty, we knew how to retain in all its purity what we already have, what has caused us so many struggles, such bitterness and such suffering in the past, in that past which our new redeemers unjustly and irreverently make sport of, our road would not be narrowed nor our horizon obscured by the unprecedented threats of slavery.

When the present Governor Tugwell was appointed to that position, I was present at the meeting of the committee of the Senate which considered his appointment and predicted what was going to occur in Puerto Rico. For me it was obvious because for the two previous days I had been carefully reading the books of Mr. Tugwell and penetrating his antidemocratic ideology of a purely Fascist character. There is nothing more absurd than to classify Tugwell as a Communist or Socialist. He is neither one nor the other. He is as much a socialist and of the same kind of ideology as Adolf Hitler. Reading the books of Mr. Tugwell and comparing them with the book of Hitler and his innumerable speeches, both the German Fuehrer and the Governor of Puerto Rico believe in the same ideology, that is to say: the centralization of the government in the hands of a strong power controlled by a single party, which carry on the functions of sovereignty with absolute independence of the popular will which is regimented and subjugated by the persecution of accumulated capital and the absorption by that central power of all the means of production. War to the death to private initiative, industrialization of the lands by the central government, fixing of all the corporate benefits in favor of the state, destruction of free commerce and indirect protection of labor and the farmer on the basis of a total repudiation by them of every vestige of political power. That is the program of the German National Socialist Party; and that is the ideology of Dr. Tugwell according to his books.

On arriving in Puerto Rico he found a propitious field for his experimentation and ventures, with a new party, with a party leader who was successful in inspiring, through many circumstances, an idolizing fanaticism in a great part of our proletariat; a leader of strong will, surrounded by men none of whom were capable of resisting him. In the last 3 years, through the so-called fundamental laws of the Popular Party, there has been created little by little a central system of government which despoils the people of all their democratic prerogatives.

That system began by dominating the insular legislature itself, a ridiculous and rickety copy of the German Reichstag during the first years of the Chancelorship of Adolf Hitler. As there, here in Puerto Rico laws were proposed which fundamentally altered our system, our economy, our traditions, and our principles of government without even having been prepared, studied, and analyzed by the legislators themselves; on the contrary they came from extraordinary brains, of the chosen group which acted and surrounded the Fuehrer. Submitted to the so-called legislators, these laws were approved after technical reference to committees of the house and senate, but in truthful reality without having been considered or studied by those committees. With a sarcasm which to me it is inexplicable that the Puerto Rican people have been able to stand without being ashamed of their cowardice, laws have been approved with an extreme and complicated machinery and of a character revolutionary to our economy, by 10 men in the senate, the majority of whom—and I am generous in saying the majority—never read them, and if they read them then or read them now, do not understand them. In this manner the legislature was robbed of their direct democratic intervention in the government.

The great fundamental and basic principle of democracy has consisted in the exclusive right on the part of the representatives of the people to vote and manage their income and taxes. Here, that privilege was made a joke of by means of a number of laws of the Popular Party, depriving the people and its legislature of that sacred right, the fount and origin of the liberty of the United States, to put it in the hands of the Governor of Puerto Rico and the political chiefs who surround him, to the point where we have seen at the present moment that they pretend to dispose of the sum of $16,000,000 enormous for Puerto Rico, without the intervention of the legislature, by the simple ukase of the Governor and the submission of the attorney general, the auditor, and the treasurer of Puerto Rico In all the other activities of the government we have seen the displacement of the legislative will to place it in organism which the Governor of Puerto Rico exclusively controls. The famous development law is Fascist establishment through which the central power assumes without limits all the powers of the legislature in the administrative field. Naturally, that law has not been put entirely in force because it would have caused a commotion in our island; but little by little it is being instrumented and organized until the moment arrives in which it constitutes a true octopus which embraces and absorbs all the activities of our government

Now, thank God, a bomb which has exploded in the Popular camp itself may open the eyes of our people. Of all the destruction accomplished by the Popular Party there is none more prejudicial to the interests of Puerto Rico than the destruction of our municipal life. The municipalities are the bastions on which all democratic people defend their institutions. Free people of the world for hundreds and thousands of years have saved their liberty by the direct and heroic action of their municipalities. The burghers of the Nordic countries, the communities of medieval France, the Spanish towns were the institutions which resisted, combatted, and destroyed feudalism, gave life to the nations, and were able to impose their will on the governments. When one wants to become master through the exercise of a central power, whether he is gloriously called by the name of Napoleon I, or tragically Adolf Hitler, or comically Mussolini, or any other of their imitations in these countries of our America, the first thing which is thought of is the destructior of the municipal power. Already our municipalities do not have economic life because the central power has materially strangled them by seizing all the revenues which under a good administration are municipal revenues and they have been deprived of an infinity of attributes, and the last deprivation, in the trajectory of the roads which lead them to disappearance, is the law of aqueducts, that iniquitous despoil which today the Insular Commissioner of Sanitation, a prominent Popular leader, and the executive council, composed of other Popular leaders of equal prominence, are carrying out against Ponce. It is to be properly assumed that that is a Popular policy.

But the psychological phenomenon which arises among us is worthy of study so that we may cry aloud, because it takes us directly to a public crisis of horrible transcendence. The policy of Hitlerism in German, of fascism in Italy created in both countries a rickety mind of submission and humiliation which was hidden behind an apparent structure of grandiose discipline and order necessary in the coordination of the elements which composed those peoples. And that is occurring also among us.

When the law was approved creating the Authority of Aqueducts (water system), no municipality protested, except San Juan, because the majority of the municipalities which might be affected by the law were in the hands of the Popular Democratic Party, and because everyone believed, both in San Juan and in the island, that what that law was concerned with was the seizing of the water system of San Juan from the government of the capital. And because of that psychological phenomenon to which I referred above, this was a good thing; it was good for those who combat us politically without noting that they were destroying themselves, because in municipal life municipal acts should be united to be effective; and where the lifeblood is taken from a single municipality of Puerto Rico, it is taken from all, regardless of the party which dominates them. The central government has not dared to take the aqueduct of the capital from us because it knows that it cannot and because it knows that we are going to defend it with all the force of which we are capable; but to justify the action which they propose in the morning, or God knows with what other intentions, they carry out the abuse of robbing Ponce of its aqueduct without the consent of that community. Spitting at the sky, the saliva falls again on their own faces. The bomb exploded in the Popular camp.

As always happens in these cases, the cowardice, together with the irresponsibility was made patent. The phrase of Senator Barreto will remain in our political history as a monument of both things. To say that he voted for the law as a Popular Senator but repudiates it as a Ponceno is simply to confess that psychological condition which I am charging here tonight. But it still remains for our friends of Ponce and the other towns of the island, and for the mass of our people, to consider the degree of degeneration which implies in a community what I heard, with cheeks red with shame, exclaimed to one of a group of Popular youth who commented on the matter, "That about Ponce is celestial music. Now Luis takes the whip and 24 hours later Grillasca and all those people are under control."

I Am an American Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. SCANLON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. SCANLON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following address delivered by me at the I Am an American Day celebration in Pittsburgh, Pa., on Sunday, May 21, 1944, and the proclamation of Mayor Cornelius D. Scully, of Pittsburgh:

Reverend clergy, honored guests, ladies, and gentlemen, this is not an ordinary day providing shallow reason for ordinary observance. It is not a day for the tinsel trappings and cheap fanfare of hollow ceremony. This is a sacred day.

This is a day for particular and reverent recognition of the great privilege of free American citizenship.

Here in Allegheny County we participate in the celebration of this day with great enthusiasm and pride in the fact that Pittsburgh has the distinction of being the first municipal government to legally set aside a day on which the dignity and heritage of American citizenship should henceforth be annually recognized.

This was done in 1939 through an ordinance introduced by Councilman A. L. Wolk, and unanimously adopted by city council, directing that the mayor annually designate the third Sunday of May as Citizenship Day.

This wholesome and patriotic movement spread rapidly and a half dozen larger cities took similar action. A year later, on May 3, 1940, the Congress of the United States formally decreed that henceforth and annually the President be authorized and requested to set aside this day as I Am an American Day.

So much for the history of the day's celebration.

On this solemn day I would impress upon every listener that, in times like these, when our freedom is gravely imperiled, every day should be I Am an American Day.

Your Government expects and relies upon you to daily practice Americanism; to be ever conscious of your privileges and your responsibilities as a citizen. There are many ways to daily observe and demonstrate a living sense of Americanism.

We might leave the military problems to the military experts. Your opinion and my opinion in those matters is not worth the breath it takes for utterance.

Of course, as an American you have a right to be an armchair strategist. You have a right to express your opinion, to engage in foolish, and often vicious, back-fence or poolroom debate on the progress of the war and the efficiency of our military leadership.

But you also have the right and the duty to defend your home and your family. You'll never indulge in armchair strategy, in rumor spreading, in serving the purpose of Hitler and Hirohito by creating discontent among other uninformed and gullible people if you really love your country.

Instead of whispering opinions about where and when the United Nations should take the military offensive, about the strategic soundness of the Allied policy in either the European or Pacific theater, resolve this very day to take your own personal offensive on the home front, here in America.

Resolve this day to volunteer as a blood donor at the American Red Cross blood bank. Repeat this donation as a continuing act of patriotism and an expression of your Americanism.

Above all, resolve to have an unshakable faith in these United States of America.

Millions of our sons and daughters have marched on to war with that faith and with a song on their lips and in their hearts.

It's a typical American song of freedom—this is worth fighting for.

Just what does that mean? It doesn't mean alone the peaceful valley, the sun-baked street, the residential district of a great city. Those are physical things and places; they'll be here forever.

Our boys and girls march to battle with the inborn spirit which came down to them from their ancestors who fled to this great country to escape the tears, the toil, the oppression, and the heartaches of the Old World way of life.

Our boys and girls march to battle envisioning one thing above all which is worth fighting for. They fight for the right to enjoy a life of liberty in the peaceful valley, the sun-baked city street. They go to fight for the home they have left behind them.

They are bursting with the confidence of ultimate victory over our ferocious enemies, whose plight becomes more desperate daily.

They are filled with confidence and unquestionable loyalty to their commanding officers, from the lowest ranking corporal to our Commander in Chief Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

They left their homes with implacable faith in you and me. We are the custodians of the American home front, and ours is a solemn duty to protect it.

It is our sacred obligation to see that when our service men and women return home, they will return to a life of contentment, a life of opportunity, a life of freedom from fear and freedom from want; a life of economic security.

Our boys and girls must not return to the same grim and dreary prospect which faced the boys of 1917 when they were demobilized.

There is a way to avert that, but I shall not talk about it today, for this is not a political meeting.

However, in passing, it would seem logical to declare that the leadership which has brought this Nation, and our allies to the verge of victory, is the same experienced leadership which will facilitate a speedy end of the war, a just peace, and a post-war world of work, happiness, and prosperity.

Conversely it is just as logical to declare that an inexperienced leadership would prolong the war and guarantee a post-war world of depression, hunger and misery for the common man. And, worse than that such a leadership would lay the foundation for another world war within the next generation.

I will make one concluding observation on our immediate and continuing duties as custodians of the home front; and, all service men and women agree, so I am told by one of our honored guests, Commando Sgt. Charles E. Kelly, our Pittsburgh hero in this war and winner of the Congressional Medal of Honor.

The majority of the residents of this greatest industrial center of the world work in our steel mills, our coal mines, or in other defense plants and industries.

Some are mechanical workers, others are office works. They all take special pride in skill with their hands; a skill, of course, which exists because of the intelligence of their brains.

Their special skills, your special skills, are more valuable today than ever in our Nation's history. If we are to survive as a free Nation, and we will; if we are to achieve post-war freedom from fear and want, and we will, then it naturally follows that we must employ our skills to the utmost; we must pledge ourselves to keep up the home front by giving all we have to the war effort.

We must work hard. We must remember that the battle front cannot be sustained without the home front. Our boys must have the finest equipment in the greatest quantity. It's up to you to give it to them. But, even that is not enough.

All of us must become more conscious of the terrific cost of this war; of our sacred duty not only to lend our skills and labor to the successful prosecution of the war, but to lend our very possessions, our treasures, our money to the Government by the regular purchase of War bonds.

Do these things. Have confidence in our military leadership, have confidence in your Government; remember that Lincoln had to contend with the carping criticism of unpatriotic Americans; remember that if you would keep the New World, the new America of today, you must fight and struggle and work for it today and tomorrow.

With these ideals, I am sure that our returning boys and girls will find that we have not let them down on the home front while they endured the agonies of hell on the battle front.

Thank you.

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by formal decree of May 3, 1940, designated that henceforth and annually the third Sunday of May be observed and celebrated as Citizenship Day; and authorized and requested that the President of the United States each year proclaim and set aside this day as I Am an American Day; and

Whereas it was expressly stipulated that this be done annually in special and public recognition of those who have attained citizenship by coming of age, or by naturalization; and in particular recognition of the great privilege of American citizenship; and

Whereas our beloved President and Commander in Chief, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, by special proclamation, has complied with this congressional request, and urged that all civil and educational authorities make plans for the proper observance of citizenship or I Am an American Day, declaring, "That it is even more essential in time of war than in time of peace that a people should understand the form and genius of their government and the responsibilities of citizenship"; and

Whereas the city of Pittsburgh has the distinction of being among the first of the Nation's municipal governments to inaugurate this wholesome and patriotic recognition of American citizenship, even antedating congressional recognition thereof, by virtue of an empowering ordinance written and introduced in 1939 by the Honorable A. L. Wolk, and subsequently adopted unanimously; and

Whereas this ordinance did direct that henceforth and annually the mayor of the city of Pittsburgh be authorized and requested to publicly signalize the third Sunday of May as Citizenship Day,

Now, therefore, I, Cornelius D. Scully, mayor of the city of Pittsburgh and Federal regional coordinator of civilian defense for western Pennsylvania, by virtue of office and authority of the council of the city of Pittsburgh, and in consonance with a formal congressional decree and in obedience to Presidential proclamation, do now urge that our citizens observe Sunday, May 21, 1944, as Citizenship Day, or I Am an American Day, with full solemnity and in complete accordance with the aforesaid resolution and decree and Presidential proclamation; and Further, I do herewith appoint Capt. Frederick L. Oliver, of the United States Navy, to the chairmanship and responsibility for our local observance, confident that the leadership and the patriotism which have so distinctly characterized his work, as the highest ranking naval official in the metropolitan Pittsburgh district, will insure the success of our public celebration; and I urge that our observance be city- and country-wide and not confined to the privacy of the home or the individual, so that the great public meeting to be held in Schenley Park will be greater in attendance and enthusiasm than ever before; and I further urge every man, woman, and child to avail themselves of this public opportunity to renew their allegiance to American democracy. Every defense council in my jurisdiction as Federal coordinator of civilian defense, every religious group and creed, every school and college, every business house and corporation, every veteran, fraternal and social group, every labor and trade or industrial association, every political or other organization should actively participate in this day of tribute to our sacred heritage of American citizenship.

So, therefore, let each of us, the clergy, the press, radio broadcasting companies, the aforesaid groups, and all others individually and collectively, demonstrate a continuing sense of patriotic citizenship as herein indicated; and exert every effort and lend full cooperation so as to insure that Greater Pittsburgh will maintain her enviable record of active and vigorous Americanism. Our great city and county must continue to be the leader in community and individual appreciation of the American way of life.

International Currency Stabilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT W. KEAN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials from the New York Times of May 29 and June 1, 1944:

[From the New York Times of May 29, 1944]

On the same day as President Roosevelt called a United Nations monetary conference the British Government published a white paper on post-war plans for maintaining employment. The connection between these two events is closer than it may seem at first sight, for the British post-war plans imply heavy government spending; heavy government spending puts a strain upon the stability of the national currency; and the recent proposal for an $8,000,000,000 international stabilization fund implied that the countries participating were under obligation to bolster the sinking currency of any one of them by pouring in loans in the form of purchases of that country's currency at par.

Under the post-war employment plan the British Government proposes to "pump money into the channels of consumption" by a wide variety of means, including planned spending on public works when depression threatens, concerted action between the treasury and the banks to influence the volume of capital expenditure by variations in the rate of interest so as to keep money cheap, and a system of benefits under social insurance designed to maintain the purchasing power of the community. "We must be ready," write the authors of the proposed policy, "to check and reverse a decline in expenditure on consumer goods which normally follows as a secondary reaction to a falling off in private investment."

We need not examine here the wisdom of the British white paper's proposals. It is sufficient to point out that they imply a policy of cheap money, currency expansion, and deficit spending—all of which must endanger any previously established parity for the British pound sterling. If there were no proposal for an international monetary fund supported by the treasuries of other countries, and particularly by our own, this might merely be dismissed as a matter for the British alone to settle. But the proposed $8,000,000,000 fund raises the question whether other nations can be expected to underwrite such plans and in effect to support such domestic policies.

The British case is simply one illustration of the basic problem raised by the proposed international stabilization fund. For we have invited 41 countries to the monetary conference; and if we are committed to support the currencies of China, Ethiopia, and Iraq, we are thereby committed to support the internal economic policies of China, Ethiopia, and Iraq. How long will we consent? How long could we afford to do this?

International cooperation with regard to stable monetary systems and stable exchanges after the war is imperative. But the proposed $8,000,000,000 stabilization fund wholly misconceives the nature of the problem to be solved. The primary need is sound economic, budgetary, and currency policies within each nation. If these exist, a huge international stabilization fund will be unnecessary. If these do not exist, no international monetary fund, no matter how large, could in the end support an unsound currency. But in attempting to do so it could drain part of the resources of the nations with sound currencies and thereby endanger even their soundness.

[From the New York Times of June 1, 1944]

The United Nations Monetary and Financial Conference, called by the President, will meet a month from today. Its purpose is the highly desirable one of securing stable exchange rates in the post-war world. But the recent proposal for an $8,000,000,000 international stabilization fund misconceives the nature of the problem and approaches it from the wrong end. Essentially it seeks to fix the value of each nation's currency unit in relation to the others by arranging to have the fund buy the weak currencies and to sell the strong currencies at the parities fixed. It is obvious that a weak currency will drop to its true market value as soon as such purchases cease. As long, however, as the purchases continue, the nations with strong currencies will be subsidizing the nations with weak currencies (or at least the private holders of those currencies), and thereby subsidizing also the internal economic policies, whatever they may happen to be, of the nations with weak currencies. The United States, as the chief contributor to the fund, would be the chief loser; but the money that it poured out in this way might not only fail to help world recovery but, by prolonging unsound policies within the nations whose currencies could only be held up by such purchases, might actually do harm.

The true solution of this problem would begin at the other end. It would seek to make currencies sound within each country. If each nation can maintain the integrity of its own currency, if each nation keeps its own monetary unit at par, then the problem of maintaining a stable relationship between different currencies will solve itself. The true object of the forthcoming monetary conference, therefore, should be to lay down the principles and explore the methods by which this can be done.

These broad principles should not be difficult to formulate. One requirement for a stable currency is that it be redeemable in something that is itself fixed and definite; for all practical purposes this means a return to the historic gold standard. Another requirement for a stable currency is a balanced budget. A third requirement is that government refrain from currency and credit inflation. A fourth is a removal of, or at least a great reduction in, the pre-war barriers to international trade—tariffs, quotas, exchange restrictions, and all the rest.

These requirements form a unit. If one of them is violated it will be difficult, if not impossible, to fulfill the others. Thus, if a nation's budget is chronically unbalanced it is practically compelled to resort to borrowing through currency or credit inflation to make up the difference. When it does this it undermines faith in its currency unit and cannot maintain gold payments. Officials of the government then say that the gold standard "has broken down," when they really mean that their own policies have broken it.

There will be grave problems after the war for almost every nation in fixing a new currency parity at a level where it can be held. But the belief that only a rich nation can afford a gold standard is a fallacy. As Viscount Goschen, one of England's ablest Chancellors of the Exchequer, once said: "Our powers of obtaining gold would only be exhausted when the country had nothing left to sell."

The greatest single contribution the United States could make to world currency stability after the war is to announce its determination to stabilize its own currency. It will, incidentally, help us, of course, if other nations as well return to the gold standard. They will do it, however, only to the extent that they recognize that they are doing it not primarily as a favor to us but to themselves.

A Letter From Ernie Pyle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL A. WEISS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include in my remarks a letter I received from Ernie Pyle concerning my fight-pay bill, H. R. 4359, that is worthy of the attention of any Member of this House. Ernie Pyle, famous war correspondent, has lived with our boys since the invasion of north Africa and knows the temper of our boys:

ENGLAND, May 21, 1944.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WEISS: I've wanted for some time to write and thank you for your active interest in the "fight pay" suggestion, but the pressure of events has been such that I just hadn't got around to it. And while I'm at it, thanks too for your very nice words about me and the column in your letter of March 4.

I hope, of course, that your bill passes. But there's a very fine point of distinction about who should be eligible for fight pay, and I'm afraid that's where you may run up against a nub.

I have a feeling that Congress, may be not quite getting the point of what the proposal was made for, will want to give it to anyone who is ever in danger from enemy action. If it is made that way, it will be so broad as to destroy the value in doing it at all. Our original motive was to give recognition to that poor old ——— who lies up there in the mud and cold and rain for weeks at a time, never dry, never warm, eating cold food out of cans, dirty and unshaven and sleepless, and constantly under mortar, artillery, or rifle fire. Usually he is an infantryman, although others do sometimes come into such sustained combat, such as rangers, paratroopers, and S. S. troops.

Lots of other people die too in war—but differently. The sailor lives well until he dies. So does the nurse, comparatively. And the wide fringe of other combat troops who do have casualties but who know nothing of the prolonged mental and physical misery of the old front-line rifle trooper who lives like an animal.

For instance, I suspect that the average person discussing this proposal would want to give fight pay to everyone who served on the Anzio beachhead, for they were all certainly in danger. Yet the bulk of our troops up there, the supply troops and reserves and what not, were living either in houses or dugouts, and were living comfortably.

I think a captain on the beachhead proposed the finest qualification for fight pay that would limit it to the people we mean—he suggested it be given only to those who served at least 4 days a month within small arms range of the enemy. That would automatically rule out all those except the poor old duffer up there in the mud.

I'm just throwing these things out to you as a suggestion to do anything with that you wish. I do feel that the whole point will be destroyed if too broad a definition is given and too many people taken in. Some of our medals have become almost valueless because we give them too freely.

Senator TOBEY has written me a nice letter, and I am making these same suggestions in a letter to him today. Thanks again for your interest, and good luck.

Sincerely,

ERNIE PYLE.

Accomplishments of the Robinson-Patman Act and How It Has Benefited Small Business Enterprises Against Unfair Competition and Price Discriminations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to print, I submit herewith article which appeared in the National Independent anniversary number for May, outlining the benefits which have been derived from the Robinson-Patman Act since its enactment.

There have been far more results through this act in correcting discriminations in prices and other unfair competitive practices than is generally known. The article, which is of particular interest to small business, which law has not been used as freely as it should to correct trade abuses, is as follows:

Contrary to the opinion of some that the Robinson-Patman Act amending the Clayton law against unlawful restraints and monopolies has been ineffective in correcting abuses of discriminations in price and unfair acts of competition, there is abundant evidence that many abuses in business have been corrected.

More could and would be corrected if those affected would report infractions of this law. There has been too much hesitation, however, on the part of businessmen to report what are apparent violations. They fear being involved or having their identity disclosed, and that the complaint may be directed at a friendly competing company or a concern from whom supplies are obtained which may penalize them for reporting discriminations.

There is no justification for this fear since complaints to the Federal Trade Commission which has enforcement jurisdiction are strictly confidential. The Federal Trade Commission cannot proceed without some one making a complaint, hence the importance of cooperation from those affected by any unfair or discriminatory competitive practices. This cooperation from those injured is vital if there is to be further improvement in the competitive picture.

Complaints should be made as complete as possible to the Federal Trade Commission and forwarded to Washington. If there is any further data needed the Commission will contact the complainant, always with the understanding that the identity is strictly confidential. Any leads that will help clear up the issues should be supplied. The Commission then proceeds with its own investigation to ascertain the facts.

WHAT ROBINSON-PATMAN ACT COVERS

The law is directed at correcting price discriminations between purchasers of commodities of "like grade and quality" and where the effect of such discrimination "may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination." Thus both buyer and seller are affected in the event of violation of the law.

Differentials in prices are permitted which "make only due allowance for difference in cost manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered." The Commission, however, may "fix and establish quantity limits and revise the same as it finds necessary, as to particular commodities or classes of commodities where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce."

It is illegal also "to pay or grant, or to receive or accept, anything of value as a commission, brokerage, or other compensation, or any allowance or discount in lieu thereof, except for services rendered in connection with the sale or purchase of goods, wares, or merchandise, either to the other party to such transaction or to an agent, representative, or other intermediary therein where such intermediary is acting in fact or in behalf, or is subject to the direct or indirect control, of any party to such transaction other than the person by whom such compensation is so granted or paid."

It is also unlawful under this act "to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value to or for the benefit of a customer of such person—or in consideration for any service or facilities furnished by or through such customer in connection with processing, handling, sale or offering for sale of any products or commodities manufactured, sold or offered for sale by such person, unless such payment or consideration is available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products or commodities."

Moreover it is unlawful under this act to "discriminate in favor of one purchaser against another purchaser—by contracting to furnish or furnishing, or by contributing to the furnishing thereof, any services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms."

In addition it is unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of commerce, knowingly to induce or receive a discrimination in price which is prohibited by this act.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVEN CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS

Since the enactment of this law 107 orders to cease and desist have been issued in Robinson-Patman cases. These cover 50 types of commodities or lines of business, 16 of the total number bearing in quantity discounts which have been prohibited or limited. There were 45 orders involving price discrimination, 59 unlawful brokerage allowances, 11 cover advertising and other allowances, and 5 referred to inducing and receiving price discriminations.

The lines of business affected include bakers' yeast, window glass, chicory, optical goods, ice cream, fresh fruits and vegetables, padlocks, rubber and rubber products, beds, springs, couches, mattresses, typographical numbering machines, paint, artificial teeth, and bakery packages and food products.

Cease-and-desist orders have been issued against the biggest concerns in their line, including United States Rubber Co., Standard Brands, Inc., The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., numerous buying organizations, Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., United States Fence Manufacturers Association, Atlantic Commission Co., Corn Products Refining Co., Lambert Pharmacal Co., Sherwin-Williams Co., Life Savers Corporation, and National Biscuit Co.

The accomplishments of the Robinson-Patman Act and its effect in the correction of unfair competition, discriminatory discounts, allowances, etc., have been of much greater effect than the issuance of cease-and-desist orders Following the passage of this act in June 1936 there was an almost universal effort made by members of industry in general to reexamine and revise their pricing schedules and policies to comply with its provisions.

MILLIONS OF DOLLARS IN REBATES

Previous to the enactment of this law discriminations and unfair practices on the part of many companies were rampant as there was no restraint whatever on their operations. The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. for instance, received $7,105,000 in rebates and advertising allowances. Chain-store corporations of all types received concessions in lower prices, excessive quantity discounts, free goods to lower costs of products, which totaled many millions of dollars.

Some of these big distributors engaged in retailing threatened manufacturers that if they did not give them concessions under one guise or another they would refuse to buy any of their products and enter the production of such products in competition with them. These concessions have been demanded to obtain an undue advantage over their competitors and in numerous instances concerns have been forced out of business due to inability to make both ends meet because of the low prices exacted. In other cases these companies after failure have been taken over by some of these large operators.

With the passage of the Robinson-Patman antiprice discrimination law manufacturers had an effective instrument in their own hands against these powerful buyers whose chief aim had been to drive prices down for supplies. They now can resist all threats by pointing to this act as they are just as guilty to give concessions as those who receive them.

The war has helped considerably in overcoming chiseling by the big buyers, even among manufacturers whose entire output was taken over by chains, mail order houses and big department stores. Such manufacturing companies while they have a fairly steady output because of the mass buying of big distributors have been caught in the squeeze. Selling on an extremely close margin they were caught with advancing raw materials and wage increases and many of them have appealed to O. P. A. for relief.

MORE COULD BE ATTAINED

In the face of the many concessions of one type or another before the enactment of the Robinson-Patman Act many wondered how the independent merchants were able to exist because of the cutthroat competition to which they were subjected due to the price discriminations in one form or another.

Much of these abuses of fair competition have been eliminated though some still exist which are being constantly corrected. More could be accomplished in this direction if businessmen injured would disclose bona fide instances of violation of Robinson-Patman Act to the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. Speaker, there is one vital point in connection with prosecution of this law that is not generally known to the trade. When a conviction is obtained through the Federal Trade Commission which is finally sustained, the injured company can file action for triple damages through their own attorneys, whose fees the offender must pay in addition.

Congress Looks at Civil Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Civil Service Assembly of the United States and Canada, June 1, 1944, in New York City:

Two points summarize the general attitude of Congress toward civil service: (1) We are for it, and (2) we think it should and must work efficiently.

The merit system in this country is now 61 years old and has achieved rather widespread approval. But there is nothing sacred or inevitable about the civil-service system. If it functions effectively and can justify itself, it will survive Victory Day and the postwar period. Regardless of the political party in power, however, the American citizens, through their elected representatives, will demand a discriminating tax dollar. Public personnel officials must be prepared to use a dollars-and-cents yardstick in measuring the value of their work. This can be done increasingly in connection with such matters as production records, absenteeism, accidents, and labor turn-over.

Financial standards in personnel work should supplement and not supplant the human touch. We should make every effort to eliminate unnecessary forms and records and to simplify our procedures. Paper work should be reduced to a minimum. This would save time, money, and materials and free personnel workers to deal more directly with down-to-earth problems and human equations.

CONGRESS HAS BEEN HELPFUL

Historically, Congress has been reasonably favorable to the principles of civil service. I think this is also true of most State legislatures and city councils. A look at the record shows this to be increasingly so since 1883, when the Pendleton Act became the legislative foundation for the merit system in our National Government. With few exceptions, the record shows a continuing rise in the proportion of Federal employees under civil-service coverage. This figure has reached approximately 95 percent—probably an all-time high.

In addition, Congress has broadened and strengthened the Federal personnel program through the adoption of the Retirement Act of 1920, the Classification Act of 1923, and similar laws, notably those sponsored by Representative ROBERT RAMSPECK, able chairman of our House Civil Service Committee. This is a record of advance and not retreat, and clearly spells out the attitude of Congress.

In our personnel legislation there are still gaps to be filled. More definite authority should be provided for the carrying on of such important but neglected activities as: Employee training, health, and safety. This can and will be done, through closer working relationships between the legislative and executive branches.

While the legislative attitude is generally largely sympathetic there are, nevertheless, certain criticsms which should be openly discussed.

The House Civil Service Committee, for more than a year, has been investigating personnel administration in the Federal Government. One of the earliest findings was overstaffing, particularly in the new and expanding war agencies.

The committee's interim report sets forth the background of this undesirable situation as follows:

"In the summer and fall of 1942, the Federal Government's employment curve shot up with alarming rapidity. For the first 9 months of 1942, in fact, the Government was hiring 100,000 additional workers every 30 days. Confusion, duplication, and needless hiring followed inevitably in the wake of this enormous rate of employment. Workers themselves complained of idleness, which they attributed to a lack of coordination and responsible management. Members of Congress were swamped with demands for a halt to what their constituents believed to be unwarranted mass hiring."

IMPROVEMENTS ARE MADE

Since this first report, substantial improvements have been made. Not only was the upswing halted but an actual decline in Federal employment has occurred during the past year. This saving resulted partly from the committee's work and partly from the efforts of personnel and other administrative officials, including action in the Senate.

Another finding which disturbed our investigating committee was the apparent lack of management control in the executive branch of the Federal Government. The uncoordinated departments and agencies do not have an overall centralized authority with such powers of control. This is a basic cause not only of over-staffing but also of overlapping of functions—a broader problem than usually thought of in connection with personnel work.

According to the committee's first report: "Some students of the civil-service structure are of the opinion the Bureau of the Budget has wide, discretionary powers over Federal management. Others believe the Civil Service Commission has such authority. Still others are of the opinion that such authority is vested in the General Accounting Office. The 10-month study made by your committee leads to the inescapable conclusion that neither of these agencies has such authority, that no such authority exists anywhere in the Government today. The committee will study further the problem of over-all management. From time to time the committee will make further reports with specific recommendations for the improvement of the operations in the various Government agencies."

Other weaknesses were found in such matters as poor supervision, inequities in classification and pay, and overrapid promotions. However, the Congress, the Civil Service Commission, and the departments and agencies are all working to bring about needed corrections. The council of personnel administration is playing a useful role in all these endeavors.

Civil-service commissions have a necessary place in modern government. They have done a satisfactory though not a perfect job of wiping out the spoils system and other forms of favoritism. By providing an equal opportunity for citizens to compete for positions in the public service, they have increased confidence in our form of government.

By furnishing qualified eligibles to operating agencies, they have increased the efficiency of the government business. In such other personnel matters as promotions, transfers, classification, pay, and retirement, civil-service agencies have made some contributions. But central personnel agencies at best can do only a limited amount of the big job of public management.

Administrators, supervisors, and foremen in the operating departments have the greatest opportunity for attaining a high standard of employee performance and satisfaction. Unfortunately, these operating officials too seldom recognize and accept their personnel responsibilities. An important job yet to be accomplished by personnel specialists is that of getting administrative and supervisory officials to do the bulk of the personnel job.

HEALTH AND SAFETY NEGLECTED

Now I want to speak specifically of two areas of personnel administration which I think have been neglected in the public service. These are fields in which I have long taken a deep and personal interest—employee safety and employee health. In my judgment, personnel directors in the public service must give much more attention to these subjects than they have in the past. Unquestionably these are neglected matters, and one of the reasons why the accident experience and the provisions for medical care of workers in the Federal service is so unsatisfactory is because no one has had the specific responsibility for them. It's trite, but true, everybody's business is nobody's business. The personnel director in the public service must be equipped in the future to give leadership in these new fields. We know he must be broader than an expert in appointment and classification matters. Just as he has broadened his scope to cover training and personnel utilization as essentials of his day-to-day job, so in the future he must assume aggressive leadership for all the phases of employee relations and employee welfare, including safety and health.

I have seen in the coal industry of my own State of West Virginia what happens when employers begin taking a genuine interest in accident prevention. In 1941 the Federal mine-inspection bill was passed, as you may recall. This act requires more strict inspection of mine property and the setting up of modern safety programs. In order to meet the new standards it was necessary for mine operators, who had taken only an indifferent interest in accident prevention, to provide adequate and up-to-date safety organizations in their mines. What is the result? In the first year of operation the coal industry, which is producing at an all-time high, with new properties in operation and with tens of thousands of inexperienced miners, has been able actually to reduce accident rates.

While accident rates have been going upward—seemingly out of control—in other industries, in the coal industry, a booming, expanding industry, they have actually come down. I cite this case because it shows what can be done when management and labor take hold of the problem in earnest, and much of the credit for this improvement, of course, must be given to the workers themselves. Any bureau chief or operating official who does not enlist the interest, support, and initiative of workers in his accident prevention program is overlooking a good bet. This is certainly one endeavor in which management and labor can close ranks and go down the line together.

It is this human side of the personnel job which appeals to me and which after all is most important.

I have said that safety is neglected in the Federal service. Here are a few shocking facts: Almost as many Federal employees were injured last year in the conduct of the Federal business as were employed by the Departments of State, Justice, Treasury, and Interior combined. Of the 157,000 Federal workers injured in 1943, 90,000 lost time from work. This lost time accounts for a sizeable share of the absenteeism that retards the war efforts of the Federal Government. It represents 5,000,000 chargeable days lost from work. It adds up to a direct cost of almost $10,000,000—an indirect cost of $40,000,000 to $50,000,000. In this one year 617 Government employees—not fighters on the battle fronts—lost their lives in the business of the Government.

FEDERAL ACCIDENT RATE HIGH

When I tell you that the average accident record of the Federal Government is six times as high as that of du Pont's, a company engaged in particularly hazardous work, I submit that safety in the Federal service is a neglected field. Government, with only 50 percent of its workers in industrial operations, has a record only slightly better than the average of those reporting to the National Safety Council. Yet it is interesting to observe that some of the best industrial employers have a record only one-third or even one-fourth of the national average. This shows what can be done. Not for a moment should Government rest content until it is as careful of its manpower as any private employer, bar none. Certainly in these days of manpower shortage no employer should be hiring additional workers simply because he fails to conserve the ones on his rolls. Isn't safety a problem of utilization, of placement, of training, of knowing the accident proneness of workers, of knowing the ways to make them safety-minded? The personnel officer has a challenging role to play.

To be sure, the record of Government is not all bad. Where some attention has been given to safety, we find the same fine results that General Motors, U. S. Rubber, and other private employers have achieved. If the Government as a whole had as good a rate, for example, as the Alexandria, Va., Torpedo Station—an installation doing hazardous work, at that—the executive branch would have saved last year a total of more than 5,000,000 man-days in productive work, the full time of 17,000 workers.

The record of this and other units of the Federal Government shows as clearly as in private industry that safety is not due to chance alone. As President D. D. Fennell, of the National Safety Council has said, "Safety is actually purchasable—any city, State, or industry can determine its own accident rate." Safety must be planned for and paid for. With a few exceptions safety plans have not been made in the Federal service, and in many departments Congress has not been asked to appropriate adequate funds for afety promotion. Operating officials and personnel people alike are to blame. Neither the heads of agencies nor the Budget people, nor the personnel people have made clear to Congress the necessity for accident prevention. Neither the Civil Service Commission nor the Bureau of the Budget has shown aggressive leadership in this respect. All of those concerned in personnel and, in fact, in general management have a responsibility which they have not yet discharged. Personally, I feel sure that Congress will be willing to take an interest and play its part when the executive branch makes entirely clear the need for safety methods and safety funds.

On employee health I think the record is a bit different. Congress has received the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission for general legislation to permit the establishment of medical and health programs in the departments and agencies. The best thinking of both medical and personnel people was brought together in this proposal, which I have introduced as a bill.

In these times when the Government is employing thousands of the physically handicapped and a larger proportion of elderly people and women, it is self-evident to me that medical and health services are necessary tools in maintaining the health and efficiency of workers. Certainly industry has found that health programs pay in reduced absenteeism and increased production. The National Association of Manufacturers reports that the installation of medical and health programs in 234 industrial establishments was accompanied by a 29.7 reduction in absences due to sickness. As the veterans come home and become reemployed in Government, we shall need the utmost of medical skill to make sure we are placing them effectively.

I realize that there are departments and agencies which are doing little or nothing because they believe congressional sanction is necessary. It is my intention to do all in my power to speed the passage of this health legislation. It is up to Congress to act now.

MERIT SYSTEM ENCOURAGED

On the credit side of the personnel ledger, there are some encouraging developments to report. One of the most important is the rising popular interest in the merit system. This is reflected by the action of numerous civic, professional, and employee groups which have endorsed the principle and given impetus to the adoption, extension, and strengthening of civil service laws throughout the country. As a result, we have witnessed phonomenal growth of the merit system in national, State, and local units of government; so that today more than one thousand of these jurisdictios are already under a civil-service system. It is, of course, up to the public personnel officials of the Nation to see that we have better management of the public business as a result of these laws which legislative bodies have adopted. For the most part, this challenge is being met with reasonable success.

Another bright spot observed during the past 10 years has been the creation of departmental personnel offices throughout the Federal Government and in many States and cities. This has resulted in far greater attention to the daily personnel problems which arise in the operating agencies where the real work of government is done. More effective personnel utilization is being achieved because of these personnel offices. Improved supervision and better placement have been attained. Employee training, health and safety work can be carried on more successfully when the departmental personnel offices are avaliable to supplement the necessary but limited work of civil-service commissions.

The whole country, in this war, has become training conscious in the armed forces, in industry, and in the Government. We have had to train people by millions to do new jobs, and our astonishing war production shows that we have succeeded. There was a time in government when it was thought sufficient just to take a person from a civil-service register and put him to work. There was no recognized need for job training. People learned by the pick-up method—often far too slowly.

TRAINING PROGRAM VALUABLE

Perhaps one of the biggest contributions Government has made to the war effort has been the training-within-industry program of the War Manpower Commission. The short intensive training courses developed by this unit of Government have been given to more than a million supervisors in industry and to more than 100,000 supervisors in the Federal service. Management has learned to use training as a tool. Never again can we go back to the horse-and-buggy days of just letting the worker finally discover for himself how to do his job. There can be no question that the business of Government will be carried on more efficiently in years to come as a result of our wartime experience with training.

After the war our number one placement problem will be the finding of jobs for returning veterans. Personnel officers in national, State, and local governments and in industry will carry a large share of responsibility for dealing with this problem successfully. In most units of government and in some industries, plans for restoring veterans to their old jobs are well advanced. But we must face and work out many difficulties—the disabled service veteran, the messenger of 4 years ago returning as a major, the so-called psychoneurotic, and those expecting to return to jobs or agencies which have been wiped out during the war.

Another question of serious concern to personnel administrators is that of the civilian employees to be displaced by returning veterans or to be laid off from liquidating war agencies. Employment stabilization on a nation-wide basis is a general responsibility of Government and industry. Within Government the legislative and executive branches must pull together if we are to avoid a reaction against formal merit systems in the clamor for jobs.

We should not forget, however, that the immediate and most urgent problem before us is that of winning the war. While we should think ahead, we should also place our major emphasis on doing a homefront job as thoroughly as possible. We must tap all possible sources of labor supply and utilize those now on the job more effectively than ever before.

LOYAL WORKERS PRAISED

In conclusion, ladies and gentlemen, there is a fallacy I desire to nail on the head. The luxury of constantly blasting the bureaucrat is one the Government and our people can ill afford. Morale is determined in a large measure by the confidence which workers have in their leaders, and the usefulness of programs. Federal employees have a right to react against carping criticisms in the press and on the radio. This unfair attack does not inspire the ablest people to seek Government as a place to work. Government will not conduct itself well if it must absorb the leftovers in personnel. These so-called bureaucrats who are running the Government include capable, conscientious, and courageous Donald Nelson, Ed. Stettinius, Bill Batt, Ralph Bard, Frank Yates, J. Edgar Hoover, and James Forrestal. Congratulations from my heart go to the engineers and the architects, the clerks and the laborers who are building our ships, and designing the guns for our battle wagons, and the engines for our fighting planes.

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news release appearing in the Sparta (Wis.) Herald of May 19, 1944, and other Wisconsin papers:

WASHINGTON NEWS LETTER

(By Congressman WILLIAM H. STEVENSON)

Servicemen's Benefits—Dependents' Aid of Several Kinds—Not Only Wife, Children, But Parents, Brothers, Sisters May Be Eligible—

The application for veterans' dependents' allowance is important, and there is need for giving the matter prompt attention.

This application is made on special forms, available at the induction center from the enlisted man's commanding officer. In filling out the form the enlisted man should be careful to spell all names correctly and give exact information as to marriage, dates of birth, etc. Many of the difficulties concerning allotments are due to carelessness in filling out the forms.

In the event the enlisted man fails for some reason or other to make application, any class A dependent can make application instead. These forms may be obtained from the War or Navy Departments, from the County Veterans' Service officer, or you may obtain an application by writing your Congressman. I will be pleased to forward one to you and assist in every possible way. The Army requires that its regular application form be filled out, while the Navy simply requires a letter giving the name of the applicant's wife and children, date of birth, and service address of the enlisted man.

If the serviceman does not wish to make application for class B or B-1 dependents, no other person can apply. These allotments are granted and continue only at the will of the man or woman in the service. They cannot be forced to make application. However, whenever an enlisted man fails to make such application and the dependents are reasonably sure that he will approve it, they may make the application themselves. The permission of the enlisted man then will be obtained by the service; and if he gives permission, the allotment will be approved and payments started. Thus, it can be seen that only class A dependents can obtain allotments without the consent of the serviceman. All other dependents require his approval.

Other relatives—parents and brothers or sisters of servicemen—can receive an allotment even if the serviceman's wife and children are getting one. If the enlisted man also partially supported his parents and brothers or sisters prior to his entrance into the service, they are also eligible for an allotment. Application can be made in the usual manner and all that is necessary is proof of dependency, as though the enlisted man were single.

For example, if there is a wife and one child dependent upon the serviceman, they receive $80. If this same man has two parents and a sister also dependent upon him, they can receive a total of $79 also. To get this extra $79, all that is necessary is an additional $5 deduction from the serviceman's pay. The Government makes up the difference. If the parents and brothers or sisters are only partially dependent—that is, less than 50 percent—they can get $37.

Often your Congressman can help expedite allotment applications when there is real need for this money, so it is advisable that you write me when payments are slow in coming to you. Address your inquiry to Congressman WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

In addition, if parents are dependent upon more than one son or daughter, who are both in the service, they are eligible for larger allotments. For example, if two parents are over 50 percent dependent upon a son in the service, they receive $68 a month. Now, if another son or daughter enters into the service, upon whom they depended also for support, these same two parents are eligible to receive another $37 from the second son or daughter. Although a serviceman has a wife and children receiving an allotment, that does not prevent his parents and brothers and sisters dependent on him from getting an allotment also.

International Politics at Home and Abroad

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Churchill, speaking before the British Dominion Prime Ministers in London early in May said:

It is right that the British Empire in its collective united aspect should put itself solidly on the map, and make all the watching world realize that it stands together.

Following Mr. Churchill at the same meeting was Mr. Mackenzie King, speaking for Canada, who said:

The Government of Canada is as anxious as the Prime Minister of Great Britain and his colleagues to display to the world the solidarity of the Commonwealth in loyalty to the cause for which we fight.

There is a striking contract between the reception given those words in the British Empire and the reception our administration forces would give similar words uttered concerning the United States by a citizen of this country. For any person in public life to insist that the United States "put itself solidly on the map" would bring down upon his head an official "hush-hush" and a barrage of left-wing smears charging him with being a Nationalist or Fascist; this latter being a popular term used against anyone who does not agree with the New Deal ideologies.

VOTES MAKE A DIFFERENCE

But when votes are involved, there is no such "hush-hush" in the United States. May 24, Churchill, addressing Commons, said:

For a long time past the Foreign Secretary and I have labored with all our strength to try to bring about a resumption of relations between the Soviet Government and the Polish Government, which we recognized and have always recognized since the days of General Sikorski. * * * Our efforts to bring about a renewal of relations between the Polish Government in London and the Soviet have not succeeded. We deeply regret that fact, and we must take care to say nothing that would make an agreement more difficult in the future.

POLES—POLITICIANS

The Polish-American Congress in Buffalo last week charged that "certain Americans are ready to push Poland and the Baltic countries into the Russian orbit and force them to live collectivism." There are slightly less than 3,000,000 persons of Polish descent in the United States. Politicians are now courting them. Ignoring Mr. Churchill's admonition, an administration politician told the Polish-American Congress that the consequence of imposing upon Poland a boundary that will expose her to her enemies and the reduction of her domain to a point where it will impair her growth and virility will prove disastrous and a threat to future peace.

On the other hand, there are votes among the Communist forces in the United States who have pledged themselves to go all out for the New Deal and reelection of the President, abandoning their name "Communist Party" and disguising under the name of "Communist Political Association." This group sympathetically supports Russia in her designs on Poland.

Mr. Churchill's House of Commons speech gives Americans an idea of the goal of British diplomacy for a four-power pact to rule the world. He referred to Britain, the United States, Russia, and China. These great powers are expected to never again quarrel but will rule the world in peace forever and a day. Many problems will have to be overcome if this be true. The Russian-Polish problem is only a start. The Russian-British rivalry in the Near East deeply involves Palestine, the Arabs, and the whole Mohammedan world. What about Hong Kong, claimed by China through natural rights and by the British who made it? Sitting at a four-power peace table, with whom will the United States cast its vote on controversial questions involving Britain and Russia, China and Britain, or Russia and China? Churchill said "In one place we support a king, in another a Communist." Will Russia agree to a king one place and China agree to a Communist in another? In this connection Churchill said further:

We do not include in our program of world renovation any forcible action against any government whose internal form of administration does not come up to our ideas, and any remarks I have made on that subject refer only to enemy powers and their satellites who will be struck down by the force of arms. They are the ones who have ventured into the open and they are the ones whom we shall not allow to become again an expression of those peculiar doctrines associated with fascism and nazi-ism, which undoubtedly have brought about the terrible struggle in which we are engaged. Surely anyone can see the difference. * * * Consultations always are proceeding between the three great powers and others and every effort is being made to explore the future to resolve difficulties and to obtain the greatest measure of common agreement. A few things have already become quite clear and were very prominent at the conference just concluded.

The Atlantic Charter has popped back into British-American happenings via the Roosevelts. Churchill noted in his speech that he was expected to set the Atlantic Charter in its exact and true relation to subsequent declarations and current events. He launched into this after the lengthy portion of his speech dealing with Spanish relations to the Allies and to the Axis, praising Franco's government for resistance to German pressure concerning Gibraltar, and concluded that part of his remarks by stating:

I have no sympathy with those who think it clever and even funny to insult and abuse the Government of Spain whenever the occasion arises.

BUT THE ROOSEVELTS DISSENT

Side by side in a Washington newspaper were two articles concerning separate press conferences held by the Roosevelts—F. D. and Eleanor. Reporting the President's press conference the one story says:

President Roosevelt said yesterday that in his judgment Spain had not yet sufficiently reduced the volume of its material aid to Germany. He added that he did not think any of us were satisfied with what the Government of Spain had been doing since we have been in the war.

In the next column of the same newspaper an article appears under the heading "Can't teach an old dog, etc., Mrs. Roosevelt says of Churchill."

The article says:

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, discussing Prime Minister Churchill's conciliatory policy toward the Franco Government of Spain, said yesterday: "Mr. Churchill has thought a certain way for 60 years and I don't think he wants to change the way he has thought for 60 years."

Commenting further, the article says:

Churchill's foreign policy speech of last week, which touched on Spain, she termed "very characteristic of Churchill," adding that he himself would be "shocked" if anyone suggested that by it he laid the Atlantic Charter on the shelf.

Do Mrs. Roosevelt's remarks concerning Churchill mean something has come between the two men who signed the Atlantic Charter—her husband and the Prime Minister? If so, will the British through their press and actions continue to plug for a fourth term for Mr. Roosevelt? And how will these personal quarrels affect international relations and desired permanent peace?

Address of Rear Admiral Emory S. Land

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein an address made by Rear Admiral Emory S. Land, United States Navy, retired, Chairman, United States Maritime Commission, and War Shipping Administrator, before the Institute of Transportation, New York University School of Law and School of Commerce, Accounts and Finance, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York City:

This week marks the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the sailing from Savannah, Ga., of the first steam-powered vessel to cross the Atlantic. It therefore seems appropriate and prudent as we recall this important event in the history of transportation to take stock of our present standing as a maritime power and, where possible, to relate that position to the future.

Today we are concentrating on the grim business of building and operating ships to win this war. However, we need not blind ourselves to the responsibilities of our maritime future.

Frankly, it is my opinion that we have the opportunity of making the American merchant marine of the post-war days as important a factor in the water-borne commerce of the world as it was a century ago when American clipper ships sailed all the seas, carrying a substantial portion of our foreign trade.

When the war is over world shipping will play an indispensable role in attempts to maintain permanent peace, so today we turn to the part which we, as a nation, may play in developing commercial operations with a vigorous American merchant fleet.

We will have ships second to none in quality, speed, and safety. We will have the trained personnel to man them and trained personnel and management to operate them.

Do we have the foresight and the will to make the best of the opportunity before us to establish a peacetime merchant marine adequate to meet our needs? Can we operate and maintain a fleet of modern, efficient vessels that will insure us against dependence upon foreign-flag shipping for the movement of a substantial portion of our foreign trade, both import and export?

I believe we can, and that we can insure ourselves against ever again having to expend billions of dollars in the hasty construction of a fleet to serve as auxiliaries to our fighting forces. The construction of a large fleet under wartime pressure requires expenditures far beyond normal costs and, in addition, takes time that should be devoted to getting on with the actual fighting.

In 1939 the world's merchant fleets ran to some 75,000,000 dead-weight tons divided approximately as follows: British, 27,000,000; American, 11,000,000; Japanese, 8,000,000; German, 5,000,000; Italian, 4,000,000; Norwegian, Dutch, Swedish, Greek, and others, 20,000,000.

It seems a reasonable assumption that when the war ends and peace terms are discussed, the question of shipping and particularly the future of Axis shipping, will receive a great deal of close attention. There has been much comment here and abroad as to limitation of Axis shipping to necessary coastwise and interisland vessels with the handling of all oceangoing tonnage under flags of the United Nations.

In view of the part we as a Nation are taking in world affairs, it is not likely that we will again withdraw into that self-satisfied attitude of isolationism which colored the thinking of many citizens not long ago. We must, therefore, consider the part we should have in handling world commerce when peace and reconstruction come.

To meet the statutory requirements of the Merchant Marine Act we must have a merchant fleet adequate "to carry our domestic water-borne commerce, and a substantial portion of our water-borne * * * foreign commerce." It must "provide shipping service on all routes essential for maintaining the flow of such domestic and foreign water-borne commerce at all times," and it must be "capable of serving as a naval and military auxiliary in time of war and national emergency."

This means that we must have a larger merchant marine than existed before the war. There is a general feeling that this fleet should be somewhere between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000 dead-weight tons; and with the tremendous merchant marine construction during the war, there is every indication that we should have a sufficient number of vessels "of the best-equipped, safest, and most suitable types" for the purpose.

I have been accused of pulling a rabbit out of the hat when I indicated that our post-war merchant marine should be somewhere between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000 dead-weight tons. The rabbit is the Japanese merchant marine and the hat is Japan. If we take the combined dead-weight tonnage employed by the Axis Nations prior to the war and assign one-third to the United States and two-thirds to the other United Maritime Nations, the increment over 1939 to the American merchant marine could and should be employed primarily in handling the services where Japanese tonnage formerly was employed.

There is no thought in my mind that those members of the United Nations group whose very lives depend upon their merchant fleets should be deprived of their full rights because of an increase in the merchant fleet flying the Stars and Stripes. In fact, by assigning to them two-thirds of the tonnage operations formerly handled by the Axis Nations, their respective merchant fleets would be increased, just as we believe ours should be.

If we are to have such an expanded merchant marine, and expect to maintain it under private ownership and operation in successful commercial competition with others, we must clear away certain existing situations some of which place our vessels at a disadvantage with those operating under other flags. These can be resolved, I believe, so that all inequalities, except those based upon our higher standard of living, are removed.

The solution of these problems is not something which the shipping industry can leave to the Government. They concern the entire industry directly and indirectly, and many of them are international in character. We must, under the circumstances, strive to reach an agreement with the shipping industries in the other maritime nations, and to reap the advantages from the opportunities in foreign fields when the war is over, we should begin to resolve some of these difficulties now.

In mentioning them here, it is my hope that the attention of the entire industry will be directed to them, and that the industry collectively will accept the challenge to take these problems under consideration now, and clear them up without unnecessary delay.

Among the problems that must be solved to remove inequalities of operational costs, establish the utmost safety at sea, and allow us to maintain that adequate merchant marine which we are charged with fostering and encouraging are:

1. What are we going to do about conference rates and regulations? Do we favor them, and will membership in them be of advantage or disadvantage to the American merchant marine? Should they be regulated more closely by government or be left more completely under private operation?

2. Should there be a clearer understanding and more uniformity between the American and British groups on the classification of ships, including construction rules and regulations?

3. How far are we going to go in making international agreements on safety at sea, the number of lifeboats and their character, the placing of the Plimsoll marks, and fireproofing? Differences on these points can have considerable bearing upon the safety of the ship, and the passengers and cargoes that are carried, as well as on the relative earning power of the vessel.

4. Why should thereby differences in the canal tolls paid by vessels using the same route because of differences in the admeasurement rules of different countries? Canal transportation costs are not minor items, and all vessels should be treated on an equitable basis no matter what flags they fly.

5. Can there be agreement among the maritime nations as to the size, location, and character of crews' quarters? If our standards in this respect are maintained, and are so much higher than others, we are placed at a decided disadvantage in original cost and maintenance. If our standards are correct, how can we bring the other maritime nations into line? What part will the seamen's unions take in establishing uniformity?

6. Are we to be interested in international sanctions that will affect shipping, and are we to favor shipping pools? Without the existing United Nations shipping pool, which directs the use of the United Nations' merchant vessels to the best possible advantage, our present war efforts would be seriously hampered. Are we to favor an international committee on shipping in times of peace which will exercise some such control on the operation of ships, or do we want to go it alone?

7. What are we going to do about the possible revision of our navigation laws? Some of the present provisions date back to the days when navigation was quite a different problem than today, and there are undoubtedly conditions existing today which, for the sake of uniformity in navigation and safety, should be clearly defined and regulated.

8. Are the labor laws that apply to "the men who go down to the sea in ships" archaic in principle or application? The days when the dregs of the beach manned the ships are passed and we must have labor laws to meet present-day conditions at sea. Insofar as possible, there should be a uniformity among the maritime nations in this regard.

9. Will it be of advantage to the seamen and to the shipping industry to abandon the long-standing practice of signing on and signing off the crew for a round-trip voyage, and placing the contractural relations between the shipowner and the crew on a more permanent basis? Whether the present basis to which the unions have tied a rotation system of employment for a considerable number in normal times is better than steady employment for a smaller group, has many points of discussion. Whatever plan is adopted should apply to all.

In resuming normal trade relations with other nations when the war is over we might well profit by the example set by our great merchandising establishments in expanding and developing their business. They have proven an efficient delivery system of their own—in these cases, an adequate fleet of trucks—to be of prime importance in building and expanding their business. If we, as a great agricultural and industrial nation, support a merchant marine which can render that type of service to other nations, it stands to reason we can profit from the service we render.

The Clipper ships of a century ago proved that to be true; the trade and prestige resulting from this service made a great contribution to the rapid and healthy growth of a young nation, where free competitive enterprise was proving to be a dominant and constructive force.

If today and in the future we are to make that overseas delivery fleet felt in the further upbuilding and defense of our country, it is up to each one of us to see that our merchants, our exporters, our importers, and our travelers make use of that fleet. Our ships will not in themselves create trade. They are but the vehicle of delivery, and become effective only as those who have the goods to sell abroad, or who purchase products in the foreign markets make use of them.

Back in the early twenties the United States Shipping Board adopted the slogan, "Travel and ship on American-build ships." There is just as much a need for the application of that principle today; in fact, it will be of even more importance when peacetime commerce is resumed than it was then. We now have a far greater investment in merchant ships than we had when that slogan was adopted. That slogan still stands, but it can and should be amplified by stressing the importance of American exporters selling their wares c. i. f. destination and American importers buying their needs f. o. b. shipping point, and in each case seeing that the shipments are made on American-flag ships.

It is important that the public be made aware of the national economic benefit derived from the maintenance and use of an adequate merchant marine. Twice in a quarter of a century we have been faced with the necessity of building a large fleet of vessels, on a wartime basis, to serve as an auxiliary of the Navy. To serve as such auxiliary in time of need, the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 provided for the development and maintenance of an adequate merchant marine which in normal times could serve as the delivery fleet for our domestic and foreign water-borne commerce.

To enable us to have the "best equipped, safest, and most suitable types of ships," that can compete on an even cost basis with foreign flag ships, Congress provided in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, that the Government should assume the difference in the cost of building the ships here and abroad. In consideration of this assumption of a part of the cost, the vessels became a part of the auxiliary reserve fleet of the Navy, and subject to requisition by the Government in time of need.

To place the owners of the vessels on a competitive operational basis with the owners of foreign flag vessels, Congress provided that the Government should pay to the shipowner in an amount sufficient to cover the actual difference in operating costs under the American flag. It further provided for the setting aside from the earnings of the vessels sufficient amounts to take care of the deferred payments on the purchase price, and the depreciation replacement funds. It also provided for setting aside a share of the earnings from which at stated periods reimbursement is made to the Government, insofar as possible of the amounts paid by it to the owner, to cover these differences in operating costs.

If the ships travel full to cubic capacity and down to the Plimsoll mark, they can and will earn sufficient to repay the Government for the amounts advanced to the owners to cover the difference in operating costs. If the travelers and shippers will see that the ships sail full and down, there should develop a situation where the recovery by the Government from net earnings will offset the amounts paid by it to cover operating differentials.

This country in normal times has produced approximately 10 percent more than is required for its own needs. If this surplus can be disposed of in the foreign market, it will not hang over the domestic market as a threat to lower prices with a corresponding reduction in wages and living standards; but will set up abroad a credit which we can use in purchasing such products as we may need or desire which will serve to keep our living standards on a high level.

In the days following the war when we anticipate an even greater market abroad for our products, the possibility of earnings from American flag vessels, if we as a nation will support and use them, should enable us to set our merchant marine on a firmly established basis and at a minimum cost to the public.

During the past few months, a great amount of misinformation has been published in reference to steel fractures on Liberty ships. The Maritime Commission has furnished all the details and all the facts in respect to such fractures to the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and the Truman committee of the Senate, both of which have been making careful investigations of this subject. The entire subject has also been under careful study by the Maritime Commission, the War Shipping Administration, the Coast Guard, the Navy, and the American Bureau of Shipping.

The outstanding fact is that while six Liberty ships have broken in two, during the same period seven riveted-type ships have suffered like fractures, and the record on the riveted ship is in no way complete, whereas the current record on the Liberty ship is entirely complete.

Structural failures of ships at sea under the general heading of "Acts of God" have occurred since Noah built the Ark, and man has failed to design or build a ship which he can guarantee will pass through every storm or sea, and the Liberty is no exception.

During the past year, collision losses alone have been many times more serious along the Atlantic coast between New England and Florida, than have been the failures of any and all kinds in Liberty ships throughout the world.

The Liberty ship is the pack horse of the sea and nothing is gained by attempting to put a blot on its escutcheon. Intended and designed solely as a cargo carrier, the Liberty ship has already been converted into nine different types of auxiliaries for special uses in the all-out war effort. Beggars are not choosers, and we have found that necessity is truly the mother of invention in meeting the requirements of the military high command.

No one need offer apologies for the Liberty ship. It has performed wonders carrying essential war cargo to all parts of the world, and the fact that it could be built in such a short time has enabled us to erase the black cloud of "too little and too late" that marked our first efforts in the war. Furthermore, let me assure you there is no justification for the thought that the steel fractures which developed on Liberty ships were due to faulty work or haste in construction.

In the operation of commercial cargo and passenger vessels there has always been an element of venture or chance on the part of the operator, and there always will be. Under the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, there arises the question of the expense involved which must be met by the taxpayer. In any determination of the number of ships that should be operated, full consideration must therefore be given to the economic value of such operations to the country as a whole, the pocketbook nerve of the operator and the expense to the taxpayer.

To compete successfully in the overseas trade requires a regular service with guaranteed sailings. No shipper is going to be content with a service which is haphazard, when at no additional cost he can obtain a dependable, service, and patriotism to the contrary notwithstanding cannot force him to ship on unreliable American-flag ships.

While striving in the post-war period to furnish a service under the American flag that is unsurpassed by others we should endeavor to avoid uneconomic competition. It has always been my judgment that the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended, could be reduced to one word—"parity." The act represents the "equalization" of opportunity for the American operator with its foreign-flag competitors. It also represents "stabilization," a consummation devoutly to be desired both at home and abroad. It is difficult to envision any legitimate objections that might be presented by any or all of our competitors to an adequate American Merchant Marine based upon the true principles of "parity," "equalization," and "stabilization."

Certainly consideration should be given to the investment that we have made in our merchant ships, and what this means in comparison to other values. Today this investment is between ten and twelve billion dollars, and at the end of the 1944 calendar year it appears probable this figure will be somewhere between seventeen and nineteen billion dollars. Assuming that between 35 and 40 percent of the cost of these ships to be emergency or war costs, the commercial value at the end of 1944 would be roughly between twelve and thirteen billion dollars. This tremendous sum approaches three-quarters the value of the vast network of railroads of the United States. Under no circumstances is this an investment that can be disregarded.

In considering the post-war problems of the merchant fleets of the world, we should recognize that an American merchant ship is 20 percent more valuable the day after the armistice. Just as soon as the reason for carrying them is removed, guns will go, degaussing, plastic armor, magazines, and all other national defense features will be removed; the ship promptly becomes 20 percent more efficient and therefore 20 percent more valuable as a unit. This situation does not follow with any other war product, as many of them will have only scrap value when peace comes. The merchant marine, therefore, becomes "the ace in the hole" whenever and wherever post-war planning is considered.

No one who gives the subject real consideration has any thought that every ship we have in operation when the war is over is to be permanently retained in active service. If we should set our sights with that objective in view, we would have to plan for a commercial warfare with the other United Nations which would be most bitter, and most expensive to the taxpayer and thoroughly indefensible.

By setting our goal at between fifteen and twenty million dead-weight tons, we will be keeping within a reasonable limit, and in doing so, we will make use of a fleet of modern, efficient vessels.

We will have to set up a reserve fleet that should be maintained in condition to respond to any emergency call in national defense, or for special cargo movements, such as occurred in 1926 when the strike of the coal miners in England resulted in a very heavy movement of coal from this country not only to England but to many other countries that had been obtaining their coal from the British. It has also been necessary to pull out of the then existing reserve fleet a number of ships to move to the foreign market the large grain crop which piled up from time to time.

What this reserve fleet will consist of is a question still undetermined, but a rough estimate has been prepared to show the cost of maintaining a merchant-marine reserve. This estimate runs between $3,000 and $4,000 per ship per year, or for a thousand ships, let us say, $4,000,000 per year.

How infinitesimally small is this maintenance cost of a reasonable reserve fleet as compared with the building of an emergency fleet in time of war can be understood by recalling the figures quoted above as to the cost of the present fleet, built mostly under wartime pressure. Four million dollars annual maintenance cost against $18,000,000,000 war cost does not have any very close relationship to my way of thinking. This maintenance cost could be properly called the annual insurance premium paid for the assurance that we would have the necessary number of vessels available, at once, in time of need. Figure it out and see what a very low rate this insurance costs. You will find very little insurance protection of any kind available at any such low rate.

This reserve fleet, no matter what its eventual size, must not, however, be allowed to hang over the shipping and shipbuilding industry like the sword of Damocles, but must be put in sanctuary so that it is definitely off the market, by statute, to come back in service only when Congress so wills and the emergency justifies such action.

Senator BAILEY, chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and Congressman BLAND, chairman of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, recently introduced a bill to provide for the sale of certain Government-owned merchant vessels, which I call "the price-freezing bill for the post-war fleet." It might be of interest to you if we take a few minutes to analyze this bill and its economic features.

Taking the Liberty ship as an example, and assuming it to cost $2,000,000 with the further assumption that the emergency wartime cost is 35 percent of the total, we have a peacetime cost of $1,200,000. Normal depreciation of 5 percent is then allowed plus an accelerated depreciation of not more than 2½ percent per annum due to the use and abuse arising from wartime operations.

In case the vessel is sold to an American operator in foreign trade and a construction-differential payment is allowed, the cost to that operator would be between five and six hundred thousand dollars.

The cost to a coastal or intercoastal operator would be at the same approximate figure, plus the payment of the balance of the peacetime cost of the ship out of the profits, which balance would be the equivalent of the construction-differential payment allowed the foreign-trade operator.

In case of sale of the vessel to a foreign-flag operator, the price would be the peacetime cost of the vessel, less the depreciation allowance.

By following this procedure we would avoid at least some of the errors of omission and commission that took place with the fleet of World War I.

Starting with the inception of the Maritime Commission construction program and up to the end of April 1944, there have been delivered into active service 3,308 vessels of which 1,151 are the long-range type—including 396 standard-type cargo ships, 267 large-type tankers—and 2,157 of the Liberty-emergency type. During this same period of a little over 4 years, more than 160 of the vessels of the long-range type were sold to private owners. These vessels have since been requisitioned by the Government for war use. I mention these figures as a clear indication that the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 are effective in carrying out the declared policy of Congress of fostering and encouraging the development of an adequate American merchant marine privately owned and operated.

The General Council of British Shipping has set down six points in respect to the future of the British shipping industry which, it seems to me, are both reasonable and fair, and which I believe could be followed by the American shipping industry with considerable advantage. "(1) Restoration and expansion of trade in cooperation with the United States and other United Nations. (2) (a) Reconstruction of the merchant marine in accordance with the white paper, August 1940, in which the government declared their intention of securing after the war the 'maintenance of the British mercantile marine in adequate strength and in a state of full competitive efficiency.' (b) Understanding with United States regarding tonnage position. (3) Maintenance of private enterprise. (4) Continuance of activities of National Maritime Board in progressive improvements of conditions of sea service and establishment of continuity of employment. (5) Equality of sacrifice of all nations in work of revictualing Europe. Release from control at appropriate time and order. (6) Effective cooperation and self-regulation of industry through liner conferences and international freight cooperation schemes where necessary."

The first and primary point is for the restoration and expansion of trade in cooperation with us and the other United Nations; and profitable commercial trade cannot be expanded except by cooperative action between the United Nations.

There can be no real advantage, other than national defense, in possessing a merchant fleet if there is no employment for it.

It depends upon governments whether trade shall be restricted or extended and whether tariff walls shall be erected or razed.

From the point of view of shipping, protective tariffs, dumping and exchange duties, import prohibitions, quotas, clearing agreements, and bilateral and barter agreements generally lead to closed markets and restrictions and less employment of shipping.

Let me repeat something I said not so long ago: "I hope after this war, we can get together with the other maritime powers and evolve an understanding which will satisfy the vital needs of everyone and at the same time prevent a recurrence of the mutually disastrous rivalries of the not-distant past. Commercial rivalry based upon free competition is a good thing, making for lower costs and increased efficiency. Commercial rivalry abetted by Government and manipulated for national advantage is not conductive either to amity or good business. Those of us who are responsible for the development of American shipping recognize these things, and we have no ambition to 'hog' the sea. We will play ball with anybody who is willing to play ball with us. All we ask is that our legitimate requirements, which, everything being considered, are not unduly large, be accepted by our friends abroad."

Students of history, particularly American history, will readily recognize the necessity of stiffening our backbone and steeling our minds when hostilities with the Axis powers are concluded.

There will be the usual flock of "sob sisters," some in long pants, some in short, who will have all too quickly forgotten the sweat, blood, and tears that our men and women have experienced prior to the cessation of hostilities. Not only will they want to give up all that is good and true that we will have won at great price, but they will want to coddle and pamper with gifts and blessings those who brought on the conflict. The surest way to precipitate World War No. 3 will be to pay serious attention to these "sob sisters."

When Capt. Moses Rogers conceived the idea of putting a steam engine into a sailing vessel for auxiliary power, he did not give up when those he first approached turned him down. On the contrary, he persevered and eventually obtained the backing of a group in Savannah.

It is my belief that the shipping industry can profit from the example of intestinal fortitude displayed by Captain Rogers a century and a quarter ago. The industry has been through many vicissitudes, and it should have learned much from those experiences.

Today it is a part of that great effort to win a lasting and a just peace. Tomorrow a great opportunity will be knocking at its door. It has in the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, its Magna Carta. The question is: Will it seize the opportunity that will be before it? It is up to the shipping industry to do more than just hang up its shingle, and place its ships on a berth. It is up to that industry to spread its ability to serve far and wide, and to cooperate with others in fostering the development and expansion of our foreign trade so that American ships may always said "full and down."

Emergency Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me, I include as part of my remarks a radio address delivered by Hon. Chester Bowles, Price Administrator, Tuesday, May 30, 1944. It follows:

As you know, we in the O. P. A. have two major wartime responsibilities. First, it is our responsibility to see that every one of us gets a fair share of scarce products through rationing.

Our second wartime responsibility is to keep prices and rents from going upward.

For, as we all know, higher prices now mean a sharp and constantly growing increase in your present cost of living. They also mean an increase in the cost of fighting the war. Eventually higher prices would lead to a wild, skyrocketing inflation which would cause almost as much chaos and suffering as war itself.

Our O. P. A. authority to ration scarce commodies comes through the President's Second War Powers Act. Our O. P. A. authority to control prices and rents, however, comes directly from Congress. The act which gives us this authority must be renewed by June 30 of this year if the present program of price and rent control is to be continued.

Now the law under which prices and rents are controlled by the O. P. A. is known as the Emergency Price Control Act. Very wisely Congress passed it shortly after Pearl Harbor in an effort to head off the inflationary price rises that have taken place in every other war in which our country has ever fought.

The decision as to whether or not this act is to be renewed will, as I say, be made by Congress within the next 30 days. As far as I can see, it is practically certain that we shall continue to have a price and rent control law. The only question is what kind of a law. Will it be a law that allows us to maintain the present level of prices and rents, or will it be a law which allows prices and rents to go upward?

As Price Administrator, responsible for carrying out the price and rent control policy which Congress will lay down during the next 30 days, I would like to discuss this question with you in some detail both in this present broadcast and in the broadcast I am planning next week.

First of all, let's review the record of control made by the O. P. A. under the present law.

When Congress assigned the job of controlling prices and rents to the O. P. A. it was clear that the task would be a stupendous one. There are 3,000,000 business concerns in the United States which manufacture and sell hundreds of thousands of different products. There are 14,500,000 rented dwellings in the country in areas subject to rent control.

The task of controlling all prices and rents was new and unfamiliar. It had never been attempted in America.

In our effort to establish prices that were fair to the various manufacturers and farm groups and to the stores and wholesalers which sell the finished products, it was inevitable that many mistakes would be made. Lacking precedent, we in the O. P. A. have had to learn by the trial-and-error method.

As I look back on the job today, I believe we all have a right to feel proud of the accomplishment. As I have pointed out, in every other war in the history of this country—or any other country—war has brought with it skyrocketing prices on food, rents, clothing, and other necessities.

The inflationary forces in this war are far greater than in any war in world history. If it had not been for O. P. A. price control and rent control there is no reasonable basis to even guess the tremendous heights to which prices would have risen.

Under O. P. A. price control and rent control there have been some price increases during the past 2 years. But in comparison to what might have happened, they have been relatively small. And during the last 12 months the price level in general has been held stationary.

Of course, that doesn't mean that some prices haven't gone up. It simply means that for those prices that have gone up there have been others that have gone down, so that the average has remained level.

Today the United States Department of Labor tells us that the cost of living is 7 percent higher than 2 years ago, when the O. P. A. first put price control at retail into effect. Since April 1943 there has been no significant net increase. Rents have remained level and food has even gone down slightly.

Clothing, as I pointed out last week, has risen somewhat in price, and the quality has deteriorated. But when you average everything up for the low income and medium income family, the cost of living, according to the Department of Labor, has as a whole, item by item, averaged out just about what it did in April 1943.

The price level of industrial and wholesale products—products like petroleum, copper, steel, and aluminum—has risen only 2.9 percent in the last 2 years.

In the comparable period of the last World War, industrial prices, which eventually help determine the final cost of the war, rose more than twice as much. By preventing increases of that kind we have already saved billions upon billions of dollars in fighting the war—costs which would have been reflected in an increased national debt and higher taxes.

Under 2 years of O. P. A. price control we have seen for the first time during any war price increases held to an absolute minimum, both the prices of war goods and the prices which you pay at the stores. Has this been accomplished at the cost of production? Certainly there is nothing in the record to indicate this.

In the present war, under O. P. A. price control, farm production has increased more than four times as much and industrial production fully five times as much as they expanded during World War No. 1, when there was only moderate price controls in effect.

Has this control over prices and rents been accomplished at the expense of business profits or farm income? Again there is no sign in the record that this is true. Corporation profits, even after all taxes, are today more than double what they were in 1939. Net farm income in 1943, after all expenses, was 182 percent above the level of 1939.

That doesn't mean that all farmers and all businessmen have prospered to that extent or anything approaching that extent. But it does mean that today we have less economic hardship and fewer bankruptcies than in any other period in the modern history of this country.

Thus today, in the midst of the greatest war in history and under our present program of O. P. A. price and rent control, most people in the United States are making good money. Most businesses are making more profits than ever before in peacetime.

According to a recent survey, 19 out of 20 people in this country believe that prices should not rise higher than their present levels. Probably there is no other single phase of the war effort on which there is so complete and absolute agreement of all citizens in all income groups and all types of occupations.

But price and rent control are necessarily complex operations. The regulations which make these protective controls effective touch more than 3,000,000 business firms in all parts of the country. Some of these people reason that if there were no O. P. A. sitting on the price lid, or at least if the O. P. A. did not control prices in their particular field, they would be able to make higher profits.

As a result, Washington today is filled with hundreds of lobbyists sent here to secure special advantages for the pressure groups which they represent.

By well-organized efforts behind the scenes, these lobbyists are now vigorously concentrating their attacks on the price-control law. Most of them say: "Of course, we aren't really opposed to price or rent control. All we want is certain changes in the law." Usually they know full well that the changes they have suggested mean higher prices in the stores to you, the final consumer, as well as higher profits to the groups they represent.

But sometimes, it is only fair to say, these lobbyists seem honestly convinced that special concessions could be made to them without damaging the over-all program for which we are responsible.

In preparation for the debate on the new O. P. A. price and rent control law which will start within the next few days, two congressional committees, one in the House of Representatives and one in the Senate, have been interviewing witnesses and studying the price-control situation for the past 2 months.

These two committees have listened patiently to lobbyists pleading their special selfish interests, to businessmen and other officials who have sincere ideas on how price control may be improved, and to the members of my own O. P. A. staff.

The Senate Banking and Currency Committee alone has collected more than 1,000 pages of testimony. The recommendations which these two committees will make to Congress will be thoroughly debated in both the Senate and House of Representatives. Some time in the next 30 days a final decision will be reached. A bill of some kind will be passed.

Now, naturally, I have some strong personal beliefs on the subject of this price-control bill. A person in my position, working with these problems hard, day in and day out, cannot help but have definite opinions.

You know that our main objective in price and rent control has been to hold the line—to keep the cost of living and prices in general from rising.

I believe personally that it would be a grave mistake if prices were allowed to go up. It isn't that a rise of 2 or 3 or 4 percent in prices would in itself upset our whole economy; but if those initial increases are allowed we could never hope to stop there. One price rise leads to another. It wouldn't take many before requests for wage increases become stronger and stronger. Wage increases on a broad scale invariably lead to other price increases, and still others, and inflation has begun.

When inflationary price increases begin, it is felt immediately by the quarter of the population who live on fixed incomes. There are nearly 30,000,000 of them altogether—older people on pensions, teachers, Government employees, white-collar workers—the wives and dependents of the men in the armed forces who are fighting this war for us. If your main source of income is a $50-a-month dependent allowance from your soldier husband, even a small initial increase in living costs is a very serious matter.

After this war I'd like to see us all set our sights high. Let's shoot at a high level of production, a high standard of living, with plenty of good jobs to go around. In my opinion this high level of production, this economy free of unemployment, can be best achieved if we continue to resist the selfish pressures which are now seeking to raise prices a little here and a little there.

In line with these beliefs, I have personally recommended to Congress, based on my practical experience as Price Administrator, that the present law be renewed in substantially its present form.

In spite of those strong opinions of my own, I'd like to emphasize that Congress is the group that must decide the over-all policies of our Government. Congress is, in fact, our board of directors. Congress must make the basic policy decisions, and I want to say that I shall always respect the decisions they make, whether or not I may personally agree with them.

As I see my responsibility as Price Administrator, however, it is up to me to see that the implications of any changes in the price control act which Congress is considering are to the best of my ability clear beyond all question—clear to the Members of Congress and clear to you people who make up the public.

If the present Price Control Act is continued in substantially its present form, we can continue to hold prices in general approximately where they are today. But if some of the amendments suggested actually become law, prices and rents will certainly go up, and go up fast, and there is nothing we in the O. P. A. can do to stop them. There is hardly a person in the country who won't feel the force of these increases. There are millions of us who will suffer directly and sharply as a result.

All told there are some 125 different amendments and changes in the Price Control Act already suggested to Congress. Only two of these, to my knowledge, will help to render price and rent control more effective. Most of the remainder will, in my considered opinion, clearly result in not only encouraging but actually in forcing higher prices.

Much of the largest proportion of these amendments are the result of direct recommendations of lobbyists and pressure groups. Some of these groups are obviously well intentioned. They may believe sincerely in the proposals which they are indorsing, unaware of the possible consequences to the Nation. But, to put it bluntly, a high percentage of these groups seem to feel that this critical war period is the time to reap large personal profits regardless of the consequences to the country as a whole. They seem to look on the present large volume of wartime business only as an opportunity to collect profits far higher than they ever enjoyed in peacetime.

The issue of whether the O. P. A. is to continue to hold the present level of prices and rents or whether prices and rents are to be forced upward * * * a little at first, then more and more * * * is in my opinion second in importance only to the actual winning of the war.

It is a critical question of national policy and solely for the Congress to decide. It is a policy question which will, in my opinion, deeply affect the economy of our country for 10, 15, or even 20 years to come.

I am sure that Congress will debate the issue thoroughly. I have every personal hope that the final decision will be such that we may continue to hold the line against the devastating forces of inflation and to protect you and your family against further increases in the cost of living. But whatever the final decision may be, it is my earnest hope that we make it with our eyes wide open.

Memorial Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a memorial address delivered by me on Sunday, May 28, 1944, at the annual memorial service conducted by the Revere, Mass., veterans:

The crisis of this war is near. As we gather in tender tribute to those who have fallen in freedom's cause, we must realize that they who gave all for the Nation expect no less from us. They died to make men free. We must live and carry through to fulfillment the work which they so nobly began.

The men and women of our time have been singled out like the people of Washington's, Lincoln's, and Wilson's time to bear great responsibilities. From our founding fathers we inherit a great and human tradition. From them we hear the clear call to live beyond and above ourselves—that generations to come may draw strength and courage from the example we set before them.

From our past we have much to nourish us as we face the stern realities ahead. In our schoolboys, as we learned American history, we thought of those great men as a breed apart. Today, however, as we face trials no less severe than theirs we feel them nearer to us than they ever were before.

Here, on this very ground where we now stand, men faced the unknown without fear or favor, trusting in God and building the dignity of man in His image. From these humble and decent origins came the traditional faith of all Americans. From it developed the courageous leadership of Washington, the spiritual example of Lincoln, the forward-looking statesmanship of Wilson.

These are the symbols of our character, bringing into splendid focus the work and belief of the millions of unknown men and women who gave root to all we hold dear. From every land they came, to throw off the shackles of despotism, to walk upright in the new and inspiring climate of American fellowship.

From thees freemen developed a great and prosperous nation, devoted to the arts of peace. A busy, trusting nation that had little time for guile or intrigue. A hopeful nation that instinctively thought well of other peoples and so—was stunned by the infamy of December 7, 1941. When the smoke of that ambush cleared away, a tragic number of our battleships were twisted hulks of ruin. Others lay in the slime at the bottom of Pearl Harbor. The pride of the American Navy was gone. Taking immediate profit from its treachery, the Japanese Navy manned the far Pacific at will, spearheading the invasions that took Hong Kong, the Philippines, Singapore, and the Dutch East Indies in bewildering succession—Australia prepared for the worst. Even our Pacific coast was on the alert. America was rocked back on her heels.

Our enemies thought we could never rally from this paralyzing shock. But from the farms and pastures they came, these wisecracking young Americans, who had never handled a gun before in their lives; gave up the comfort and security of their homes to fight diseases and jungle and Jap—all at the same time. In a series of small though bitter campaigns they held the line.

With a courage of which we were unaware, these neighborhood kids we know saved us, gave us the time to recover our wind and set to work to strengthen ourselves for the day of reckoning. Today we have built most of that strength. Thanks to the men and women of America, we now have the greatest naval striking power in world history. We have the greatest air force and the security of knowing that our men are going into battle as the best-equipped fighting men in the world.

Burma Mission, Guadalcanal, Savo, Munda, Midway, Kassimir Pass, Salerno, Anzio, Cassino—these are the new names on the bright scroll of American manhood. Others are to come.

In the past some of us wondered if our children were being brought up the right way. This is the answer: Our boys have what it takes. Sure, we gave them everything, but now they are paying us back—tenfold. Our enemies thought we were weak, not only in arms but in spirit. They forgot that there is an American character—a character stronger than the difference of race or color or creed—the character of men fighting and dying, if need be, to help one another. Here, surely, is one aspect of eternal truth. Here man comes closer to his God.

Out of the blood and bone and human faith that have gone into the building of America something has to come down to us. It has not been lost, as some have feared. It is there in the skies over Germany. It is in the prayers of every woman whose love reaches out to give men the spiritual strength that never dies.

From thes things we know that we are on the right road. In spite of road blocks and detours, we know that America is going forward to fulfill her destiny, alive with the idealism of the individual man working fairly with other men. In this spirit of comradeship we are prepared to make sacrifices. For what is good and true there are times when we must sacrifics. In the long run such giving of ourselves is never lost.

Parents may leave no worldly goods to the child. But they leave something which is infinitely finer. The memory of the parents and the sacrifices they cheerfully made to bring opportunity and happiness to the child is a living value which remains when earthly props give way.

On this memorial occasion we grieve for the love and affection that we withheld now that it is too late to give. We try to break through the inscrutable mask of eternity to speak again with our loved ones who have gone. We seek for ways to atone for the mistakes we made. We try to bridge life and death for the fulfillment of all these things. We resolve to be better men and women and people as we extend our hand in mystic fellowship.

The delicate blossome we place on the graves of our dead will wither and fall away. But from this tender communion let us keep forever fresh in our hearts the beautiful and inspiring memories they have left with us.

Lest we forget, there are other graves far from home where our spirit must visit this day. And let us think of other men who stand poised this very minute to die that we may live.

D–Day is nearer than we realize. On this historic day will depend all that we are, all that we may be. Our men are ready. Are we? For one moment they look back to make certain that we are prepared to finish what they have been chosen to start. In every way we can, let us give them the assurance that we will complete the task. As the seconds tick off, they challenge all of us with the need for speed and effort. Our fighting men look to us for this. We must not, we cannot, fail them.

So, let us pledge that we will make each passing moment count. Today we are Americans, conscious of our responsibility to ourselves and to the world. Today and tomorrow we must keep that faith for the debt we owe to those who have died; for the promise we must hold forth to the children who will follow us.

We have pledged. Now, let us pray, with any words or thoughts our hearts may offer. Let us be with our men through every demanding hour that lies ahead. Though thousands of miles separate us, we will be with them in mind and heart and spirit. From us, to them, our prayers for a quick, decisive victory and a firm and lasting peace that America may soon have her children back home with her again.

For What Are We Fighting?—A Statement of the Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, in these trying days many men and women in public and private life, with equal justification, are giving serious thought to the objectives of this war. Failure of the administration to outline a proposed slate of peace aims or to develop a candid and clear-cut foreign policy has stimulated this discussion as citizens in and out of Washington grope around trying to find something definite to which to tie.

Mr. Speaker, the following article, entitled "A Statement of the Case," by a citizen of the State capital of South Dakota—Pierre—is worth-while reading, since it summarizes in language which all can understand some of the American ideals and objectives which we all hope will be preserved and projected both during and following this war. Unfortunately, some of them are not included in the highly touted "four freedoms"—which omit freedom of opportunity, despite the fact that it is the most typically American freedom of them all—but it is hoped that realistic peace makers will remember the freedom which Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill forgot on their ship on the ocean:

A STATEMENT OF THE CASE

What are we fighting for? is a question that is asked more often than it is answered. It may be that most of those who are doing the actual fighting understand what it is about and could, if called upon and desired to do so, put it into words that would be clear and plain. I have no authority to speak for anyone in the armed forces, but it might sound something like this:

"When the evil man started to oppress the people of the world and to attack all the forces of good, when he caused us to be murderously assaulted, there was nothing to do but fight, except for the craven soul who had neither love nor honor in his heart. 'Pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war' did not attract us; this was one war where the fife and drum corps could not have raised a corporal's guard. The average American warrior has killed in this trade of war as he would kill a rat or a rattlesnake to stop a destroying, poisonous, Godless foe who had for prototype the kidnaping racketeer. All of this is and was well known, and it is not what they mean when they ask the question. Only unthoughtedly can it be asked at all, as it implies an acquiescence in a slave world and an acceptance of things forced upon us rather than a chance to return to the life we lived before the evil man began to trouble this poor world's peace. I think we know what it means and that it means almost the same thing to each one of us a return to just like it used to be. We'll make it better if we can, sure, but like it used to be is so much better than anything we have seen since. Just now we are not asking for more."

For instance, in Pierre, S. Dak. (in the first place it is pronounced "Peer" and in residence of a year I have yet to hear it given the French pronunciation a single time), hence there are in residence the only flock of wild Canadian geese ever to permanently inhabit a body of water inside the limits of a metropolitan city. Some 75 of them, depending on the visitors, feed on the shores of the lake which is on one side of the State capitol ground, fly over the city and up or down the river when the spirit moves them, hurling their cries of vengeance, perhaps, should anything go wrong while they are away. In the mating season the big party breaks up and by fours and fives, then threes and fours, and finely by twos and the matter is settled for the year; not, however, without the night and day being filled with discordant cries of love and denunciation for a month or more. The geese seem to be the special charge of the Governor, by virtue of his office, and it is hard to contemplate the punishment sure to be meted out to anyone who would harm one of these trusting wild birds. On some of their flights they are gone for a day and night and cover many miles, but they always return and it seems there is a note of gladness in their cry as they come near the city. Do you think a boy from Pierre could ever forget that? One of the Pierre boys was over Tokyo with Doolittle, and, thank God, he came back, he may have thought of the geese just as he dropped his sincere regards to Tojo. Some of the boys from Pierre will never come back. One day the courthouse was closed and the city and country went to the air field to hear a major general of the United States Army speak kindly and appreciatively of one of them and to present his mother a symbol of such appreciation by the Army and the country. When this boy made his supreme sacrifice he knew it would be his last and in the brilliant sun of a tropical island he may have seen the angels coming for him and thought of Pierre and the wild geese.

Pierre is a city of freemen. It is one of the few cities of the world where man can wear cowboy boots and hats and not look like they were taking part in a picture show. I have seen them in the Senate dining room of the Capitol at Washington where they were no more conspicuous than was Senator THOMAS of Oklahoma, one of the group, and one of the best dressed men in the Senate. They not only wear this raiment in a natural and becoming manner, but can, if the occasion requires, live up to it. Boys who have grown up around this kind of men do not forget them. A boy who has lived near the Buffalo grass hills will never forget it and all of the beautiful lawns or fields of the east or the old world will make no picture in his mind to take the place of what he has known at home. He also has a comprehensive picture of the people of the world. In his State and city dwell Swedes, Finns, Scandinavians, Dutch, Jews, English, Danes, French, Indians, and very many others who have lived and gotten along together as well as though they had been of one race. They are Catholic, Baptist, Methodist, Episcopalian, Congregational, Lutheran, and many others including the worship of the Indian. In their daily intercourse it would be hard to tell one from the other by the treatment they either receive or bestow on others. A Finn may be the mayor, an Irishman the sheriff, the hotel man a Jew, a Dutchman has the lumber yard, an Italian the restaurant, a Greek the grocery store, a swede may be States attorney, and they all belong to the Kiwanis Club and religiously attend each week. The high school quartet, singing at one of these club luncheons, included a Negro boy, selected for his voice suitable for the part; he came in with the others, sat at the table with them, and did his part without comment from anyone as a matter of course.

You are wasting your time when you tell the boy from Pierre that the different races of people cannot get along in harmony and with perfect peace, for he knows better.

He remembers the winters in Pierre, with the mile-long street down the hill, after the first snow it is as slick as glass and instead of hauling cinders or gravel to give traction to cars, the city fathers rope off the street for the duration of the snow so that boys and girls may coast in safety and peace so far as the city traffic is concerned. There are some murmurs at this from those who are compelled to detour but custom is custom and it is not to be supposed that the boys and girls will forego a coasting right that has been respected for a generation, at least they will not forego it easily, not in Pierre.

The cosmopolitan character of the city is further exemplified by the flag man, Dr. Henry M. Reed; he makes flags of all countries of the world, knows more about flags, perhaps, and their particular history than anyone in America; he has supplied orders from all points of the compass, appeared on radio Hobby Lobby and appears on all occasions in the State where the colors of the world are being marshaled and his display of flags are a prominent feature. On gala days in Pierre the streets are lined with an assortment of all of the flags of our allies; the soldier or sailor going out from here is not a stranger to the flags of other nations.

The flesh pots of the East are not going to overwhelm the South Dakota boys to any colossal extent. A $15 dinner, a lot of fancy dishes, and subservient flunkies will not cause him to forget the fat roasted pheasants, fresh-river fish, home-grown or Belle Fourche vegetables his mother set out on frequent occasions, together with proper flagons of home-made wild-grape wine, having a tang and flavor that cannot be purchased, wherewith to wash it down; and beefsteaks—no doubt, there are other places where they have them, but to make comparison, to the South Dakota boy, is like telling a resident of Shasta or Portland how to grow roses. To get back and find it just like they left it, that is all the boy asks. Unconditional surrender and an end to mad-dog rule of any part of the world, then to get back.

When it is all over and he has had time to think things out, if there are changes to be made, he will have the experience of the war to aid him in the things he wants to do. He will be a hard man to fool—a hard man to influence—he will know the difference between the sound part of the body politic and the lunatic fringe, double talk, and evasiveness will not avail with him, and it may be well not to make too many plans, for he may have plans of his own about a lot of things, and after doing the things he has done any task ahead of him may not seem so difficult; action and not too much talk has been his method of procedure and he may adhere to this method until such time as the changes that seem necessary are made. What he wants now is to get it over with and to get home. He doesn't need "honor and country" emblazoned on an escutcheon to keep him reminded, for, though he may never speak them, these words are always in his heart; that is what he is fighting for.

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to join with thousands of my constituents of Passaic, N. J., in this great defense city's observance of Memorial Day.

Standing alongside me as I spoke at Military Park close to the monument dedicated by Gen. John J. Pershing in 1924 was a hero of this war—Capt. Edwin Schneider of the Army Air Corps. Eddie, an employee of United States Rubber's Passaic plant before Pearl Harbor, recently came home after he had completed 262 missions over Jap territory in New Guinea and had been cited several times for extraordinary heroism.

The young captain was in the best of health and spirits. He was modest. He would not talk about his own daring military exploits but he did have praise for all our fighting forces in the South Pacific.

Sitting near able Allen Smith, city editor of the Passaic Herald-News, at a luncheon of Passaic Post No. 4, Blue and Gray Division, shortly after the ceremonies at Military Park, the captain said:

"Mr. Smith, I seek no acclaim and I want no publicity. I do have a big favor you might possibly grant me, however, although I hesitate to ask it."

Editor Smith, proud of his fellow-townsman who, with his ship's crew, had done so much to even up accounts for Pearl Harbor, quickly indicated his readiness to accord almost any accommodation.

"I am engaged to the loveliest girl in Australia," continued the captain. "She is really beautiful and I thought you might be willing to put her picture in the paper."

By the time these remarks are printed the picture of the future Mrs. Schneider will have appeared and Eddie Schneider's big favor will have been granted.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke at Passaic's memorial observance as follows:

Somehow, with me at least, the spirit of Abraham Lincoln seems to hover over our American Memorial Day. He loved his countrymen and he fought and died for their freedom.

To Abraham Lincoln mere words counted for little on such a day. The lives of our heoric dead spoke for themselves.

Mindful of these dead and their contributions to our free Republic and standing in the presence of our heroic living—those who have borne arms for our country in this war and those of '98 and '18—this at a time, possibly the very hour, when so many thousands of Passaic boys and their comrades from nearby communities await near the English Channel for the D-day signal which will start Liberty's greatest march against Europe's mighty fortress of aggression and oppression, I feel a deep sense of humility. Almost any words I might utter would be trite. We would do well just to turn our eyes to the heavens and thank Divine Providence that America was founded and is being maintained by liberty-loving men and women.

A 17-year-old boy came to my office in Paterson yesterday. He had his father's permission to enlist in our armed forces but he was having difficulty getting a release from his war-plant employer. I am trying to help the lad because he is now misassigned. He should be on the fighting, not the home front.

"Congressman," said this boy, "I love the flag and liberty more than life itself. My only brother felt the same way. The last word we had from him told us how he had followed Old Glory in a victory parade in Tunisia. Shortly afterward there came a message to our home from General Ulio in Washington. It advised us that my brother had been killed in action in Sicily. I want to take his place."

He didn't realize it yesterday, but that 17-year-old boy made a memorial speech that will not be bettered today anywhere in our America. He, in fact, is America—that America which remembers, that America which has what it takes, that America which cannot be beaten.

No; America cannot be beaten, but it can be hurt. It can be sabotaged by the thoughtless, the indifferent, the careless right here at home.

I was glad to note this last week that the head of one of our largest labor unions, in castigating part of his membership for indulging in any unauthorized strike affecting war production, pointed out that public opinion was inflamed and the union itself would not survive if the men in uniform held it interfered with their job at the front.

The Chief of Navy Chaplains, recently returning to the Capital from an inspection abroad, emphasized that our fighting men were taking inventory. When they came home, he continued, men on the home front would be measured by their actions, not their words, in this hour of crisis.

This should be obvious to all and men in public life, men of industry, men in all walks of life, will be appraised and rated even as those in labor unions.

The sadness of Memorial Day in the years to come will be tempered if we can square conscience with this personal accounting.

I have only one other thought on this Memorial Day and it is this:

We owe the mothers of men a terrific debt in this hour. Go to Arlington, go to any cemetery, any bivouac of our heroic dead. Talk to the caretakers. They will tell you some forget, but not the mothers of men.

We owe the mothers of men more than victory. We must pledge them we will not lose the peace.

Fifty-four percent of the seniors in a New York university register their belief another world war will follow in less than 25 years.

"We orate on our valiant dead,
Then, willful-blind, we turn our head—
Repudiate their victory."

The mothers of America—yes, the mothers of the world—will not be safe unless there is a peace which will bring about world understanding and cooperation based on the universal standard which was expressed in the Sermon on the Mount.

Is this too much to ask of humanity on Memorial Day?

Hull Gives Pledge to Small Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of the remarks of Secretary of State Cordell Hull, as made public by the State Department:

At his press and radio news conference today the Secretary of State made the following reply in answer to a question whether there was anything he could say that might be of reassurance to the small nations. The correspondent who asked the question pointed out that some of the small nations seemed to think that they would not be properly represented in the proposed international organization.

"That is a matter in which the small nations, and the large nations as well, should be at all times especially interested. It is a mutual affair. The future welfare of each nation depends upon the welfare of all. In view of that common interest and that self-interest in every mutual sense, I doubt whether there would be many nations, large or small, which would have any other purpose than to cooperate in all legitimate and practical international relationships that would be mutually advantageous and mutually profitable.

"As far as this Government is concerned, whenever I have said anything on this subject, it has always emphasized the all-inclusive nature of the world situation and our disposition and purpose to see that all nations, especially the small nations, are kept on a position of equality with all others and that, in every practicable way, there will be cooperation."

NO BLUEPRINT OF DETAILS

"Now, it is not possible at this stage for this Government or any government to give anybody a blueprint as to all of the details of how these relationships between all of the different nations will be gradually developed and perfected. There is no occasion to be especially concerned about the attitude of this Government in view of the declarations that the President, and I, and others have made.

"The truth is that even those declarations are not necessarily called for in the light of our entire history and our traditions. We have for 150 years preached liberty to all the nations of the earth, to all the peoples of the earth, and we have practiced it. We have encouraged all nations to aspire to liberty, and to enjoy it. Our attitude toward the Philippines is a striking example. Nobody had to put us on the witness stand to know what we were doing for them.

"Even back in our earlier days we preached the same spirit of liberty with which we, ourselves, were inspired in acquiring our own liberty, to all the nations, especially those that were in chains of despotism, as the South American countries were for centuries under Spanish rule. Nobody asked us to do it. That was our philosophy. That was our spirit, both at home and toward all peoples who might aspire to liberty. As soon as our American neighbors threw off the Spanish yoke, we proceeded to recognize them, right and left."

CHAMPIONSHIP OF LIBERTY

"We had the same spirit toward Greece and other countries desiring liberty as we demonstrated in the Philippines. That has been our consistent record, a record of championship of liberty for everybody, encouraging them at all times and in all places. I see no reason why this country, this great free people who, through generations, have dedicated themselves to this wonderful human cause and preserved it—I see no reason why they should be catechized every morning before breakfast as to their loyalty to liberty, or their consistent desire of liberty for everybody and freedom for aspiring peoples everywhere.

"I have spoken of this often in speeches and at other times before, during and after my trip to Europe. Here is an example from my address to the Congress:

" 'The principle of sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, irrespective of size and strength, as partners in a future system of general security will be the foundation stone upon which the future international organization will be constructed.'

"That is our objective. I think I have indicated sufficiently to you the policy of this Nation and this Government representing it."

Our Memorial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial which appeared in the Lynn Telegram-News, Lynn, Mass., on May 31, 1944:

OUR MEMORIAL

Bravely and sincerely we paid tributes of devotion to our heroic dead. Memorial Day is particularly appropriate to bow our heads in prayer while our hearts are filled with gratitude to those whose sacrifices were so great that their very lives were offered for their fellow men.

Since the dawn of independence in our land 168 years ago, there must have been inherent good and basic virtues in the purposes and aims of our country for there has never been need of fear or any dearth of defenders. It is no great wonder that this is so for all of our founders well know the weight of oppression and, within them, strong and vivid, was the love of freedom and the will for independence.

How that independence was achieved; how the chains of slavery were broken forever; how the indivisibility of the Union was preserved and how greedy nations were kept at formerly safe distances was the work and achievement of those whose memories we cherish.

It is now only a generation ago that the flames of world war engaged almost every civilized nation to prevent an imperialistic effort to destroy all democracies and smother the rule of the people. We then joined the Allies to efface the danger of autocracy and dictatorship in its attempt to subdue and rule the peoples of the earth. Our cause was the cause of humanity, the success of our arms was glorious but the tremendous problems were not settled.

The majority of the nations of the entire world are now engaged in the most massive and widespread conflict in an effort to complete the work that was started in 1914. The Great Ruler of all destiny has willed that more than 10,000,000 of our sons and daughters are joined under wings and arms with the nations which have denied the right of one-man government. Our fighting men are in most parts of the world, protecting us, our cause, and our country. This in itself is a great tribute to our honored dead in that it confirms their purposes and ratifies all that they fought for.

Our gratitude to our heroic dead may probably be best reflected by adding to our words, our prayers, and our flowers, efforts and sacrifices more earnest and in greater measure than those already made. May all that we do and all that we say reflect a purely unselfish desire to win, achieve, and establish a peace that will not only endure but one that will be commensurate with the cost in suffering, sacrifice, and human lives.

To all of our protectors, both living and dead, let us guarantee, to every extent of our ability, full cooperation, free from all envy, pride, and avarice to the end that all over this world there shall be governments similar to that of the United States of America.

The Christian Heritage of Poland, the Crucified

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS S. GORDON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a splendid and interesting sermon delivered by the Right Reverend Monsignor Joseph F. Flannelly, entitled "The Christian Heritage of Poland, the Crucified," that appeared in the Polish Weekly, Sokol Polski, an official organ of the Polish Falcons of America, published in Pittsburgh, Pa.:

At the high mass celebrated on Sunday, February 27, in St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York, by the Right Reverend Monsignor J. Dworzak, of Yonkers, N. Y., presided over by Archbishop Spellman, the rector of St. Patrick's, the Right Reverend Monsignor Joseph F. Flannelly, delivered the following sermon:

"After our blessed Lord had foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, He said:

" 'But he that shall persevere to the end, he shall be saved' (Matt. xxiv: 13).

"Dearly beloved, it was at Castelgondolfo that our Holy Father, Pope Pius XII, wrote his first Encyclical Letter, on October 20, 1939. That was less than 2 months after the tragedy of September 1. In that letter the Holy Father referred to Poland's hour of darkness, and he declared that Poland has a right to the generous and brotherly sympathy of the whole world because of its fidelity to the church and its services in the defense of Christian civilization.

"Most willingly—yes; even anxiously—do we all, archbishop, priests, and people, acknowledge that right, and with a sympathy springing from our deepest heart of hearts do we offer with you of Polish blood this holy sacrifice of the mass for Poland and her people.

" 'Quis est homo qui non fieret?'

"Who is the man who would not weep when, while recalling the aspirations, the sacrifices, and the contributions of the Polish people during the past 1,000 years to make and preserve Poland a free and Christian country, he gazes upon Poland today—I will not say 'dead'; no, I will not say even 'dying'; but gasping for life and struggling for existence?

"Who is the man who would not weep, when, while recalling the Polish people as the Good Samaritan to all the oppressed peoples of Europe for over 500 years, he gazes today upon the Polish women and children, as well as men, lying along the roadside of the world, dying from the treacherous assaults of the robber nations. If weeping with Poland and her people will be a source of help and even consolation to them, then we weep generously and copiously.

"But even more do I feel that we can help Poland and her people by assuring them, here in the presence of our sacramental God, that we are in awe and admiration of their confidence in God and their perseverance in prayer to him. In their history, there has been many a day when the sun of justice did not shine upon Poland, and sorrow filled Polish hearts to overflowing. But on every one of those days Poland was lifted beyond the clouds and the sorrow was transformed into joy consummate, confidence in God, and persevering prayer to the crucified Saviour.

"Most unfortunately, another such day is at hand. While we offer this holy mass, I urge you all to beg for the Polish people, wherever they may be on the face of this earth, the grace to persevere with absolute confidence in their prayer to God. The very fact that they have persevered so long is proof that they are the elect of God. He loves them in a very special way, and in His own good time He will reward them both here and hereafter.

"You remember the parable of Our Lord in which He taught the necessity and the value of perseverance in prayer. He said that there was in a certain town a judge who neither feared God nor had regard for man. A poor widow went to him again and again saying 'Give me judgment against my adversary.' For a while he refused. But she continued to implore. Finally, the judge, fearing that he would be worn out by her incessant visits, gave judgment in her favor. From this parable our Lord drew this lesson: If even an unjust judge will give justice because of the perseverance of the just, how much more speedily will our kind and holy Father in Heaven hear and answer the unfaltering prayer of his faithful children. Like the widow, the Polish people have prayed unceasingly.

"I know that you of Polish blood and ancestry are suffering in heart, at least, with your people back home. I know that you would wish for the prayers of Poland to be answered at once and justice done speedily. That is most natural. But I beg of you to leave the time to God. Just pray, and pray that your countrymen will pray, pray, and pray.

"For almost 1,000 years the Polish people have followed Christ. They took up their cross and went after Him. Anyone who deserts Him on the road to Calvary is not a true Christian. Particularly during the past 175 years, Poland has been on that road to Calvary. With all due reverence, let me say that there is a very striking likeness between the Saviour's journey and Poland's. It is in this respect. While carrying the Cross our Saviour fell three times. Each time He arose and continued His journey. When He had reached Calvary, He was thrown down upon the Cross, never to rise again until He came from the tomb, glorious and immortal, on the day of resurrection.

"In 1773, 1793, and 1795 Poland fell, like her Master, each time—after each partition—she arose and followed Him.

"During the past 3 years she has arrived at the hill of Calvary. Stripped of everything except her Catholic faith, she has been thrown down upon her cross. Today she is being nailed to it.

"How truly is hers a Christian heritage. As she hangs on her cross I am sure she will ask forgiveness for those who have crucified her. With true Christian courage Poland will endure the physical torture and patiently suffer the jeers of her godless enemies.

"Then, to the eyes of the enemies of God, she will appear to die forever. But we know that it will not be forever. 'He who liveth and believeth in Me shall not die forever.' Like her Master, Poland will rise. Pray that Poland and her people will always understand that her resurrection will be the reward only for her perseverance in prayer and her confidence in God."

Protesting Against Two New O. P. A. Regulations

REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the O. P. A. is not satisfied to let things alone. Just as everything is moving along smoothly and the people are becoming reconciled to its operation, some new plan or regulation is devised to arouse the wrath of the public and cause more headaches.

Corroborative of this, I cite two recent occurrences:

First, a new method by which they are establishing what is known as issuance centers located in the larger cities, many miles from the local boards, and these issuance centers and not the local boards will issue ration certificates in the future for gasoline, tires, and so forth.

The local boards have been satisfactorily and successfully handling the issuance of these ration certificates, and the public has become accustomed to such operation and thoroughly satisfied therewith, but in the future this power of issuance is to be taken away from the local boards and vested in these several issuance centers, causing additional expense, inconvenience, and extreme dissatisfaction, both on the part of the local boards and the public.

They seek to justify this change on the ground that they are afraid the certificates, if left with the local boards, may be stolen, and that they have to be issued from some safe centers at a long distance from the sites of the local boards. There may have been some thefts, but these are rare and constitute the exceptions, and, because this is so, they should not upset the local distribution of these certificates.

The public is much better satisfied when these matters are handled in their own local rationing boards, and the local boards feel that it is a reflection upon their honesty that this change has been made, and the public feels that it is another effort on the part of Washington to exercise a bureaucratic tendency to take away from the local boards the operation of rationing.

Those who compose the local rationing boards in my district are businessmen of the highest integrity, who are giving their time, without remuneration, in a patriotic way, to try to help the Government. They know how to deal with the public and the public has confidence in them, and the O. P. A. should continue under the present system which has been successfully administered by these local boards, and not take away any power whatever from the local boards and vest it in some issuance center at some far distant point in the State.

I have received many letters and telegrams of protest from my district, from responsible people, who are patriotic and who have tried to cooperate, who are opposed and incensed at this new regulation.

I have registered these protests with the O. P. A. and urged that the proposed change be not made, but up to now I have secured no promise that the order will be rescinded, and I want publicly to protest and denounce this innovation and publicly urge that it not be done.

The other incident is the proposed ceiling price upon watermelons. No ceiling price has heretofore existed on watermelons, and the farmers in my district planted watermelons this year in the belief that there would be no ceiling price, as no notice had been given of an intention on the part of O. P. A. to place a ceiling price thereon, and, as a result, these farmers are going to suffer because of the increased price they have had to pay for fertilizer and labor in making and marketing the melon crop, and they are naturally incensed at the Government.

Another objection to the proposed ceiling price on melons is that a fairly good price is placed as a ceiling up to July 4, but after July 4, the ceiling price is cut in two, and since most of the melons in my section are marketed after July 4, my farmers will receive this very low ceiling price which, as I understand, is below the cost of production.

Why should a ceiling price be placed on watermelons? Watermelons are a luxury and not a necessity; and if the farmers make their prices too high, the public will not buy them. If a ceiling price is to be invoked, then certainly those producing the late crop should not be discriminated against.

Earnings of Oil Companies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, without comment, I ask consent to insert in the RECORD herewith the net earnings after taxes of the oil companies of the United States for 1942 and 1943. I believe the comparison of the earnings in the 2 years will be enlightening.

It is important to point out that the great majority of crude-oil producers are not represented in this table of earnings:

Oil company earnings—(Full calendar year)

Company	1943		1942
	Dollars	Per share	Dollars	Per share
Barnsdall Oil Co.[1]	$3,602,764	$1.62	$2,801,846	$1.26
Pure Oil Co.[2]	13,874,000	2.50	13,761,000	2.47
The Atlantic Refining Co.[3]	10,688,000	3.79	6,800,000	2.33

Address by Judge Chamberlin on Equal-Rights Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, a notable contribution to the discussion over the equal-rights amendment was an address delivered before the National Association of Women on May 23 by Judge Harry O. Chamberlin, of Indianapolis. Judge Chamberlin, one of the most outstanding jurists of Indiana and the Midwest, began his consideration of the equal rights proposal in a truly judicial manner, with impartial attention to arguments on both sides, but the further he got into the real merits of the subject the more he became convinced of the justness of the proposal, and the address as finally delivered was more "pro" than "con." His treatment of the subject was scholarly and illuminating, and I only regret that space limitations have precluded my requesting that the entire address be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. As this is a subject of lively and timely importance at the present time, I have asked and have secured unanimous consent that salient points in Judge Chamberlin's address be reproduced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as follows:

There are several forms of the proposed equal rights amendment to the United States Constitution but the one I prefer, and the one engaging our attention at this time is in simple language and patterned after several other amendments touching the civil rights and liberties of our people. It is:

"Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex," although good results might well flow from any other similarly worded text, provided always that its ultimate meaning is neither clouded nor ambiguous.

There are very few legislative proposals on the one hand or objections thereto on the other that do not each have some merit. The way to properly appraise the value of these opposite positions, however, is to weigh one against the other. Assuming that an affirmative proposal contains much good but that its operation might effect some inconvenience or practice hostile to a given public custom, isn't it rational and at least good sense to conclude that if the good outweighs the harm, the public would then be benefited by the change? It is axiomatic that legislation should be predicated upon the theory of the greatest good to the greatest number. It is no doubt true that the final ratification and operation of the equal rights amendment will produce some governmental as well as legal dislocations—not dislocations of right and justice but only those of custom and practice where readjustments can be readily made, and the way soon mapped out for a smooth-working program. Disarrangements have been many and varied during the recent war years but they have been accepted as subordinate in importance to the vastly greater factor of the country's protection and self-preservation.

Let's not appraise the value or the righteousness of equal rights on the basis of political strength, but rather upon the basis of its intrinsic justness.

One of the necessary and fundamental factors in the making and enforcement of a contract is the element of consideration. Without it, the contract fails. It is, therefore, the basis of all legal bargaining. Something must be given in return for consideration in whatever form that may take. Exactly so with the theory of equal rights for women. No undertaking, small or great, no accomplishment slight or important, no record, casual or imposing, has ever been made by this country of ours without the distinct aid, material and otherwise, of the women. Surely, then, human beings with a record of pinnacle performance are not less worthy of consideration than mere chattels, the bases of contracts.

We all recognize, with serious forebodings, the many and involved post-war problems which are bound to confront us in the near future. It will require the best and most far-sighted thought to cope with the intricate situations certain to arise, if we would avoid or even minimize the economic disruption almost surely to follow the great war through which we are now plodding slowly but successfully. Wars inevitably produce inflation of values; inflation brings economic injustices; economic injustice is only another name for depressions and governmental discontent; and these things all sum up to inequality before the law.

While equal rights for both men and women do not spell a panacea for all governmental ills it can and will remove one of the irritating disturbances to a very large section of our population. And while a fair and an honest administration of the theory of equal rights for women under the proposed amendment may not eliminate all the economic troubles of womanhood it will at least be conducive to such a degree of contentment as to render more efficient and more effective their already valuable and ever available services and cooperation in productiveness and the output of America's commerce of chattels, as well as America's output of mental development and advancement in educational training. For I say it is the women of this country who do most for the promotion of this educational development of tomorrow's men and women both in the homes and in the schools. No task is fraught with greater importance to the Republic than the training of our youth and this I repeat, is, generally speaking, the women's job.

The man of a family is usually designated as the breadwinner. He is thought to be the central or focal point around which the home is purchased and financed, and some investments are made, a bank account established, a business possibly is purchased and conducted. The wife perhaps is a mere incident to all those acquirements. But let's look at the picture a little more closely. The woman bears the children; she mends and makes their clothes; she is the purchasing agent for the family and she buys closely; she more often than otherwise inaugurates the savings or bank account; she does her own housework; she encourages the husband to start his own business; she keeps his books at the store or office; she does without a servant or a maid, even to the extent of washing, ironing, and cleaning the house; she coaches the children in their studies; she may even substitute as a teacher in the schools; in general she saves the pennies, the nickels, the dimes, and even the dollars, by the devotion to her family's interests.

In the course of years a substantial substance has been acquired—but usually in the name of the husband. And yet, it was the wife's ingenuity—her savings and sacrifices—her thrift and courageous industry in large measure that made possible the acquirement of the home property, or the piece of rental property or the savings account or the profitable investment in some good stock. Her interest in those tangible accomplishments should be legally recognized through some statutory expression such as the equal rights amendment.

Of course, every woman is not a wife, and the foregoing set of facts do not apply to all of the female sex, but I use this illustration to point out the inequality of the general situation in very many of the States. In Indiana the situation, while not the worst, is far from fair to women. The State either commercially or legislatively has done but little to equalize their economic and employment rights. Such benefits as they have received have come more through the force of public opinion than through legislative action.

A branch of statutory law governing property rights between husband and wife, called the law of community property, is in force with varying provisions in eight of the States. Louisiana retains, with modifications, the community law of France. Arizona, California, Idaho, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, and Washington trace their community systems to Spanish or Mexican sources. This marital property law is thought to be of teutonic origin, though its early history is not fully known. In theory it subscribes to equal ownership by husband and wife in all property acquired by either of them during marriage, except such as is inherited, received as a gift, or purchased with separate funds owned before marriage. However, the actual control of much of this property is given to the husband. Due to varied statutory forms and interpretations of the law in several States using the system, it does not have uniform application among them. (U. S. Department of Labor Women's Bureau, Bull. 157, January 1, 1938.)

The bulk of discriminations between men and women in American jurisprudence grew out of the feudal common-law fallacy that marriage destroyed a woman's separate identity. Discriminations against the unmarried woman were not so numerous, even under the English common law. As to these things Chancellor Kent, the great jurist and analyst, said among other things, more than a century ago:

"The law concerning husband and wife has always made a very prominent and extensive article in the codes of civilized nations. There are no regulations on any other branch of the law, which affect so many minute interests, and interfere so deeply with the prosperity, the honor, and happiness of private life."

Oklahoma's constitution excludes women from election to eight major State offices. Wisconsin's legislative employees must be men. One of the three Commissioners of the District of Columbia must be a member of the Engineer Corps of the Army.

Twenty-three States exclude women from jury service; thirteen States permit women to serve at their option; Utah excludes women from grand-jury service.

In 40 States property acquired after marriage by the joint efforts of husband and wife belongs to the husband and is subject to his control. In South Carolina a woman's clothes have been held to belong to the husband and it is said that a recent decision somewhere held that a wife's hair was the property of her husband. Several States hold that a minor child's (as well as the wife's) earnings belong to the husband. It is notoriously true that women are often paid less for their services in exactly the same work and rendered with equal or greater efficiency. Frequently there appears a legal ban against married women as school teachers. In 19 States women cannot serve on juries although a recent ruling by the Supreme Court holds that no State may deny jury service to a Negro man.

Owing to existing economic conditions and wartime emergencies, some gains have been made for women's civil rights. But they are strictly emergency and temporary gains. When the soldier returns home at the conclusion of the war when there is no manpower shortage then, it will still be a man's world outside the home castle. And may I venture the prediction that when the soldier does return home to his wife, his mother, his daughter, and his sister, and is shown the definite legal inequality existing against them, he will say in substance: "Why, this is one of the things I've been fighting against all around the world with bullets—now let's continue the fight here with ballots and with logic."

It is said that for certain periods in most women's lives they are preoccupied with the care of children, first in the bearing them and then in tending them during the limited time they are physically dependent upon their mothers. This special kind of care no father, regardless of his devotion to his paternal obligations, can supply. And after the brief period of physical dependence has passed, most mothers still want to stay close to their children at least during their very early formative years.

This theory is fallacious, not in fact, but in the implication that women are satisfied to have denied to them or withheld from them the justness of their civil rights solely because they have embarked upon the commendable job of raising a family.

Former Judge Dorothy Kenyon, of the New York municipal court, and a very vocal opponent of the equal rights amendment, summarizes in part her opposition in this statement. She says: "We should not have an equal rights amendment, because it would destroy our power to enact special legislation. It seems to me the height of folly to destroy a power for good merely because it is capable of being used, and has in fact been used in the past both badly and unwisely. Why throw out the baby with the bath? That some of our protective laws are bad and should be abolished is my own opinion. Good in their day, some of them have now outlived their usefulness. For instance, I no longer see any justification for the flat prohibition against night work for women. Our support laws should also be changed to relieve men from the obligation to support childless wives in idleness."

Upon the strict basis of logic and analysis, I think Judge Kenyon has made, in that statement, a fairly good argument for rather than against the amendment. She apparently favors special legislation which in itself spells inequality, and is usually held repugnant to sound legal reasoning.

The general theory of the law everywhere is against special legislation, and the reports are filled with decisions annulling and voiding legislation because it is special, and gives rights and privileges to certain classes and groups not equally given to all classes of citizens. In fact both the Constitution of Indiana and the Constitution of the United States either explicitly or impliedly deny to their respective legislative bodies the right to pass special or local laws or laws violative of the theory of equal protection to all.

But Judge Kenyon admits that such good as has come from this special legislation is capable of being used and has been used both badly and unwisely. Surely we won't throw out the baby, but we can separate him from the bath of dirty water and throw out the latter just as the courts have repudiated much of these special enactments. If the truth really be faced, there are probably many statutes operating today in the various States, which are local and special but which are tolerated because they have never been attacked.

The opponents of equal rights seem to fear that the passage and ratification of the amendment will destroy our power to ever enact any laws either locally or nationally in aid of the establishment of the equal-rights theory.

In the first place the amendment would be only prohibitive of the creation of inequitable and unjust relationships whether they affect men or women. It could not, in any event, as I see it, prevent rational legislation in aid of the very purpose of the amendment.

A portion of the bill for its submission to the States for ratification and which becomes a part of the amendment itself, expressly states that:

"Congress and the several States shall have power within their several jurisdictions to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

So it seems to me that any act of any State, or of the Congress which may be held to be appropriate to the creation of an equal civil or economic status as between men and women generally would not only be valid and operative but probably needful in the final adjustment of the judicial problems which naturally will arise. But in the end, if the United States Supreme Court as at present constituted doesn't change its mind too frequently and doesn't upset too many well-established precedents, with no greater justification than political expediency the whole civil relationship between the sexes will be harmonized upon the adoption and operation of an equal-rights amendment.

Let us not be disturbed as to the possible unconstitutionality of certain laws affecting the so-called health of and hours of labor of women workers. They were originally conceived through the fallacy of the "weaker sex" idea and have little if any foundation in actual fact. Certainly this doctrine should be forever exploded since the women have carried on so well and so valiantly in many of the physical parallels necessary in an effective promotion of the war effort.

In Indiana when the husband or wife is a party to a suit, and incompetent to testify in his or her own behalf, the other is also excluded. However, in a suit for the seduction of a wife, the husband is a competent witness, but the wife is not. She is therefore precluded from voicing her own innocence in a charge usually affecting her chastity.

Under our laws of inheritance a second childless wife is limited in her husband's estate to one-third only of a life estate in his real estate if there be a surviving child by his previous marriage. She is thus penalized because in a natural course of events she happens to be wife number two instead of wife number one.

Dean Acheson of the United States Department of State, in voicing his opposition to the equal-rights amendment, says that its enactment would cause confusion. Why, of course, it would cause confusion. The rectifying of any wrong always causes confusion, but the confusion is generally at the expense of those who have been the beneficiaries of the wrongs committed. It is because they have been deprived of their ill-gotten advantages and this naturally promotes some confusion in the readjustment of things. But the pertinent inquiry should be, Does the gain for good outweigh the inconvenience of the confusion?

One of the first and most striking features of our great Declaration of Independence is the assertion that "We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." I know of no interpretation that would limit the scope of the term "men" as used in this section of the Declaration of Independence to the narrow limitation of masculines alone. On the contrary, I believe it to embrace the generic or general and all-inclusive significance of both men and women, for the thought is not confined to suffrage of any kindred subject, notwithstanding the prejudiced attitude that many interpreters place upon the relationship of women as construed under the old English common law.

So, that, if our founding fathers conceived and caused to be perpetuated the idea that women, as well as men are endowed with the inalienable right to have life, liberty, and happiness, and that equality of rights is one of the things that will promote a just and righteous happiness, it is a far cry from a sensible analysis to say that equal rights cannot be secured because it would cause confusion.

The real test should be and is: Is the work produced by women, whether in office, shop, or factory, equivalent in efficiency and in the element of time required, to that turned out by men or vice versa? If so, then there should and must be no discrimination in the emoluments or earnings on account of sex.

Thus it will be seen that notwithstanding the merits advanced by either side of the controversy, there is definitely existing in this country a mixed, complex, involved, inconsistent, and at best a scrambled situation as to the legal status of women. A noted economic philosopher some years ago inquired, "How is it possible to unscramble eggs?" The same question might be asked as to this problem, but the answer to this is more practical and more possible: By the adoption of the equal-rights amendment!

International Trade as Viewed by American Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor:

INTERNATIONAL TRADE AS VIEWED BY AMERICAN LABOR

(Address of Matthew Woll,[1] vice president, American Federation of Labor, before Manufacturing Chemists Association, June 1, 1944)

The outstanding post-war problem, both national and international, is to find ways and means to meet in a spirit of justice and human kindness the proper economic aspirations of both nations and individuals in order that the temptation to international war may be removed.

Through bitter suffering the world has learned that no nation is free if its daily bread can be given or be withheld in war or in peace according to needs or pleasures of some other nation. The world has likewise learned that political liberty without economic liberty is but an empty shell.

Economic liberty need not necessarily mean privation. Gradually, almost imperceptibly, science has been drawing from Nature some of her essential secrets. Science, more than laws, has broken up one after another slavery, feudalism, absolutism, the 12-hour day, and other forms of human bondage. Science also has changed and will continue to change the relations of nations.

The question presented to every American is whether the United States will shape her life largely in her own way, and in accord with her ideals, or whether she will become inextricably involved in Old World interests, habits of thought, and economic affairs. In other words, America is called upon to decide whether international trade has a certain divinity which must be placed upon a permanent basis. Thereupon it will be the duty of a concert of powers to allocate to the nations of the earth their rights to import and export and at what prices and then set up an international standard of living and a superstate to assure that the world will stay pigeonholed.

Or will we choose to abandon attempts to regiment a world that refuses to be regimented and adopt the practical, diplomatic approach; that is, to recognize what are the realities of the economic interdependence of nations and try to achieve a formula by which nations can cooperate. Certainly, this is not isolationism, so called, but rationalism.

No one can predict with any degree of certainty what sort of world we will face when world hostilities come to an end. However, the past does not indicate the sort of thinking and planning that is more than likely largely to influence the judgment of nations in working out their destinies under conditions of peace. It is futile to discuss post-war trade problems without a realistic examination of some of the leading factors involved.

Among these leading factors may be considered:

1. The agricultural and industrial revolution during the period 1933–34 and the resultant loss of former markets.

2. The strength of the system of state trading controls and preferential trade system after the war.

3. The predominance, in world trade, of giant state trading agencies, great international corporations, and cartels.

4. The critical position of the free trade-unions and free enterprise, under the circumstances both in foreign trade and in the domestic American market.

5. The possibly dangerous tendency of this country to discuss the merits of lofty principles of freedom of trade while ignoring the abolition of those principles in domestic and foreign trade.

It is not possible in a brief discussion to more than summarize some of the principal aspects of these outstanding problems. The following points are, however, essential considerations:

As during the World War of 1914–18, great changes in the structure of economic life have occurred throughout the world.

India, for example, is now a creditor country and one of the leading industrial nations of secondary rank.

South America has rapidly expanded not only its production capacity for consumer goods, as during 1914–18; it has also notably expanded production of minerals, some basic industry, and other primary commodities.

The United Kingdom now produces about one-half of its food requirements and has enormously increased the efficiency of its manufacturing plants. On the other hand, England has liquidated about half of its overseas investments and has amassed an enormous debt sterling balance.

POST-WAR FOREIGN TRADE—AMERICAN LABOR

Europe has undergone fundamental changes that may outlast the war. The synthetic production of textile fibers, rubber, gasoline, and plastics, the development of processed wood substitutes for metals, are only the better-known changes.

American organized labor in the North American continent seeks to maintain the independence of labor unions and business enterprises. In contrast, organized labor in Europe and in the United Kingdom seeks to nationalize basic industry and, by various so-called socialistic measures, tends to change and modify the character of an independent labor movement in the unfounded hope of capturing control of the state.

This increasing dependence upon the state on the part of organized labor in Europe and the United Kingdom is shared by organized European industry. To an extent not appreciated by either American business or American labor, European and British industry has become increasingly reconciled to dependence upon the state and guidance from the state in recent years.

The economic crisis of the early thirties was followed in Europe by revolutionary changes in the character of state intervention in business and of state economic administration. The gold standard was abandoned by its creator, the Bank of England, in 1930, and the British example was followed throughout most of the world during the following 5 years.

In Europe as a whole there gradually developed first a regulation of foreign trade and foreign exchange, as emergency measures, to meet the economic crisis. Thereafter followed the regulation of internal business activities, including production, prices, and distribution.

As Nazi Germany in 1933 inaugurated the German rearmament program and the German effort to create a "self-sufficient" war economy, other leading countries also strengthened state economic control over business in order to prepare for war.

In the late 1930's in Europe there ceased to be any genuine freedom of international trade as it was formerly understood. Most European countries had state regimes which controlled foreign trade channels in a manner that excluded freedom of competition by private firms and corporations without regard to country of origin or the manner of payment for imports. Most states insisted that their imports must be paid for in exports, not in foreign exchange; imports were prohibited or restricted where domestic production, even at very high cost, could supplant imports.

Practically every country in Europe developed a program of "tied trade" or balanced trade agreements with other countries and a program of subsidized expansion of domestic production of products formerly imported. The result was, for example, that Brazilian cotton of inferior quality and at higher prices was purchased by Germany in preference to cheaper and better grades of American cotton.

From the standpoint of the American farmer, worker, and businessman, the significance of the new European system of state control of domestic and foreign trade was that these new factors eliminated the normal freedom to buy and sell in open trade agreements. Competition was no longer between individual producers, sellers, and buyers in different countries; it changed in character to competition between state trading agencies, for which not only economic but also political interests of the contracting states were decisive elements.

The ability of the individual American producer to sell better products at a lower price than his foreign competitor ceased to be a decisive factor; the question was not the price or the quality of imports, it was the question whether payment for imports could be made in the products of the purchasing country.

ECONOMIC REVOLUTIONS

The World War of 1914–18 demonstrated how blockade conditions and sea warfare forced countries dependent upon imported food and industrial products to turn to domestic production. The cotton-textile industry of Lancashire, England, lost its Far Eastern markets to new competition in Japan and India. The German chemical industry lost most of its export markets to new producers in France, England, and the United States. The trend toward industrialization in colonial and rural countries was accompanied by a trend toward agricultural self-sufficiency in many industrial countries. These trends continued after the war.

France, Italy, Germany, and Sweden sharply increased their own grain and other food production during the interwar period. The United States had become a creditor nation and an outstanding factor in world trade.

The World War of 1939–44 has accelerated similar trends throughout the world. Industrialization in Latin America and in the Far East has proceeded at a remarkable rate. India has become an industrial nation of secondary rank, as well as a creditor nation. East Europe has been made a second Ruhr industrial district by the Nazi government, which has transferred a substantial part of industrial activity and armament production to the area comprised by southeast Poland, German Upper Silesia, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Hungary. Coal production in Upper Silesia, with coal fields slightly greater than those of the Ruhr, now compares with Ruhr coal production.

In Turkey, the Belgian Congo, South Africa, as well as nearer home in Canada, Brazil, Argentina, and elsewhere, additional production capacity has been created in minerals, heavy industry, finishing industries, and in some agricultural products such as Turkish and Brazilian cotton.

In addition, however, the war has comparatively impoverished some leading countries. The United Kingdom probably has left no more than half of its former investments abroad and has piled up debts to many countries of the world to a total of perhaps more than $4,000,000,000 in blocked sterling debts.

The small countries of Europe must undertake reconstruction with limited financial resources, even though their colonial possessions, such as the Belgian Congo, the Dutch East Indies, and Portuguese colonial possessions provide rich resources. France alone has a substantial amount of gold and foreign investments in comparison with its post-war needs.

TRADE TREATY BENEFITS SCRAPPED

These circumstances lead to certain conclusions:

It seems a foregone conclusion that Russia will exert a political and economical hegemony over east Europe, from Finland, through Poland and Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. The almost inevitable result may be the creation of a counterbalancing bloc of western European states led by the United Kingdom. This would mean the creation of a bloc of states and colonial empires that cover the greater part of the world.

It is sometimes forgotten that in 1939 the beginning of such a bloc had been made. Financial and economic accords were concluded between the United Kingdom on the one hand and France, Belgium, and the Netherlands on the other in 1939 and early 1940.

The terms of the economic accord of December 4, 1939, between France and the United Kingdom, exemplify the character of the accords and give a picture of post-war possibilities which gains significance because of the view generally held in British and French official circles—then and now—that the accords should be maintained after the war.

The provisions, in brief, were:

1. The pegging of the pound sterling—French franc rate of exchange.

2. A clearing agreement covering exchanges of goods and services, with no limitation upon credit balances, until 6 months after the war.

3. Preferential buying in the other empire where possible rather than buying outside the British or the French Empires.

4. Pooling of the raw material resources of the French and British Empires.

5. Common purchasing agencies in third countries for the two empires to eliminate competitive buying.

6. No increase in the restrictions upon trade between the two countries, no matter what restrictions were placed upon imports from third countries.

It seems unnecessary to emphasize the effects upon American farmers, manufacturers and workers, dependent upon export markets and subject to import competition, which would follow the post-war creation of a trade cartel of this character between the British, French, Dutch, and Belgian empires, together with the participation of the Scandinavian states, dependent upon British markets, and possibly including Spain, Portugal, and Italy.

This state trading cartel, it should be recalled, was actually established in a tentative form during the early part of 1940. Its development was terminated only by the collapse of western Europe. After the war the emergence of Russian hegemony in east and southeast Europe may well impose some such combination as a measure of European self-defense.

In addition, the financial position of post-war England will be badly shaken by war expenditures; England will naturally tend to finance its huge import surplus by preferential buying in countries that will accept payment in British goods and services. England's former revenues from foreign investments, shipping, banking, and trade will have declined once more as in 1914–18.

It would be a grave oversight to ignore the prospect that political and economic circumstances may necessitate the creation of this huge preferential bloc of nations, with the resultant adverse effects upon American trade at home and abroad.

STATE TRADING AGENCIES—PREFERENTIAL TARIFFS

International competition, under the State clearing systems, and exchange-control systems ceased to be conducted by private enterprise; buying and selling in open markets at competitive prices and costs were practically eliminated. The balanced clearing agreements, which determined, over long periods, the volume of goods exchanged and frequently also their prices, eliminated open markets and competition in them. Price, quality, and cost of production of individual producers competing in open markets ceased to be the basis of world trade.

States that suffered from a crisis in foreign exchange reserves permitted purchases so far as possible only from countries that accepted payment in goods. At the same time they subsidized exports to countries which still permitted payment in gold and in stable "free exchange" currencies.

There is no convincing evidence that after the war the principal countries of the world will have either the means or the desire to abandon State control of foreign trade and foreign exchange. Emergency conditions will remain for some years in the domestic fields of reconstruction and reemployment, as well as in international trade and financial relations.

Even the great resources of the United States are not sufficient to finance, on a long-term credit basis, the program of European and world reconstruction in such a manner that restrictions upon international trade and financial transactions could be generally abandoned.

Post-war discussion that presupposes the early or general abandonment of State economic controls of foreign and internal trade in Europe and elsewhere would not therefore seem to be realistic.

GIANT CORPORATIONS—CARTELS CONTROL EXPORTS

It seems almost a foregone conclusion that many nations, particularly in Europe, will maintain state agencies for the control and direction of foreign trade. Long before the present war international cartels and giant corporations dominated world trade in many products. Even as far back as 1915 it was calculated that 15 American corporations accounted for 75 percent of the value of industrial exports of the United States.

In most of the leading export and import commodities, such as petroleum, wool, cotton, certain fruits, metal, and other products, a few firms or corporations, and in some cases one or more joint sales agencies, accounted for well over half of total exports or imports of the product of the United States. Closer concentration of private control in the foreign trade of the United Kingdom, Japan, Germany, and other countries had existed for years.

In certain industries, giant national corporations in the leading countries have concluded a complicated series of agreements dividing up world markets and exchanging engineers, production processes, patents, sometimes organizing jointly owned producing or selling companies in various markets, and dictating in any event the terms of trade to independent distributors. In other cases a few producers have dominated the field of distribution.

The economic consequence of the resultant artificial restriction of production and sales have seriously contributed to the economic difficulties of many countries. The adverse effects upon industries and countries of the rapid disappearance of the small and medium-sized producer and distributor has been noticeable in Europe as well as in America.

FREE TRADE UNIONS—FREE ENTERPRISE

But the political power and effects of international interlocking corporate groups, syndicates, and cartels are perhaps far more significant than the economic effects. It would be difficult to recite the true history of the rise of the Fascist regime in Italy and the Nazi regime in Germany without noting the decisive support granted to these movements by international finance and industry, especially certain great corporations and cartels.

World trade after the war will be dominated by state foreign trade agencies and by great corporate and cartel groups. Gigantic corporations, with annual sales and expenditures in excess of the annual budgets of most nations in peacetime, cannot be termed "private" or free enterprise. Nor can such terms be applied to rigid international cartel groups which eliminate outside producers and frequently dictate their terms even to smaller nations.

The future of the small and medium-sized manufacturer, and, of the worker, in industries where competition still exists in vigorous forms, is endangered today to a greater extent than ever before in history. The great domestic market provided by the farmers is threatened first by the loss of foreign markets. The former export and domestic markets of competitive American industries are similarly threatened.

American exporters face the prospect of exclusion from former export markets, irrespective of their competitive prices and the superiority of their products.

American producers for the domestic market face the prospect of overexpanded foreign industries, mining companies, and agricultural producers seeking to unload, in the United States, war stocks and the products of excess production capacity by state subsidized export campaigns.

JOB SECURITY OF PARAMOUNT IMPORTANCE

Faced with the huge problem of shifting aproximately 30,000,000 of war workers and servicemen into avenues of profitable employment in the post-war period, the question of unemployment in the period of transition is of transcendent importance.

After all, the whole life of the worker is pervaded and molded by his job, by the physical condition under which he works, by the length of his workingday; by the adequacy of his pay; by the extent to which he is protected against arbitrary discharge; and by the nature of the strains under which he works.

The harmful spiritual consequences of enforced unemployment are no less than its material deprivations. However keen and anxious we may be to help build up the economy of other nations and peoples, we must not attempt these efforts at the sacrifice and well-being of our people.

We are and have been living more or less under a protective philosophy. We have our trade unions and trade associations to look after our respective interests. We have our minimum-wage laws, our child-labor laws, our sanitation and compensation and security laws. We have their counterparts in other spheres of activity. We have our immigration laws, etc., all designed for protective purposes. It is therefore just and proper that we should protect our American standards of life and of work against destructive foreign competition.

There has been a tendency in the United States to discuss the advantages of freedom of trade and freedom of enterprise for farmer, worker, and businessman in general terms, which almost completely ignore the manner in which freedom of enterprise has been abolished in many branches of American economic life, as well as abroad.

It would be unquestionably a great victory for American principles of free enterprise if the rest of the world consented to adopt a revised international gold standard based upon American gold and Americar credit. Also, if the world agreed to discard state controls of domestic and foreign trade and to break up giant corporate groups and cartels that sprawl over the world markets. There is, however, no present prospect of the achievement of these laudable objectives. There is, therefore, every reason for this country to take intelligent and prompt measures to meet post-war realities.

It would be an invitation to disaster to permit foreign state-controlled industries to invade the American market with their war stocks and excess production capacity by means of state subsidies which could nullify superior American efficiency and destroy superior American living standards. European state-controlled trading systems of economy permit production cost and price to determine trade.

European systems of economy likewise permit the dumping of products in this market, whether or not their production costs are substantially higher than American costs. Under such circumstances the laudable academic theory of the international division of labor on the basis of production costs ceases to have relevance.

OTHER TRADE RESTRAINTS AND BARRIERS

In addition to the foregoing other considerations must be recognized in any serious discussion of post-war trade. Some of these considerations relate to—

(a) Lack of purchasing power on the part of the masses of the people of the world.

(b) Lack of price stability; instability of currencies, laws and regulations restricting the free flow of trade and currencies.

(c) Quota restrictions and prohibition of imports.

(d) Preferential tariffs.

(e) Government bartering; Government monopoly of trade.

(f) Government control of vital raw materials.

(g) Subsidized shipping and State industries.

(h) Patents.

All of these are more or less trade barriers. They do have an effect on foreign trade and act as trade restraints.

Submerged and low living and working standards of people abroad do restrict and limit and as well tend to degrade the markets of the world. This condition may rightfully be considered the most vicious of all our trade restraints. If standards of living and of work were increased everywhere to our American standards the increase of the purchasing power of the masses in all lands would be tremendous.

Even were such an additional purchasing power in existence, international trade as well as the masses would benefit little unless stability of prices was assured. The possibility of securing an assurance of the stability of the money of the peoples of the several nations will be one of the important problems in our post-war world. Depreciation in the value of currency is therefore closely associated, as a trade barrier, to the lack of purchasing power on the part of so many of the nations of the world.

Placing quota limitations on either imports or exports constitutes other grave trade barriers. These preclude an equal opportunity to all producers.

Preferential tariffs, such as are in effect among the nations of the British Commonwealth, constitute effective trade barriers in that the countries comprising this group influence the trade of nearly 50 percent of the world's population, but a lesser percentage of the world's purchasing power.

Government barter, or monopoly control of a nation's import and export commerce, is another form of trade restraint in that such monopoly control precludes a free market in the purchase and sale of goods under such control. The same is true of government control of vital raw materials. This, too, constitutes an effective trade barrier and is a denial of a free and open market.

Government control and large investments of government funds in government-directed shipping combines indirectly constitute a barrier to free trade in that such shipping concerns and facilities lend themselves to favor the nation which controls or subsidizes those facilities or concerns. Shipping companies are often used to offset import restrictions in the form of tariff rates levied on competitive imports by such companies absorbing the import tax through lower freight charges.

In the field of patent laws we find the laws of other governments, that is, of all commercially important governments, including the colonies, dominions, and territorial possessions of such governments at variance with our own. In other lands a grant of patent is public property under limited restrictions. Unless sufficient articles protected by such patent are produced within that country to meet the domestic consumptive demands, the government may issue a license to others who may wish to produce such articles.

Our patent laws permit of citizens of a foreign government obtaining a patent registration, thus securing a monopoly on the right of production as well as of sale of such patented article.

This trade barrier is further aggravated in that no article, so registered in the Patent Office, can be imported here, though produced abroad, without the written consent of the patent registrant. The patent holder alone can have these patented articles, protected by an American patent, produced in a foreign country and shipped into America. This same privilege is not accorded by other governments to Americans.

With reference to the requirement that trade within a country be confined to citizens of the (foreign) country, our good-neighbor policy has not prevented some Central American countries, and possibly others, from putting into effect a most insidious trade barrier of denying noncitizens the right to engage in trade. This again constitutes an unfair and inequitable trade barrier.

TARIFF DUTIES LESSER TRADE BARRIERS

These and other trade barriers have been adopted by individual nations undoubtedly for different reasons. It is fair to presume they were enacted and adopted in the attempt to protect and promote the interests of the nations concerned. But, of the trade barriers cited, the United States has resorted to but one. We do subsidize shipping engaged in foreign trade. However these shipping companies are operated by private persons and corporations, and are uninfluenced by Government authorities in favoring American trade.

What is generally referred to as a trade barrier common to America as well as to every other commercial nation is the imposition of tariff duties on imports. Indeed, most foreign nations impose a tariff duty or customs duty, which in respect to the wholesale value of the article or commodity involved, when sold in the country which permits of importation, is higher than our own. Yet, our own Nation is unjustly accused of being the chief and sole offender in this regard. At the same time no reference whatever is made to the many other and more destructive trade barriers practiced and enforced by other countries which I have called to your attention.

DECLARATION OF THE A. F. OF L. ON TRADE BARRIERS

It is obvious that if we are to modify, alter, or eliminate these trade barriers and encourage a greater flow of international trade concerted and voluntary action is required on the part of all commercial nations of the world.

In this regard I would direct your attention to the declaration adopted at the post-war conference of the American Federation of Labor last month, and which in part provides—

"We have demonstrated during this war that a free economy can produce goods in unimagined abundance. In the years of peace a sustained high level of production and employment is also possible if there is assurance of economic justice within nations and between nations. To accomplish this, it will be necessary to get rid of that kind of exploitation which tends to concentrate income in the hands of the few and prevents the great mass of workers from having the purchasing power to buy the things they need for daily life. It also will be necessary to lessen the barriers between nations so that there may be a larger interchange of goods and services for all. The basic test of freedom is the welfare of the common man. We hold that under freedom society can be so organized that everyone will have an opportunity to earn his own livelihood."

The report further provides that—

"A certain number of international functional agencies will be necessary to insure the consistent development of sound economic policies in a world which will be increasingly responsive to the advances in technology due to scientific discovery and invention. The frontiers of the world of labor are those of economic as well as political geography, and the economic barriers to freedom of intercourse must not be permitted to block the pathway to prosperity. These problems by their very nature cannot be solved in any single set of laws or agreements because the conditions with which they deal are forever changing. It is, therefore, necessary to maintain and create the pertinent institutions for dealing with them."

In defining the institutions to deal with these subjects the report provides that—

"In the world of commerce and industry there should be agencies to deal with such problems as (1) the stabilization of foreign exchange, (2) communications and transport on land, sea, and in the air, (3) the commercial policy including cartels, (4) fiscal policies and foreign investments, (5) access to natural resources and raw material, (6) to coordinate these activities there should be a United Nations Economic Organization with consultative and advisory functions.

"In each case there should be provision for objective studies of the facts which should be made available to the general public."

TRADE TREATIES

Instead of the foregoing it has been suggested that entering into trade treaties is the proper method to be followed for the attainment of the results indicated. Fundamentally, trade treaties, as at present negotiated and entered into, disregard constitutional requirements under guise of trade agreements. Then, too, under the method adopted of negotiating trade agreements, sole power to determine matters relating to foreign trade are delegated exclusively to the executive branch of government.

Quite aside from the fact that trade agreements entered into have been negotiated under methods which do not provide ample opportunity for consultation and consideration of the domestic interests involved, including labor, experience has demonstrated that to make these trade agreements or trade treaties effective, there must be some automatic enforcement provision.

A prime provision of all trade agreements or treaties is that the other contracting parties shall not grant to imports of other countries a lower tariff rate or similar concession than that accorded to imports of the United States. These provisions have not been adhered to in all instances. To the contrary, we understand that complaints in this regard reached such proportions that certain high officials in our Department of State were impelled and did prepare a strong protest against the failure on the part of several nations to fulfill the terms of the trade treaties entered into. However, the protests were never transmitted, nor were the complaints manifested ever properly adjusted.

In this discussion I have dealt largely in a general way with the many barriers to an enlarged intercourse of foreign trade, the least harmful of which is the levying of tariff rates on competitive imports. I have not attempted to deal specifically with rates that govern under our laws and to the extent imports to this country are subject to tariff rates as compared to those on the free list; neither have I attempted to set forth comparative rates enforced on imports by other countries.

AMERICAN VALUATION JUSTIFIED

Suffice it to say that some two-thirds of the articles listed at this time in our tariff schedules are on the free list.

A discussion of the tariff rates themselves assumes increased importance when it is recognized that in the main our tariff duties are levied on foreign valuation—a system of valuation not alone unfair to American producers but equally discriminating as between competitive producers of our principal commercial nations. In fact, under our foreign-valuation system, those nations are favored whose people suffer the greatest submerged standards of life and work. They are the greatest beneficiaries under our present system, particularly the Japanese and peoples of other low standard and semienslaved nations.

All engaged in the American chemical industry should be grateful for the foresight, the patience, and energy of the late Frank Garvin, who, in 1920–22, realizing the unfair and discriminatory advantages which the German cartelized chemical industry had over its American competitors in the American market, prevailed on Congress to levy tariff rates on imports of chemical products on the value of competitive American products.

This system of levying duties on the American selling price, or American valuation, enabled the American chemical industry to be in a position to render to our Nation and its allies the valiant, patriotic, and all-important service so essential to our victory in this colossal and world-wide devastating war.

Trade in the post-war period we fear, will not be governed upon an individual and private basis, nor will it be governed by production costs or by prices, domestic or foreign. Instead it will be controlled by the political and economic objectives of each nation concerned with maintaining domestic employment. It is our further judgment that in time, when an expanded production capacity will again be realized by the leading industrial and commercial nations abroad, that the nations confronted with surpluses, and, for other considerations will be prepared for large scale export dumping wherever and whenever possible.

We should be prepared at all times and under all circumstances to protect our own market and our own people and be ready to meet whatever emergency may arise. So far as lies within our power and influence, let us aid other nations and peoples to attain higher standards of life and of work, and enlarge and enrich the markets of the world. In so doing, let us not be unmindful that the interests of America are of foremost consideration. But regardless of whatever policy or relationship is to govern, let it be formulated and arrived at in open concert, by a democratic procedure, and not by bureaucratic methods or means.

Time Magazine Goes to Town With C. A. A.-A. A. F.-W. T. S.—Women—Gen. Hap Arnold and the WASPS—Says Some Congressmen Were Not Impressed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from Time Magazine of May 29, 1944:

WOMEN—UNNECESSARY AND UNDESIRABLE

ROBERT RAMSPECK is a sober, studious Congressman with an affable air which hides a bulldog's tenacity. As chairman of the powerful House Civil Service Committee, he recently took a look at a bill which another smiling, stubborn man, Gen. Henry Harley Arnold, has been trying to shove through Congress. What he saw made BOB RAMSPECK clamp his teeth on his pipe stem.

The bill would make the Women's Airforce Service Pilots a part of "Hap" Arnold's Army Air Forces. It would expand the whole WASP program to train and commission more women pilots. The bill would also give colonel's rank to handsome, energetic Jacqueline Cochran, now Chief of the WASPS and one of the ablest of United States air women.

RAMSPECK and his committee went ferreting. They found out that the WASPS, earnest, hard working, and rule abiding, are nevertheless an expensive experiment. Minimum cost of complete training for a WASP is $20,000—not $12,150, as the War Department once estimated. Of 1,313 women who have gone to WASP training schools, only 541 have graduated; 281 have flunked out; the rest are still in training. Only 3 WASPS (all of whom were seasoned pilots before they joined) are qualified to fly four-engine bombers. Nineteen WASPS have been killed, 11 in operational flights after graduation.

WASTED MANPOWER

Hap Arnold's argument has been that there is a serious aviation manpower shortage; the A. A. F. could use 2,000 to 2,500 WASPS. From unhappy C. A. A. flying instructors and C. A. A.-trained personnel came another story. They say they have found no place for their talents since the curtailment of the A. A. F. training program. They are available to ferry planes by the thousands. General Arnold waved their claims away, held fast for his WASPS.

The Ramspeck committee used A. A. F. figures to support the men's pleas, found that they are a sizable group—some 6,000 instructors alone—who could be trained for the work the WASPS are doing in about half the time and at half the cost.

Furthermore, the A. A. F. could utilize its returned combat pilots, as the Navy does, for noncombat flying. If a manpower deficit really exists, the committee found, it is "due largely to a failure to * * * utilize existing personnel."

STARTLING AND INVALID

Said the report acidly: the need "to recruit teen-aged schoolgirls, stenographers, clerks, beauticians, housewives, and factory workers to pilot the military planes of this Government is as startling as it is invalid"; the militarization of Cochran's WASPS is not necessary or desirable; the present program should be immediately and sharply curtailed.

Jackie Cochran maintained an anxious silence while Hap Arnold talked on. The committee kept its report in its desk. Ramspeck had not decided whether to release it officially or let the cold facts come out in debate when Cochran's WASPS are tossed onto the House floor.

The Stench—The Political Picture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, the political situation has cleared up somewhat in 24 hours. Or has it?

The President asked Mr. LEMKE of North Dakota: "Bill, are you going to run against me or not?" This was—or was it—a slip of the tongue, but it was a slip not to be overlooked.

Up to date, then, it would seem that the President has decided to run. Since that is so, it follows that all those C. I. O. political committee activities stem directly for him and have his approval. Deny it as he may, he, through Hillman his anonymous representative, is responsible for the defeat of STARNES and COSTELLO and others. His cohorts glory too much to make a denial effective.

Some $7,000,000 dollars or more have been raised to support the Democratic nominee, who can be no other than the present occupant of the White House, and with the approval of the candidate-to-be.

So is the public morale to be debauched to make a Roman holiday to establish an autocracy and a personal monarchy with the political blessing of the man who seeks to succeed himself, plus the aid and help of one anonymous Hillman and an announced Hannegan in an endeavor to make a perpetual President. God save us.

None of us are so blind as those of us who will not see. It is really too bad, but too true that the President of the United States is responsible for such attacks on Congress as he has approved and as have been disseminated by those who love anonymity, to defeat many good men in Congress.

History will record that no such epidemic of purely political chicanery was encompassed in so short a time or ever was so disadvantageous to a country as that which has been perpetrated under the Roosevelt regime to the disadvantage of a democracy.

The multitude, who really are the Government, have been hypnotized, drugged, and numbed by the theory that they cannot even speak nor whisper nor gasp, for fear of losing the food from a paternal Government which is good enough for them to live on so long as they can live off it. What a story of 7 long years.

That is a horrible situation for us who pay the taxes for the support of this group to have to contemplate. How long are we going to take it?

The nonchalance of those who have spent and propose to spend our hard-earned dollars without a sign of acknowledgment of their responsibility to us from whom the revenue comes—so long as they can continue to soak us—is appalling. It should bring us all to a realizing sense of the situation in which we find ourselves by reason of our negligence of the responsibility which rests upon us. Are we dead to a realizing sense of what is being done to us?

Drunk with the intoxication of getting something for nothing, have we found ourselves in a catastrophe, breeding a revolution which would spell the end of a civilization? Who is to blame who will not fight to live.

What is the use of talking about what has happened? We are following along the highway traveled by those ancient civilizations which lie buried today if we know enough to profit by the experience of the ages.

In Mexico, piled one on top of the other, are to be found five civilizations, such as that of which we are so swelled-headedly proud today, all five of which, if history is to be read and understood, are buried there because of the complacance of the people toward problems of their day which are absolutely comparable to those which confront us.

Cannot we learn anything from experience?

The insidious methods employed by groups to seek paid loyalty, the deference to labor and to strikers and all unions for votes which have helped to delay victory by strikes, and the purely political purpose as so evidenced to continue a family fortune for personal power to keep the fortune intact if not the name makes every good American sick at heart as he wonders if we are on the way to join the buried civilizations. Are we?

Is a Huge Debt an Economic Aid?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein an editorial appearing in the Pontiac Daily Press of Pontiac, Mich., on June 1, 1944, which presents fair, logical, and sound reasoning on the subject of national debt. Let every sane American read this editorial with hope and encouragement:

IS A HUGE DEBT AN ECONOMIC AID?

Because this month's Fifth War Loan drive will increase the national debt by $16,000,000,000 to a level of $214,000,000,000, Congress must complete action before June 30 on a House approved bill to raise the Federal debt ceiling from $210,000,000,000 to $240,000,000,000. The Senate, by increasing the bill's limit to $260,000,000,000 has made a conference on it necessary.

The pending increase in the debt limit is the seventh since 1936 when the Treasury borrowings were limited by statute to $25,000,000,000. There has been a lift of the debt ceiling every year since the rearmament program was launched in 1940. Two previous increases were voted to cover relief and recovery expenditures arising from the depression early in the New Deal Administration.

Heretofore it has been the generally accepted American view that a small debt can be useful by providing a safe place for investment of private funds and that a large debt is never safe or desirable. In other words, the Federal debt could not be permitted to rise unless there were a corresponding increase in the national income. Without such increased income, the theory was, the interest burden would become too heavy and conditions favorable to inflation would be created.

The theory that there is no danger in a national debt since the money is owed to the people themselves, has been rejected as unsound by orthodox economists. This was the theory which comforted the leaders of Germany as they followed the lax fiscal policies which resulted in wild inflation and misery for their people.

It was during the depression of the early thirties that a new national debt philosophy was born in the United States. It resulted in the application of the theories of John Maynard Keynes, a British economist, to the fiscal problems of our Government, and it gave us the New Deal system of deficit financing so often assailed by critics of the administration.

In the view of subscribers to the Keynes theories a national debt of $300,000,000,000, which we are likely to have by the time peace is restored, will present no great problem if national income and employment remain at high levels.

The extremely broad scope of the implications in that big "if" should not be permitted to escape the attention of every taxpayer.

Stuart Chase is one economist who subscribes to the Keynes theories, but he concedes in part what Harold G. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution, contends, namely, that the inflationary tendencies of a compensatory fiscal policy could not be held in check without a transfer of the powers of taxation and appropriation from the legislative to the executive branch of the Government. Such a transfer, of course, would violate the historic American conception of the checks and balances provided by legislative, executive, and judicial branches and increase Presidential powers already considered too great by millions of Americans. This has been President Roosevelt's burning desire since the day he entered office and is a tremendous leap toward dictatorship.

The average American businessman still looks askance at the deficit financing practiced by the administration. Conceding that war has left the Government no choice in the matter, he still believes, and he is supported by orthodox economic opinion, that carried to its ultimate extreme, it can result only in inflation, repudiation, and disaster.

Food as Related to U. N. R. R. A. and Lend-Lease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, there has been some rather loose talk in this House about the United States being able to feed the rest of the world. I heard yesterday about the nearly 2,000,000,000 pounds of surplus wool in this country. It seems to me that the Members of the House and the country should know that most of this wool has been imported from other countries. The normal production of wool in the United States is about 650,000,000 pounds. We use, in normal times, approximately 750,000,000 pounds for domestic purposes. This country, because of the seeming necessity of having a large stock pile of wool, imported a great deal of wool from Australia, Africa, and South America. The sad part about the use of domestic wool revolves around the fact that importers are able to buy the domestic wool under the established or support price of wool in this country. It leaves the domestic producers of wool holding the bag. It is my understanding that the Surplus Commodities Corporation is now engaged in selling a certain amount of this wool on the open market.

The country should also remember that in 18 out of the last 19 years up to 1943 we were importing about a billion dollars' worth of agriculture products over what we exported. It has generally been supposed that this country raises an ample supply of food and that we exported more than we imported. This is not borne out by the facts and figures supplied by the Department of Agriculture.

The national income of this country has varied from $83,300,000,000 in 1929 to a low of $39,900,000,000 in 1932. In 1942 it was about $120,000,000,000. It is estimated to be more than $150,000,000,000 for 1943 and 1944. If this country is to ever pay off its national debt, we must keep a high plane of production and employment for our citizens. Agriculture is the key to the continued prosperity in this country.

Coming back to the food problem, let me remind you that the farm acreage under cultivation has not varied much in this country since 1919. Between 1919 and 1929, a period of 10 years, it averaged 355,000,000 acres. In 1942 we had about 343,000,00 acres in production. This does not mean that there has not been some increase in production. The last 2 years has seen favorable weather and a high production of crops. Scientific means of cultivation, fertilization, and the better use of seed have increased the yields on the farms. It should be remembered, however, that in 1896 we produced the largest corn crop ever produced until 1943, when the crop was larger. In 1896 we produced 2,671,000,000 bushels of corn. We normally produced about 875,000,000 bushels of wheat. The domestic demand calls for about 750,000,000 bushels of wheat. If this country was to have a serious drought for 2 years, we would be unable to feed ourselves, let alone other countries.

If we are to meet the needs and demands of our domestic users of agriculture products it is estimated we should bring into operation some 4,000,000 acres of new agriculture land each year. This means that irrigation projects should be encouraged because they produce the most food on the smallest acreage.

It is interesting to note that over a period of time when we were paying out something like a billion dollars a year to the farmers for not producing crops we were at the same time bringing into this country $10,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products. This, of course, just doesn't make sense.

It seems absolutely necessary that we bring more land into irrigation, that we spend more time and money in soil conservation and rebuilding practices of our soil if we are to increase production and meet our domestic demands. We should have manufacturing plants in this country to transform our raw products into synthetic products when surpluses do occur. Many of the surpluses which appear locally, be it potatoes in the Scottsbluff Valley in Nebraska or cabbages in the Rio Grande Valley in Texas, are due to the improper distribution of the products.

I think this Congress should understand that these lend-lease agreements with other countries, if they are to be repaid by sending us agriculture products, means that the future existence of agricultural prosperity will be further depressed in this country.

It does not seem that the planners of other nations should rely upon the United States to feed the rest of the world. In the light of the known facts, it just cannot be done. It seems to me that if we are to have a period of prosperity in this country, then agriculture should be protected. When we gave the State Department the right to make trade agreements and adjustments with other nations, we placed with that Department the power, through legislation, to bring on a permanent depression, through tariff manipulations.

The Constitution provides that Congress should have the power to regulate and issue currency. In checking the tariff regulations it is interesting to note that about 65 percent of the trade agreements deal with agricultural products. Our country holds about 7 percent of the population of the world, but we control about 10 percent of the raw products of the world. If this Nation is to embark upon a program of tremendous industrial expansion, then we can expect to be at the mercy of other nations controlling our needed raw materials. If this is to be done at the expense of agriculture, then certainly we should not plan on feeding the rest of the world through such agreements as we might make under U. N. R. R. A. or lend-lease.

National Prohibition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, because in recent weeks I have witnessed an increase in the pressure being exerted in the attempt to put over national prohibition I am moved to call attention to the dangers which lie in this ill-conceived attempt to legislate the morals of Americans.

I was of the opinion that this legislation had been consigned to a peaceful death, but upon inquiry I am advised the committee plans to reopen hearings on the Bryson bill. It seems we are to be lulled into a false sense of security, then, when the time seems ripe, this measure will be rushed out here and an attempt will be made to secure its passage under the guise of hastening the conclusion of the war.

I know this is a subject that is not too popular. Political wisdom seems to advise that we restrain from broaching it in the House.

I cannot help feeling, however, that we are doing a dangerous thing when we allow the proponents of the measure to gain the impression that we are lowering our guard.

There are many splendid arguments for temperance, I know. I admire and commend those earnest persons who strive diligently, day in and day out, in the cause of promoting temperance. Moderation in all things is a praiseworthy and a mighty good slogan in all walks of life.

However, there is an irreconcilable difference between those who advocate temperance and those who by stealth and with the use of pressure tactics attempt to foist unwanted legislation which will give rebirth to the horrors which attended the last trial of the noble experiment.

Reams have been written about the gangsterism, the thievery, the murder of those days all of us would rather forget. The trail of broken homes, broken lives, and broken characters left scars on American life that are still visible. No greater tragedy ever occurred in any civilized nation than was our lot through the imposition of gangland rule which came with national prohibition.

Students of history in future generations will read with amazement the sordid stories of that and will doubt the evidence of their own eyes when they read that there were men and women who again sought to inflict on America this reign of terror and scandal.

If there were no greater argument than this—if the advocates of this measure are sincere in their belief that this time it will be different—then they certainly must subscribe to the democratic process. They certainly must not advocate another act of contempt for the men who are abroad fighting for the life of their country.

National prohibition was foisted on the country a generation ago, while America's sons were in foreign lands, fighting for the right of self-determination everywhere. These men fought for liberty and freedom and came home to find themselves saddled with this octopus of scandal, corruption, and death. We must determine that it shall not happen again. Let those who seek national prohibition lay aside their weapons until our fighting men have laid aside the weapons they are using to vanquish the Republic's enemies. When they have returned to their homes, and have had sufficient time to consider the matter fully—then will be the time to ask them if they wish national prohibition in the country they fought and bled for. We talk about our loyalty to our fighting men—don't let's sneak this underhanded deal over on them again.

Unreasonable O. P. A. Regulations Should Be Abandoned

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL C. MICHENER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the permission given to me, I am including in these remarks a petition just received and signed by a large number of the leading farmers and citizens of the great agricultural district of Michigan which I have the honor to represent in this Congress. The petition is as follows:

To the Senators and Representatives of the United States of America:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States of America and legal voters, respectfully petition you to take such action as may be necessary to abolish immediately certain restrictions, imposed by the Office of Price Administration under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, on the following sales and transactions:

1. Public sales by a bona fide owner, directly or through an agent or auctioneer, of such owner's used furniture, household goods, and personal effects acquired by such owner for his own use or consumption and not acquired for the purpose of resale;

2. Public sales by a bona fide farmer, directly or through an agent or auctioneer, of such farmer's used tractors, machinery, implements, and tools acquired by such farmer for his own use in connection with his farming operations and activities and not acquired for the purpose of resale;

3. Public sales by an administrator, executor, guardian, or trustee, directly or through an agent or auctioneer, pursuant to an order of court, of any used personal property of the character enumerated in paragraphs numbered 1 and 2 above.

Your petitioners represent that the maximum price regulations, prescribed by the Office of Price Administration and popularly known as ceiling prices, when applied to sales of the character above described, are unjust, unfair, unreasonable, arbitrary, un-American, and impracticable; that it was never intended or desired by Congress, or by the American people whom Congress represents, that the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 or the maximum price regulations issued thereunder should apply to sales of the character above described, but on the contrary such act and regulations were intended to apply only to sales by merchants, dealers, retailers, and wholesalers engaged in the buying and selling of merchandise; that such regulations, when applied to sales of the character enumerated in paragraphs numbered 1, 2, and 3 above, tend to promote connivance and fraud on the part of sellers and buyers; and that such regulations impose such undue hardship and restraint on an American citizen in the liquidation or disposition of his own used personal property (acquired by him for his own use or consumption) and so hamper, impede, and interfere with the right of such owner to sell such property as to practically deny to him the right of such sale or auction.

Mr. Speaker, I am in complete harmony with the sentiment expressed in this petition. The problem sought to be solved by these petitioners exists in every agricultural congressional district in the country. This petition does not express the complaint of a few local people only.

I think we all agree that the Office of Price Administration has been of benefit in many instances. On the other hand, only a prejudiced blind follower who has any practical knowledge of the facts will attempt to justify the practice which these petitioners seek to change.

The Emergency Price Control Act expires by limitation of time on June 30, 1944. The Committee on Banking and Currency, having jurisdiction over this legislation, has been wrestling with the problem for better than 2 months. A bill has been reported continuing the life of the agency until June 30, 1945. It is contemplated that on Tuesday next this bill will be taken up for consideration by the House of Representatives, and at this time I want to call the attention of the membership to the views of my constituents as expressed in their petition, and I express the hope that in legislation continuing the life of the O. P. A. for another year provision will be made to remedy the conditions herein complained of.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that all Members will read this petition.

Montgomery Ward Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. WEICHEL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Daily Sentinel Tribune, of Bowling Green, Ohio:

MONTGOMERY WARD CASE

If the Government of the United States can legally do what it has done to Montgomery Ward & Co., then, indeed, the boasted liberty of America has been destroyed; and, like Nazi German, the people are the servants of the state and the state is not the servant of those who create it.

Make no mistake. The mail-order business of Montgomery Ward cannot be construed as being a necessary part of the war effort without "an indecent exposure of the intellect," as Sidney Smith declared a hundred years ago. The law giving the President the right to seize property essential to the war effort was surely never intended to apply to retail business but to such things as factories, mines, and transportation.

If the Government can seize Montgomery Ward's business, it can seize any business in Wood County if the proprietor protested the War Labor Board's demands. It could seize any farmer's land under such a condition. And in its statement Thursday Montgomery Ward declares that the Board itself had asked the courts to dismiss Ward's case testing its authority, the Board contending that its orders in a labor case were not "legally binding," but were only "advice" which Ward need not accept.

Make no mistake that the principle involved relates to the actual labor dispute between Ward and its employees and the War Labor Board. The American way of determining the legal questions involved was through the courts. The principle involved is whether or not a private company or an individual may have his property seized by military forces without an order by a court of justice.

Montgomery Ward has done the country a service by its refusal to give up its property without actual physical force compelling it to do so. It brings the question of individual rights squarely to the attention of Congress and to the people of the United States.

Opposing Continuance of Fair Employment Practice Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, certain press reports recently concerning the action of the House on the passage of the national war agencies appropriation bill, left the erroneous impression that I favored the continuance of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice.

The reverse of that inference is true. I am opposed to the continuance of this agency, and when the bill was under consideration I denounced this agency and stated in the debate that I would vote for the Tarver amendment, which I did, to strike out the entire appropriation for the Fair Employment Practice Committee, since I thought this organization had committed violent abuses and had rendered a disservice and created disunity in time of war.

I cited in my statement on the floor of the House the incident of the Dallas News, wherein the Dallas News advertised, "Wanted: Colored man"; and the Fair Employment Practice Committee reprimanded the Dallas News for using the word "colored" in an advertisement, and said that it was discriminatory as to race, and I declared in my remarks to the House that an agency which has no more sense than this should be abolished, and I voted twice for the Tarver amendment to eliminate all appropriations for the F. E. P. C. and did all that I could to eliminate same from the bill.

I believe those who seek to stir up the race question now are rendering a disservice to their country and also making more difficult the solving of the race question in the United States, and I shall continue to do all I can toward the abolishment of this agency.

Under leave granted, I submit herewith copy of a letter which I wrote one of my constituents, Mr. J. E. Keever, of Ennis, Tex., explaining my position and my vote upon the bill:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1944.

Mr. J. E. KEEVER,
Ennis, Tex.

DEAR ED: I understand that recent press reports indicate that I favored the continuance of the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice, and that I am being criticized therefor. The press report is misleading and erroneous.

I voted to abolish this Committee on Fair Employment Practice and denounced it in a speech in the House, specifically citing the Dallas News incident, and voted twice to eliminate it from the appropriation bill making appropriation for 16 war agencies.

The facts with reference to this matter are these: Last Friday, May 26, the House had under consideration H. R. 4879, known as the national war agencies appropriation bill for 1945, and which made appropriation in the same bill for 17 different war agencies, aggregating $1,030,858,367. Included among these was $500,000 for the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice, but also included were a number of very vital war agencies, such as War Production Board, War Shipping Administration, Selective Service System, Office of Censorship, Office of War Information, Petroleum Administration for War, Office for Emergency Management, War Relocation Authority, and others. All of these items were in the same appropriation bill, and before it was taken up, I conferred with Congressman TARVER, of Georgia, a member of the Appropriations Committee, and he advised me that he was going to offer an amendment to strike from the bill the $500,000 for the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practice, and I told him I would vote for such an amendment and assist him in every way possible in securing the elimination of this item from the bill. He offered the amendment and led the fight so to do, and made a very effective speech in the House condemning this activity, and toward the end of his speech he yielded to me for a statement which I made in the House, and which is contained on page 5029 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 26, and is as follows:

"Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

"Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

"Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I think the gentleman from Georgia has made a very excellent statement. I shall vote for his amendment to strike out the entire appropriation for the Committee on Fair Employment Practice. I think this organization has committed ome violent abuses, and, as the gentleman says, has rendered a disservice and created a disunity in time of war. In addition to specific instances of meddling cited, I have in mind the instance of the Dallas News, wherein the Dallas News advertised: 'Wanted, colored man.' And this organization, the Committee on Fair Employment Practice, took that up with the Dallas News and said they had no right to use the word 'colored' in an advertisement, that it was discriminatory as to race, and demanded that this ad should not be used. The News wanted a colored man, and not a white man, for a particular job; but they must not so advertise for fear of offending the colored race. An agency which has no more sense than that should be abolished."

The Tarver amendment to eliminate all appropriations for the F. E. P. C. was adopted by a vote of 141 to 103. A few minutes thereafter the Republicans demanded another vote on the Tarver amendment, and a number of them changed their votes, and on this second vote the Tarver amendment was defeated by only 4 votes, the vote being 119 for and 123 against.

I voted for the Tarver amendment both times, and through my efforts got a number of other Members to do likewise, as I was very much interested in eliminating all appropriations for this agency, of which I strongly disapprove and had condemned in my remarks in the House and was greatly chagrined and disappointed when the House rejected the Tarver amendment on the second vote.

Immediately thereafter came the vote upon the passage of the bill making appropriation for all of these 17 different agencies, all of which I considered vitally important to the conduct of the war, except the one for the F. E. P. C., and the defeat of this bill would have meant no funds for these vital war agencies for another year.

The largest item in the bill was for the War Shipping Administration, of $530,350,000, which was over half of the entire bill, and the smallest was the item for F. E. P. C. The F. E. P. C. appropriation was about one-tenth of 1 percent of the total amount of the bill, and I hesitated to vote against a bill when I approved of 99.9 percent of the items therein. Furthermore, my record has been 100 percent in voting for all appropriations for the conduct and prosecution of the war, and I hesitated to break this record, especially just as our important invasion of western Europe was about to be launched, and I therefore voted for the bill, in the hope that when it reaches the Senate, the item for the F. E. P. C. will be eliminated.

Congressman TARVER, of Georgia, who offered the amendment and led the fight to strike out the F. E. P. C. appropriation, also voted for the bill, as did many others who had supported the Tarver amendment, the vote on the final passage being 247 yeas to 58 nays.

I am violently opposed to the F. E. P. C. for, in my judgment it is not aiding the war effort, but hurting it by creating disunity in time of war. I believe those who seek to stir up the race question now are rendering a disservice to their country and also making more difficult the solving of the race question in the United States, and I shall continue to do all I can toward the abolishment of this agency.

With kindest personal regards,
Sincerely,

LUTHER A. JOHNSON.

Hon. Will Rogers, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago this House lost one of its most valuable Members when Bill Rogers went back into the armed services. Bill was one of us who came here to Congress for the first time in 1942. His was a famous name, honored and loved by the American people, but Bill demonstrated very soon that he did not intend to sit back and rest on the name that was his. His own sincere convictions made it imperative that he work for and vote for and in all other ways express those convictions here on the floor of the House and elsewhere. The name of Bill Rogers was always among those out in the front leading liberal and progressive legislation which would tend toward a better Nation and a better world.

Some of us who realized especially how badly Bill was needed here in Washington tried to persuade him to remain in Congress. Bill believed, however, that his place was with the men in his tank destroyer company, and that argument was unanswerable. By this time he has probably rejoined those men, and is happy in the thought that he will soon be leading them into conflict against the forces of nazi-ism. Those of us remaining here will miss Bill, miss him badly, but we are glad that he is serving our country where he himself believes he can serve best.

Home Owners' Loan Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. WEICHEL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration and the Woodville State Bank, of Woodville, Ohio, concerning the Home Owners' Loan Corporation:

THE WOODVILLE STATE BANK,
Woodville, Ohio, May 24, 1944.

Hon. ALVIN F. WEICHEL,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WEICHEL: We recently wrote the H. O. L. C. asking if they would be willing to submit a list of mortgages they hold in this community as we were interested in purchasing these mortgages. As is true of all bureaucrats, they are reluctant to release any of their holdings on a continuity of the bureau in which they are interested and did not hesitate to indicate that in replying to our letter. The letter received from Mr. Hager is enclosed herewith which clearly indicates the intention of the H. O. L. C. We felt that you would be interested in this since you have indicated a desire to liquidate this loaning agency.

With kind personal regards.

Yours very truly,

A. W. EMCH,
Executive Vice President.

NATIONAL HOUSING AGENCY,
FEDERAL HOME LOAN
BANK ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., May 12, 1944.

Mr. ARTHUR V. EMCH,
Executive Vice President,
The Woodville State Bank,
Woodville, Ohio.

DEAR MR. EMCH: This will acknowledge your letter of May 10, in which you ask that, if it is the Corporation's intention to dispose of its mortgages, we submit a list of H. O. L. C. loans in your locality for your consideration of the purchase of such of them as appear to be eligible bank loans.

The fact is, the Corporation is not endeavoring to sell its loans, nor can it furnish lists of its mortgages or give out confidential information concerning its borrowers' accounts.

There has been much misunderstanding regarding the Corporation's operations and the availability for purchase of its mortgages, most of it due to the discussions in Congress and elsewhere on the general subject of H. O. L. C. liquidation and to the conflicting publicity these discussions received. The act which created the Corporation, however, included no provision for the sale of its loans, and there was no suggestion of such a disposition of these accounts when this legislation was being considered. Moreover, no legislation has since been enacted which would require such sales.

It would not, as a matter of fact, serve the best interests of the Government or the taxpayer for the Corporation to put its loans on the market. The Government, through the agency of the H. O. L. C., has spent huge sums in bringing the Corporation's good loans to their present safe condition, where, though costing little to service, they provide the interest income needed to offset the costs and losses of servicing the slower loans and disposing of the acquired properties. If these good loans are to be taken over by prospective purchasers, who would naturally be interested in the better mortgages only, the Corporation will be deprived of this revenue and left with the residue of slow loans and properties. The inevitable result will be greatly increased Corporation losses, with a correspondingly increased Government debt, to be made good by the Treasury and the tax-paying public.

In view of your inquiry, I am enclosing a copy of the Commissioner's report to Congress, which I believe you will find interesting.

Very truly yours,

JOHN M. HAGER,
Executive Assistant to the Commissioner.

Good News for the Louisiana Sugarcane Growers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include herein a very interesting, important, and far-reaching editorial which undoubtedly will cause tremendous interest and planning in all postwar proposals. The editorial, appearing in the May 20 edition of Collier's, one of America's leading weekly magazines, is entitled "Fuel for All?" as follows:

FUEL FOR ALL?

As sensational a piece of scientific news as we've seen in recent years is the story of Dr. E. Berl's announced discovery of a way to make gasoline, coal, and oil from various products of farm, forest, and ocean. If true (and we'd like to emphasize the "if" for the time being), the news has tremendous implications for industry and for the future course of world history.

What nature does, of course, in making coal and petroleum out of vegetation, is to change carbohydrates such as sugar and starch into hydrocarbons—coal, oil, lignite, peat, and so on. But nature takes several thousand years, while Dr. Berl says he can turn the trick in a few hours by internal combustion produced in a cheap, simple apparatus.

He says that from 100 long tons of Louisiana dry sugarcane he can get 2,980 gallons of gasoline, 3,430 gallons of middle oil, 1,210 gallons of lubricating oil, and the 8.45 long tons of sugar which the cane would have yielded anyway.

Sugarcane planted on 2.1 percent of the United States available crop lands, says Berl, could produce by his process as much gasoline as our 32,000,000 cars burned up in the year before the war. Other materials from which he claims to be able to produce gasoline or coal are sorghum, sweetpotatoes, cornstalks, grass, leaves, Irish moss, seaweed, algae, wood, and sawdust.

It sounds like wonderful stuff; but at least the Berl claims were revealed in the shape of a paper read at an American Chemical Society meeting, and Dr. Berl himself is a research professor at the eminently respectable Carnegie Institute of Technology.

If the process stands up and produces as promised, a lot of worry about eventual exhaustion of world oil and coal supplies can be dropped. Gone will be one potent cause of wars—the need for nations to assure themselves oil supplies wherever they can find them. Industries can make their own fuel, and so can a lot of farmers. The world's fuel supply will be safe until the sun cools off, and human life quits the earth along with plant life and all other animal life.

The Berl hopes may fade or the Berl process may never come into general use, or it may be forgotten until our grandchildren dig it up from the files. But at the very least, the news gives fresh promise that in time science will lick every problem of full, comfortable living that has bedeviled mankind from the beginning of mankind's tenancy on this planet.

The American Merchant Marine Attacked on Two Fronts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD J. WELCH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, the American people must be aroused to the tremendous importance of the American merchant marine. The American merchant marine is now under attack from two quarters—on the domestic front and on the foreign front. Our merchant marine is one of the Nation's greatest peacetime assets, as well as one of our most necessary national-defense assets, and it must be maintained at the highest level of tonnage and efficiency to meet our national requirements.

The action of the Civil Aeronautics Board in interpreting the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 to prohibit the operation of trans-oceanic air lines by shipping companies is not only a grave threat to our post-war merchant marine, but it virtually emasculates it. The right to operate such transoceanic air lines as are necessary to meet the competition created by similar operations of shipping companies of foreign nations must be given and the rulings of the Civil Aeronautics Board must be changed to bring that about.

No single factor will contribute so much to destroy the American merchant marine than the narrow-minded and short-sighted application of the problems of domestic transportation to the highly competitive field of international commerce carried on by our surface shipping companies. To repeat, the Civil Aeronautics Board ruling must be changed and Congress must act to overthrow its ham-stringing application of the Civil Aeronautics Act.

The enemy from other maritime nations is that subtle propaganda being carried on to lay the groundwork for dismantling and reducing our Merchant Marine following this war from its position of supremacy.

For many years we have produced about 10 percent more than we have consumed. It has been necessary to develop foreign markets for this excess production. The continuance of a successful domestic economy largely depends upon our ability to sell our surplus products in other countries. American goods should and must be carried in American ships. Our merchant marine should be maintained at that level necessary to carry out this policy and purpose.

Simply because of past errors we permitted the American merchant marine to degenerate into fifth place in former years and following World War No. 1, we must not make those same errors again. Propaganda methods are already being developed and put forth to lull us into complacency on this vital matter. We must not be misled but must adhere rigidly to the principle that our merchant marine shall be second to none and that it shall carry American goods to American-found foreign markets.

The San Francisco Call-Bulletin in a recent editorial forcefully called attention to this propaganda which I include herewith, as follows:

HOLD OUR SHIPPING—AMERICAN MERCANTILE MARINE, NOW FIRST, SHOULD NOT BE "ADJUSTED" TO GIVE BRITAIN SUPREMACY

It is becoming increasingly evident that England has determined upon, and has put into operation, a program of propaganda aimed at softening the United States into a lull of post-war insecurity that will persuade us to dispose of much of our merchant shipping immediately after the war.

Britannia no longer rules the waves, and she gives unmistakable evidence of being resentful at that supremacy having passed to this Nation. More by indirection than by direction; more by innuendo, is she hammering away now in an effort to prepare us for reenactment of the idiotic role we accepted after the last war.

Then it was that we disposed of most of our merchant shipping, leaving our Navy without necessary auxiliary support for peacetime national defense. Further, by stripping our merchant marine to skeleton dimensions, we helped to hamstring American industry by making it dependent upon foreign shipping, largely.

Foreign shipping, naturally enough, served first the interests of its respective governments, putting America at a disadvantage—in some instances, eliminating us entirely from competition for foreign trade.

That is the role England is preparing now to assign us again. She has made dupes of us before. She thinks she can do it again. And she can, and will, unless this Nation becomes solidified in a determination to keep its own shipping.

Most recent evidence of what England is planning for us comes from the annual meeting in London of the Institution of Naval Architects. There, it was brought out that when the war ends, Britain will have only half her pre-war tonnage of merchant shipping, whereas the United States will have three times the tonnage we had in 1941.

And what does England propose to do about this? Mr. W. C. Warwick, director of some 40 British shipping companies, told the Institution of Naval Architects:

"After allowing for the restricted output of new ships in Great Britain, it seems probable that the British mercantile marine will approximate about one-half of the pre-war position, or, say, 10,000,000 gross register tons.

"The United States will probably have 30,000,000 gross register tons, or, say three times their pre-war tonnage.

"It is to be hoped that mutually fair and equitable means may be found for adjusting the post-war mercantile marine tonnage of the two countries."

They are preparing us for softening. It is time now that we adopt a national policy that will assure this Nation's peacetime protection. Our merchant fleet now ranks first. Let us keep it there.

Not Against Women Flyers, but for Fair Treatment by A. A. F. for W. T. S. Trainees and Instructors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Post of May 17, 1944:

THOUSANDS OF MALE PILOTS IDLE, WASPS FACE FIGHT FOR EXISTENCE

(By Mary Spargo)

A report condemning the expenditure of millions of dollars in training WASPS to ferry planes when there is a huge surplus of male pilots will be made to the House within the next few days by the Ramspeck Civil Service Investigating Committee.

The committee's findings will be released just before the House considers a measure introduced by Representative JOHN COSTELLO (Democrat, California) to make the WASPS a part of the Army Air Forces.

The Ramspeck committee, according to Capitol Hill reports, will ask that further training of WASPS be discontinued and may go so far as to request termination of the organization altogether.

BATTLE OF SEXES

The House will face a battle of the sexes when it considers the bill to militarize the WASPS next week.

The WASP bill struck a snag when some 11,000 C. A. A. pilots began to bombard their Congressmen about the discrimination against men. When the War Department was informed of the thousands of letters in congressional hands, it withdrew previous objections to commissioning the C. A. A. pilots and instructors, provided the WASPS could be commissioned.

Aviation authorities here are speculating as to how 11,000 more men pilots could be used, let alone a greatly increased WASP force.

Lined up in determined opposition are the American Legion and aviation interests. They have to contend, however, with the prestige and glamor of Miss Jacqueline Cochran, famed woman flyer, cosmetic manufacturer, and wife of Floyd B. Odlum, multimillionaire New York financier, and some 1,000 of her attractive WASPS.

A storm of male protests over commissioning WASPS at a time when the Army Air Forces have transferred 36,000 young men signed up for preliminary training into the infantry has resulted in two amendments to the Costello bill and another will be offered.

Under the first amendment 6,000 civilian instructor-trainees for the Army would be commissioned, and under the second the 5,000 pilot instructors also would get commissions.

Representative JOHN J. SPARKMAN (Democrat, Alabama) announced yesterday that he would introduce another amendment designed to prevent the Air Forces from refusing to commission the male pilots covered by the bill by setting standards which at the present time the men cannot meet.

His amendment extends the bill to include C. A. A.-W. T. S. instructors, as well as trainees, and provides that the men be given the additional training necessary to meet Army Air Force requirements for flying officers.

MADE MORE ACUTE

The problem has become more acute as combat pilots who have seen service abroad and are brought back because they are over combat age cast their eyes on the ferrying jobs held by women.

The women, now operating as civilians under civil service, receive $250 a month, plus $6 a day maintenance away from their base.

It is estimated that it costs about $18,000 to train a woman ferry pilot, and congressional investigators maintain that the whole sum, amouting in the aggregate to some six and a half milion dollars could be saved by using trained pilots already complaining of lack of flying hours.

SOME ALREADY ASSIGNED

Congressmen are also irked because, anticipating easy passage of the bill, the Army Air Forces already have assigned 45 or 50 civilian women to the Officer Candidate School at the Army Air Forces School of Applied Tactics at Orlando, Fla.

Exploring Vikings Visited Minnesota Area in Year 1362

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, out in Minnesota we lay claim for our State to having been inhabited by white men over a century before the arrival of Columbus in the Western Hemisphere. We back up our claim with the famous Kensington Runestone, whose story was related again in a recent issue of the popular national magazine Pathfinder.

In order that my colleagues may know more about Minnesota and its record of the visit of those early Vikings I would direct your attention to the Pathfinder article, which follows:

RUNESTONE'S RECORD

If you have a friend who expresses doubt of the authenticity of the Minnesota runestone, you had better urge him to stay safely in the East. Out where the stone was discovered some 46 years ago, few apparently have heard the misgivings that pop up now and then. And Minnesota folk are liable to be reasonably resentful when they do hear. Take our friend, Peter Schramm, out in Garvin, Minn., for instance. Peter tells the story as well as any. He had no notion, until we told him, that anybody questioned the pre-Columbus relic. Then, when we explained—but you must hear the runestone tale first.

It was a century and 30 years before Columbus arrived, Peter Schramm tells, that a band of adventuring Norwegians and Swedes explored North America. This, Peter says, was established beyond question by finding, in 1898, near Kensington, Douglas County, Minn., a runestone left by these far-from-home travelers.

What's a runestone? It's a stone on which there are runic characters (i. e., the old Teutonic alphabet in which all the letters were made with straight lines). It seems there were 30 of these explorers in all, 8 Swedes and 22 Norwegians, who came more than 1,000 miles from Hudson Bay, via the Nelson River, Lake Winnipeg, and finally down Minnesota's Red River. Meanwhile, somewhere along the Canadian coast, awaiting their return, lay their sturdy windjammers.

No "private property—keep out" signs were on hand to warn the explorers. But Indians had rules. And the penalty for violating them was drastic. One day the red men caught 10 of the Vikings by surprise and massacred them. The survivors left the runestone behind to commemorate the tragedy. But it didn't turn up until 1898, when a farmer found it imbedded in the roots of a poplar tree near Kensington. Even then, the stone was used for a long while as a doorstep, with no one aware of either its significance or worth. Finally it came to the attention of a Norwegian scholar and historian. His translation reads like this: "Eight Goths and 22 Norwegians on exploration journey from Vinland over the West. We had camp by two skerries (rocky islands) and one day's journey north from this stone. We were there and fished one day. When we returned home found 10 men red with blood and dead. Ave Maria. Save us from evil."

On the stone's side is carved: "Have 10 men by the sea looking after our ships, 14 days' journey from this island, year 1362."

In addition to the stone, Peter told us, there are other proofs of the seafarers' visit, including 6 "mooring rocks" discovered on lake shores and river banks. More, he predicted, will turn up. "Their boats being exceedingly valuable," he said, "the explorers saw to their security at evening. With a stone drill, a 6-inch-deep hole was bored into the stone rock that served as an anchoring pier. In this hole a ringbolt, attached to the boats by a rope, was inserted and thus the craft were moored securely every night. This mooring method is of Scandinavian origin, and is still being used."

That was when we asked Peter Schramm about the rumor of the stone being "planted." The report, he said, was new to him, but he would run it down. He ran up, instead, to the University of Minnesota. There he obtained a better picture, and even greater certainty.

But the runestone's authenticity was questioned when it was first found, sure enough. "Somebody asked the farmer who found it if he himself had chiseled the characters," Peter said, "and that made him plenty sore. I ought to have remembered, because it was my mother-in-law, then residing on an adjoining farm, to whom he expressed his indignation. The farmer was Olaf Ohman, come to think of it. And the fellow who succeeded in translating the inscription was H. R. Holand, a Norwegian scholar and historian, residing in Wisconsin at the time."

For a while the runestone was in possession of the Minnesota Historical Society. Now when you go to the chamber of commerce in Alexandria to ask about Minnesota generally, they show you the stone—and tell you that Columbus was a little late.

Legislature of Louisiana Asks for Federal Aid in Necessary Roads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 4, adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 4

Whereas the United States of America is presently engaged in a global war; and

Whereas every effort must be made to bring about a speedy victory; and

Whereas many great industrial plants are located in the parish of East Baton Rouge, State of Louisiana; and

Whereas these plants employ thousands of workers who are contributing directly to the war efforts; and

Whereas there exist only two highways whereby these thousands of workers can use in getting to and from their work; and

Whereas Harding Field and Camp Van Dorn are located within a radius of 50 miles of the city of Baton Rouge; and

Whereas these two highways are used by the occupants of these camps;

Whereas these two highways are inadequate to carry this congested traffic; and

Whereas, as a result thereof, there exists in the third ward of the parish of East Baton Rouge, State of Louisiana, on the highway known as Plank Road and the highway known as Bayou Sara Road, the worst bottleneck and traffic congestion in the State of Louisiana; and

Whereas this traffic congestion and traffic bottleneck is materially and severely hindering the war efforts; and

Whereas the portion of the said highways herein described are in a terrible condition and are too narrow and are otherwise inadequate to carry the necessary traffic; and

Whereas it is necessary that these portions of the said highways be declared as essential to the war effort; and

Whereas these portions of the said highways herein described should be improved and widened in order to bring about immediate relief: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana (the Senate and House of Representatives concurring therein):

That a traffic congestion and traffic bottleneck is hereby declared to exist on Highway No. 3 (U. S. 61 and 65) known as the Bayou Sara Road from its intersection with the Airline Highway No. C-1500 (U. S. 190) just east of the Mississippi River Bridge in the Parish of East Baton Rouge to the junction of said highway with Main Street in the city of Baton Rouge.

That a traffic congestion and traffic bottleneck is hereby declared to exist on Highway No. 36 known as the Plank Road from its intersection with the Airline Highway No. C-1500 (U. S. 190) east of the Mississippi River bridge in the Parish of East Baton Rouge, State of Louisiana, to the point where the highway intersects Florida Street or Highway No. 7 in the city of Baton Rouge.

That the two highways between the points hereinabove described serve as the only two arteries by which the thousands of employees use in going to and from their work at the many large indushtrial plants which are so magnificently contributing to the war efforts.

That the two highways between the points hereinabove described are used by the occupants of Harding Field and Camp Van Dorn.

That this traffic congestion and traffic bottleneck is materially hindering the war effort.

That the Secretary of War be and he is hereby memorialized to certify that the said portions of the said highways herein described are essential to the war effort.

That the secretary of state of the State of Louisiana be and he is hereby directed to send a certified copy of this resolution to the Secretary of War of the United States of America and to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Louisiana in the Halls of Congress.

J. E. VERRET,
Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate.
R. NORMAN BAUER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Who Has Smeared Labor?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, from the Chicago Daily News of April 29 comes the following editorial:

A felicitous phrase dies hard, especially when the phrase reflects a combination of special interests in business and politics. It is no wonder, then, that labor's no-strike pledge is lugged into every discussion of war production, inflation, the closed shop, W. L. B. and N. L. R. B., not to mention politics. It's a warm generous phrase, liberal and gliberal, too.

But the no-strike pledge has meant next to nothing with respect to strikes. That is plain as a pike staff, in view of the Department of Labor's official report on strikes in 1943. That report, compiled by bureaus staffed by friends of organized labor, certainly did not fail to give the no-strike pledge makers, Messrs Green and Murray, every possible edge. Madame Perkins and her department are not in the business of labor baiting.

The report showed that there were more strikes last year than in any other year for which records have been kept except 1917, 1937, and 1941. More men walked off the job in 1943 than downed tools in either 1937 or 1917, but not quite so many as in 1941.

In view of these cold facts, the only possible thing that could be said in substantiation of claims that labor's no-strike pledge has been of appreciable value, would be to claim that if there had been no such pledge, there would have been more strikes and more strikers than in any years of peace, except three or four.

But that is not to say that labor's no-strike pledge has been of no benefit whatsoever. As it has been made the justification of War Labor Board orders inserting union maintenance clauses into employment contracts, the pledge has reaped many millions of dues for union treasuries that would not otherwise have gone into them and also has brought about virtual closed-shop conditions in a greater part of American industry than ever functioned under that condition before.

None of this is said in disparagement either of the workers or of union labor as an institution. It is said merely to keep the record straight and to dispose of false claims made on behalf of some labor-union officials.

If labor has not performed 100 percent in this war, who has, outside the men at the front? We have previously printed the figures compiled by the Union Trust Co. of Cleveland that show factory workers to have contributed a larger percentage of their numbers to the Army and Navy than any other occupational group in the Nation. We take pleasure in printing today the calculations of the same sound institution on the productivity of labor in munitions industries. The bulletin of the trust company says: "Output per worker in the munitions industries is taken as being equal to 100 in January of 1943. By last April (1943) it had risen to 115, and then it moved sideways for 2 months. Then it advanced both rapidly and steadily until it had reached 136 by the end of last year. That was a remarkable achievement. It meant that by the close of 1943 three workers were turning out more munitions than four workers had been able to make at the beginning of the year."

Let's analyze that. Three workers at the end of 1943 were equivalent to four at the beginning of 1943. That is why our output of planes, guns, tanks, and other weapons and munitions rose month after month, even in a year when we had the fourth largest number of strikes on record.

In the long run, of course, improvement of output per man and man-hour is mostly due to inventors, engineers, and other technologists who empower labor and endow its toil with greater speed and precision. Much of the gain in efficiency in 1943 was undoubtedly due to the tuning in of new plants and the constant rearrangement of facilities—but in so short a time technology alone could not account for all the improvement made.

A large part of it was made because labor worked harder and more skillfully. No man can gainsay that.

And that greater will to work and improved output by the great majority, it seems to us, bring into even more stark contrast the mischief wrought by the minority who struck or who soldiered on the job. It was they who cast odium upon their fellows, not the professional labor baiters. Labor's good name has been badly treated in labor's own house.

The public has been more or less aware of this minority offense, and it has literally burned up many citizens and soldiers, too. Here is a sample out of scores or even hundreds of similar instances in which a minority have brought disrepute upon their fellows. Production of medium tanks at the Chrysler Detroit plant was halted for 4 days recently by 300 men indulging in small walkouts. Of these 300, some 38 were key men—crane operators. They kept 600 men who wanted to work in idleness, and after the strikes were off lack of key parts kept 1,000 idle for some time.

The interdependence of manufacturing operations has been growing throughout the war as line production and automatic processes have been increasingly installed. The result is that a strike of 100 men today may mean more in lost production than a strike of 200 men last year. That is why the conventional statistics of the Department of Labor on strikes (confined to its officially defined strikes, which excludes all malingering and slow-down sabotage and also strikes of very short duration) are inadequate yardsticks of lost production. But insufficient as those statistics may be, they constitute a most damaging record of how a relatively small minority have brought discredit upon millions of workers who have done an all-out war job every workingday.

Leading Aviation Magazines Say W. T. S. Instructors and Trainees Should Come Before WASPS

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPPESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following articles from Aviation News, April 1944, and Aero Digest magazine, May 1944:

[From Aviation News for April 1944]

THE WASP PROBLEM

As Representative RAMSPECK's House Civil Service Investigating Committee launched an inquiry into the WASP training project, a group of 122 instructors at one civilian contract primary school last week wired the President and other officials protesting the Army's failure to plan utilization of their flying ability and experience in the war effort, although the WASP training program continues, with 1,000 graduates planned by June.

Indignation is rising among experienced civilian airmen as they leave their instructor jobs at schools no longer being used by the Army and face selective-service induction. They point out these facts:

Civilian men pilots with thousands of hours of flying are ineligible for combat because of logical reasons, such as age, but they are also deemed unfit for the Air Transport Command if they do not have 200 hours' time in planes of 200 horsepower or more. Most of their work has been with power below this figure.

Yet civilian girl pilots are accepted for training with 25 hours. Upon completing a 6½-month flight training course paid for by the Army and taught by a civilian contract flight school, the WASPS are graduated with about 210 hours' instruction, plus the original 35 hours that made them eligible. These graduates are then given assignments denied men pilots with thousands of hours' flying time and years of experience.

The statement that all men pilots will be sent out of the country to fly and therefore necessitate use of women pilots to replace them is sound logic as far as it goes, airmen say. But those thousands of civilian men pilots who are ineligible for the A. T. C. are also ineligible for combat. Thus the argument of replacing all civilian pilots with women appears illogical.

One major example of inefficiency is in transitional training after the WASP has been graduated from her 6½ months' course by the civilian flight school. This transitional flying involves about 100 hours' training on heavy four-motored bomber equipment or high speed fighter aircraft. Thus the girls are given an additional 100 hours of flight training by regular A. A. F. pilot instructors, and each hour that the girl pilot receives this training from an Army pilot in Army planes she is taking the place of a combat pilot. Why not utilize more Army men pilots?

In addition to using the present backlog of civilian pilots, the Army might well assign 2 or 3 months of cross-country ferry flying within the United States to its young men pilot graduates. They could thus polish off their navigational cross-country techniques and at the same time deliver aircraft to domestic ferry points.

Furthermore, Army flyers returning from combat areas could ferry planes in the interval before their reassignment, keeping their flight techniques sharp without combat strain. Large numbers of these men are being made available for domestic ferry operations in the United States.

The evidence so far indicates someone has blundered. The costly and impractical WASP program deserves close scrutiny.

[From Aero Digest Magazine for May 1944]

As had been predicted by all who knew the inside story involved, those who tried to engineer a fast play for training additional WASPS—Women Airforce Service Pilots—while thousands of experienced men pilots are clamoring for work, have been caught off base.

A House civil-service investigating committee may soon light a fire under the Army Air Forces for spending millions on the WASPS under such circumstances, and for attempting to legitimatize and expand the organization by making it a regular part of the Army. The committee has not finished its investigation, but there are signs that it does not think too highly of what it is finding.

In discussing the situation Chairman RAMSPECK (Democrat), Georgia, of the House Civil Service Committee, has emphasized that he is not objecting to the WASPS because they are women. He simply thinks that it is wasteful to continue to train these women at what critics say is a cost of $6,540 per trainee, in view of the fact that there are already plenty of competent men flyers available for the various types of ferrying work—including the towing of targets.

Meanwhile, the House Military Affairs Committee which rushed through the Costello bill, making the WASPS a full-fledged military outfit, has been receiving plenty of protests over the nonemployment of qualified men flyers. The Costello bill has not yet reached the floor, and there appears to be some chance that it will be recalled for further hearings. At any rate, committee members in a more chastened mood are preparing an amendment for subsequent adoption either on the floor or during a possible redrafting of the Costello bill. This amendment would provide for the commissioning in the A. A. F. of all trainees under the C. A. A.'s war-training program who can meet the required standards.

Vegetable Oils Versus Animal Fats

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, for many years the oleo interests have been trying to convince the public that oleo, a vegetable oil, is equal to the animal fat in butter. They have been particularly vociferous since 1938, when vitamin A was added to part of the national production of oleo. In fact, the oleo interests said that oleo was equal to butter before they even started to inject vitamin A into the concoction.

In the past 2 years the oleo interests have worked up a certain amount of public sentiment in favor of removing the one-quarter cent per pound Federal tax on uncolored oleo, the 10-cent tax on colored oleo, and the wholesaler and retailer tax.

It happens that vegetable oils are being subsidized twice as much as the Federal tax. This is shown by the following official table which shows only the direct subsidy paid to the vegetable oil refiners:

Commodity Credit Corporation vegetable oil program, Oct. 1, 1942, through Mar. 31, 1944

Refiner contracts (1942 crop)	Oct. 1, 1942, through Dec. 31, 1942		Jan. 1, 1943, through Dec. 31, 1943		Jan. 1, 1944, through Mar. 31, 1944		Total through Mar. 31, 1944
	Pounds	Dollars	Pounds	Dollars	Pounds	Dollars	Pounds	Dollars
Cottonseed oil	475,127,686	2,375,638.41	865,294,472	4,326,473.23			1,340,422,158	6,702,111.64
Peanut oil	18,114,474	90,572.37	99,979,122	499,895.62			118,093,596	590,467.99

Total	605,428,369	3,027,141.87	1,938,395,973	9,691,980.75	1,071,502	5,357.51	2,544,895,844	12,724,480.13

You will note that 2,554,895,844 pounds of vegetable oil were subsidized through the refineries by $12,724,480.13 or about one-half cent per pound. Additional sums are spent on the subsidy oil program in addition to the refiner subsidies as the over-all expenses and the producer subsidy to the crop must also be considered.

The following official table shows the receipts of the Bureau of Internal Revenue from oleo taxes from 1934 to 1943:

Receipts of internal revenue—Oleomargarine—Fiscal years 1934–43

Year	Commodity taxes		Special taxes			Special taxes—Retail dealers		Total from oleomargarine taxes

In fact, on the basis of peanut oil, the subsidy would be several cents per pound if the governmental peanut monopoly did not show a profit on the peanuts diverted to the edible trade. This is shown in the following letter:

MAY 23, 1944.

Hon. REID F. MURRAY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR REID: This is in reply to your letter of May 2 with reference to the cost of subsidies on soybean, peanut, and cottonseed oils.

Enclosed is a tabulation showing by calendar years to March 31, 1944, the actual number of pounds and cost of the subsidy for each oil on which a subsidy was paid from October 1, 1942, through March 31, 1944. This program applied only to oils produced from oilseeds of the 1942 crop. No subsidy payments are being made on soybean, cottonseed, or peanut oils from the 1943 crop. We should point out that the enclosed tabulation covers only the payments made on these vegetable oils as such. We have also had producer subsidies on soybeans of both the 1942 and 1943 crops.

The 1942 crop soybean program will show a total cost of approximately $5,670,000. The cost of our 1943 crop soybean program is estimated to come to approximately $12,000,000.

Under our 1943 peanut program we shall sell about 700,000 tons of peanuts to the edible trade. In order to stimulate the use of peanuts in the manufacture of peanut butter, peanuts are sold at lower prices for such use than for other edible purposes. It is estimated that this peanut butter program will cost approximately $14,000,000. On the sale of peanuts for other edible purposes it is estimated that there will be a profit of approximately $18,000,000, or a net gain on peanuts for edible use of $4,000,000. About 200,000 tons of peanuts will be crushed for oil and meal at a loss of approximately $11,000,000. The net loss of the entire 1943 peanut program will, therefore, be about $7,000,000. The administrative cost of this program will be very close to $500,000. The over-all net loss will, therefore, be about $7,500,000.

Sincerely yours,

MARVIN JONES,
Administrator.

The oleo interests are ever ready in their efforts to put through oleo legislation. They even tried to enact oleo legislation on the basis of the war but did not have much of a case when it was disclosed that all the oleo was being made that could be made from the oil allocated to the oleo industry by W. P. B.

There is one more fact in connection with the oleo situation which is difficult to understand. The same States which seem to support oleo legislation and have tried to emphasize its greatness have arranged it so that these States get a 50–60 percent greater Federal subsidy on milk per hundredweight they produce than is paid by the Federal Government in the areas which appreciate the food value of this great product. It would appear, if they wish to be logical, that they would use filled milk and not insist upon a subsidy 50–60 percent greater than is paid in the real-dairy sections of our Nation.

The nonagri groups that send emissaries to Washington to appear before congressional committees extol the value of oleo and depreciate the value of butter are not deceiving as many people as they may think they are deceiving. Their testimony wherein they say that butter should be 25 cents a pound and that the farmer would still make 12 cents per pound on it is so ridiculously in error that no further comment is needed.

The dairy industry should think in terms of the industry and not in terms of the various products made from milk. In the past as much as 40 percent of the national butterfat production has been made into butter. Butter has been the real foundation of the dairy business. If the diary interests do not unite as an industry and protect itself from inferior substitutes like oleo versus butter; as filled milk versus normal evaporated and natural milk; as high moisture low fat content cheese versus the normal fat and moisture cheese, we can expect to see great damage done to the dairy industry. The fluid milk market man should be as interested in protecting the butter industry as the butter industry itself, because the whole industry is based on the milk as produced. There is not much in a hundred pounds of milk that is not to be found in 10 pounds of cheese; 50 cans of evaporated milk; or in 5 pounds of butter plus 8 pounds of powdered skim milk. The sooner the industry recognizes this fact the sooner the industry will be in a position to fight the interests that are undermining the dairy industry. For example, the appearance of a fluid milk producer before the Agriculture Committee endorsing oleo. This procedure will ultimately harm the dairy industry as a whole and should not be followed.

On the Road Back?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, back in 1942, when, from the well of the House I bitterly denounced Federal Union, Inc., and World Fellowship, Inc., which advocated the repudiation of our Declaration of Independence, the hauling down of our flag, the surrender of our sovereignty, and the formation of a United States of the World, a campaign of vilification was started and ever since has been continued by New Deal, pink, red, and the Marshall Field press against all those who insisted that, while cooperating with foreign nations, we should at all times, in all things, first give consideration to America's interests. Members of America First were falsely accused of being pro-Nazi.

Isolationists or nationalists, whichever you prefer, who hated war; who opposed war; who did not wish to see the United States become involved in a foreign war, were labeled as disloyal, unpatriotic. But this past week saw President Roosevelt announcing that, in our dealings with foreign nations, no part of our sovereignty should be surrendered. That was an adoption of the Republican declaration of foreign policy made last September at the Mackinac Conference.

We know that Earl Browder, the Communist who was released from jail by President Roosevelt before the expiration of his term, recently officially buried the Communist Party, but resurrected in its stead the same old group, with the same objectives, under the name of the Communist Political Association, and both are now all-out for a fourth term for Roosevelt.

So we know where the Communists stand—back of Roosevelt—and their purpose is the same as always—the establishment of communistic doctrine. We also know that Roosevelt is accepting that support, although in his 1936 campaign he said:

> I have not sought, I do not seek, I repudiate the support of any advocate of communism. That is my position. It always has been my position. It always will be my position.

Today he accepts that support, which comes under the banner of the Communist Political Association.

It will be interesting to note whether the Marshall Field press, PM and the Chicago Sun, and the Luce publications and the New Republic, now that Roosevelt has declared for the preservation of our sovereignty, will continue to abuse his fellow isolationists. Or will they take the position that, inasmuch as Roosevelt has now declared that no part of our sovereignty shall be surrendered in our negotiations with foreign nations, we may be permitted to follow the example of Stalin and of Churchill, who unwaveringly have always insisted that the interests of their respective countries be given first consideration?

As Churchill is a British firster, Stalin is a Russia firster; as they think, speak, and act for their respective countries, can we not once more, without fear of a campaign of false charges, be permitted to think, speak, and act first for our own country, for the men and women who are fighting in this World War and of their safety and their speedy return to their own homes when victory has been won? Can we not insist that, when this war is over, our boys be brought home instead of remaining abroad to police the world?

It matters not at all whether the politically astute Mr. Roosevelt, seeking a fourth term, was induced to make this declaration by the election returns from Wisconsin and Illinois and the thought that, by so doing, he would secure the support of the Midwest at the coming election. Nor should we concern ourselves overmuch with whether he really meant what he said, or whether this statement, like so many of his other statements—as, for example, his unequivocal promise that our boys should never be sent to fight on foreign soil—was merely campaign oratory.

The important thing is that he should have at least reached the conclusion that, after all has been said, this country, its institutions and its servicemen, are first in the hearts of our people; that the overwhelming majority are determined that our republican, constitutional form of government shall not be destroyed by international power politicians seeking the advancement of their own national interests.

Thank God that at last there comes from the President an acknowledgment that, in our cooperation and collaboration with other countries, our sovereignty will not be surrendered. Let us hope that he means it and that his statement is not just another political campaign promise.

U. N. R. R. A. Needs Money Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of June 2, 1944:

U. N. R. R. A. NEEDS MONEY NOW

The United States appropriation for U. N. R. R. A.—the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration—for the coming year still waits final action in Congress. The President asked for a total of $800,000,000, to be expended up to June 30, 1945—$450,000,000 in cash and authority to allocate $350,000,000 as lend-lease. Congress has not yet made these sums available. In the meantime 500,000,000 people in 30 Axis-occupied countries, according to estimates of Deputy Director General Roy F. Hendrickson, of U. N. R. R. A., will need relief as fast as United Nations troops set them free. We are not asked to shoulder the whole burden. We are asked, and have agreed, to carry the larger part because of our proportionately large resources.

We don't know how soon U. N. R. R. A. will have to meet major demands. The signs are that it will have work to do in western Europe and in the Balkans before the summer is over. But it cannot improvise the needed supplies. To give concrete instances, clothing, repair materials for water and sewerage systems, farming supplies, food processing equipment, all take a long time to make, assemble, and transport. U. N. R. R. A. can't start till it has money in the bank. Nor can it, without funds, take advantage of seasonal supplies of food or military surpluses. It will not be a going concern until it has money in its pocket.

There is no majority opposition in Congress, for the U. N. R. R. A. resolution passed the House by about 6 to 1 and the Senate by about 3 to 1 last winter. But haste is needed. Congress should appropriate the money at once. Such an action would say again to all concerned that the United States is willing to spend a few million dollars to save Axis victims as well as many billions to smash the oppressors.

WASPS May Oust 5,000 Instructors of Army Pilots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald of May 21, 1944:

WASPS MAY OUST 5,000 INSTRUCTORS OF ARMY PILOTS

Some 5,000 highly skilled instructors in the Army pilot-training program will be discarded in favor of women with 35 hours in the air unless Congress comes to their rescue.

The fantastic story of the run-around given to the flying teachers of America's aces by the War Department was unfolded yesterday by Representative MORRISON (Democrat) of Louisiana.

REPRESENTATIVE MORRISON WILL TELL

MORRISON declared that he will tell the full story this week of how the House Military Committee was high-pressured into reporting the Costello bill commissioning members of the WASPS on the plea of a manpower shortage.

The Brooks bill, designed to make some use of the hundreds and thousands of hours of flight experience of the topnotch instructors, will be offered as an amendment to the Costello bill, MORRISON said.

Under a strange parliamentary situation MORRISON said the Brooks bill has become the "tail" that is wagging the Costello bill "dog." He expressed doubt about the passage of the WASPS commissioning bill, despite the interest of Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, without the bolstering support of the Brooks bill.

SUPPORT FOR BROOKS BILL

MORRISON declared that support for the Brooks bill has grown rapidly since the story of the injustice to the Army pilot-training veterans has spread on Capitol Hill.

The Brooks bill could not even get a hearing before the House Military Committee. Yet the Costello bill, in which Mrs. Roosevelt had enlisted the support of Lt. Gen. Henry H. (Hap) Arnold, commanding general of the Army Air Force, got the green light after a 30-minute session, MORRISON said.

MORRISON declared that General Arnold was in the "fix" of Br'er Rabbit of the Uncle Remus stories—he just had to climb the tree. He explained that Arnold had started the WASPS' program without any specific authority from Congress on the expectation that authority would be forthcoming since Congress had never turned down any of his requests.

SAME PRIVILEGES AS MEN

MORRISON cited the report on the Costello bill by Chairman MAY as the strongest argument that could be made in behalf of commissioning the instructors in the Army pilot-training program. The May report, arguing in favor of giving the WASPS "the same rights, privileges, and benefits as male members of the Army of the United States with the same grade and length of service," states:

"There is no controversy over the fact that there exists in this country an acute shortage of manpower necessary for the armed forces and essential industry. This shortage requires every economy in the use of available manpower and the substitution of women wherever possible, both in industry and in the armed forces, thereby releasing men for combat military service."

"The only difference," said MORRISON, "is that the male instructors, who are highly trained and available would be tossed into the ash can if the Army had its way, to make room for women whose hours in the air do not even approach the number held by the men."

Lend-Lease for Comrades

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AIME J. FORAND

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following two editorials from the Christian Science Monitor of May 23, 1944, and the Boston Herald of May 24, 1944:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of May 23, 1944]

LEND-LEASE FOR COMRADES

The American soldier who finds himself fighting beside a Briton perhaps, or a Frenchman, in the invasion of Europe will be glad to note that his comrade has as good equipment as his own. A well-armed comrade looks like a walking life-insurance policy at a moment like that. Some of that comrade's equipment may be lend-lease equipment.

As President Roosevelt's letter accompanying the fifteenth lend-lease report has underlined, this great venture is no longer simply a means of providing other nations with the matériel to save themselves from a rapacious enemy. It is now a method of making sure that the "combined operations" of many allied forces are carried out with a maximum of striking power and a minimum of weak links.

There may even be some lend-lease weapons in the hands of the various undergrounds. Certainly when the enslaved peoples rise we shall want them to be as effective allies as we can make them.

Fourteen cents of each war dollar is all that has gone into lend-lease. It is not too much to have paid for the assurance that Britain and Russia would be in the fight to the end. It is not too much to have paid for the destruction of Nazi resources which these allies have accomplished with lend-lease equipment.

When this war is over it will be possible to figure a certain ratio between the cost of victory as stated in goods expended and as stated in lives expended. The cost in American lives will be lower because 14 percent of American supplies needed to win the war were used by men and women of other nations.

[From the Boston (Mass.) Herald of May 24, 1944]

LEND-LEASE, AGED 3

Just a year before Pearl Harbor President Roosevelt left on a Caribbean cruise and worked out the broad aims of a radical new step in interally relationship. The day after his return, on December 17, 1940, he broke on a startled Nation the conception of lend-lease. He filled in some further details in a fireside chat on December 31, and a week later the plan was incorporated in his message to Congress.

On January 10, 1941, the historic bill, H. R. 1776, was introduced. The House Foreign Affairs Committee, by a vote of 17 to 8, sent it to the floor, where it was adopted February 8 by 260 to 165. The Senate discussed it from February 17, when the Foreign Relations Committee reported it by 15 to 8, until March 8, when it was passed 60 to 31. The House acceded to minor amendments on March 11, and it was signed that day.

From the time that the proposal was first advanced to the people until it became law was thus a period of 84 days. There was unlimited debate in and out of Congress, yet the American democracy moved with remarkable speed, all the more notable because we were not then at war and a large section of the population did not believe we ever should be. While still nonbelligerent and hoping to stay so, we agreed to turn over to our unofficial allies unlimited material and services without the slightest quibble over payment.

The President has now made a report on lend-lease through March 31 of 1944, showing that we have supplied aid totaling $24,224,806,000 to the various nations whose defense he has deemed vital to the defense of the United States. Into the vast pool of anti-Axis guns and planes and ships and information and men's blood and lives, we have poured this share of victory. Some time the accounts will have to be cast up, and our contribution measured against Russia's dead, China's exhaustion, and England's suffering. It will not be easy. "There is no way by which a statistical balance sheet can be drawn up," the President notes. But the twenty-five billions has been well spent and the Nation's 84-day judgment well justified.

Funds for U. N. R. R. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of June 2, 1944:

FUNDS FOR U. N. R. R. A.

The first concrete test of our readiness to collaborate with our allies in meeting post-war problems is now at hand. The mechanism which has been established for this collaboration is the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. Although Congress has authorized an American contribution of $1,300,000,000 to this agency, it has not yet actually appropriated any portion of this sum. The initial appropriation of $800,000,000 requested by President Roosevelt seems far from excessive in view of the gigantic needs which will confront U. N. R. R. A. when the liberating armies of the Allies have cleared the road for its healing efforts.

U. N. R. R. A. must undertake the tremendous task of reconstituting the civilian economy of Europe so that our invasion will be, in truth, a liberation and so that the liberated peoples can once more be self-sustaining. Millions of displaced human beings must be fed, clothed, sheltered, and transported back to their homes. The spread of disease must be checked and controlled by adequate medical measures. Farm and factory equipment must be furnished for areas systematically devastated by the retreating Germans. As Allied armies have occupied industrial towns in Italy, they have found the factories in ruins—not a machine in working order, no power, light, gas, or trains. In rural regions, the very basis of the farmer's livelihood, his tools and livestock as well as his crops, have been stolen or destroyed. U. N. R. R. A. must help the people of Europe to help themselves.

There is no time to be lost in getting to work on this job. The preliminaries cannot be left until U. N. R. R. A. is actually installed in a liberated area. Clothing and shoes take at least 6 months to procure; if they are not on hand when U. N. R. R. A. is called upon to take charge, thousands of lives may needlessly be lost through exposure. Farm implements and food-processing equipment must be ordered and assembled long in advance; if they are not available when needed, a whole year's produce may be lost. Repair materials for water and sewage and power systems cannot be improvised; delay in making such repairs may spread disease and seriously affect the safety even of our own troops. If this liberation is not linked with resuscitation, its whole significance for the future may be destroyed.

The eyes of Europe's millions are focused upon us. If we prune and haggle now over what we are to give in the way of relief, their faith in us will ebb. And that faith is a part of our fighting strength. It is one of the foundations of the world's future. Twenty-five nations have already made their contributions to U. N. R. R. A. They are waiting for the contribution of the wealthiest and greatest nation of the earth. We must not default.

The Future of American Capitalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California, Mr. Speaker, I am very glad indeed to include with my remarks herewith a recent speech delivered by Mr. Wendell Berge, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, entitled "The Future of American Capitalism."

In my judgment the things Mr. Berge has to say in this speech should be carefully digested by every Member of Congress and should be a guide to our action if we are really interested in the preservation of truly free enterprise in our country.

The speech follows:

America's industrial future will be determined largely by the type of measures which we adopt in the post-war period to achieve an expanding economy. Accomplishment will depend upon general understanding of our objective, and a clear grasp of the means necessary to make a capitalistic economy function successfully in the modern world. Attainment of lasting prosperity without drastic alteration of our way of life cannot be expected unless we have a firm conception of the capitalistic principles on which our economy is based.

American capitalism today faces a challenge. The American people are fighting in this war not only to preserve their own freedom; they are also fighting for a future in which there must be full employment, full production, and the assurance that all people shall have opportunity to build for themselves and their children a more abundant society.

Other systems have been held forth as a better way of life. It is claimed that a managed economy would offer stability and security. We may ask at what price. It can only be answered that a managed economy would ultimately be forced to deny businessmen the right to invest according to their own best judgment. It would have to direct businessmen what goods or service to produce, what quantity they should market, and what price they should charge. It would force labor to be tied to its status in a particular job. No Thomas Edison or Andrew Higgins or Henry Kaiser would emerge.

We have seen what has happened in other quarters of the world. Let us not delude ourselves. If American capitalism in the post-war world is prevented from fulfilling its promise of full production and full employment, the danger that we shall have a rigidly controlled economic life forced upon us will become very real.

What is capitalism? Capitalism is the theory and práctice of competitive production in a free market. The right to enter an occupation or to start a business, to invent and develop new products and new devices is the heart of economic democracy, and the essence of capitalism. When the arteries of enterprise are constricted by monopoly, private enterprise cannot function, and the entire economy falls victim to a series of maladjustments that cannot be solved short of vigorous Government control. Over an extended period this control is inconsistent with the maintenance of what we think of as capitalism.

Capitalism is a system of reward for enterprise and a promise of return for risk. It is a system of profit, but it is also a system of loss. Those who enjoy the opportunity for gain are expected to assume their rightful responsibility; in other words to take a chance, and to accept the occasional penalty of loss in the spirit of enterprise. Capitalism means equal opportunity and the guarantee that none shall be barred from the market place.

Monopoly is the greatest threat to the survival of true capitalism. For this reason it is important to affirm that capitalism does not mean—in fact, it rejects—the right of private monopoly to stifle enterprise. Vested monopoly interests must not bar the emergence of new businesses. It is not, in fact, consistent with the maintenance of a capitalistic system for either Government or private monopoly to prevent the development of new industries in order to protect the old. Nor will our system work if we permit combinations to dominate the market, to fix prices, or to restrict production. Basing-point systems, restrictive patent pools, closed-market agreements, cartel agreements which cut off free trade among nations, tariffs which cater to special privilege, feather-bedding rules by labor unions—all of these are anticapitalistic devices. They represent the most serious threat to a free capitalist economy. No other system for organizing production places such a premium on flexibility or provides such stimulus to the introduction of new ideas, new industries, new goods, and services. No other system offers such incentives to efficiency or emphasizes so completely the concept of service to the public.

The scope and magnitude of America's achievement in war production is an unmistakable index of our capacity for growth. The tremendous energy and determination which inspired and made possible the fulfillment of our war needs are equally available for the tasks of peace. It is the joint problem of government, industry, and labor to unleash the incentives and to keep clearly in sight the goals which will maintain the levels of employment and production attained during war. Indeed, there is every reason to believe that this Nation can surpass in time of peace its accomplishments under the pressure of grim necessity.

In the United States the choice we make between economic philosophies may well decide the future of democracy. If we extend governmental planning to all branches of economic life, or if we permit private planning to freeze the pattern of industrial concentration and control, we shall surrender the chance to attain economic democracy. Once economic freedom has been eliminated, there is no turning back, and democracy itself becomes a shadow without substance.

We stand on the threshold of some of the greater technical and scientific developments of modern history. Light metals, plastics, vitamins, television, new chemical and electrical techniques are all in their infancy. Air transport, housing developments, and the improvement of national health will provide an insistent demand for the output of these new materials. The slums of country and of city alike can become an unpleasant memory if new materials for housing are made available in a competitive market. The most provincial area can possess the advantages of the great metropolis through radio, television, and electric power.

This future will not be won without effort. If scientific development and economic progress is nullified by a system of cartels and moncpolies or by rigid Government control, we shall delay and may lose the opportunities which will be opened to us at the end of the war. If discovery is to be translated into a more abundant life, the way to enterprise must be guarded as we guard our civil liberties.

How does it come about that business, or Government, or labor in a supposedly free economy becomes afraid of change, fearful of any alteration of the status quo? To some extent, short-sightedness, a trait common to all of us, is responsible. Fundamentally, however, it is the all-too-human desire to escape the risks of enterprise without giving up its rewards. It is the quest for relief from the trials and dangers of competition. But thus to limit and hedge around the right to enterprise affords only a deceptive security, an illusory safety. The periodic depressions and the social shortcomings which critics emphasize as the inevitable products of capitalism are not at all inevitable. They are the result not of the system but of its abuses. They are the consequences of attempts to escape the responsibilities which freedom of enterprise imposes.

If we examine closely the instruments of capitalism, we find that they are designed primarily to initiate experimentation, to spur efficiency, and to promote progress. They are not designed to entrench vested interest, to stabilize control of the market, or to safeguard the status quo. Like every other instrument or institution, they can be abused, as they have been abused, to defeat the purposes for which they were intended.

Thus the modern corporation in its origin was intended to facilitate enterprise by dividing risks, limiting liability, and encouraging the introduction of new capital into the market. As an instrument, the corporation may be used or misused. In its proper orbit, the corporation has served this country well. Too often, however, the corporation has been diverted from its original purpose, and as a consequence we have witnessed in recent years the increasing concentration of ownership and control of vast sectors of industry through the corporate device.

Similarly, the patent system was designed to promote progress, to encourage invention, and to protect and reward the inventor. Yet through patent pools and cartel agreements we have seen the stifling of research, the delay of new industries, and the suppression of the small inventor and businessman. It is not enough to say that such abuses are illegal and should be penalized. Business itself should aid in the elimination of these abuses.

The price system is the keystone of a competitive market. It is upon the free and flexible adjustment of prices that the effective operation of an enterprise economy primarily depends. Here again the frequency and the extent of abuse, the degree to which many prices and price levels are fixed or administered by monopoly, create an almost insurmountable obstacle to the working of a free market. It is basic to the concept of a free economy that there shall be no domination of the market regardless of the means by which such domination is achieved. In this respect, there is no question that the growth of moncpoly and the acceptance of restrictive practices have jeopardized the foundations of our economic way of life.

American capitalism must, if it is to go forward in the post-war world, meet with resolute courage, initiative, and resourcefulness the changed conditions with which it will be faced. In the early years of this country, American enterprise accepted the challenge of undeveloped resources and created the strongest productive system of any country in the world. The mainspring of the growth of the American economy was freedom of enterprise. America was in the vanguard of the movement to release industry from the shackles of feudalism. Men did not need permission from the Crown or from a paternalistic government to move from one corner of the nation to another, or to enter one trade or another. Products, too, could be bought and sold wherever there was the most advantage. Coal mined in Pennsylvania could be transported to any point in the country where it could compete in quality and price with the output of local mines. The oil of Texas could furnish power, light, and lubricants to the industry of the East. It was a cardinal tenet of American capitalism that there must be no obstacles erected to the movement of trade within our borders. Industry grew with the national market, and the wealth of our Nation increased correspondingly. No governmental agencies determined the production and allocation of goods. No permission was required to risk one's capital. America overcame the threats of sectionalism and as a consequence developed into a united economy and a united country.

At the end of the present war, American capitalism will face the greatest opportunity as well as some of the greatest difficulties which it has had to encounter in its history.

What are the conditions which capitalism will find at the war's end? The conclusion of the war will find an enormous productive plant. The enlarged capacity to make thousands of products, such as aluminum, magnesium, plastics synthetic rubber, steel, medicines, airplanes, electrical equipment, now staggers the imagination. Hitherto backward areas have now become industrialized. Opportunities inherent in the rebuilding of a war-torn world will beckon to our businessmen.

But we will also emerge from the war with a national debt unprecedented in history, bringing with it a tremendous problem of taxation. Small businessmen will find themselves with inadequate financial reserves to cope with their post-war difficulties. There will be reluctance on the part of certain groups seeking special privilege to abandon the practices of a controlled economy once the need has disappeared. There is a possibility that certain portions of the world will remain under the influence of cartel groups posing problems for American businessmen anxious for world trade. It may be too much to expect a world free from the obstructive influence of tariffs.

What can be done to keep our economy from following the twin mirages of self-governing monopoly and Government control of business? Considered as a question of policy and as a program, certain principles emerge from the confusion which surrounds our current economic thinking. It seems to me that we should move in the following directions:

1. The present controls of Government which have regimented and welded us into a wartime economy must be removed as soon as possible after the peace. To delay beyond the period of necessity is to invite their perpetuation.

The American people are well aware of the danger represented by a cartelized economy in which monopoly and power-hungry groups seek to control economic and political life on a basis of privilege. The experience of Germany in recent decades demonstrates all too clearly the vicious results of a union between cartels and paternalistic government. The keynote of a monopolized economy and a feudalistic political regime becomes suppression. No competition is permitted. Those who exercise their initiative are considered bootleggers, chiselers, and, finally, become outlaws. Once competition is eliminated, there is only a short step to the suppression of free speech and the right to criticize. A society so constituted can endure only by a reign of force. The Nazis achieved power by terrorism and could maintain themselves in power only by military aggression.

It is in the post-war world that American capitalism—in fact, democracy itself—will meet its most serious challenge. To win this war we have had to suspend many of our fundamental economic liberties. We must make sure that they are merely suspended, not lost; otherwise the dead hand of priority, allocation, and price control will reach beyond the peace. To remove its grip will require the combined strength of Government, business, and the public. If it is not broken, paternalism will follow. Paternalism of any brand, be it public or private, would in turn give us a rigid economy, which in time would crack wide open under the stress of social change. Like the monopolist, the bureaucrat cannot afford to take risks. Both must play safe, which, economically, leads to stagnation.

It is recognized, of course, that some controls during the transitional period are necessary. In general, it seems that necessity continues only as long as there are vital shortages and only in the fields where shortage exists. When scarce materials cease to be scarce, there would seem, as a general rule, to be no further need for transitional controls.

2. The new technology developed by this war must be made available to peacetime industry. A free technology is a key to progress. Inventions developed by public funds in this war must not become the private preserves of monopoly groups. The results of this research must be made available to returning servicemen and to youth generally, so that free enterprise can be more than a pious hope to them. If necessary, the Government should develop its own industrial research facilities, as it has done so extensively and so fruitfully for agriculture, and make the results available to all, including small and large businessmen.

3. Plants constructed in wartime must not be ploughed under in peacetime. The large productive capacities which we have created must be utilized to advance our standard of living and maintain our national income. This will be absolutely necessary if we are to maintain a national income which can carry a national-debt load of from two to three hundred billion dollars, if we are to find jobs for the returning servicemen, and if unemployment and sectional dislocation is to be avoided in the transition from war to peace. The small businessman must receive primary consideration in the disposition of Government plants and surplus war materials.

4. Credit must be made available to small business. Small business unavoidably has found the going rough during this war. The post-war period will find it without the reserves available to larger units. Since small business is in many respects the most vital part of our economy, we must see that credit is made available to it on liberal terms.

5. Taxation incentives should be given for the launching of new enterprises and fo the expansion of existing plants. Taxation must not discourage venture capital and productive investment. We must recognize that a steady stream of new investment is necessary to an expanding economy.

6. Internal trade barriers among the States and between sections must be removed. The discriminatory freight rates which have burdened the South and the West and hampered their development, must be eliminated, as must other restrictive transportation practices, and also certain State legislation which thwarts the policy of Congress in fostering the freest passage of goods in interstate commerce.

7. International trade should be encouraged. The reciprocal trade-agreements policy of our Government should be promoted. Tariff barriers should be lowered or removed wherever possible. Cartels, which are in effect privately erected tariff barriers, are illegal, and must be completely abolished. World-wide trade will not only make people in every corner of the earth richer, but will give the people everywhere a vested interest in maintaining peace.

8. Patents must be made to promote the advance of science and the useful arts. We cannot tolerate the use of patents to block off and fence in whole sectors of our technology. At the same time patent protection must remain as an incentive to the individual inventor and the businessman. The patent system should remain, but its abuses should be uprooted. Research developed in Germany for the purpose of making war on us should be made available for general use by the people of the United States.

9. Labor must have the right to collective bargaining. In its own interest it should not attempt to prevent the development and introduction of new inventions and techniques or to join with industrial groups to fix prices and production quotas. In the long run, labor is the principal beneficiary of technological progress because as its productivity increases its standard of living rises. Social-security and unemployment-insurance programs, if wisely conceived and administered, are not only consistent with capitalism but will promote and assist its successful functioning. They should be encouraged.

10. The Government should properly develop public works and projects of the T. V. A. variety, not only as emergency measures, but to provide additional opportunities for free private enterprise. The T V. A. has opened up an entire region for industrial investment and development. Business ventures of every type are now flourishing in that area. The continuation of the policy represented by T. V. A. and similar long-range public works projects offers constructive support by Government to private initiative and full employment.

Finally, there should be vigorous enforcement of the antitrust laws. It is equally to the interest of the buisinessman, the worker, and the consumer to see that these acts are applied, no matter what political party is in power. This series of acts reflect the free enterprise spirit of America. This support should be more than lip service. In its own interests, business should insist on the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

The foregoing is not presented as a complete or exclusive program for preserving the essentials of economic freedom, but I think it represents some of the principal aspects on which we should concentrate. If we fail in such a program, then inevitably Government direction of all major phases of economic life will become the order of the day. Much as we dislike it, there is no apparent alternative to permanent government control if private enterprise fails.

What I have heretofore said is not directed against necessary Government action in times of crisis. We have all seen instances of necessary Government intervention during emergencies such as the depression a decade ago. Such intervention, of course, is inevitable and appropriate if capitalism fails to meet its responsibilities. People cannot be allowed to starve or go homeless. But the crises that call for drastic Government intervention can be avoided in most cases if we will cultivate the policies that make for the broadest measure of economic freedom. Private enterprise should not fail if it really is given a chance.

What might seem strange is the fact that the pressure for continued Government control after the war will come from monopolistic business itself. And yet it is not so hard to understand. The monopolist wants an ordered and a secured market. He wants to know with certainty the amount of goods he can sell, where he can sell it, and the price. He wants to know that he will be protected against the competition of new processes and new enterprises. In other words, he wants to be protected against risk. Much of this protection he seeks to acquire through private agreements; but to the extent that he can get government to rationalize and guarantee his position, the monopolist feels that he is additionally secured. Many monopolists would prefer the protection of government to the perils of competition. They would prefer to take their chances on the outcome of conferences with Government officials, to what they might get in the rough and tumble of the free market place, where they would have to pit their strength against vigorous competition.

Hence, many of these monopolists today are urging what they call a continued partnership between Government and business after the war. What they really hope for is a policy that will result in Government approving and condoning monopolistic practices. But what they should know is that in the long run such a program will inevitably mean strict Government regimentation of all business—Government direction of business in the minutest detail by a mammoth bureaucracy. And this will signalize the permanent disappearance of our economic and political freedom.

If we see to it that the rules of a free economy, which are also the rules of capitalism, are permitted to operate, the position of the United States in the world economy and the welfare of its people will most certainly exceed the performance of the past and justify the sacrifices of the present.

Farm Machinery Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, for months we have been arguing back and forth here in the House and elsewhere about the critical farm-machinery shortage, and all we have to show for it as far as I can see is pages of printing in the RECORD. I think it is high time we stopped talking and began investigating this situation carefully. The confusion surrounding the entire farm-machinery program, the charges and countercharges, and, most important of all, the acute shortage of farm implements make it imperative that action be taken to clear up this doubt and the maladjustment in farm machinery production schedules.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard charges here in the House that the Government is promoting a farm-machinery monopoly since the War Production Board division which sets up farm-machinery quotas is staffed by representatives of some of the largest implement companies, and that therefore allocation of farm-machinery quotas is dominated by the large firms.

The charge has been made that "a farm-machinery shortage so serious that War Food Administrator Marvin Jones has refused to bring it out into the open for fear of the consequences to President Roosevelt's fourth-term ambitions was threatening to become one of the major scandals of the war." Farm leaders are quoted as claiming that when farm-machinery quotas were being established last fall the big manufacturers, in an attempt to hold their competitive market positions, asked W. P. B. for larger quotas than they could fill, taking the business from the smaller manufacturers that could have produced the tools.

On the other hand, evidence has been submitted to the House by one of the large implement manufacturers showing that they are filling their quotas almost 100 percent. It is reported also that during the early part of the war period, the large manufacturers were cut almost entirely out of the implement program and only the smaller firms were given most of the quotas, but that this program was a failure and it was found necessary to give the large manufacturers more generous consideration in the establishment of quotas. We have heard that farm machinery production cannot fill our farmers' needs because the Army and Navy has need of the materials that go into such farm implements. If that be so, why is it that there are farm implements available for allocation to foreign countries when our own farmers so desperately need this equipment. Our foreign farm machinery commitments are another phase of our farm machinery problem which I believe could and should bear open investigation.

Mr. Speaker, I, for one, believe we have had enough debate here on this subject which is of such vital importance to the war effort and to the domestic welfare, and I am, therefore, asking that immediate action be taken on the following resolution which I have introduced in the House:

Whereas an acute shortage in farm implements exists in the agricultural sections of the United States; and

Whereas certain farm organizations contend that farm-implement production figures have been written in a misleading manner; and

Whereas it is represented that there has been a maladjustment in quotas and production schedules for farm implements: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House Committee on Agriculture or any duly designated subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and directed to immediately institute an investigation of the shortage of agricultural implements, incuding an inquiry into the quotas established therefor, the production schedules therefor, whether smaller companies can increase or could have increased production of implements of which there is now a shortage through a shift in quotas to them from large manufacturers, whether the best interests of the United States and its allies could best be served by providing for an immediate increase in production of implements of which there is a shortage, and by rescheduling for use in the United States certain implements now scheduled for shipments to foreign countries which the Allied armies now occupy or expect to occupy.

The House Committee on Agriculture or any subcommittee thereof acting under this resolution shall file its report with the House not later than 30 days after adoption of this resolution.

This resolution shall become effective immediately upon its adoption by the House.

Office of Price Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to say that the Louisiana delegation in Congress is in receipt of concurrent resolution from the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, which is now in session, and wherein we are memorialized to vote against any future appropriations for the Office of Price Administration unless Congress direct and fix higher ceiling prices on rough rice, strawberries, watermelons, livestock, milk and dairy products, cotton, and corn.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to the industries and products mentioned in this concurrent resolution, there should have been included oil. Petroleum is one of the most important products of Louisiana and the rest of the United States, and while the Members of Congress have pleaded with the O. P. A., and all of the high officials who have to do with price fixing, the oil industry is about to be ruined, not only in the State of Louisiana, but all the other oil-producing States, and this in the face of the fact that oil is one of the most necessary products in the prosecution and winning of the war.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the concurrent resolution of the legislature be included in these remarks. The resolution follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 6

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Members of Congress from this State not to support any further appropriation to the Office of Price Administration, unless the Office of Price Administration fixes higher ceilings on rough rice and strawberries, watermelons, and all livestock, milk and dairy products, cotton, and corn

Whereas the farmers of the State of Louisiana are doing all within their power to assist in the prosecution of the war against our enemies, but that the producers of rice and strawberries are handicapped by the existing ceiling prices on rough rice and strawberries, watermelons, and all livestock, milk and dairy products, cotton, and corn: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Louisiana (the Senate of the Legislature of Louisiana concurring), That this legislature do request and recommend to the United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States from the State of Louisiana that they vote against any further appropriation for the continuance of the Office of Price Administration, unless Congress direct and provide, as to such appropriation, that the Office of Price Administration fix higher ceiling prices on rough rice and strawberries, watermelons, and all livestock, milk and dairy products, cotton, and corn; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to forward official copies of this resolution to each Senator and Representative of the State of Louisiana in the Congress of the United States.

J. E. VERRET,
Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate.
R. NORMAN BAUER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Our Dutiful Dead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAM HOBBS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Horace C. Carlisle:

OUR DUTIFUL DEAD

On the thirtieth day of the mild month of May,
When the flowers abundantly bloom,
And the soft, sifting air is replete everywhere
With the sweetness of their rich perfume,
We, Americans, meet—where the shadows retreat—
Where the tears of remembrance are shed—
And, as tokens of love, lay fresh flowers above
The still graves of our dutiful dead.

Tho the Father Divine on us sends rain or shine—
Tho the skies above be foul or fair—
Tho the flowers we lay on their tombs fade away,
And the dead never know they were there—
The Creator on high, in the sweet bye-and-bye,
Will remember the prayers that we said,
As in sorrow and pride we knelt there by the side
Of the graves of our dutiful dead.

As the centuries roll toward their coveted goal—
Toward the eternal end of it all—
May this custom sublime grow sweeter with time,
Until death makes its great final call.
At the end of the way, God's Memorial Day
Will exterminate death, with its dread,
As, beyond the Great Dome, He calls lovingly home
From their graves all our dutiful dead.

—Horace C. Carlisle.

General Gellette, Believed Last Confederate Officer, Dies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the address which we have heard today, I desire to announce the death of an outstanding figure in the cause of the Confederacy, Gen. O. R. Gellette, of Shreveport, La. General Gellette is believed to be the last remaining commissioned officer of the Confederacy, and his death marks the end of an historic era in America.

General Gellette lived a long and useful life. He was always active in causes for the upbuilding of his State and his community. It is more than significant that at the very moment this historic man passed into eternity, he was talking to World War veterans in the American Legion office, where he was much beloved and which he frequented.

General Gellette's son is a commissioned officer in the Army of the United States. He was a commissioned officer in the Confederate Armies.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the newspaper account of the death be printed in the RECORD:

GENERAL GELLETTE, BELIEVED LAST CONFEDERATE OFFICER, DIES

SHREVEPORT, LA., June 2.—Gen. O. R. Gellette, 99, reputedly last surviving commissioned officer of the Confederate Army, who during his life refused to take the oath of allegiance to the United States because he considered the War between the States unfinished, died here yesterday.

Death came quietly as he sat in the American Legion service office of Caddo Parish courthouse. Heart disease was blamed.

Active to the end, General Gellette in his nineties danced, ate sirloin steaks, drank beer, and roared rebel sentiments. Enlisting as a private in the Second Mississippi Regiment April 30, 1861, he rose to become a brigadier general at conclusion of the war. He served on the staff of General Stonewall Jackson, and when Jackson was mortally wounded by a Confederate sentry at Chancellorsville, it was General Gellette who helped carry him away.

He was a native of Iuka, Miss., and fought in 14 major battles, including Gettysburg and Antietam, without suffering serious wounds before being captured by Federal troops in North Carolina in April 1865.

Besides his Confederate rank of brigadier general, he bore the honorary title of major general as past commander of the United Confederate Veterans in Louisiana.

What Is Tax Equality

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the following letter written by myself to the president of the National Tax Equality Association will, I am certain, speak for itself. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed with my remarks herewith:

MAY 29, 1944.

Mr. BEN C. MCCABE,
President National Tax Equality Association, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. MCCABE: Tax equalization which will help toward realization of the sound objective of making our tax system one where taxes will be levied in accordance with ability to pay and benefits received is a cause in which I believe all earnest people can serve with enthusiasm and earnestness.

In this connection I am prompted to write to you in response to some of the literature which I have seen coming from your organization and which to my surprise seems to me concerned almost entirely with what you refer to as "tax-exempt cooperatives." I have heard a number of people refer to your organization as the "anticooperative association" and I have heard them insist that your purpose is really to destroy cooperative organizations and their ability to continue to protect the farmers of America and many other groups of our citizens in their right to attempt to solve their economic problems through their own efforts. I am sorry to say that the manner in which you have carried on your propaganda in my opinion justifies the contention that you should abandon the name "National Tax Equality Association" if the work of your organization is to continue along the lines so far pursued and that some of the names given to it by its critics might be more appropriate.

There may be a portion of the receipts of farm cooperative organizations which can properly be regarded as income under the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution and which receipts therefore are actually dependent upon action by Congress in exempting them from income taxation. I emphasize "may be," because there are legal questions involved in this discussion. I readily agree that those questions should be discussed fully and have no objection whatsoever to this being done. But I am reliably informed by people well qualified to speak on the subject that if every legal question were decided against the cooperatives and as your organization apparently would like to have them decided, the Government nevertheless would stand to collect barely $200,000 per year in additional revenue.

Let us assume for the sake of argument, however, that the amount would be 10 times $200,000, or $2,000,000. Taking this figure as a basis of comparison, let me point out to you some of the other opportunities to attack tax inequalities if a well-balanced job is to be done. In doing so, I am frank to say that my purpose is to attempt to show why I am compelled to agree with the people who call your organization an anticooperative association.

First, then, there is the percentage depletion allowance granted to corporations engaged in the exploitation of natural resources. Competent officials of the Bureau of Internal Revenue estimate that something in the nature of a tax subsidy of $500,000,000 per year is given to these natural-resource industries. I am not referring to the perfectly legitimate granting of percentage depletion up to the point where it becomes equal to the cost of development of the mine, oil well, or other extractive enterprise. I am speaking here only about that portion of percentage depletion deductions which are in excess of the total amount of development cost. It will be seen that this subsidy is 200 times the maximum amount which you think might be collected from the cooperatives. It seems reasonable that any National Tax Equality Association, in order to justify its name and banner, would have to devote considerably more of its time to saving $500,000,000 than it would devote to recovering a dubious $2,000,000 from the cooperatives.

In the second place, there is the matter of tax-exempt securities, admittedly an old and thorny subject. But if your organization is determined to bring about true tax equality and to serve the public interest in an impartial fashion, it would seem that at the very least it should help to do the work of educating the public about this issue. Nearly $20,000,000,000 of tax-exempt public securities are now outstanding and interest in the amount of about three-quarters of a billion dollars is annually received upon this. The Treasury estimates that nearly $220,000,000 of the income received from these tax-exempt bonds would constitute tax liability if these bonds were not exempt.

In the third place, it would seem that study should at least be given to the operation of our tax laws with regard to capital gains and losses in order to bring these provisions into such shape that mere speculators would not be benefited by them.

Amendments recently passed by Congress in the bill which was enacted over the President's veto provided certain special provisions with regard to the taxation of lumber companies which will operate to greatly favor a few of the largest of such companies in our country in a manner for which there can be no justification.

And, finally, there is section 722—the so-called relief section of the excess-profits-tax laws. I am told that more than $3,000,000,000 of claims have already been filed under this section. And while some of these claims are undoubtedly legitimate, I think it important in the interest of true tax equality that we be extremely vigilant to prevent the very great possibility of something resembling a raid upon the Treasury as excess-profit industries under the very broad provisions of this section.

It is my opinion that there is a strong, though so far rather well concealed, movement going on throughout the country not only for the legitimate objective of seeing that taxes upon active business in the post-war period are not too burdensome but also for the completely indefensible purpose of attempting to lift a portion of their fair share of the tax burden from the shoulders of those who have profited most in recent years. Should such a move succeed it would, of course, be necessary to impose corresponding tax burdens on the people generally and even upon the poor. I know of no one who has openly espoused the movement I describe and I doubt that any honorable man would do so, but nonetheless, we should be able to learn from past experiences and should, I think, be alive to this danger.

Indeed, I am convinced, and this is, of course, the main point of my letter, that such a movement, and the other tax factors which I have briefly described in this letter should concern far more deeply any true tax equality association than should attacks upon the cooperatives which in so many instances have stood between our farmers, as well as other groups in our population, and sheer economic ruin and destitution.

Sincerely yours,

JERRY VOORHIS.

Francis Dugan Culkin

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. FRANCIS DUGAN CULKIN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, FRANCIS D. CULKIN was elected to the House of Representatives in November 1928. He became a member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and of the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

As a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee he was largely responsible for the development of the Oswego Harbor and fitted it for the real service it has been in wartime.

As a member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee he was outstanding in the efforts that he made for the development of the American Merchant Marine and for the correction of abuses that grew up in connection with the Maritime Commission and its operations. In the work of that committee he brought to bear his great ability as a cross-examining lawyer.

One of my earliest recollections of Judge CULKIN was a controversy of a rather involved legal question on the floor of the House and in the press with the late Samuel Untermeyer, one of the leaders of the New York State bar. Judge CULKIN was so clear and so convincing that in everyone's opinion he had the best of the argument.

FRANCIS CULKIN was my own and my wife's personal friend. His family and my family were very close. We shall never forget our fine friendship with them and it will be our privilege to continue that friendship with his family. Our sincerest sympathy goes out to all of them.

Senator Clarence D. Becker, of Lebanon, Explains Pennsylvania Military Ballot Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I had the privilege of hearing a speech by the Honorable Clarence D. Becker, State senator from the seventeenth district of Pennsylvania, representing Lebanon County and part of Lancaster County, in which he discussed the new Military Ballot Law of Pennsylvania. Senator Becker covered this subject so completely and yet so concisely that I requested him to send me a copy of his speech for insertion in the RECORD. I know every citizen of Pennsylvania will find this exposition of our ballot law of interest and value to him, and no doubt citizens of other States will want to know what Pennsylvania has done.

Senator Becker has made a most distinguished record in the Pennsylvania State Senate and is recognized as one of the outstanding members of that body. Senator Becker has also volunteered to do everything he can in the way of explanations at all places throughout his senatorial district so as to make the knowledge of the ballot law well known to every voter in that area.

Senator Becker's speech follows:

The Pennsylvania military ballot law has been acclaimed the most liberal in the Nation.

The provisions of the law were developed under the direction and sponsorship of Pennsylvania's war Governor, Gen. Edward Martin, and the statute was enacted at an extraordinary session of the Pennsylvania Legislature convened upon his special call recently and now down in history as one of the shortest and most harmonious sessions in the annals of Pennsylvania. The measure was adopted upon a strictly nonpartisan basis and the session is reputed to be the only one in the history of Pennsylvania in which not a single "nay" vote was cast on the floor of the House or the Senate against any bill on final passage.

The statute as enacted provides that any qualified elector serving in the Army, Navy, Merchant Marine of the United States, American Red Cross, Society of Friends, Women's Auxiliary Service Pilots, or the U. S. O. attached to and serving with the United States armed forces, may vote under its provisions, for the duration of the war and 6 months thereafter.

The only requisites are that the person desiring to vote is in the actual military service as above defined and that he or she is a qualified elector. A qualified elector, under the Constitution and the election code, is a person 21 years of age, a citizen of the United States for 1 month, a resident of the State for 1 year (unless having formerly resided here, has returned and resided here 6 months) and resides in the election district 2 months preceding the election.

It is not necessary that the voter be registered or enrolled, as is required in the case of civilians.

Under the provisions of the statute, the Governor is authorized to designate a Military Ballot Day upon which local election boards will keep polling places open from 7 a. m. to 8 p. m. to enroll names of qualified voters.

Governor Martin has designated and proclaimed Friday, July 7, as Military Ballot Day.

Prior to Military Ballot Day, the State council of defense, through the local and district councils, will supervise and conduct a house to house canvas to obtain names and addresses of eligible voters in the services with the armed forces and the allied agencies above designated.

This canvas will begin on Flag Day, Wednesday, June 14, and extend through Wednesday, June 28.

In addition to the canvas of the State Council of Defense any individual, anybody, may furnish such additional names and addresses of qualified voters as may have escaped the general canvas.

All of these names will be submitted to the local election boards between the specified hours on Military Ballot Day and compiled into an alphabetical list.

Anybody may furnish the name and address of a qualified voter to a local election board on Military Ballot Day. Thus, if I am a resident of the first ward middle in the city of Lebanon, Lebanon County, and know the name of a qualified voter in the service and entitled to vote in Millcreek Township, Lebanon County, I can appear in person and furnish the name and address of the voter and other necessary information to that election board, nor does it make any difference whether I am of age or otherwise a qualified elector.

The sole purpose of Military Ballot Day is to obtain the names and addresses of all qualified electors entitled to vote, and this information may be furnished to the local election boards in any legitimate way by anyone on Military Ballot Day, in addition to the report of the house-to-house canvas of the local defense councils.

An alphabetical list of qualified electors, as compiled by the local election boards on military ballot day, will be posted in a conspicuous public place by the county board of elections 45 days before election day.

Additional names and addresses of qualified electors entitled to vote may be furnished to the county board of elections at any time following Military Ballot Day and a supplemental list will be posted 5 days before election day.

The official military ballot will be mailed to the absentee in the service at least 65 days before election by the county board of elections. Provision is made for subsequently mailing official military ballots to those qualified electors whose names and addresses are furnished up to the time of election.

The simplicity of the enrollment and the thoroughness of the canvass will insure with certainty that a military ballot will be in the hands of substantially every Pennsylvania elector in the service entitled to vote.

Actual voting is likewise simple. The official military ballot, in the same form and color as the civilian ballot, together with a small flyer bearing sentence paragraphs of instructions, and two envelopes will be contained in the package mailed to the voter.

The smaller envelope will carry the legend "Official Military Ballot." The larger envelope will carry an affidavit with the name and address of the local county board of elections.

The voter will present himself to an officer authorized to administer an oath and in his presence, will secretly mark the ballot by crayon, ink, pencil, or any legible way. He will place the marked ballot in the smaller envelope and seal it. He will then place the smaller envelope in the larger envelope and seal it. The officer will fill out the affidavit on the back of the envelope, and the voter will drop the envelope in the mail in the regular way and the voting is complete.

A commissioned officer, any member of the merchant marine designated by the Administrator of the War Shipping Administration, or any person of any State or territory of the United States authorized to administer oaths, may take the oath of electors voting by military ballot.

The county board of elections, upon receipt of the military ballot will safely keep it, without opening it, until the third Wednesday after election. Inasmuch as election day always falls on a Tuesday, the third Wednesday after election day is the equivalent of 15 days.

At 10 o'clock on the third Wednesday following the election, the county board of elections shall meet and open the military ballots and tabulate the vote. Each candidate for nomination or election shall be entitled to appoint one watcher, and each political party which has nominated candidates shall be entitled to appoint three watchers. Watchers shall be allowed to be present when military ballots are opened and when such ballots are counted and recorded.

Any ballot bearing a jurat dated on or before election day, November 7, 1944, and reaching the county board of elections at or before 10 a. m. of the third Wednesday following election day will be counted if otherwise valid.

An elector receiving an official military ballot happening to be present in person at his precinct voting place on election day may vote in the same manner as if he were away.

The several counties will be reimbursed by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for the actual expenses of preparing, handling, mailing, delivering, counting, and safely keeping official military ballots.

The penalty for any unlawful tampering with the military ballot procedure or other violation of the statute carries a $1,000 fine or imprisonment not exceeding 2 years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. ULYSSES SAMUEL GUYER, late a Representative from the State of Kansas

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, soon after I came to the House, SAMUEL GUYER came into the House from the Kansas City district of Kansas, and continued there until his death a year ago.

He was a man of high courage, an indefatigable worker of sound judgment, and one who could always be depended upon to vote and talk his convictions. He was an orator of rare ability and on many public occasions he was called upon to deliver the oration.

The loss of such a man results in a void which is always hard to fill.

John William Ditter

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOHN TABER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN WILLIAM DITTER, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, Hon. J. WILLIAM DITTER came to Congress first in 1932. He was a great lawyer and a wonderful orator. I think it goes without saying that he was the ablest Member of the House of Representatives in a joint running debate at the time of his death.

He early became a member of the Appropriations Committee and served on that committee for nearly 10 years. His service there was varied. He served upon the District of Columbia Committee, the Interior Subcommittee, the Treasury Subcommittee, the Navy Subcommittee, and the Deficiency Subcommittee. For 5 or 6 years he had been upon the Navy Committee and Treasury Subcommittee, and had carried a great deal of the load of each committee. I think he was the leading authority in the House upon the Navy and was of tremendous value on the Deficiency Committee.

He could always be counted on to carry a fight to the floor upon any matter in the public interest, and was always vigorous and effective.

We all loved BILL DITTER. We all regret most sincerely his untimely end in an airplane crash. One of the finest characters who served in the House of Representatives in my day is gone.

Russia and the Atlantic Charter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN B. BENNETT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think every American is greatly disturbed at the course of relations between Finland and the Soviet Union, particularly as to the alleged offers of peace on the part of the Soviets. The fact that Russia has ignored and disregarded every basic concept of the Atlantic Charter and subsequent declarations by the United Nations, is naturally a cause for considerable alarm. Our State Department has repeatedly said that the sovereignty of small nations would be fully protected at the peace table. Yet in the case of the current Finnish-Russian negotiations, our principal contribution toward carrying out this pledge is utter and complete silence.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a copy of a letter on this subject written to the President of the United States by four outstanding Finnish Americans representing approximately 500,000 of our citizens:

MAY 22, 1944.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Representing the overwhelming majority of Americans of Finnish stock, may we further petition your aid in bringing to an end the hostilities existing between Russia and the Republic of Finland.

Heretofore our committee has made representations in person and by letter to Secretary of State Hull, and has been received by Assistant Secretary of State Long and Mr. Cumming of the Department. We have endeavored to point out the great moral cause of American participation in the war and how it would be served at this juncture by an amicable settlement of the existing hostilities between Soviet Russia and Finland.

There can't be any doubt—and this has been officially recognized—that in the case of the Finnish-Russian fight, the winter war of 1939–40, as well as the present conflict, Finland has been the victim of Russian attacks. Whatever may be the social and official taboos of the present day in this regard, the fact remains that Finland, with a population of less than 4,000,000, has not attacked Russia, has not joined the Axis, has at no time fought for aggrandizement, has been motivated purely by purposes of defense of her homeland and the right to govern it according to the will of her own people, and in the main the people of America so recognize the situation between Finland and Soviet Russia.

May we not petition you today, Mr. President, to intercede in this matter, in true accord with the spirit of the second article of the Atlantic Charter, remembering that of the post-war democracies founded in Europe after the last war, Finland is the only one that survives today with its original constitution. We choose to believe that this is due to the fact that it is founded on the identical principles of our own Government and the basic tenets of true representative government of justice, peace, and democracy.

And may we reiterate what we have previously maintained, that:

1. Democratic, peace-loving, and progressive Finland is entitled to continue its existence as a free and independent nation for, as Lincoln pointed out in his first inaugural address, a country and its institutions belong to the people who inhabit it. From the birth of our Nation the traditional policy of the United States has been one of friendship and help to the small democratic countries.

2. Finland is entitled in all fairness to know the terms on which peace is made. Unless Finland is advised beforehand of those terms, its powerful and ruthless enemy may later demand conditions which mean Finland's complete annihilation as a nation. To accept the present Russian terms would be tantamount to committing national suicide. Finland is not dominated by Nazi Germany, for if she were, how could she even have begun to discuss the conditions presented by Russia, especially when the conditions include the demand for internment of German troops.

3. The present war in which Finland is involved is a continuation of the war which began with the invasion of Finland in 1939 and for which aggression Russia was expelled from the League of Nations.

4. Finland has given evidence of her good faith in seeking peace by welcoming territorial and governmental security guaranteed by Great Britain and the United States. Her sole threat to permanent peace and maintenance of genuine autonomy and independence is from the side of Soviet Russia.

5. Deep-rooted attitudes of a people do not change overnight. Finland continues to want peace, and wants only the freedom to continue to govern herself. Accusations of atrocities on the part of the Finnish Army and suggestions that Finland has committed herself to the Axis do not ring true.

6. Finland's outstanding record of honest dealing with the United States, as well as her record as a democracy from the beginning of her independence, are the proper criteria from which to judge her present dilemma. It is our earnest plea that she will not be deprived of the sustaining friendship of our great Nation at this crucial moment.

7. The recent exchange of notes between the Finnish and Soviet Governments, as to possible peace terms, plainly states the reasons why the Republic of Finland cannot accept the terms and conditions laid down by the Russians. Neutral circles which laid the foundation for the conversations between the two countries have likewise been shocked by the severity of the Russian terms. Translated into realities, the size of the indemnity and the insistence of the Russians upon retaining the fruits of her former war of conquest over Finland will mean the utter extinguishment of national life and independence in the republic of Finland.

In submitting this plea to you, Mr. President, we voice the sentiment of Finnish American religious and other groups representing a membership and affiliates of approximately 500,000 people. Among these are the following: The Finnish Evangelical Lutheran Church of America, also two large Finnish Apostolic Lutheran bodies, the Knights and Ladies of Kaleva Lodges, temperance groups, the Finnish American League for Democracy, and the cooperative groups, both farmers' and consumers' cooperatives, and all the noncommunistic fraternal organizations, all of which have a nationwide membership. Eight Finnish language newspapers in our country, whose patriotism and loyalty to our country are unquestionable, are of the view we are voicing.

Very respectfully yours,

O. J. LARSON,
Former Congressman from Minnesota.
Rev. FRED A. HEIDEMAN,
The Finnish Apostolic Lutheran Church of America.
HENRY PURANEN,
Finnish-American League for Democracy.
V. K. NIKANDER,
President, Suomi College and Theological Seminary, the Finnish Lutheran Church of America.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. JOHN TABER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. THOMAS HENRY CULLEN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, TOM CULLEN was a veteran in the House of Representatives when I first arrived here 22 years ago. I will always remember his exceeding courtesy and kindness to all the younger Members on the New York delegation.

He was a man of character, exceeding industry, and great ability. Seldom does a man have such a long record of public service as was his lot to have, extending over a span of nearly 50 years.

Our sincerest sympathy goes out to his family.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. JOHN TABER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM HOWARD WHEAT, late a Representative from the State of Illinois

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, Hon. WILLIAM HOWARD WHEAT came to Congress from the Nineteenth District of Illinois in November 1940.

He had a fine service here upon the Naval Affairs Committee and did all that he could to help build up our naval forces for the war.

He was a man of the highest character and finest instincts and the sincerest devotion to duty. We all regret his passing.

Patriotism at a Price

REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a recent column by Walter Winchell, who seems to think it necessary to advertise that he is patriotic, indicates that he thinks some people's loyalty must be purchased.

Winchell, you may recall, prides himself upon the fact that he holds the rank of a lieutenant commander in the Navy, even though he is not in uniform, has no duties as an officer, and receives no pay from the Navy. Insofar as a real contribution to the Navy's war effort is concerned, he is on the inactive list. As a creator of ill feeling, the originator and distributor of vilification, he has been and is a past master.

Winchell, a lieutenant commander in the Navy, although not speaking as such, recently threatened that, unless Congress took certain action reducing the tax on night clubs, the actors' union would forbid members from participating in bond rallies. Coming from an officer in the Navy, that statement made by anyone other than Winchell, would seem rather startling.

Note what the Omaha World Herald, of Omaha, Nebr., had to say on that particular broadcast. Let me quote:

From his own particular "beat," and concerning his dear friends of the gigglewater set, Columnist Walter Winchell writes:

"If Congress fails to act on Congressman KNUTSON'S bill to reduce the 30-percent tax on night spots (which is making too many entertainers jobless), the night-club actors' union will forbid members from participating in bond rallies."

In other words:

Hooray for the war (provided it doesn't interfere with my racket).

Down with Hitler (if it doesn't cost me anything).

Buy bonds. Buy bonds. (But if anybody tries to tax me—bye-bye, bonds.)

It is an intriguing philosophy, and one which might produce interesting results if adopted outside Mr. Winchell's circle of superheated patriots. For example, suppose the investment banker were to say: "If you don't take me out of the 95-percent bracket, I'll buy no more bonds." Or suppose the magazine or newspaper publisher were to say: "You'll get no publicity for the war drives from me unless you restore the newsprint cuts."

We hope the Members of Congress read Mr. Winchell's paragraph, and we hope it inspired them to stand pat.

Veterans' Rights to Reemployment Under Selective Service Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, when the Congress passed the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940 it enacted certain provisions to assure the reemployment of veterans in their old jobs when they were honorably mustered out of the service. Recently, the national headquarters of Selective Service issued a memorandum stating the general rules and regulations which Selective Service will put into effect in order to carry out the congressional will. Naturally these rules and regulations may be changed slightly from time to time, and the veteran should consult with his local draft board in order to get more specific information at a later date. Nevertheless, I feel that the summary given by the Selective Service will be of great use as a general guide to all those in the armed service and to their friends and relatives. If the veterans in my congressional district want more particulars or detailed information, I will be glad to take the matter up with Selective Service and furnish it to them.

There are two points which I wish to emphasize particularly:

First. Every person who entered the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard—male or female—subsequent to May 1, 1940 and who has satisfactorily completed his service in the armed forces has rights under this provision. It makes no difference whether he or she enlisted or was drafted.

Second. The act requires the veteran to make application for reemployment "within 40 days after he is relieved from" training and service. Every veteran should keep this in mind and not take any chance on losing his rights through the lapse of time. The specific provision from the memorandum itself is as follows:

TIME FOR APPLICATION

(a) The act requires the veteran to make application for reemployment "within 40 days after he is relieved from" training and service. This is mandatory. Compliance is essential if the veteran is to claim his reemployment rights against the objection of the employer.

(b) While the employer cannot, strictly speaking, extend the 40-day period, he can voluntarily reemploy the veteran thereafter and he may as a part of the employment contract agree that the veteran shall be entitled to the benefits of section 8 of the act. Such an agreement to be enforceable would have to be clear and explicit; otherwise, while the veteran may be employed it is doubtful that he would be entitled to the additional benefits conferred by the act for seniority, pay and employment for 1 year.

The summary given by the Selective Service follows:

Seniority rights accumulate during the veteran's period of active service in the armed forces in the same manner as they would have accumulated had he remained continuously at work in his civilian occupation

A veteran, in order to claim reinstatement in a position, must be qualified to perform the duties and functions of that position. If unable to qualify for an upgraded job, he is, nevertheless, entitled to a position equal in seniority, status, and pay to the one which he left.

A veteran is entitled to reinstatement in his former position or one of like seniority, status, and pay, even though such reinstatement necessitates the discharge of a nonveteran with greater seniority.

A veteran is entitled to his former position or one of like seniority, status, and pay, and may refuse another, even though the pay is greater and offers other advantages.

Conscientious objectors have no reemployment rights under the law and the Selective Service System has no responsibility to aid them in regaining former positions or obtaining new positions.

Eligible for benefits under the act are persons who enter the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard (male or female) subsequent to May 1, 1940, but the veterans seeking benefits must have a certificate indicating satisfactory completion of service in the armed forces.

Members of the Coast Guard auxiliary are not eligible, nor do the reemployment provisions apply to employees of States, although the act declares it to be the sense of Congress that such persons should be restored to their former positions or to positions of like seniority, status, and pay. The policy of the Selective Service System is to render all possible aid to such persons. Many States have passed laws granting their employees substantially the same reemployment rights as are granted to Federal employees by the act.

The act requires the veteran to make application for reemployment "within 40 days after he is relieved from" training and service. This is mandatory, and compliance is essential if the veteran is to enforce his reemployment rights over the objection of the employer.

In the case of jobs created by war expansion, the permanent or temporary character of the job likewise depends upon the facts and circumstances in each individual case.

The memorandum further points out that:

A veteran entitled to reemployment rights has recourse in the courts to recover back pay, even after reinstatement if it was improperly delayed or postponed by the employer.

A veteran entitled to reemployment may not be discharged from his restored position "without cause within 1 year after such restoration." The question of what constitutes cause is to be determined by standards of common sense and is to be measured by "practices and customs generally acceptable in industry or practices and customs in common and accepted use in the particular place of employment."

A veteran who has been reinstated to his former position cannot within 1 year be displaced by another on the ground that the latter has greater seniority rights.

A soldier who is placed in an inactive status and transferred to the Enlisted Reserve Corps, at his own request, on the condition that he will engage in essential industry, loses his reemployment rights if he does not apply to his former employer for reinstatement within 40 days after his transfer.

The functions of the Veterans' Personnel Division of Selective Service are confined to assistance to veterans in obtaining reemployment in their former positions. The responsibility for assistance in obtaining new positions is being exercised by the Director of Selective Service through the United States Employment Service of the War Manpower Commission.

The Director of Selective Service discharges his responsibilities for reinstatement of veterans in old jobs through a Veterans Personnel Division at national headquarters with decentralized responsibility to State directors and authority to set up necessary machinery within the States to carry out the program at local and State levels.

General Grant—Soldier and Humanitarian

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Memorial Day address delivered at Grant's Tomb, New York, on May 30, 1944, by Charles J. Zinn, commander of Lafayette Camp, Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War:

In keeping with a generation-old custom it is my privilege, as commander of Lafayette Camp, Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War, again to make these brief remarks in commemoration of our great civil war leader, Gen. Ulysses S. Grant. At the close of the last century the Ulysses S. Grant Post, No. 327, Grand Army of the Republic, instituted this splendid tradition. Now, with the recent death of Robert G. Summers, the last surviving member of that post, whose passing we deeply mourn, we are more than ever conscious of our prerogative and its accompanying responsibility to carry on these memorial services as successors of that post. Today for the first time in the history of New York's Memorial Day parades no member of the Grand Army of the Republic took his place in line as it passed below this tomb and it has fallen to us as sons of veterans to carry on.

We must see to it that the memory of Grant is perpetuated in the hearts and minds of America by holding these services as long as the tomb remains. Here may patriotic Americans continue to come on future Memorial Days to pay tribute and to give testimony of their devotion to those high principles of which General Grant was the great exemplar.

At the time of Grant's death Sherman is said to have told his friends, "It will be a thousand years before his character is fully appreciated." Our presence here today is evidence of our appreciation of that sterling character whose worth is yearly becoming more and more apparent.

We Americans have every right to be proud of our generals, both in the Civil War and in the present great conflict. However quickly are forgotten what words of praise we say here today, we can well be thankful that never will any speaker at this tomb have occasion to echo the thoughts of Ingersoll expressed at the Tomb of Napoleon. His words though uttered many years ago are remembered still as a scathing indictment of the war lords of the world when he said: "I would rather have been a French peasant and worn wooden shoes. I would rather have lived in a hut with a vine growing over the door and the grapes growing purple in the kisses of the Autumn sun. I would rather have been that poor peasant with my loving wife by my side, knitting as the day died out of the sky, with my children upon my knee and their arms about me. I would rather have been that man and gone down to the tongueless silence of the dreamless dust than to nave been that imperial impersonation of force and murder known as Napoleon the Great."

No. In General Grant we are fortunate in having a hero who is the personification of the military genius combined with the humble humanitarian. It has been well said that he was a soldier of perfect symmetry in character, judgment, performance, and humanity, whose inspiration was found in the cause for which he fought.

So today, when we are engaged in a terrible struggle with the cruelest enemies of civilized times, we are fortunate in having faithful disciples of Grant leading our armies in Italy and on the other battlefields over the world. Just a few hours ago in a military cemetery on the edge of the battlefield in Italy, Gen. Mark Clark, that outstanding exponent of Grant's principles, took time out from war to remember our fallen heroes, and voiced the hope that within a few days the first European capital to be taken from the enemy, would be liberated. Let us join in that hope and breathe a prayer for his success and the speedy victorious termination of this awful conflict.

A war correspondent is recently reported to have deplored the fact that our soldiers at Cassino, who had been engaged for 25 days in some of the fiercest fighting of the war, do not hate our enemies enough. As for me, I thank our merciful and just God that those boys, who take second place to no one in their zeal to attain victory for our cause, have not had their souls seared by the awful cancer of hatred. How true to the ideals and nobility of character of Grant are they proving themselves, and how that great general would have gloried to be their leader in battle.

They know, as he did, that the natural law recognizes the right to kill in a just war.

They know, as he did, that it is the soldier's duty to make the most effective use of his weapons and to take advantage of every military opportunity.

They know that the war criminals must be brought to justice.

But they, as he, have no room in their hearts for hatred of their enemies no matter how much they may abhor the ideologies and tactics of those enemies.

On one familiar occasion Grant, the soldier, said, "We will fight it out on this line if it takes all summer," while on an equally famous occasion, after the unconditional surrender of General Buckner, Grant, the humanitarian, entered Buckner's tent at night and taking out his pocketbook said: "General Buckner, you are a prisoner and will be sent north. I presume you have no money that is current with us, and I wish to share mine with you." Other examples of both these traits are too numerous and well known for me to burden you with their repetition now, but in closing I wish to leave one thought with you. Consider, if you will, what would have happened to this beloved land of ours—yes, what would have happened to the entire world—had not the victor at Appomattox displayed to the vanquished a Christian spirit of forbearance and charity. Will those among us who foster hatred tell us how a divided America could have twice within 25 years been mobilized to rescue a world whose existence was periled. I say to you that if, after achieving a wonderful military victory as a soldier, General Grant had not won over the South through his great heartedness we and the rest of the world today would be at the mercy of the Nazis and their partners. Truly is the motto of the Sons of Veterans of the Civil War equally applicable today to the entire world, "Preserved through the grace of God."

Religious and Racial Intolerance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. D. LANE POWERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

Dr. Jacob Hochman, rabbi of the Jersey Homesteads Jewish Community and president of the Jersey Homesteads-Hightstown Interfaith Council, reports a synopsis of talks delivered over Station WTTM, Trenton, N. J. This broadcast was sponsored by the Jersey Homesteads-Hightstown Interfaith Council:

"Intolerance is so common and so alien to the doctrines of democracy and Christianity. Americans everywhere are urged to practice democracy. A warning followed in the words of Lincoln, that 'United we stand, divided we fall.' Remember the verse from the Bible 'The Lord hath made of one blood all the nations of the earth.'

"The need for religious, racial, and international tolerance in the world today is self-evident. Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism were promulgated by Semites, and the faiths venerate the same God. The similarity shows that one's prejudice against another's belief goes against his own, and the ignorance is the cause of such emotions. Education is the cure.

"False propaganda created prejudice against the Negroes. In order to become a nation of equal opportunity, we must be tolerant with the races of her vast union; so should we acquire this tolerance.

"Tolerance toward nations reduces extreme nationalism by educating the superior groups. Here we forget that people of different creeds and customs have come from other countries, giving each other their knowledge and experience and have melted into one great people.

"The state of mind becomes tolerant as the emotions and prejudices diminish, and the answer to the problem of religion, race, and international relationships is tolerance."

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address over Station WNBF on May 27, 1944:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my congressional district, I wish to correct an announcement I made last week in reference to the Endicott flood-control meeting. I mentioned the affair would be held on Thursday, June 1. Actually, it will take place the next evening, Friday, June 2 at the Endicott Municipal Building. I look forward to an interesting discussion with the affected residents of the Greater Endicott, Vestal, and Johnson City area.

During this week of Memorial Day which by the way is next week, I am stealing a few days away from official duties at Washington in order to keep several long-standing appointments. On Memorial Day, May 30, I will speak at the annual exercises on the Courthouse Square, in Binghamton, at 3 o'clock, and will look forward to seeing my friends there.

On the following day, Wednesday, May 31, in the evening, I will address an assembly at the Nimmonsburg Fire Hall.

June 1, Thursday, I am scheduled to be in Endicott at the Air Raid Wardens' Association to talk at the Endicott Legion clubhouse.

As I mentioned first, the Endicott flood-control meeting will come Friday June 2.

Sunday, June 4, will wind up six speeches in as many days and find me at Ross Park, Binghamton, attending the eighth annual Townsend Day celebration. My Townsend friends tell me they will hold a basket picnic at noon which is going to be good.

Ever since I have been in public life, I have always anticipated these Townsend Day gatherings. It is so nice to get back to see one's old friends. After all, no matter where you go, old friends are best.

I look forward, therefore, to this Townsend Day at Ross Park. I look forward to seeing the faces of my many friends and shaking hands with them.

I will have to return to Washington immediately after my Townsend Day speech.

While on the subject of speaking engagements, I wish to say that in all probability Congress will recess late in June for at least part of the summer. My plans are therefore extensive for getting around the Triple Cities and the district.

You will recall that last summer I spoke during June, July, and August at 112 meetings of church, Republican, civic, Grange, and Townsend origin. I also visited most of our war plants. I expect to do even better this summer if I am able to reach all the places and dates I have already put on my calendar.

It is so refreshing to return to my district after nearly a year away from home. It gives me a much better grasp on things in Washington. By meeting and talking with folks at home, I obtain a much broader outlook and am able to reflect more accurately than otherwise the true representation to which I believe the American people are entitled.

I hope my friends will make it a point to attend these meetings which take place in their neighborhoods. I will reach practically every nook and corner of the counties of Broome, Chenango, and Madison in my summer speaking itinerary. I hope they will feel free to bring their problems and their troubles to me for whatever solution I am able to give them. I will do my best for one and all.

"THE ROAD

"Life is a road that we all must travel—
It's rough and dusty with many a bend
Some are soon lost in its darkest shadow
Some find the road all sun to the end.
I trod this road alone and in sorrow
Till I met one who called me 'a friend',
So, holding his hand, I started anew
And saw not the shadows that we passed thru
Nor feared not the land at the roadway's end
For the road had given to me a friend!"

The Seat of the Black Market

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARVE TIBBOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the Apollo News-Record, Apollo, Pa.:

THE SEAT OF THE BLACK MARKET

Washington's O. P. A. is flooding the mails with appeals to the people to help crush the black market. Mr. Ickes says the black market is responsible for the folks not getting more gas on the home front. This black market is an evil thing. It can only be crushed by our citizens.

But where does it head? It is our studied opinion, as well as that of a good many others, that its chief source and center is in the Government bureaucracy known as O. P. A. at Washington, the fount of all wisdom, knowledge, and understanding.

No other opinion can be reached when it is known that a truck driver must drive his truck 36 miles to Kittanning and return to get a renewal of his ration. He must use an average of 3 gallons of gas for the trip, not to mention wear and tear on irreplaceable tires. Then he finds the hours of the ration board are such that he must leave his work for possibly half a day. Six cents postage and whatever paper it took to write a letter would suffice.

Then a soldier comes home on a precious and rare furlough. He has a lot of folks he would like to see before going back, perhaps to leave home for the last time or for a period of years. He is allowed the princely privilege of 3 whole gallons of gas, if he uses at least one of them to apply in person at Kittanning. Any local veterans' organization would be glad to handle the matter, but they couldn't be trusted by the O. P. A.

And a dear relative has the good fortune or misfortune, however you happen to view it, to leave this vale of tears. You can't go and see this relative's remains or comfort other survivors by your presence unless you have saved enough A rations for the trip.

That is only one side of the picture, of course. The Government can let millions of pounds of butter spoil because some wise dictator misjudged the needs. So butter disappears. Then it comes back, and it still takes 16 points to get a pound. Salesmen of wholesalers come to local merchants and beg them to take sugar so they can relieve the shortage of storage space. But the local grocer knows he can't get rid of the sugar—it's rationed, you know.

The people go to the stores or the filling stations to get supplies, but find their points won't stretch. They have tried to be sparing in use of critical materials. The local ration boards struggle heroically with the regulations and try to put some reasonable human interpretation into them, but the bureaucrats won't let them.

There, my friends, is the real source of the black market. If one-half the effort put forth by these blistering bureaucrats to enforce their ideas on the people had been put into constructive effort to relieve critical shortage there wouldn't be any great need for rationing, nor any market for the black market. Nor for dictators of the Ickes stripe.

There is the real rub. These dictators like their jobs. They never want to see them ended, for when the need for rationing disappears, the need for their services also disappears. So when there is no need for rationing they simply create one, and insist on a shortage where there is no excuse for a shortage.

Civilians Help to Smash Axis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Lester Allen from the Boston Post:

CIVILIANS HELP TO SMASH AXIS—ROLE OF NONCOMBATANT BRINGS NO PUBLIC ACCLAIM BUT IS VITALLY IMPORTANT TO VICTORY

(By Lester Allen)

While the bombs rip Europe into unlovely shreds and the men of our fighting forces hammer atolls and islands into dusty rinds of crushed coral, and victory is in the making—the noncombatants who are in there taking what we dish out with the enemy are given very little thought, but there are heroes there—men, women and children who have lost everything they possess through the pulverizing effect of our arms and are still ready to help lick the enemy when we come to them.

A colonel in the Army Medical Corps just back from New Guinea had something to say about noncombatants which is food for thought, and a good place to begin to have a different viewpoint about the people of France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, Denmark, Poland, and even Italy.

"I am most grateful," said the colonel, "to a certain little tribe of black men—the fuzzy-wuzzies of New Guinea—for giving a meaning to the word resistance as applied to noncombatants. These men had everything to lose and nothing to gain in helping us. They could very easily have gone into the hills and built new villages and left us and the Japs, too, severely alone to fight it out. We had destroyed their villages with shell fire—killed some of them, too—but they knew the difference between what we were trying to do and what the Japs had done.

"As stretcher bearers carrying wounded out to airfields beaten out of the kunai grass, they saved the lives of countless Americans. They would endure the most appalling hardships and wouldn't complain, just to carry a wounded soldier back from the hospitals at the front to the airfields."

When Americans went ashore on Pacific atolls after bombardments which had smashed everything into rubble, leveling palm groves which were the source of a living for natives and destroying their villages—the natives still alive greeted our men with prayers of thanksgiving and went to work as soon as they were permitted to help.

It was that way on Guadalcanal, Bougainville, New Guinea, Tarawa, Kwajalein—everywhere the Japs were ousted from the Pacific.

The smallest Italian child knows the great difference between the "Tedeschi," as they call the Germans, and the Allied soldiers. The general experience of officers in A. M. G. has been that all the Italian people in the liberated areas, with the exception of a few—and very few—die-hard Fascists, have been profoundly relieved when the Allied armies take over.

Examined from the standpoint of the Italians, this is a strange thing. The Germans did not destroy their homes when they first came. They didn't treat them badly, as a matter of fact. But they were prisoners, nevertheless. And they didn't like it.

HOMELESS BUT LOYAL

When the American and British and French forces came to wrest Italy from the Germans, whole towns were destroyed by German and Allied shell fire and bombing. The people were homeless, and still are without shelter. But they are generally reported to be ready and eager to aid the Allies.

The controversy over the attitude of the French people since the fall of France in 1940 has been raging ever since then. It has been held by some that the French people are reaping the reward of 25 years of disregard of the kind of government they had. Some went as far as saying that they got just what they deserved.

But let the average American citizen ask himself what he would do, as a civilian, if Boston were invaded and seized by an enemy.

Lacking arms or other means of fighting the enemy, what would the average civilian do? They certainly wouldn't cooperate with the enemy willingly. But if it is a case of work or starve, they would probably work, getting as much as they could for as little work as possible.

They would resist secretly, and only a few renegades would openly go over to the enemy. By and large, all classes of people would give lip service of a kind and hang on, in hope that the day would soon come when they could actively fight the enemy.

No doubt there would be controversies in our midst and savage differences of opinion about who was responsible for our plight, just as we have savage differences of opinion about what party should run the Government. The blame would be placed on this group or that group—and it would be difficult, lacking a free press and free speech, to come quickly to a general agreement about who was at fault.

That is exactly what has happened in all the occupied countries. There is general agreement in hatred of the enemy and determination to see them defeated. Anyone who comes to help get rid of the enemy will get their help.

NOT ALL IN UNDERGROUND

Not all Frenchmen, Hollanders, Norwegians, Danes, Poles, Greeks, Yugoslavs and other nationalities under the heel of the Nazis have been working in the underground. It would be folly to believe that they have been. And not all so-called collaborators have gone over completely to the enemy.

A large percentage of those called collaborators, according to the information services of the various occupied nations, are what missionaries in China used to call "rice Christians." That is, as long as they needed the rice the missionaries would give them, they were Christians. When the need ended, they went back to their old faiths.

The Dutch underground reports that members of the Dutch Nazi party, many of whom joined after the Netherlands was overwhelmed, are no longer wearing their party badges. They are trying desperately to rid themselves of the Nazi stigma, because they are certain the Nazis have lost the war and will soon be driven out.

But these rice Christians are a minority in all the occupied countries. The large majority of people have been concerned for over 4 years keeping body and soul together against the day when they will be liberated.

They have looked to the hardy men and women in the underground, who have risked death 24 hours a day, for leadership, although they have taken no active part in sabotage, intelligence work, or aiding escaping prisoners of war.

The damage inflicted upon cities and towns all along the European coast facing Great Britain has been enormous. What the Nazis haven't torn down to create clear fields of fire for defense against invasion ha been bombed into rubble. The air fleets have literally worn paths of ruin across the Netherlands, France, and Belgium. It means that hundreds of thousands of noncombatants have had to endure the peril and loss of bombing with the Nazis.

One of the thrilling untold stories of the war is that of the operations of the underground in Europe giving protection to Allied airmen.

A large proportion of the Allied planes lost on raids go down over occupied territory, and the flyers and air crew bailing out land by parachuting. If they reach the hands of the underground organization they are smuggled out of France, Netherlands, and Belgium and sent back to England. Hundreds have done this. Indeed, there are tales of our airmen who have spent some very pleasant weeks in France as guests of the underground, and at least one case of an airman who received a severe reprimand because he did not avail himself of the earliest possible escape from occupied territory.

This bespeaks the efficiency of the noncombatants ready to rise against their Nazi taskmasters the instant the invasion forces reach their home localities.

And these noncombatants should not be judged too harshly if they have failed to participate in underground activities. It requires a special kind of talent and bravery and special circumstances. For example, underground workers are more efficient when they have few or no family responsibilities. The care of a family in semistarved occupied Europe is a full-time job, leaving small time for taking risks.

Resolution of the Polish-American Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER G. ANDREWS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the Polish-American Congress, Buffalo, N. Y., May 28, 29, 30, 1944:

Resolved, That this congress of American citizens of Polish descent affirms the loyalty of all of its members and their devotion to the fundamental principles of liberty set forth in the Constitution of the United States of America and the Declaration of Independence. We pledge our support to the Government of the United States in maintaining and carrying out those principles in this country. We ask our United States Government to use its influence in international affairs to secure a restoration of the Republic of Poland in accordance with those principles; and we ask all our fellow citizens to consider the devotion of the Polish people throughout the centuries to the ideas of liberty and justice, their suffering under subjection to foreign rule, and the great desirability to the entire world of reestablishment of a strong, free, and independent Poland.

When the civilization of western Europe was threatened by the Turks in the early part of the seventeenth century, the Polish Army under King Jan III Sobieski bore the brunt of their attack and successfully turned back the hordes who would have checked the progress of Europe toward higher cultural and living standards. At that time, although in area and population smaller than the greater and more powerful countries of Europe, the Polish people had a national pride and consciousness which developed leaders in the realms of science, art, and culture generally. Among early notable contributors to progress were Copernicus and Ladislaus Jagiello.

In 1772, about 4 years before the Declaration of Independence, while the American Colonies were suffering under the rule of England which forced them into revolution, Poland's stronger neighbors, Germany, Austria, and Russia, divided the country between them; and for nearly 150 years, until the reestablishment of Poland in 1918, after the First World War, the people of Poland were separated into three parts, each subject to a foreign power insisting on the use of its own language in the schools; and notwithstanding this, the loyalty and tradition to national ideals and culture persisted in the people and their contributions to the thought and progress of he world were evidenced by the development of such masters as Chopin and others.

The struggle of the American Colonies appealed to the statesmen and patriots of Poland as a new star of liberty arising in the west as the star of Poland was passing into the shadow of an eclipse. Thaddeus Kosciusko was one patriot who came to America and offered the engineering skill of which George Washington took advantage in designing the fortifications of West Point. Those fortifications insured Washington the control of the Hudson River throughout the war and were a vital link in the chain of events which finally secured the liberty of this country. Another patriot whose love of liberty led him to volunteer for American service was Casimer Pulaski, who was made a general in the Revolutionary Army and was killed in action while leading his regiment in an attack against the British at Savannah. His service to the country has been recognized and commemorated in the giving of his name to the elevated roadway from Jersey City to the Newark Airfield, which is known as the Pulaski Skyway.

In the latter part of the nineteenth century, the tide of immigration began flowing from Poland to the United States and continued until restrictive limits were placed on immigration from all European countries. By that time, the number of people living in this country who had come from Poland or were descendants of Polish immigrants had reached the total of 5,000,000 in our total population of 130,000,000. In the First World War, Americans of Polish descent furnished their full quota of men serving in the armed forces of this country. In the present war, men of Polish descent are serving in our armed forces to an even larger percentage; and reports from the European battlefields show, especially recently, the valiant exploits of Polish soldiers who have escaped from home and joined the armies of the United Nations.

In peaceful pursuits, the cultural progress of the Polish people gave to the world the work of Paderewski and Mme. Curie, who was Marie Sklodowska, of Poland, prior to her marriage. Students of the careers of Mme. Curie and her husband agree that her genius had much to do with the discovery and development of the use of radium, and that her carrying on of the research and development in that field since her husband's death has been of great benefit to humanity.

A new era for the Polish people offering opportuinties for development of their highest aspirations opened with the reestablishment of the Republic, pursuant to the treaty of peace which ended the World War in 1918.

The boundaries of the state thus established were not as large as those of Poland in 1772 when the first partition of the country occurred; and the new republic made a prompt attempt to recover from Russia the territory which had been Poland in 1772 but had not been included in the reestablishment of the Nation. This controversy with Russia was ended by the Treaty of Riga, signed by both countries in 1921, which established the boundaries of Poland as they were recognized by all of the nations of the world and questioned by nobody until Hitler marched into Poland on September 1, 1939. In the 20 years from 1918 to 1939, Poland achieved an amount of progress under republican form of government which is remarkable and unique in the history of the world for a people who had lived for a century and a half, split into three different parts, each under the rule of a different foreign government insisting on the use of that government's language in the schools of the country. In education, the Republic modeled its system of schools on that of the United States. In the national parliament there was proportional representation of all minority groups and equal treatment of all before the law.

The only sure foundation for world peace is a friendly feeling of nations for one another. A feeling based on any reasonable grounds by any nation that it has been unjustly treated is bound to produce friction and disharmony. Premier Stalin has publicly expressed the Russian desire for a strong, free, and independent Poland; and Poland needs the friendship of its most powerful neighbor.

Justice requires that the boundaries of Poland should be established now as they were before the invasion by Hitler on September 1, 1939. If this is done, Russia can feel sure of a friendly feeling on the part of all the Polish people. This friendship is far more important to Russia than the addition of any territory to its already enormous expanse; and this result would lead naturally to constantly increasingly friendly relations between the two countries.

On the other hand, separation of any part of old Poland from the rest of the country would inevitably embitter the people of both the portion taken away and the remainder of the nation. Indeed, the whole world would be shocked by the obvious injustice of such action.

The suggestion to add East Prussia or a portion of it in place of territory which Russia has proposed to take would only aggravate the situation and make more trouble. Everybody knows that the Prussians are the hardest people in the world to get along with and East Prussia would be a continual thorn in the side of Poland, intensifying the soreness and sense of injustice caused by separating a part of its people from the rest of them. East Prussia, like the rest of Germany, should be controlled by the united action of all the Allied Nations.

For these reasons, we appeal to the sense of justice, of humanity and government throughout the world to see that the boundaries of Poland are reestablished on the same lines which all countries recognized by treaties which were signed in 1920 and observed by all countries without question or any complaints up to the time of the German invasion.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States with the request that this Government use all reasonable and proper means to secure to all the people of Poland the benefit of those principles of liberty and justice embodied in our Constitution and in the Declaration of Independence.

St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH MRUK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. MRUK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by the Niagara Frontier Industrial Traffic League of Buffalo, N. Y., in opposition to the St. Lawrence seaway and power project:

STATEMENT IN OPPOSITION TO THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT, S. 1385

The Niagara Frontier Industrial Traffic League is an organization of traffic managers representing approximately 130 industries in the Niagara frontier. Many of these industries have water-front locations and are vitally interested in water transportation. The league members are practical traffic men whose duties require expert knowledge of all of the problems incidental to the movement of their raw materials and finished products and, as such, feel competent to evaluate the proposed seaway project from the standpoint of transportation.

The league contends that there are already ample water transportation facilities between the Great Lakes and salt water, and the statement credited to the author of this bill to the effect that the Great Lakes are now landlocked comes as a shock to our members who have used the present St. Lawrence canals and the new State barge canal in the movement of commodities to and from the North Atlantic and the Mississippi waterway to and from the Gulf of Mexico.

Prior to the war some of our members have used, although to a relatively small extent, the foreign vessels which operated between the Great Lakes and foreign ports via the present St. Lawrence canals in the movement of both in-bound and out-bound commodities. It is their considered opinion, however, that the proposed seaway would not attract any greater quantity of traffic to or from this area than has heretofore moved through the existing canals.

The members of this league have studied the proposed St. Lawrence project as practical transportation men and have concluded that it offers little of value to the industries which they represent and in many cases would prove exceedingly harmful. They desire to emphasize that the proposed seaway as an additional medium of transportation is absolutely unnecessary. In the prewar years, there has been and unquestionably in the post-war years there will be, an excess of transportation facilities. The unhealthy and unsatisfactory financial condition of many of our transportation companies in the past decade is a matter of record and instead of fostering additional unneeded projects such as the St. Lawrence seaway, we feel that Congress should address itself to methods of strengthening our present transportation companies, and thereby assure our existing carriers of a more solvent condition in the post-war period.

The return of normal shipping on the lakes and in the coastwise and intercoastal trades together with the ability of the trucking companies to repair, replace, and augment their present equipment will provide this Nation with more means of transportation in the post-war period than will be necessary.

The manner in which the unprecedented amount of traffic has been moved during these war years without any serious difficulty is more than ample proof that our only concern with post-war transportation will be how to utilize all of the facilities that will then be available, not to add more.

Our carriers have earned the praise and gratitude of everyone for their splendid contribution to the war effort and it would be a rank injustice to make them face the loss of traffic that will accompany the cessation of hostilities with the further loss of revenue tonnage that would be diverted, to the proposed seaway.

Theoretically, the aspect of cheaper transportation that would be afforded by the completion of the seaway is attended by a certain amount of plausibility, but when analyzed in the light of a cold practical inspection of all of the facts this theoretical appeal is eclipsed by the more practical considerations which prove that the advantages plus over-all cost are more than offset by the damage and over-all loss.

The very existence of the Great Lakes, the present St. Lawrence canals, the New York State Barge Canal and the Mississippi waterway already provides communities on and adjacent to the Great Lakes with cheaper transportation facilities than are available to areas not so fortunately situated and the completion of the seaway would widen this disparity.

Any student of freight-rate adjustments knows that it is not without precedent nor without reason that the loss of revenue to the existing carriers resulting from loss of tonnage would be offset by increased rates on the remaining noncompetitive traffic. The proposed seaway would not reduce the over-all cost of moving this Nation's business and while it might be of some value to a relatively small section, this would be more than offset by the cost of the project and the loss to those who would be adversely affected.

It is conservatively estimated that the total cost to the United States, if amortized over a 50-year period, will be $600,000,000, or $12,000,000 a year. While the eventual cost may very well exceed this figure, it nevertheless affords a basis for calculating the cost to any given quantity of tonnage that might use the seaway.

For instance, using a conservative estimate of 4,000,000 tons a year of United States freight, the cost would be equal to $3 a ton. On a liberal estimate of 6,000,000 tons, the cost would be equal to $2 a ton.

One of the most-discussed commodities which, it is claimed, would use the seaway extensively is grain, and converting these tonnage figures of $3 and $2 to cents per bushel of wheat, we find that the cost would equal 9 cents and 6 cents per bushel, respectively. The pre-war rate on wheat from the head of the Lakes to Montreal was less than either of these figures. From this illustration it is clear that the proposed seaway will not result in any economy, but, on the contrary, will be a profligate waste.

There are other reasons why the seaway would be detrimental to our national economy, but we rest our opposition on those features with which our experience as traffic managers fully qualifies our conclusions. We respectfully submit that this proposed legislation should be defeated.

Respectfully submitted.

J. B. EDWARDS,
W. B. FAULKNER,

Fourteen Minnesota Men Graduate From Federal Bureau of Investigation National Police Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, as the Silver Anniversary class of the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Police Academy moves into its midterm activities this week, I believe it appropriate that mention be made of the splendid accomplishments of the school which in its early days trained State, municipal, and county law-enforcement officers in the latest methods of combating the underworld menace and more recently specializing in antisabotage activities.

When this present class of 38 members finishes its work about the first of August, it will bring to 892 the number of law-enforcement officers from every State in the union and from several foreign countries who have trained in this "West Point" of law enforcement.

I am proud that among this number is Capt. Walter H. Hall, formerly of the police department of Bemidji, in the congressional district I represent. Captain Hall is now on war duty. Thirteen other Minnesota officers have graduated from the F. B. I. National Police Academy, and I shall mention them later. Torkel Knutson, sheriff of my home county, Polk, also attended the school for a time.

Director J. Edgar Hoover, head of the F. B. I., inaugurated the academy on July 29, 1935, in order that the army of 150,000 local, county, and State police officers in the United States might be properly trained to meet the problems of maintaining the internal security of the Nation. It has been the purpose of the F. B. I. National Academy to train police instructors in the latest techniques of crime detection and prevention, police administration, and training methods. As a result, the graduates of the academy have returned to their departments and established training schools, making the F. B. I.'s training available to more than 100,000 of their fellow officers.

The members of each class of the F. B. I. National Academy are carefully selected from representatives of police departments throughout the Nation whose applications have been received by the F. B. I. They must be outstanding men in their communities, of unimpeachable moral character, and in good physical condition.

The F. B. I. National Academy represents a major step forward in the raising of law enforcement to the status of a profession, and its faculty reads like a page from Who's Who. Leaders from every field generously give their time and experience to the students. Listed among its faculty, in addition to many F. B. I. instructors, are Prof. Albert Coates, director, Institute of Government, Chapel Hill, N. C.; Bruce Smith, Institute of Public Administration, New York City; Arthur T. Vanderbilt, chairman, National Conference of Judicial Council, Newark, N. J.; and Wilbur S. Smith, Bureau of Street Traffic Research, Yale University.

Recently added emphasis has been placed upon the control of juvenile delinquency and several prominent authorities in the field of sociology and crime prevention have lectured to the class, including Rev. E. A. Walsh, S. J., of Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.; Associate Justice Matthew F. McGuire, United States District Court for the District of Columbia, Washington, D. C.; Dr. William Healy, director of the Judge Baker Guidance Center, Boston, Mass.; and Dr. Arthur L. Beeley, director of the department of sociology, University of Utah.

The F. B. I. National Academy has been a potent force in the effective mobilization of law enforcement for the wartime emergency. It has been the means of training literally thousands of police officers in the proper discharge of their wartime responsibilities. Graduates of the academy, located in every State in the Union, have become the leaders of the united army of law enforcement on the home front, battling not only against the criminal but against all of the subversive forces that have sought, and are seeking, to undermine the internal security of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the Nation is indebted to Mr. Hoover for instituting this very fine National Police Academy. Through it he has placed the very latest developments in combating crime and sabotage at the disposal of thousands of our local police officers who otherwise would not have had access to this training. Its operation during peacetime resulted in the training facilities being available when war came to our shores and with the war a new menace to national security. Sabotage activities have been minimized in many, many American communities because of the training the local police officers received here at this school.

Minnesota is proud to have had 14 graduates from the F. B. I. National Police Academy. Besides Captain Hall, they are:

Marvin W. Mitchell, Coleraine, patrolman, police department; Roy M. Carlson, Duluth, sergeant-detective, police department; Theodore O. Perrault, Duluth, chief criminal investigator, St. Louis County sheriff's office; Elmer Otto Stovern, Duluth, chief of police, police department; Fred Odegard, Hibbing, captain, police department; Edward B. Hansen, Minneapolis, chief of police, police department; William Edwin Ryan, Minneapolis, detective, police department; Harry N. Tompkins, Rochester, chief of police, Police Department; Joseph G. Himsl, St. Cloud, identification officer, Stearns County sheriff's office; John W. Fahey, St. Paul, deputy sheriff, Ramsey County sheriff's office; Dewey M. Schaible, St. Paul, assistant chief of police, police department; Wesley Paul Glewwe, South St. Paul, superintendent of identification, police department; August J. Bingold, Winona, chief of police, police department.

Golden Goals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS G. BURCH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. BURCH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Dr. Frederick Taylor Wilson, to the graduating class of Stratford College, Danville, Va., on May 31, 1944:

This is a D-day for many of us. First, to you of the graduating class, gowned as you are in the garments of graduation, soon to realize your once far-off dream of becoming a college graduate. Next, to the parents here and at home who see the little girl of yesterday, today a young lady graduate; then it is an hour of happiness to you of the faculty of this good institution as you behold your finished handiwork. Finally, it is a happy hour for me as I speak your final message. I shall ever hold this occasion as a priceless pearl in my rosary of happy recollections.

My theme today is Golden Goals. I shall speak simply and briefly. The hour calls for a serious message. To you, much has been given; from you, much will be expected, since she who takes out of life more than she puts into it has not dealt fairly with life. I am sure I am speaking to future great women, women whose eyes, are on the stars, for "too low they build, who build beneath the stars."

The first goal toward which I hope you will ever strive is the goal of physical perfection. Every man and woman should strive for the highest physical perfection. The Greek ideal was a lofty one. The days ahead will require of both men and women strong bodies as well as brilliant brains. The Helen of tomorrow, like her brother, must have a steady nerve and healthy body. That means that all habits which do not make for physical perfection should be avoided. Apart from culture and refinement, the one-time habits of the harlot, so prevalent today, do not make for a healthy womanhood, and what is even more serious, portend an unhealthy future generation. The average American woman of today lives 3 years longer than the average American man. The ratio will change if woman continues to copy the doubtful habits of man. The glory of woman has been that she was a person apart from man, finer in her feelings, more delicate in her devotions, and far more lofty in her living experiences. May that glory never fade. Beauty of soul is the soul of beauty. Character is the choicest of cosmetics. If you would be beautiful without, be beautiful within. A healthy mind and heart make for physical perfection. A leading physician recently declared that a majority of our bodily ills could be traced to defective thinking. We suffer from sinful stomachs as well as from dizzy heads. Inferior complexions may produce inferior complexes.

I suggest as your second goal, mental alertness. It has been said that the average individual cultivates only 10 percent of his mental capacity. That means that in most of us there are great areas of mentality unexplored and untilled. Minds vary more in the degree of cultivation than they do in native strength. Wide reading, all travel possible, and contact with great spirits will sharpen your wits and give you the mental axe necessary to fell the trees which thwart your pathway to success and happiness. The future will fall to the keenest in mind and mental alertness. "The survival of the brightest" will keynote the tense era upon which you are soon to enter.

Then comes the goal of social understanding. I frankly warn you now that failure awaits you if you do not know or learn the art of human understanding. Investigations reveal that men and women lose out in life more on account of their inability to adjust themselves socially to others than for any other one reason. If you cannot make and hold friends, woe unto your future!

Tolerance and human understanding make for success. Keep before you Markham's lines:

> "He drew a circle that shut me out,
> Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout:
> But love and I had the wit to win,
> We drew a circle and took him in."

Lack of these heavenly virtues leads to failure. A great philosopher has said that there is more of tragedy and pathose in the inner life of the humblest man than in the outer life of the greatest among us. A modern Chinese philosopher has declared that our degree of being civilized may be gaged by the extent of our respect for the feelings of others. The popular person has no secret formula. We get back what we give.

> "Give to the world the best you have,
> And the best will come back to you."

Finally, let me emphasize spiritual awareness as a lifetime goal. By that I mean an appreciation and reverence for all that is beautiful and fine and good in life. Our hearts, like the poet's, should leap up when we behold the rainbow in the sky. You should be lifted to regions of lofty living by the sight of great paintings, and the sound of great music. Ideals distinguish individuals: one visitor to a mountain top saw the leafless trees at the timber line; another, the broken rocks and crags at its peak; the third visitor was thrilled by the sight of the distant sea.

Take time to commune with nature and nature's God. There is an unseen world of strength of wisdom and goodness to which the human soul may be attuned. Seneca, a Roman Stoic, cried, "Oh, Neptune, save me if you will, sink me if you will, but whatever else may happen, help me to hold my rudder true." Jenny Lind, the Swedish nightingale, as she began her programs, prayed this prayer: "God help me to ring true tonight." Like a tree planted by rivers of waters, your soul may grow into the full stature of heaven-blessed human beings. Like the open bay, fed by the endless sea, you, too, may have all heaven at your command. Remember that spiritual values are as real as material ones; faith is as real as the fragrance of flowers, hope is as eternal as the everlasting hills, and love is as luminous as the light from sun and stars.

You will find your highest lives in simple service. No one attains real greatness until he has lost himself in some cause greater than any cause of his own. It was said of one girl whose name was Edith, that her life was bounded on the north, south, east, and west by Edith only. Those of you who will receive in the future, life's richest rewards, will be those among you who serve most and love longest a broken and distressed world.

Self-centered lives are like peacocks that parade in pride and splendor but sing no songs; like orchids expensive but emit no sweet fragrance; like Japanese cherry trees which delight us with their beauty of bud and blossom but furnish no food for the hungry or shelter for the shelterless. "Only the actions of the just smell sweet and blossom in the dust."

You have my message. May you ever keep before you as Golden Goals, Physical Perfection, Mental Alertness, Social Understanding, and Spiritual Awareness.

Blessings on you as you go forth today. May Heaven hold you and guide you safely to the city of your highest dreams!

A Message to and Information for Mother Whose Husband Is in Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, information coming to me through the O. W. I. and other sources indicating the number of wives of servicemen who have endured financial hardships and made unusual monetary sacrifices prior to and immediately after the birth of a serviceman's child prompts me to urge service organization auxiliaries, women's clubs, church ladies' societies, and so forth, to become acquainted with the benefits which we have provided through congressional enactments and pass that information along to the mothers and expectant mothers.

Congress has appropriated $24,200,000 for this maternity care for wives of servicemen of the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh grades. We have made possible through legislation we have passed, for the wife of the man in service in these lower four grades to receive medical, nursing, and infant care without cost during that maternity period. In Minnesota, our State department of health, State Office Building, St. Paul, Minn., cooperating with the Federal Government's program, directs and administers this service through the division of child hygiene.

Inquiries relative to these benefits and this program may be directed to division of child hygiene, Minnesota Department of Health, University Campus, Minneapolis, Minn.

Under this plan the wife of the man in service may receive prenatal care from a qualified doctor at her home or at the doctor's office. At childbirth, whether the wife of the man in service stays at home or goes to a hospital, she and her baby can receive free medical and nursing care. Complete maternity care is provided, including a physical examination 6 weeks after the baby is born. Besides all this, the baby is entitled to free medical care during the first year of life.

IMPORTANT TO FOLLOW RULES

Wives of servicemen should acquaint themselves thoroughly with the rules set down for this free medical attention. The rules set down in Minnesota are clearly stated and must be met in order to receive this care and service. The wife should see a doctor at the first sign of pregnancy. She should then ask the doctor for an application form to apply for this free service. If the doctor does not have these blanks, write to the division of child hygiene, Minnesota Department of Health, University Campus, Minneapolis, Minn., and ask them to send a blank to you. Fill out the application blank carefully. Be sure to include your husband's Army serial number. The wife fills in part 1 of the blank. Ask your doctor to fill in part 2 at once, and rush it to St. Paul, Minn., for approval.

APPLY EARLY

It is important that wives apply for this in early pregnancy. The State board of health will not approve payment of the doctor, hospital, or any service before the application is made out. It is important that the application be made out by the wife at the first sign of pregnancy. In case of an emergency be sure that the doctor makes application for you immediately. It is most important to get the application filled out and sent in at the earliest possible time. See your doctor at the first sign of pregnancy and apply for this free service.

Wives can see their regular family doctor for this. It is not necessary to go to a special or certain doctor to get this aid. It is most important that wives of servicemen remember that no payment for any such service will be made prior to the filing of an application. In other words, no application—no aid. Should you know of any wife of any serviceman who needs this aid, be sure to warn her that she should see her doctor at once and make application for this free medical and hospital and infant-care financial aid.

CHARGES PAID THROUGH STATE BOARD OF HEALTH

The charges for this medical, hospital, and surgical attention are paid through the division of child hygiene, Minnesota Department of Health, University Campus, Minneapolis, Minn. The charges are paid directly to the hospital and the doctor and the nurse. No money is given to the wife. No serviceman's wife need worry about proper medical, infant, care, or hospital care in the event of a birth if she acquaints herself with this free service and makes proper application before the event rather than after. Pregnant wives can get prenatal care as well. No wife of a man in service, therefore, should fear seeing a doctor at once because of running up a bill. The sooner she sees her doctor the more free medical service she will get.

WHAT SERVICE WIVES CAN EXPECT

Complete medical service for maternity patients during the prenatal period, childbirth, and 6 weeks thereafter—including care of complications, operations, post-partum examination—and to the newborn infant.

Health supervision for infants, usually provided in childbirth conferences.

Nursing care, in the home, through the local health department including bedside nursing care as necessary—for the mother, before, during, and after childbirth, and for the baby during the first year of life.

Hospital care, in wards or at ward rates, for maternity patients and infants. Funds cannot be used in part payment for more expensive hospital accommodations. A minimum stay in the hospital of 10 days after childbirth is arranged if possible. Hospital care may be authorized in any hospital, including Army and Navy hospitals, where the maternity and pediatric services have been approved by the State health agency.

CONGRESS SET UP THIS SERVICE

The money for this service is available by acts of Congress passed last year, 1943. Your present Congress has appropriated a total of $24,200,000 for this service. I would like to see servicemen's wives learn about this help and make use of it. Should any question arise regarding any phase of this aid, or should any wives of servicemen be unable to secure this aid—it will do you well to write your Congressman about it. Address your letter: Congressman HAROLD C. HAGEN, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

1940 Edition of the Census

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, the 1940 edition of the census as put out by the Bureau of Census in the Department of Commerce and printed in the United States Government Printing Office is a most amazing mess of jumbled-up inaccuracy, if the "facts" relating to Cleveland are any indication.

The following are a few samples of the "information" contained in this book. All of them are found in volume 3, part 4, and refer to people 14 years of age and up:

It would be interesting to know how the count was made in certain instances and how the totals were arrived at. In many cases the classified section of the telephone directory would have been much more accurate. For anyone seeking quick, definite, and accurate information relative to various workers' groups, it would be almost useless as so many of them are so obviously incorrect as to make one doubt them all.

Page 695: Dancers, showmen, and athletes, 155. These are all classed under one group or heading. Why?

Page 696: Fishermen and oystermen, 13. A check with the fish companies revealed there were 42 active fishermen at that time and—strangely—no oystermen.

Page 696: Workers in wholesale and retail trade, 1,721. Any one of the big department stores employs more than that.

Page 696: For food and kindred products there are two listings on this page for 1940; in one place 1,676 and in another place 461.

Which is right, one or both?

Well, Fisher Bros. Co. employs over 3,000 people, the A. & P. over 1,800, and there are 4 other large grocery chains besides the 1,092 independent groceries and 378 delicatessens that have an average of 3 people working. Besides these there are hundreds of people working in the production of food and kindred products.

Thus, instead of 1,676 people working in food and kindred products, there are over 10,000 in Cleveland in this important industry.

Page 696: Textiles, textile products, and apparel, 299.

There are 12 manufacturers and 65 retail outlets besides all the big department stores that employ hundreds and thousands of people. Just 1 of the above manufacturers employs 2,100 people and another 1,550, and, from the opinion of men in the industry that should know, there are about 10,000 people employed under this heading.

Page 742: Osteopaths, 10. All anyone had to do to get the right number would be to take the classified directory and count them—all 69 of them.

Page 742: Teachers, 766. The clerk of the Cleveland school board reports there are 3,587 school teachers in Cleveland proper. This does not include those in the parochial schools.

Page 742: Trained nurses and student nurses, 57. This is probably the most ridiculous notation in the whole book.

According to the Bureau of Nursing Service, district No. 4, 1220 Huron Road, there are over 3,000 nurses registered there, and that includes only about 65 percent of the actual number.

Page 742: Listed under "Professional and semiprofessional workers" are hucksters and peddlers, 553; newsboys, 552; mail carriers, 936.

One would wonder how hucksters, peddlers, or newsboys could come under either heading. If one were trying to find out how many hucksters there were in Cleveland, I do not think anyone would think of looking for them under the heading of "Professional and semiprofessional workers."

Page 742: College presidents, professors, and instructors, 180. The College Blue Book, 1939 edition, to which the above figures refer, lists 705 at Western Reserve alone. There are 7 other major colleges and universities in Cleveland, all with large teaching staffs.

Page 780: Coal mining, 30; metal mining, 7. Just where these people mine would be interesting to know.

Conduct of Recent Senatorial Primaries in Oregon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUFUS C. HOLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I have prepared a statement of further observations relative to the outrageous methods and apparently limitless financial expenditures used to defeat me in the recent—May 19—nominating or primary election in Oregon. I request unanimous consent to have this statement published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, together with a newspaper article to which reference is made in my statement.

There being no objection, the statement and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, in the hope that the knowledge may be helpful to other loyal American Members of the Congress who face reelection at this time, I desire to demonstrate the kind of unfair, deceitful, and dishonest campaign which was waged successfully against me in the recent primary election in Oregon, by the "smear artists" of the international group and their associates in underhanded political tactics, the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, headed by the internationalist, Sidney Hillman, who are undermining our constitutional government. I submit the text of a letter which is similar to many others received by me from Oregon voters. Every phase of Federal policy, religious belief, or personal bias was similarly handled by my unprincipled opponent and the subversive groups which promoted his candidacy. This letter read as follows:

"There is a statement regarding yourself I would like some enlightenment on. Friday I voted for you; then returning home, I met a neighbor who informed me that you had been chumming around with both Nazi and Jap agents. I asked this party who told her. Her answer was, 'Everybody knows it.' If this statement can be traced to its source, it seems as if a suit for libel could be started, for it is a serious charge in wartime to be dealing with the enemy."

The Members of the Senate, I am sure, know that these charges are false and that a denial of them is not required. Yet the fact is that I was foremost in preparing our country for war with Hitler and the other dictators of the powers of aggression, so that our Nation was better prepared to defend itself when war came than it otherwise would have been. Moreover, I have been the chairman of that bi-partisan group of the Members of both Houses of the Congress from the States of California, Oregon, and Washington which addressed itself to Federal and defensive problems peculiar to the exposed Pacific coastal area of the United States. It was upon the findings and recommendations of this group that the directive was founded whereby the Japanese were removed from the strategic Pacific coastal area.

However, it appears that if false assertions are continuously made and reiterated, they soon are accepted by presumably intelligent voters as factual. In the recent Oregon election all the for-hire hangers-on as well as the prostituted writers and the purchasable publications were employed in this deceitful work by those handling the apparently unlimited funds made available to them, and I was unable to get fair or adequate publicity for any factual statement of mine, so uniformly, with a few notable exceptions, was the press of the State controlled.

Among these writers was one, Palmer Hoyt, managing editor of the Oregonian, once a great newspaper in Oregon, but now, under his management, little more than a house-organ catering to the advertising account of Aaron Frank's department store in Portland. Aaron travels with his fellow-internationalists. His store dominates the retail business of the Portland trade area and its advertising account is of vital importance to the revenues of the newspapers published in Portland.

Palmer Hoyt and his fellows who write for hire designate me as an isolationist but refuse to define the meaning of the term "isolationist"; although repeatedly I have asked for a definition of this tricky word.

There is another tricky word used by the "smear artists" and that word is "labor."

I was represented as being against labor, whereas in truth and in fact the man who really labors has never had a more sympathetic and loyal friend than I have been and am. The record of my public activities and of my private operations verify this statement. Yet he who preys upon those who labor for their daily bread, whether he be a hard taskmaster or a labor racketeer, has no more inveterate foe than myself.

I deplore strikes in war industries in war time. However, by the constant repetition of the assertion that I am "against labor," the morons and dupes who read and believe all they read in the controlled publications, and the victims of the racketeering C. I. O. Political Action Committee, were persuaded to vote against me.

That there may be no uncertainty of my meaning of "Internationalist," I want it understood that I so designate anyone who holds his racial, religious, or country-of-orgin group as supreme in his political allegiance and that his loyalty to the country in which he holds citizenship is to him of secondary or of minor importance, if any; or anyone who sets himself and his peculiar group apart in all countries and demands for himself special consideration in political and personal matters as an extraordinary kind of citizen, entitled to persecute others while demanding mercy for himself and his kind. His trade weapon is secret, but effective, mass boycott.

A difference with him on any subject is immediately assigned as based upon persecution of his racial, religious or country-of-origin group with the result that his entire group unites to destroy politically and to boycott commercally anyone who cannot be intimidated by their un-American practices.

In America, the Internationalists conspire to evade and would nullify and repeal the immigration laws of the Congress while their national spokesman appears to be the despicable Walter Winchell and apparently the discredited book Under Cover is their bible. Right up to Pearl Harbor their international traders were shipping scrap iron and other essential war supplies to our obvious enemies.

It seems to me that the time has come when the preservation of the Republic and the safety of the American people and of their sons in the combat forces of our country all over the world, demand that all truly, patriotic Americans regardless of their political party affiliations unite to suppress these sinister internationalists and to defeat their subversive and disturbing practices.

It is of vital importance now to the efficiency of our war efforts and to the economy of our federal operations that all Americans strive for unity in every patriotic purpose of national interest.

Mr. President, supplemental to my remarks and as part of them, I request that the article which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of last Saturday under the caption "White House guard linked with C. I. O. group," be printed in the RECORD.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 3, 1944]

WHITE HOUSE "GUARD" LINKED TO C. I. O. GROUP

(By Willard Edwards)

Evidence linking the White House Palace Guard with the operations of the Communist-dominated C. I. O. Political Action Committee, which has been attacked in Congress as a violator of the Corrupt Practices Act, was uncovered yesterday by congressional investigators.

Daily messages have been exchanged between Sidney Hillman, in his New York City headquarters of the C. I. O. group, and David K. Niles and Jonathan W. Daniels, confidential aides to the President, in their White House offices, the probers found.

KINGDON REPRESENTS F. D.

The rather astounding information was also gathered that Dr. Frank Kingdon, former president of the Union for Democratic Action, which is helping finance a congressional purge of anti-new dealers, is attending C. I. O. meetings as personal representative of President Roosevelt.

The U. D. A. is closely associated with the Hillman group in the fourth-term campaign. Like the C. I. O. committee, it has been found by the Dies Committee on un-American Activities to be controlled by Communist elements.

Among the exhibits to be presented at the expected congressional investigation of Hillman's lavish expenditures in the current campaign will be a photograph which appeared recently in the U. A. W.-C. I. O. union paper of the Wright Aeronautical Co. at Paterson, N. J.

Richard Frankensteen, director of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, and vice president of the United Automobile Workers, appeared as speaker before a C. I. O. meeting in this picture. Seated behind him was Dr. Kingdon, listed in the caption as President Roosevelt's personal representative." He recently authored an effusive biography of the President.

The message between the White House and Hillman indicated constant conferences on the course of the C. I. O. group's political campaign, the investigators said.

These revelations lent impetus to the demands in both Houses that Attorney General Biddle be called upon to explain why he refuses to prosecute the Hillman organization for violations of the law against excessive expenditures in congressional and Presidential campaigns. Hillman and Philip Murray, head of the C. I. O., have admitted the collection of $750,000 for political purposes and have announced that a fund of several millions will be assembled.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, wife of the President, is listed on the honorary sponsoring committee of the U. D. A. which is conducting a campaign for sale of the new congressional purge list," issued by the New Republic, a radical publication. The C. I. O. committee is using this list in its campaign to drive out of Congress all those whose voting records are not considered progressive.

Post-War Aviation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABE MURDOCK
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, because of its timely interest, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], entitled "The Air Must Be Free," which appeared in the May 1944 issue of the magazine Flying.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AIR MUST BE FREE

MAINTENANCE OF UNRESTRICTED AIRWAYS IN THE POST-WAR WORLD IS URGED AS A WAR BARRIER BY AN AUTHORITY ON INTERNATIONAL LAW

(By ELBERT D. THOMAS, United States Senator from Utah, former professor of political science at the University of Utah, the author is a recognized authority on international affairs. He has served as vice president of the American Society of International Law, vice president of the American Political Science Association. Born in Salt Lake City in 1883, he has represented his native State in the United States Senate since 1932)

The airplane can, given the opportunity, contribute as much to lasting peace as it is contributing today to winning the war. But I am writing with the conviction that this peacetime contribution will not be possible if we hamper aviation with a pre-post-war balloon barrage of oratory, excessive regulations, and dog-in-the-manger nationalistic taboos.

In this war, the airplane has been freed from red tape, from outworn military ideas, from snail-like production schedules. Magnificent work by hundreds of thousands of Americans—civilian and military—is behind this achievement. Now it appears imperative that we begin to establish a parallel post-war freedom for aviation, else it is endangered of returning to its former role of a troublesome stepchild. If it does, it will be denied one of the golden opportunities of this or any age to build an aerial highway toward permanent peace.

More can be contributed to better international understanding by proper regulation and experimentation with the air than in any other single medium.

I have said that it is imperative we do something about this, and you need only read your newspaper to understand the urgency. We are on the eve of a great international conference on post-war aviation. It has been a-building since last July, when Secretary of State Cordell Hull notified Senator BENNETT C. CLARK of Missouri, chairman of the aviation subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee, that such a conference was contemplated but would not be called until the committee could voice its opinions.

Assistant Secretary of State Adolf A. Berle was put in charge of the liaison work with the Congress. This work went forward slowly until recently, when Lord Beaverbrook, Britain's spokesman for post-war aviation, announced that England was ready for a conference and awaited word from the United States.

Further stimulus to hold the meeting has come from United States air lines, who have already done a magnificent wartime transportation job throughout the world—and who are divided sharply on the post-war international issue of whether we should face the world with one air line (a so-called "chosen instrument") or should permit more than one, or many, United States lines to enter the post-war world arena as competitive private enterprises.

The impending international conference and the air line debates have raised another—and most important—question. Shall the air be free? Shall our nationals be permitted to fly at will over foreign territory, with or even without reciprocal privileges going to foreign planes flying over the United States?

It seems to me that the answer should be worked out before any other questions are raised. Unless this vital question is answered satisfactorily, we may find ourselves building, not for peace, but for another war.

I am not alone in underlining the importance of this aspect of the world transport aviation problem. The British already have indicated how vital they consider it. They have gone on record favoring freedom of the air—with reservations. It is the chief of four main topics they propose be discussed at the coming conferences.

"His Majesty's government," said a recent official statement, "would welcome a greater measure of freedom of the air than existed before the war, but * * * the extent to which freedom of the air can be realized must depend on general acceptance of an enlightened international settlement."

Jointly operated United Nations lines "in particular areas * * * now operated by enemy airlines and routes passing through areas of vital security interest" are also recommended.

It is precisely this type of generalized recommendation that must be avoided if we are to nail down air freedom as the main plank in a platform on which may stand a permanent peace. I do not believe the British answer is specific enough, nor sufficiently inclusive; nor does it outline a pattern for permanent peace.

To put it more constructively, I believe that, first of all, there should be established in the world certain free-air cities, or free-air islands.

This should not be difficult to do. War victors can reach a decision themselves about enough free air to give all the nations free access to the air. Wide distribution of "free" cities will make it possible to allow nationalistic jurisdiction and control over the air, to be established in those places where the nations want to maintain that control. It also is reasonable to assume that every nation, no matter how strictly it adheres to national jurisdiction of the air over its own land, will want to have a free city or two, according to the size of the nation, for entrance of planes of all powers. Indeed, I believe that the more the free city idea is developed, the more free cities will appear in the world community.

By "free" cities I mean cities which permit entrance and exit of planes of all nations without any reference to reduction of restrictions in regard to trade or immigration. I am purposely avoiding the question of freedom of trade or free entrance of persons. Air over the oceans and the high seas, of course, should remain free. This freedom should be maintained by international agreement and by policing, if necessary, by the United Nations planes.

It follows that those nations which control the air over the poles should grant free air in those areas to all other nations of the world. Nor can I emphasize too strongly my feeling that the air over each one of the Axis powers—Germany, Italy, Japan, and all their satellites—should be made free.

This would have two advantages. In the first place, much of the need for a United Nations peace force or an international police force to curb aggression will be accomplished because free air over the former enemies will eliminate the necessity for constant patrols. Second, after a time we would know the advantages or disadvantages afforded to nations whose air is free—and I believe that free air will prove a distinct advantage over a period of years.

Other free areas should be specified at the conference table. The air over such rivers as the Rhine and Danube—already internationalized—should be free. Similarly, the air over all of the mandated territories—whether mandated as a result of the Versailles Treaty or as a result of treaties growing out of the present war—should be free for United Nations planes, if not the planes of all the world.

Other widespread free areas seem to be in order in those countries now occupied by the enemy. They should be willing to allow freedom of the air to much of their territory in return for the freedom which will be given them as a result of the Allied war effort. Air over land taken from the enemy countries and restored to their former owners also should be in this category. For example, if out of this war a nation like China has restored to her an island such as Formosa, it would seem only logical that she grant air freedom to the world so far as Formosa is concerned.

The world pattern of such a program takes significant form. Mark off a globe with all the free areas I have suggested, all of which can be brought about as a result of the war and without doing an injustice to anyone, and you will find that the problem of free air can be solved for most of the world. You will have free air over the seas and other important bodies of water and rivers, free air over the poles, and free-air cities or islands at close enough intervals across the continents of the world to be within easy hopping distance for the average transport of today or even the below-average transport of tomorrow.

Nor will those nations which want nationalistic control and absolute jurisdiction be left out in the cold. They will have gained their two major objectives: freedom for their planes anywhere they want to fly in the world, plus jurisdiction for themselves over their own territory.

Or put it in terms of the United States only. When one realizes the extent of the earth which we ourselves will insist upon having left open to us—even if air control is recognized as being nationalistic and air jurisdiction over a given land as it is today—it is clear that our interests are so extensive that we must keep in mind both the national and the international aspects of the whole question.

Consider one example among possible thousands. Assume that the present international law of the air prevails; that strictly internationalistic selfish ideas control; that every nation keeps absolute control over the air above its territory—but wants access to all other territory excepting over similar nationalistic jurisdictions. If these rules prevailed, the United States would need free air between the State of Washington and Alaska, even though it be over Canada. We need free air over anything which is in the way between continental United States and the Philippines. And so on around the world.

All types of air transport, in a peacetime world, may benefit from such an arrangement. Transports can link the world markets. Lighter-than-air ships, aided by world control of helium now held by Russia and the United States, should stage a dramatic come-back. Private planes can operate without fear of changing international regulations.

In summary, we must not, in the international conferences to come, give only lip service to what the British so appropriately spell in capital letters. This "Freedom of the Air" should become more than a phrase. It should become an international slogan, the basis for a program. It should be given meaning in terms of concrete proposals. Countries, cities, territories, islands, and areas should be named. Mileages should be measured, concessions drawn up by all the nations participating. Only by such a practical, realistic approach can we expect to get anywhere at all.

With proper foresight, with careful planning, such a program can by the same token lead to a foundation, built by the United Nations, upon which will arise a permanent and workable peace.

Philippine Freeedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILLARD E. TYDINGS

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Philippine Freedom," published in the Washington Post of yesterday. This is a very comprehensive editorial, which takes into account our relationship both before and during the war with the Philippines. I think it is worthy of reading by everyone who is interested in the problem.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILIPPINE FREEDOM

Our relations with the invaded Philippine Islands are once more coming to the fore because of the desire to hasten the date of the islands' independence once the Japs are driven out and the necessity of opening negotiations on economic ties between the two countries. As the Tydings-MacDuffie Act now stands, the President is required to call a United States-Philippines conference on future trade relations on or before July 4. Since the war has given rise to much broader economic problems, however, the Senate has passed a resolution creating a Filipino Rehabilitation Commission to "investigate all matters affecting post-war economy, trade, finance, economic stability, and rehabilitation of the Philippine Islands * * *." This advisory body would be composed of nine Philippine representatives and nine Americans—three each representing the Senate, House and White House. It is obviously desirable that the House complete action on the bill before the end of the month so that the Rehabilitation Commission can take the place of the narrower trade conference.

Pending also before the House is the important Tydings resolution to open the way for advancement of the independence date if the invaders are expelled from the Philippines before July 4, 1946. It declares a policy of driving out the treacherous, invading Japanese, of restoring as quickly as possible the orderly and free democratic processes of government to the Filipino people and then establishing complete independence of the Philippines as a separate and self-governing nation. In this respect it is sharply at variance with the previous ill-advised resolution which would have empowered the President, after negotiations with the Commonwealth government-in-exile, to proclaim Philippine ndependence within 30 days.

We could scarcely have done worse by our wards in the Pacific than to have cut them loose while their homeland is occupied by the enemy and the government is in exile and consequently operating in impaired fashion. Before we can grant them real independence we must see that their constitutional system is once more fully operative. The current resolution assures the Filipinos a free country at the earliest practicable time instead of offering them only the husk of independence. Means of keeping the Philippines free would also be strengthened. The resolution would extend the present authority for the United States to retain naval bases in the islands to include bases of all types.

The chief question that has been raised as to enactment of this resolution is that it makes no direct reference to the act of last November by which the term of President Quezon was continued until the White House proclaims that "constitutional processes" have been restored in the Philippines. That act also contemplates that Vice President Osmena shall become President as soon as the government is reestablished at Manila and serve until his successor shall have been duly elected and qualified under the Philippine Constitution. No doubt this act would stand if the current resolution should be passed without reference to it. But it is obviously desirable to leave no doubt about the matter. It would be tragic indeed to have a contest over governing authority in the hour of the Filipinos' liberation.

Address by Hon. Francis Maloney, of Connecticut, to Knights of Columbus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address which I delivered at a banquet of the fourth-degree assemblies of the Knights of Columbus of Connecticut, at the Bond Hotel, in Hartford on May 28.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The enduring qualities of our order are best demonstrated, it always has seemed to me, by the revived inspiration that comes from the conferring of degrees.

On an occasion like this the oldest members present, as well as the candidates themselves, are moved to a rededication to the high principles and noble purposes which membership in this order implies.

It matters not how often we may have attended degree celebrations in the past; each succeeding time we are drawn into the ritual with rekindled fervor. That ritual never becomes hollow or hackneyed. It never has the false ring of artificial theatrics. It never is witnessed as empty ceremony. Underlying the beautiful language is the ever-burning spirit that binds us together in seeking to achieve the high purposes of our religion and country for which men have marched under the banner of this society for 3 generations.

The history of our organization during the past half century has been the story of men, humble in the sight of God, and proud in the citizenship of the United States, banding together in a determination to adhere to the teachings of God and strengthen a natural liberty-loving patriotism.

It has been our duty to demonstrate by our own activities, and in denouncing the insidious operations of evil groups within our country, that true Americanism is based upon charity and justice, and that an essential obligation of citizenship in this great democracy is to live among one's fellowmen with tolerance and mutual respect.

As the years have passed, and this order has grown stronger and more influential throughout the land, it has been to our everlasting glory that we have fought, not only for our own rights, but also against persecution or calumny directed at any group of Americans.

Recently the noble mission of this splendid organization has been directed against the spreading waves of pernicious anti-Semitism. Our instinctive reaction against intolerance was born of the sufferings of our own forefathers. We abhor the cruelties of racial and religious discrimination because we are bound together in this society by an unqualified adherence to liberties proclaimed in the Constitution of the United States. We reject unholy and unworthy attacks upon any fellow man, and upon our fellow men who are Jews, because such attacks are sinful; because they violate the unalterable doctrine of Christian charity; because they enthrone injustice and degrade the human soul.

Our activity against intolerance in America must be continued. Indeed, it must be proclaimed from the mountaintops. War galvanizes good citizens into patriotic action, but the emotions which war unleashes may be seized upon by evil groups to arouse passion against minorities. Therefore, we must continue our vigilance. Along with all other groups of good Americans we must be alert to prevent the turning of war psychology into vicious attack upon any race or religion. This vigilance canot be confined to the joint action we may take through the official channels of our society. It must be accepted as the responsibility of every one of our members as an individual of his own community. Tolerance is cultivated by example. The Good Samaritan was a person who went out of his way to help a neighbor.

The influence of the Knights of Columbus as a Nationwide organization is powerful because its effect is found not only in the collective action of the order, but also in the separate but consistent examples of its individual members. No member of this society is true to his pledge unless he, himself lives the principles for which the fraternity stands. And I am glad to be able to say that on the issue of racial and religious tolerance, our individual members, in their daily intercourse with the people of their own cities and towns, are living up to the ideals we foster.

Our country's need is that it look forward to an era of good feeling among all the people of America, and the world. God knows we shall come out of this war with scars and with many a heartache. Let us hope that out of this common suffering there will also come a common understanding, a sense of mutual trust and respect, and a feeling of neighborliness, which are the great blessings of a tolerant and charitable people.

But our mission as an organization dedicated to enlightened American citizenship is not limited to counteracting intolerance. We have been, and must continue to be, deeply concerned with the eroding effect of materialism upon culture in the United States. Intolerance may be the product of ignorance and insularity. It may be a symptom of maladjustment, or may represent a wave of mass emotion, but materialism is more dangerous because its doctrines are articulated in many circles by those who fancy themselves leaders of thought.

Materialism in its various forms—and oftentimes it is subtly clothed in seemingly innocuous coverings—is at war with everything we stand for, and everything that America should stand for.

The basis of materialism is in its denial of God and of the human soul. It rejects anything of the spirit in human affairs. It considers that man is nothing more than a corporeal creature whose destiny is to merely be made comfortable during a short and pointless span of life on this earth.

Every true Christian is bound in conscience to war against materialism in whatever form it may take. We of this fraternity are united in the performance of that sacred obligation, and we have done much to combat the forces of materialism in America. But as with the crusade against intolerance, the war against materialism must be continuous and unrelenting. And that war must be expertly waged. Those who would enthrone materialism in America are sly and resourceful. They have at their command all of the tricks of perverted minds and wicked hearts. Against them must at all times be marshaled the full strength of the spiritual legions of America.

The most dangerous attack of materialism is that which is made under the guise of political or social reform. Proposals to transfer to bureaucratic agencies of government the direction of family life, the control of education, and the supervised care of individuals often have the poisonous germ of materialism.

One of the most deadening efforts of so-called social advances in recent years, not only in other parts of the world but even in our own country, has been the growing assumption that the chief aim of government should be the material welfare of the people.

No true Christian—no one who has in him a spark of charity or the slightest sense of justice—will dispute that the hungry should be fed; the naked clothed, and the sick and infirm cared for. These are corporal works of mercy which our Lord himself enjoined upon all men. And, in the complicated society of the modern world, the aid and assistance of government in the performance of these acts of mercy and justice are both necessary and, if properly administered, highly desirable. But the danger arises when the spiritual basis of social aid is ignored; or deliberately abandoned. That danger exists when the sponsors of particular projects, the administrators of government aid, the leaders, so-called, of social reform, are proclaimed agnostics, free thinkers, or people who consider that the mark of intellectual emancipation is disbelief in the reality of a divinely created human soul.

To such people, religion, the church, the integrity of the family, and the majesty of the individual man, are considered obstacles in the path of efficient materialists progress. When such people actually have the power of government there is the beginning of an atheistic state. We have witnessed in other parts of the world the ruinous consequences of this triumph of materialism—and we must be ever vigilant in America that a similar victory of the forces of evil does not happen here.

To the extent that materialism has been held at bay in our own country, much credit must be given to good citizens who have supported the work of courageous and outspoken societies such as our own.

Oftentimes in the past, the voices of America has first been heard in the Knights of Columbus. We have not hesitated to condemn the vice of atheism in the seats of foreign government. We have not hesitated to prod our own Government into action against alien doctrines of materialism. We have not been silent when insidious and destructive plans have been proposed within our own borders. This work must be continued. Many think that out of this World War will come a resurgence of spiritual forces. I hope so—for that certainly is one of the objectives for which good men go into battle. But we cannot assume that such a revival will be spontaneous. War brings fatigue—and fatigue begets unwariness. A tired world may want a rebirth of spirituality in government and institutions, but it may be too tired to reach for it. That is why the leadership of such societies as ours will be needed in the years ahead more than ever before.

Thus far I have discussed the mission of this great American organization in combatting intolerance and materialism. This is a mission of charity, and justice, and truth. It is a mission that must go in peace and war. It is a mission which we undertake because we want our country to lead in keeping light in the world.

But because we are a society of American citizens, and because love of country is a foundation stone of our fraternity, we are dedicated first and foremost, without reservation, and without hesitation, to the defense of our Nation in time of danger. In this critical hour all of our resources, the full strength of our joint endeavors, are irrevocably pledged to victory for our flag on the great fields where battle now rages.

Because we have taught our members, during the entire existence of our fraternity, the principles of American freedom, and the necessity for fighting to preserve that freedom, we are able to give to our country in this decisive struggle not only the aroused aid of patriotic citizens; but also the inexhaustible strength that comes from a profound conviction that the cause for which we fight is just.

To me the final proof of the value of the Knights of Columbus as an American institution is its stalwart stand in time of war. Our members need no prodding; they need no morale builders; no dispensers of propaganda. Every council of the society in every city of the land is immediately transformed into a corps of militant Americans.

I need not recall that in the early days of our fraternity there were those who looked askance upon us. It was thought in some quarters that this might be the beginning of some kind of mysterious clan of a religious group which would live within itself and apart from other Americans. But the record of the Knights of Columbus in the First World War dispelled for all time that early suspicion. To our great glory, official representatives of our organization went into every trench with the doughboys, and sailed the seas with our Navy. Where the fighting was, there they were. The only credential that was needed to receive our help was a uniform of the United States of America. And long after the war we kept faith with the men who had fought for America. Every cent of our war fund was turned into educational and recreational assistance for veterans.

Right here in Connecticut we conducted one of the most comprehensive educational projects the country ever has known. For more than 10 years after the last war we offered to every soldier and sailor who had an honorable discharge free education by correspondence in practically every subject in vocational and classical secondary curricula. We organized schools for regular instruction in every important metropolitan center of the country and we enlisted in this great post-war tribute to the fighting men of America the services of qualified scholars from colleges and universities. All this was done in grateful recognition of a nation's debt to its warriors.

In similar ways we shall remember all of the American men who fight for their country today.

There is a special bond between an organization like this and men who live and fight in battle units. The men on an aircraft carrier, the men in a company of infantry, men thrown together on an island outpost, become a fraternity, and know the strong ties of common effort and common sacrifice out of which brotherhood is born. We who have cherished that kind of unity, as we have gathered in our council halls throughout the years, developed an instinctive understanding of the soldiers' and the sailors' hearts. We can serve them and help them because we talk their language. We know their worries, and we apprehend their hopes. We shall not fail them in the years to come.

On an occasion like this, representing as it does the most solemn commemoration of our society, it is fitting that we should pay special tribute to our brothers now in the armed forces of their country. It is natural that we should hold them in special affection, and that we should feel proud of them as our own. Our council rooms and club houses are quieter and less spirited in their absence. The older members are carrying on; but we know now, more than ever before, that the verve and enthusiasm of our younger brothers is an indispensable element of strength for our fraternity.

But even though we miss them, we would not want them back until the last shot for victory had been fired—and because we have deemed them worthy of the obligations which membership in our society imposes, we know that they, themselves, will not ask to come back until they can bring to us and to their native land, the precious tokens of glorious triumph.

It is inspiring to picture where these fine young men of America may be at this moment, when we, their fathers, are assembled to observe the traditional ceremonies of Columbianism. One no doubt stands rigidly at watch as an American man-of-war plows steadily through the seas of night. Surely, as his eyes pierce the darkness and the solitude of a vast ocean, he finds strength and courage in the kind of Americanism that was strengthened in our circles. Another of these warriors is sweeping through the skies, intent upon his objective, intrepid in the dangers that surround him. He, too, must have greater insight and a fuller understanding of the high purpose for which he fights, because we helped to teach him the ideals of American freedom. Then there are those sturdy men of the land forces—some huddled together on new beachheads; others pushing forward to the Holy City of Rome, and others poised for the momentous onslaught against the European bulwarks of nazi-ism. In them, too, we are confident there is the firm resolve, the unflinching determination, to go ever forward for victory—victory for the kind of world we Americans want—victory for tolerance—victory for the spiritual uplifting of all mankind—victory for peace under God.

On land, on sea, and under the sea, and in the air—to these, our fighting sons and brothers—to all the sons of America who this night, and every night until the final triumphant hour is reached, stand embattled for their country's freedom, we send the salute of a proud and grateful nation.

To those brave men whose blood anoints the battlefields of liberty, and whose deaths forever sanctify the cause for which they fight, we consecrate the country they have loved. For them and their eternal salvation we send forth fervent prayers to Almighty God.

Isolationism—Foreign and Domestic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an outstanding address delivered by our colleague the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] at the opening of the National Wartime Conference, held at the Hotel Commodore, New York City, on June 2, 1944. The address is entitled "Isolationism—Foreign and Domestic."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the National Wartime Conference, and fellow citizens, it is a privilege to take part in this significant conference. I have listened with intense interest to the points of view set forth by the distinguished speakers who have already addressed you. The most significant feature of the conference, it seems to me, is that the workers in the so-called "learned professions," in the sciences, in the arts, and so-called "white-collar fields" generally, are realizing that they are but parts of a greater whole. This is indeed a promising sign, for the special knowledge and skills here represented will be needed in full measure in shaping both the post-war world and post-war America. If we, in our several capacities, are keenly aware of what is going on in the world around us, outside of the narrower sphere of our professional interests, the outlook for world peace, for national security, and for individual prosperity and happiness will certainly be brighter.

We are meeting at a time of storm when the flash and the thunder of modern warfare reaches into every home and into every heart in America. At this very moment the massed might of our armies is poised for what will be the greatest assault in all military history for the crushing blow planned to knock out the enemy and restore order to the war-ridden world.

Defeat of the enemy is, of course, our immediate objective, but beyond that we have another aim. That is to guarantee that neither Germany nor Japan nor any other aggressive nation or combination of nations will ever again attempt to dominate the world by force.

There are three ways in which we can attempt to bring this about and protect our Nation against future aggression.

One way is the way of complete isolation. This would require that we build up our armed might to such an extent that we would be confident no nation or combination of nations would dare attack us. It would mean transforming our country into an arsenal from behind the walls of which we might view the alarums and excursions of power-bent coalitions without fear for our ultimate safety. There are two important disadvantages in this method. First, it would be disastrously expensive. It would mean diverting a major share of our national resources to armaments and war machinery and saddling our people with a tax burden which is frightful to contemplate. But, more important than this, such a plan would not justify our confidence in this method as a guaranty of peace. Unbridled armament by any nation necessarily begets armament by other nations. It would only be a limited time until the disposition of national armed forces became such that another world conflict would be inevitable.

The second way is that of power alliances with other nations. Undoubtedly this would be a better method than the first, because it would not be necessary for America to bear the entire burden alone. Yet history teaches us that such alliances do not guarantee peace. Instead, they beget counteralliances which eventually set up a balance of power that cannot be resolved except by war. Moreover, history bears testimony to the impermanence and instability of such alliances. Secret treaties and double dealing have frustrated the purposes of the strongest coalitions. When a showdown comes, one or more of the so-called "allies" often turns up in the enemy camp.

No; if we are sincere in our desire for enduring peace, we cannot choose either of these costly and uncertain methods. Isolation will not do. Power politics will not do.

There is, however, a third way—a way that we as a Nation have never tried. When the world was sickened by fresh recollection of the last wholesale slaughter, other nations, however, did try this method. Unfortunately they failed. Whether or not their failure was due entirely to our unwillingness to participate in their effort, that unwillingness doubtless contributed greatly to that failure. It is not too much to say that any League of Nations or any similar organization for the promotion of peace—call it what you will—which does not number among its members the richest and strongest of the freedom-loving nations in the world is foredoomed to failure. Without the full moral and material cooperation of the United States of America there will always be an imponderable factor which will work to the disadvantage of the peace seekers and introduce just that element of doubt which will permit aggressors to gamble again for domination of the world.

A majority of the American people today recognize these facts. The American people are expecting from their leaders action. In response to the will of the people, both Houses of Congress have passed resolutions favoring post-war international collaboration with other nations for maintenance of peace.

It is therefore a source of satisfaction to us that under the leadership of our President our country has already traveled some distance along the path of international amity and cooperation. Long ago our good-neighbor policy toward our neighboring American republics began to bear fruit. Secretary of State Hull's program of reciprocal trade agreements bears witness to an enlightened and far-sighted foreign policy. Despite severe criticism, it was decided to enter into friendly relations with the Government of the Soviet Union, a policy which events have since proved was both fortunate and wise. More recently, both the military and political aims and strategy of this country and her leading allies have been taken up in joint conference at Moscow, Cairo, and Teheran, at which opposing points of view have been discussed frankly, compromises have been effected, and a program for realization of common aims has been evolved.

Post-war problems have also been taken up, not only with the leading allies already mentioned, but also with all our other allies. I refer especially to the epoch-making agreement of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, commonly known as U. N. R. R. A. Although this is a temporary relief organization, designed to provide the victims of Axis aggression with the basic necessities of life, yet it is an inspiring illustration of cooperation on the part of the 44 member governments. Having had a large part in the drafting of this international agreement, I was thrilled at the significance of the formal ceremony in the White House, when the representatives of these governments formally signed the agreement. The agreement is also significant in that it represented cooperation between the legislative and executive branches of our Government, since the Senate and House joined the President in providing the necessary funds called for in payment of our share of the expenses.

Similarly, an international conference on currency stabilization is about to be held for the purpose of establishing monetary policies which will help keep the world on a more even economic keel. Finally, only a few days ago, Secretary Hull announced that our Government is ready to begin informal discussions with Great Britain, Russia, and China on establishment of an international peace and security organization.

I said a majority of our countrymen approve these measures of international cooperation. There are, however, some who do not approve them.

First, there is a small but noisy minority whom we might call "the obstreperous isolationists." They are the America Firsters, the ranting, hating, 110-percent superpatriots who believe that America was made to rule the world, and that they were made to rule America. This element is in direct control of some powerful newspapers, and therefore they wield a greater influence than they are rightly entitled to. They are dangerous, because they would plunge America into a senseless course of empire abroad and exploitation at home. But fortunately their obstreperousness makes them easy to recognize, and as long as the public can be kept correctly informed about the issues it is not likely that they will succeed.

Secondly, there is another kind of isolationists who at the present time are more dangerous. These are the insidious isolationists. They are quite the opposite in all outward attributes from their more obstreperous coworkers. For one thing, they have better manners. They are less vocal—in fact, they are almost silence personified. They realize that isolationism is not in public favor, so they do not advocate it. Indeed, when forced to do so they may even give lip service to some kind of general international cooperation. On specific issues they will hedge, first skirting one side of the question, then the other, and ending up somewhere between the two. Some people say that isolationism is dead. That is not true. It is a fact that it is no longer popular. Few of those who cling to it do so openly. But some of those who were formerly outspoken isolationists are still determined, in one way or another, to block any program which will commit this country to active and effective cooperation in a world organization for securing the peace. They hope to succeed after this war as they succeeded after the First World War. These obstructionists, though they be few in number wield strong political influence. The candidate who would have their support must appease them at the same time that he throws out phrases calculated to win the public. The result, when analyzed, is nothing but double talk. We in Washington hear so much of it that I want to warn you against it.

The nature and extent of our international commitments to insure world peace will be the primary issue to be decided by the people and Congress during the next year. The decision we reach must be forthright, clear-cut; the methods we adopt must be practical, and such as to secure results: for only insofar as it contributes to the future peace of the world can this war have any real meaning. The men who are doing the fighting and dying in this war do not want, and do not deserve, weasel words or high-flown sentiments devoid of substantial content. There is nothing equivocal about the sacrifices being demanded of them. There is nothing equivocal about the way they are making these sacrifices. These men do not want equivocation from those upon whom the responsibility for the Nation's future policy will rest.

There are in our fighting forces today men who fought in the bloody conflict that came to an end in 1918, "the war to end wars." These men remember the pattern of evasion, double talk, and political chicanery resorted to after the last war by the opponents of international cooperation. There are also in the present conflict sons of those men to whom the wedding of caution and evasion was a revolting spectacle. These younger men witnessed the birth of the offspring of that wedding, umbrella diplomacy, appeasement, Munichism. They saw the misbegotten brat grow and become strong on a diet of indecision and vacillation, and finally they saw the monster strut forth and plunge the world into the holocaust in which they are now giving their lives.

These men do not want to see a repetition of such fatal mistakes. They will recognize for what they really are hesitation, equivocation, lack of frankness in framing foreign policy. They are the seeds of new wars planted in the torn earth of the present conflict.

There are also long memories among our allies. Well do they remember our desertion of the cause of peace after the last World War. It is only natural, perhaps, that among them there should still be doubts concerning the extent to which we are prepared to go to maintain peace after this war is won. Recent evidences of our desire and intention to cooperate fully have done much to dispel such doubts. If we should back track, change our policy, or modify it so as to restrict with qualifications and reservations our collaboration, these doubts would again assert themselves. In that case those nations would have no other choice than again to seek such means of national and world security as they think they can achieve without our participation.

It is not only our allies who will be watching with deep concern the forthcoming debates and discussions in Congress, in convention halls, and on the stump regarding our foreign policies. We can rest assured that the rulers of Germany and Japan and their satellites will also be keenly interested.

Our enemies now realize that their dreams of present conquest are not going to materialize out of the present struggle. The war machines which they turned loose upon the world and which overran a large part of two continents have at last been stopped dead and are now being hurled back along every front on which they are engaged. It is only a question of time before they will go down in utter defeat before the combined might of the United Nations' forces. Hitler and Hirohito know this, and the predatory groups they serve know it, too. But they are shrewd men, and the fact that there is no chance of victory for them now does not necessarily mean that all their hopes are shattered. Let them have the kind of peace that followed the last war and the kind of disunity that wrecked the League of Nations, and eventually they or their successors will again embark upon a third attempt to subjugate the world. Yes—the ears of Berlin and Tokio will be listening very carefully to what our leaders and our people say during the next year about international collaboration.

I have been interested to note how some writers, especially newspaper columnists, and some speakers, especially radio commentators, draw a definite line of distinction between American foreign policies and American domestic policies. It seems to me that they are closely related, and that the alignment of forces on both foreign and domestic policies shows a striking similarity. For example, those who oppose effective collaboration with our allies in international affairs through some association of nations, usually oppose also effective collaboration between the States of the Union in domestic affairs through the Congress. In both cases they advocate isolationism.

Everyone agrees that it will be highly desirable for us as a Nation to maintain our present high levels of employment and production after the war. Unless we achieve something like success in this we must look for another depression and all of its miserable consequences. If we succeed in keeping people on the job we shall experience a level of prosperity beyond anything even dreamed of by previous generations. To do this, however, will require national planning and some national financing. An all-out economic effort—which is what will be required—can no more be carried on without centralized planning and credit than can an all-out military effort.

Yet the exponents of isolationism between States will have none of this. They prefer to have each State find its own way out of the economic tangle which will be left as soon as war production ceases. Although they place great store by "States' rights," they have little to say about human rights. They set up a straw man called Federal encroachment, and claim that it is destroying State autonomy and undermining the moral fiber of the people by such insidious devices as grants-in-aid to States for needed public works, for health services, and for aid to dependent children, the aged, and the blind.

This economic tangle faces all the States of the Union and all the nations of the world It is largely the product of the machine age. The war has temporarily sidetracked the question, but after the war it will be back with us again. The question of what we are going to do with the men no longer needed because of the development of the machine will be no longer merely an academic one to be discussed in the classroom by college professors. It will be a practical one put to us every day by hungry men and women out of work and out of money and whose hope of relief is almost dead. If that hope should die, how tragic would be its funeral. Millions of poverty-stricken in this the richest country in the world, millions of economic slaves in this the land of the free, millions of hopeless in this the promised land would file by in the funeral procession. No tradition of the past, no appeal to moderation or to reason might hold in check an attack on our social and economic system or even on our form of government. Men crying for bread for themselves or their families do not stop to discuss economic systems and forms of government. They take what they can get, destroying everything which stands in their way.

Machinery made possible much greater production with less human labor and in less time. This meant great savings in the cost of production and consequently greater profits. By far the greater share of these profits was taken by the capitalists who furnished this investment. A moderate share was given the consumer in the form of reduced prices and a very small share was paid over to those who furnished the labor or skill.

Whatever the exact figures may be, no one can deny that there has been a very great increase in wealth and also in the disparity between the very rich and the very poor. Almost all our attention has been given to the production of wealth and very little to its fair distribution. The great capitalists have overreached themselves in their efforts. They have not only by the application of economic laws but also by the manipulation of man-made laws added to their colossal fortunes. No one begrudges them their wealth except to the extent that it was accumulated at the expense of their fellow men. But now, if the game is to go on, the rules must be made fairer so as to give the ordinary consuming citizen a better chance. Efforts of those who make and of those who administer our laws should be directed primarily to a modification of the capitalistic system rather than to a restoration and retention of this system unchanged. Those who would undo what has already been accomplished by those efforts, and those who would oppose any extension of those efforts, are essentially advocates of isolationism at home, just as those who oppose collaboration between the nations are isolationists abroad.

Just as a policy of international laissez-faire results in international anarchy and war, so a policy of laissez-faire here at home results in unemployment, class strife, and economic chaos.

During the past 10 or 12 years the Federal Congress has enacted many laws which were absolutely necessary to maintain and raise the standard of living of the vast majority of the American people. Those who make a fetish of States' rights label these laws "Government interference" and claim that they "regiment" the people whom they are designed to benefit.

To say that this country should avoid forthright international commitments is to invite international power politics and the rise of totalitarian rule on the international scene. Likewise, to say that the Federal Government should not exert itself to protect the basic human rights of its citizens is to invite power politics and rule by the few on the domestic scene. It is worth while noting again that those who would thus leave the way open for totalitarianism either here or abroad are, on the whole, the same groups.

Furthermore, it is hard to argue with the members of these groups, because lack of logic does not interfere with the vehemence of their argument. For example, the same groups who complain most bitterly of red tape in domestic wartime regulations have succeeded in fashioning a tremendous quantity of red tape with which to prevent our soldiers from voting in the coming national election. When Senator LUCAS and I introduced the Federal soldiers' vote bill, they succeeded in encumbering it with so many technicalities and so much red tape that relatively few soldiers will be able to cast a ballot in November. To these people, red tape is reprehensible if restricting their freedom of action, but acceptable if it can be stuffed down our citizen-soldiers' throats.

But let us not despair because of these isolationists—foreign and domestic. Gatherings such as this increase our confidence in an enduring peace and a prosperous America, a confidence which must be no less intense than our belief in an immediate victory. We must have a clear-cut, far-seeing foreign policy directed toward strengthening and deepening of the coalition of the United Nations to provide the basis for a stable and democratic world, ruled not by power-politics but by genuine collaboration of all nations, and especially of the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and China.

We must also have a similar domestic policy. The permanent conversion of swords into plow shares has been a vision of mankind for many centuries. The conversion of our modern instruments of warfare, of radar and similar electronic devices, of aircraft, and so forth, from instruments of war to instruments of peace, can and should raise the standard of living for all our people. In doing this, nothing is more important than unity here at home. Selfishness, class interests, and partisan politics must be subordinated to the Nation's over-all welfare.

But a peaceful and prosperous post-war world will not spring full-grown out of our minds; it must be planned for and worked for. Labor, capital, and the professions must all have an equal part in this planning. They must learn how to work together to solve the many difficult problems which will perplex us, but they must do this within the framework of international and national unity.

Let us not after victory is won forget the lessons we have learned in the bitterness of battle! Let us keep before us the memory of the men we have lost, and the reasons why we had to lose them! We can discharge our debt to them only if we provide now the groundwork for plans which will insure prompt and united action against every form of aggression, foreign or domestic. Then they will not have died in vain.

The Second Largest Bank in the United States Views Morgenthau's Monetary Stabilization Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 3, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, ever since National Bank paper currency was invented in the emergency of the Civil War and used to replace hard money to increase the control of money and the interest yield of the issuing banks, our financiers have tried one experiment after another in their effort to make their kind of currency perform the money functions of this country and at the same time preserve their money-creating privilege with disastrous consequence to business and the American people. First they procured the demonetization of silver and then gold and now when the world is staggering under the greatest debt load ever known these financiers would have us abandon every principle of sound money and try a new financial experiment in an effort to supply the money function and tighten their control of money and credit while they retain their precious interest yield to be wrung from the business of a world already loaded down with an unbearable interest burden.

Their latest money-control plan is analyzed in the monthly bulletin of the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York inserted herewith for the information of my colleagues:

A NEW CURRENCY STABILIZATION PLAN

A revised program for world currency stabilization has been drawn up by experts representing about 30 Allied and Associated Nations, and the terms of the proposal have been made public by the several governments. President Roosevelt announced on May 26 that the plan will be discussed at an international conference to be held in this country, beginning July 1, with 41 nations participating.

The new proposal is obviously an outgrowth of the plans made public last year by the British and United States Governments (the so-called Keynes and White plans) and the program later proposed by Canada. In general it follows the lines of the original American program, providing for an international fund rather than a clearing union, and places strong emphasis on gold as a standard of value and a means of payment.

In some respects the revised plan is less ambitious and more flexible than its predecessors. Besides being based on a more explicit recognition of gold as the only acceptable measure of stability, it omits the unnecessary and complicating feature of the international currency—the "unitas" or the "bancor." It provides that any member of the proposed international fund may withdraw at will. It would permit members to determine the post-war gold values of their respective currencies, subject to the approval of the fund, and would allow subsequent revaluation, within limits, in the light of unforeseen developments. It designates the early post-war years as a transition period and otherwise takes account of the extremely unsettled conditions that will necessarily exist in the international monetary field for some time after the war. It contains no provision for outright loans by the fund and specifically forbids the use of the fund's resources to meet large or sustained outflows of capital.

NATURE OF THE PROPOSAL

The proposed fund would amount to $8,000,000,000 if all the United and Associated Nations were members, or $10,000,000,000 if all nations participated. The basis on which the quotas, or contributions, of the various members would be determined is not specified; but it appears that the amounts would depend partly on the proportion of each country's trade to world trade, partly on gold holdings and partly on gold production. Under such a formula the United States would apparently contribute between two and one-half and two and three-fourths billion dollars, Great Britain about one and one-fourth billion dollars, Russia about one billion dollars, and other countries small amounts. One-fourth of each member's quota would be payable in gold, unless that amount were equal to more than 10 percent of the member's holdings of gold and gold-convertible exchange, in which case the gold contribution would be fixed at the 10-percent figure. Members would deal with the fund only through their treasuries, central banks, stabilization funds, or other fiscal agencies.

The fund would be governed by a board on which each member would be represented and by an executive committee of at least nine members, including the representatives of the five countries with the largest quotas. The distribution of voting power is not stated, except that it would be closely related to the quotas and that in no event would the United States have fewer votes than the British Empire. All questions would be settled by majority vote, except changes in quotas, which would require a four-fifths vote (including the consent of any member whose quota was increased), and uniform changes in the gold values of member currencies, which would require the consent of every member having 10 percent or more of the total amount of the quotas.

PARITY OF CURRENCIES

The par value of each member's currency would be expressed in terms of gold and would be agreed upon when the country was admitted to membership. All transactions with the fund would be at par, subject to a certain fixed charge, and all transactions in member currencies would be within an agreed percentage of parity. No change in the par value of any member's currency could be made by the fund without the member's approval, except the agreed uniform change in gold value, mentioned above, which would require the approval of every member that had contributed 10 percent or more of the total amount of the quotas.

A member would be allowed to change the established parity of its currency by as much as 10 percent, but no further change could be made without the approval of the fund. The fund would be required, however, to approve a requested change that was essential to the correction of a "fundamental disequilibrium," to take into consideration the "extreme uncertainties" prevailing at the time the initial parities were agreed upon, and not to reject a requested change because of domestic social or political policies within a country.

Members would agree not to carry on or permit transactions in gold or in other member currencies except within a prescribed range above and below the established parities. They would also agree not to impose restrictions on exchange transactions with other members (except those involving capital transfers and the apportionment of scarce currencies) or to engage in discriminatory arrangements or multiple-currency practices (such as the bilateral clearing agreements and the blocked marks of the pre-war period) without the approval of the fund. These agreements would be subject to the recognition of the early post-war years as a transition period during which members could temporarily retain existing restrictions not consistent with the long-term purposes of the fund.

The primary purpose of the fund, apparently, would be to facilitate current rather than capital transactions. Members would be allowed, however, to use the resources of the fund for capital transactions of "reasonable" amount, required for the expansion of exports or in the "ordinary course" of trade, banking, or other business.

OPERATION OF THE FUND

Members would be entitled to buy from the fund the currencies of other members subject to certain conditions and limitations. One condition would be that the currency demanded was needed for making payments consistent with the purposes of the fund. If the fund's holdings of the currency demanded had become scarce (that is, if the member whose currency was demanded had accumulated an unduly large credit balance of international payments over a period of time), the scarce currency would be subject to apportionment by the fund, and members would be authorized to restrict the freedom of exchange operations in the scarce currency and to ration the supply among their nationals at their own discretion. At the same time the fund would issue a report setting forth the causes of the scarcity and recommending steps to bring it to an end.

If, on the other hand, the fund's holdings of the currency offered were too large, or were increasing too rapidly (that is, if the member offering its currency had been running an unduly large debit balance of international payments), then that member would not be entitled to buy the currencies of other members. A member found to be making improper use of the fund's resources could be suspended from further dealings with the fund.

The fund could, in its discretion and on terms that safeguarded its interests, waive any of these conditions.

Operations on the fund's account would be limited to transactions for the purpose of supplying member countries, on the latter's initiative, with other members' currencies in exchange for their own currencies or for gold, with the important exception that the fund would be entitled, at its own option, in order to prevent a member's currency from becoming scarce, to borrow such currency or offer gold in exchange for it; or a member could sell gold to the fund in exchange for its own currency. The fund could also acquire gold by requiring members holding gold and exchange in excess of their quotas to pay for half of their net purchases of exchange with gold, and by requiring members whose holdings of gold and exchange had increased, to sell half of the increase to the fund in exchange for their own currencies, provided this did not unduly reduce the fund's holdings of the members' currencies or the members' holdings of gold and exchange.

A member entitled to buy another member's currency from the fund in exchange for its own would have to be prepared to sell such currency, or gold, to that member in exchange for its own currency, unless the other member's currency had been placed under the restrictions permitted in connection with capital transfers and apportionment of scarce currencies, or unless such currency had been acquired during the transition period before the removal of restrictions on multilateral clearing.

A member desiring to obtain the currency of another for gold would be expected to obtain it from the fund, provided it could do so with equal advantage. This rule, however, would not affect the right of gold-producing countries to sell newly mined gold in any market.

DANGEROUS FEATURES

The revisions that have limited the scope of the plan have made it less dangerous than the original proposals, but they have not made it an effective instrument for the promotion of currency stability. No international organization with anything short of dictatorial powers could achieve that aim. Stability in any country comes not from without but from within. It is a result of balanced budgets, sensible tariffs, and sound monetary and credit practices. As long as nations retain their sovereignty, the stability of their currencies must depend on their ability and willingness to keep their own financial houses in order, not on the artificial freezing of exchange rates or the operations of an international fund. The most that any international body could do in this direction would be to encourage its individual members to follow sound policies at home.

A fund of the type that is proposed would find itself in a position somewhat similar to that of a price-control agency attempting to maintain a certain price level without any assurance of support from fiscal measures calculated to equalize supply and demand at that level. Even with such support, plus autocratic powers, large enforcement staffs, and the patriotic fervor of wartime, price-control authorities in most countries have found the temporary stabilization of price levels a difficult task and have been forced to invoke the aid of subsidies. An international fund with only very limited powers of compulsion would find the task of permanent currency stabilization impossible without the voluntary cooperation of its members. With such cooperation, the problem would solve itself, and no fund would be required.

The entire plan, therefore, is a case of misplaced emphasis. It represents an attempt to operate at the level of effect, not of cause; to treat the symptoms, not the disease.

Such reassurance as might otherwise be drawn from the apparent emphasis placed on gold in the plan is reduced by the tendency on the part of some of its sponsors to belittle this feature. Lord Keynes, author of the original British plan, is reported to have expressed the opinion recently that the revised proposal represents the exact opposite of a return to the gold standard.

THE PENALTY OF FAILURE

As long as members retained the right to withdraw from the fund at any time, it might appear to a superficial view that the project, however experimental and uncertain in its outcome, could do no serious harm. Experience with other unsuccessful ventures gives little support to this view. The false sense of security, the unwillingness to admit failure, the fear of stigma from premature withdrawal, the throwing of good money after bad in the effort to avoid loss—these and other factors tend to perpetuate discredited institutions and to prolong the pretense of success long after failure should have become apparent. It is safe to assume that, if the nations of the world embark upon a scheme of currency stabilization, and if the scheme fails, the last state of those nations will be worse than the first. If the experiment does not offer strong prospects of success, it had much better not be tried.

The central problem in world currency stabilization is not to hold exchange rates in line by direct control but to remove the causes of instability. This can be done only by inducing the individual nations—and particularly the leading commercial nations, to balance their budgets, promote the stability and prosperity of their internal economies, and avoid such harmful devices as competitive currency depreciation, prohibitive tariffs, and trade and exchange restrictions. It is possible that cooperative action, as by the creation of a permanent international consultative body, the dedication of some existing organization to that aim, or even the negotiation of a multilateral agreement, might aid in the achievement of such a goal. But, whether by agreement or individually, the nations whose stability is essential to the world's economic welfare must attain that stability by the simple but perhaps arduous course of avoiding the practices that have destroyed it.

GOLD STANDARD PREFERABLE

No single step would go so far toward the world-wide restoration of confidence and the removal of the inducements to unsound practices as the return of the principal nations to the gold standard as promptly as possible after the war. Because of the very uneven distribution of the world's gold, it might be necessary for some nations to resort to the gold exchange standard, tying their currencies to those with strong gold backing. This first step should be followed by the adoption of policies designed to promote the redistribution of gold—a course that would obviously require the full cooperation of the United States.

These steps would not achieve the millennium, but they would lay the firmest possible foundation for future stability and prosperity. If they can be promoted by cooperative action, then such action should be taken. But cooperation that is intended to provide substitutes for soundness is doomed to failure.

Meaning of the Recent Primary Elections

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a most interesting address delivered by Dr. Frank Kingdon, over Station WMCA, on May 10, 1944, in which he discussed the meaning of the recent primary elections held in various States.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The same political winds that blew away a lot of fog and gossip in the Democratic primaries of Florida and Alabama have swept other primaries today. Rush Holt, the former baby Senator who wandered into the ranks of the conservatives and the isolationists during his term of office, was decisively beaten in the West Virginia polls as he attempted a political come-back. Frank Lausche, mayor of Cleveland and a consistent supporter of President Roosevelt, who ran an independent campaign without the support of even his home county organization, but with the support of organized labor, captured the Democratic nomination for Governor in Ohio.

Let nobody mistake these signs. They mean that there is a strong and effective progressive opinion in all parts of the Nation that will make itself felt decisively in the coming election. The most misleading diagnosis of popular opinion in this generation is the one to which we have been submitted in recent months. We have been told that there is a swing to reaction, that people are tired of the social policies of this administration, that the President has lost his grip upon the people, and that we are sure to see a swing to the right in politics this fall. This has been based on the fact that the newspapers and the radio are predominantly conservative, and their opinions are taken to represent their readers and listeners. The truth is that these organs of information and opinion are generally in the hands of entrenched economic groups, and they speak for the opinions of these groups and not those of the rank and file of our people. There is a deep realization among the masses of the benefits, both economic and social, that they have gained in the past 12 years, and, if these are threatened, the people will rise to defeat any candidate or party that tries to take them away or to weaken them. This has been registered in the past 10 days in States as diverse as Florida, Alabama, West Virginia, and Ohio. And Texas seems to be rolling up its sleeves to put on its own demonstration.

If political observers are hunting for a trend, I submit that they have it in the one that is setting the course for the Democratic Party. It points to a vigorus and courageous espousal of the social policies of the Roosevelt adiministration. I think that we have to recognize that this situation arises out of more than surface politics. There are two social philosophies that are in conflict in our country, and the decisive result of this year's election will be the choice between them. Just now the hero of those who believe in the underlying philosophy that is opposed to that of Franklin Roosevelt, is Sewell Avery, the president of Montgomery Ward, who is fighting our present labor policy with all the force and venom of which he is capable. I want, therefore, to bring to you a statement of his. I do this, not because I think it is an unusual damning one, but because it expresses a basic point of view. I take it from the Chicago Sun, which says: "On March 2, 1944, Avery attacked the pholosophy that the chief responsibility of business after the war is to provide jobs for everyone." Now here is a direct quotation of his words, and I hope that you will listen to them carefully. He said: "A corporation's efficiency is indicated by the number of men it can release from a job, not by the number of men hired." That is a revealing sentence because it puts into a few words the reactionary idea that a business exists to exploit its workers.

Its only aim is all the profit possible, and so, if it can make more profit by throwing people out of work, that is its policy. The operation of an industry is aimed, according to Mr. Avery, at the one annual meeting of the stockholders.

If the president of the company can arise on that occasion and say: "I am happy to report that we have made more money this year than we have ever made," then it has been a good year, even though some stockholder should rise to ask: "How have we been able to do it?" and the company president should reply: "By cutting down employment." If some thoughtful second stockholder should say: "What has become of the men and women we have fired?" Mr. Avery would say: "We are sorry for them, but they are none of our business. Our corporation proves its efficiency by the number of people it can throw out of work." It is little wonder that such a man finds himself at odds with our present social policies, for they are directed at giving the workers protection against this kind of cold-blooded thinking. The President's social philosophy is based on the idea that society and industry have a responsibility for the people, and that, therefore, workers have a right to share in industrial gains. In technological means can be found for doing a certain amount of work in a shorter time, the workers should share in the saving by having to work shorter hours. If a given number of employees can produce higher profits, the workers should share in the extra money by getting higher wages. Moreover, part of the earnings of the company, as well as savings of the employees, should be set aside for insurance against old age, unemployment, and sickness. It does not take a genius to see the fundamental conflict between these two approaches to industry and human relations within it.

It is the conflict which underlies all the bitterness of the current debate about our domestic policies. And it is what colors the whole Montgomery Ward incident. Mr. Avery is protecting a corporation, that is, the profits of the stockholders who own it, while the Government is insisting on protection for the workers also. In spite of the decisive victory of the C. I. O. in the collective bargaining election yesterday, Mr. Avery is still breathing fire and brimstone, and announcing that he will not submit to the maintenance of membership clause which the War Labor Board orders into all union contracts. Accordingly, the War Labor Board has had to announce today that it is forwarding to the White House for the President's action the dispute at the Hummer Manufacturing Co., in Springfield, Ill., a subsidiary of the Montgomery Ward Co. It has also decreed that a maintenance of membership clause shall be inserted in the collective-bargaining agreement involving the Montgomery Ward plant in St. Paul, Minn. Mr. Avery is bringing the old charge that maintenance of membership means a closed shop. It means nothing of the kind. It simply means that all the present members of the union who want to resign from it must do so within 15 days, or else stay in for the term of the contract. There is no compulsion. Anyone can get out of the union within that time, and nobody can be compelled to join it. The fact of the matter is that Mr. Avery is the old-style type of employer who wants to run his business in the old way, with the right to fix wages and to hire and fire as he alone chooses. This is the issue, and no legal legerdemain or sensational posturing can hide it. We have to reduce cases like this to their simplest terms or else we get so heated over incidental aspects that we miss the main point. Because I believe that the rank and file of our people brush aside the complications and think of the true issue in such cases, I have no fear of how they will size it up.

Before I close, I want to remind you that this is an anniversary that I hope we shall never forget. The Nazi burning of the books took place on May 10, 1933. This was the overt defiance of humanism by nihilism. It disclosed in one eerie scene the true nature of nazi-ism. The men who stood around that fire and stoked its flames with the books of the most enlightened minds of humanity stood revealed as priests of the irrational. They were denying the reason. They were announcing for themselves the abdication of the mind through the assassination of the word. They were declaring that men exist only to be manipulated for the ends of power. They were disclosing that they knew that their great enemy was the intelligence, and they were symbolically reducing it to ashes. The very extravagance of the gesture was the projection of their fear, for even those who deny the reason know in their hearts that it is greater than they and will ultimately return upon them like a consuming fire. They had already mobilized the millions of their countrymen into the goose-stepping ranks of faceless men. They hoped to make them also mindless men. But their very symbolic act was its own condemnation, for they were doing nothing but to destroy, and the mission of falsehood is to destroy. It is truth that makes alive. But it is also the truth that makes men free, and they hoped to put truth to flight so that men might accept their chains. The fire was too small, though it raged from one end of the country to the other. All such fires are too small. They cannot reach out to kill the beating heart and the questioning brain. When such fires are kindled, history has its own way of forgetting the men who laid the torch and remembering only those who were seemingly destroyed.

Nobody knows the name of the man who poured the cup of hemlock, but all men know the name of Socrates. The hand that hammered the nails into the cross belonged to one of whom memory has no record, but the Man on the cross moves tangibly in all the circling years. The men who burned the books will be the forgotten. The men who wrote them are the remembered—the immortals. It was a little fire to destroy books. It has become a great fire to destroy humanity. The fire will die. Humanity will live. One thing outlines all the bonfires of tyranny—the daylight of freedom—and men will live and work and love in that.

The New Monetary Stabilization Proposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, on June 1 I delivered a radio address over radio stations in Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Philadelphia, dealing with the new monetary stabilization proposal. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On April 21, 1944, the Treasury Department released the latest version of the new monetary stabilization proposal which had been developed by the financial technicians of the United Nations. In effect it provides for a world-wide return to the gold bullion standard. A monetary conference of the representatives of the United Nations has been called to meet on July 1 to study and consider its far-reaching and involved provisions.

For the convenience and benefit of member countries it is planned to set up a fund aggregating eight or ten billion dollars for the stabilization of currencies and the promotion of foreign trade. Under the plan the subscriptions to be made by member countries would be on the basis of 25 percent in gold and 75 percent in paper currencies. No new monetary unit is to be introduced and all currencies are to be valued in terms of gold.

Too it is desirable that nations enjoying a favorable credit balance in international payments consult with nations whose equilibrium has been temporarily disturbed. Therefore if the currencies of member countries get out of balance and are under pressure, relief may be sought through international consultation.

Also if currencies of certain countries should become scarce, authority within certain limitations will be given to correct the acute situation. The fund retains foreign exchange controls and the power to alter parity values up to 10 percent of member countries' currencies. It cannot be expected, of course, that foreign exchanges could be stabilized over a long period of time unless the fund has enormous resources.

No one can prophesy with accuracy whether the aggregate contributions will be sufficient. But assuming that 8 or 10 billion dollars will be adequate and that 25 percent of the fund's contributions are comprised of gold, it is conceivable that with honest and efficient management the plan might be successful. The plan would be particularly helpful to a nation with an adverse balance of payments since such a nation might receive aid from the fund without having to part with its gold. In such event the fund could increase its holdings of that nation's currency up to a maximum of 200 percent of its quota. Beyond that point the fund could not be of assistance to the distressed member nation. The nation with such an adverse balance would then have to call upon its gold reserve in order to maintain its position as a member of the fund.

It is probable that the latest version of the plan will not be entirely acceptable to Great Britain as it is not regarded as sufficiently flexible to permit that country to profit sufficiently from fluctuations in the exchange values of other currencies and other devices resorted to by her in the past to offset her large import balance. Great Britain's unfavorable trade balance after the war will be a constant challenge to the fund's ability to function equitably and advantageously to debtor and creditor nations. If her exports, foreign investments, and maritime revenues continue to be insufficient to meet her import demands, and her credit with the fund becomes depleted, it will necessary (after exhausting the other means provided) either to raise the exchange value of the pound, deposit more gold, or raise the price of gold.

While the plan does not contemplate ending the restrictions of capital movements immediately following the war, such restrictions are temporarily imposed subject to the efforts of member countries to gradually relax them. All foreign-exchange restrictions would be gradually eliminated, and thus one of the obstacles to the free flow of foreign trade and capital movements would be removed.

The members agree to prevent the use of the fund's resources to finance a large flow of capital out of a country. There appears, therefore, to be no ground for apprehension with regard to losing gold now owned by the United States. On the contrary, it is more likely that additional gold will flow to the United States through the fund. Our export balance will more likely increase than diminish in the post-war period. If so, it is probable that gold will continue to be more acceptable in the settlement of our trade balances than the currencies of other nations.

I want to urge with all the force at my command that the plan should include silver along with gold in order to be more acceptable to many countries in the Western Hemisphere, Asia, and other parts of the world. Such a provision would enable countries that have insufficient gold to utilize silver in the payment of their subscriptions, in the settlement of trade balances, and in providing currency backing and coinage. The fund should be in a position to supply whatever amount of silver is desired by member countries.

Believe it or not, the demonetization of gold is more complete than the demonetization of silver. Theoretically, the United States and other nations utilize gold as backing for paper currencies, but gold has been denied its right as a circulating medium of exchange. Silver, on the other hand, circulates widely as coinage throughout the world, and reserves are maintained and used not only in the United States but in other countries as well. If a proper world price were supported by the fund, silver would prove just as useful to all of the member countries in accomplishing the splendid objectives of the plan as would gold.

It cannot be disputed that the United States is in a position to maintain the supremacy of the dollar; and to peg and maintain the price of both gold and silver at appropriate levels throughout the world by offering freely to buy and sell these metals at fixed prices. England has proved that it can be done. England established and maintained the supremacy of the pound sterling in relation to gold from 1816 to 1910 by offering to buy or sell gold at any time or place at a price of $20.67 per fine ounce.

Silver is used more generally as currency through the world today than gold and its use will no doubt increase in the post-war period. The fund would render a greater service to world trade and the rehabilitation and relief of oppresesd peoples everywhere if it provided additional buying power abroad to the nations which possess and are dependent upon silver for their money at home. There has been entirely too little consideration given to the utilization of silver as a money metal. The subject has been dealt with impulsively, especially by the advocates of managed currency and opponents of metallic money and by some nations that produce little or no silver. A managed currrency is nothing more than printing-press money, and printing-press money can never mean security for the country whose fate rests in unfriendly hands; whereas the precious metals, gold and silver, provide adequate backing in the form of intrinsic value. Have-not nations cannot participate in international trade without heavy discounts to cover whatever risks are involved unless they are on a metallic standard.

It seems to me that the proponents of establishing a system for the management of currencies on a paper basis are trying to hasten the day of an economic millennium. Perhaps their motive should not be questioned, but they are not dealing realistically with conditions as they exist. They would have us believe that the man on the street has implicit confidence in their ability to devise and manage a system of establishing values for the transaction of domestic business and foreign trade. Civilization is still in its infancy, but is sufficiently matured to realize the frailties of humanity and to sense the insecurity that inevitably results from the inability of strong nations to deal fairly with the weaker.

I heartily approve the objectives of the proposals made by the Secretary of the Treasury, but in my judgment the conference scheduled to convene on July 1 will do well to revise some of the provisions in the proposed plan before the President may expect the Congress of the United States to ratify it. It will be a tragic mistake if the Congress is bypassed by this conference. Congress alone is entrusted with the constitutional power to coin money and the constitutional power to regulate the value thereof.

Address of Representative Albert Gore, of Tennessee, Before Young Democratic Club of Pennsylvania

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able and challenging address which the Honorable ALBERT GORE, Representative from the Fourth District of Tennessee, delivered before the Young Democratic Club of Pennsylvania at its State convention at Harrisburg, Pa., on May 24, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is both an honor and a privilege to address this assemblage of Pennsylvania Democrats. I am glad, indeed, to have the opportunity to lend my voice to the cause of the Democratic Party in a State where you have a struggle to overcome the stand-pattism of the Republican Party. From where I come we have but little trouble in beating the Republicans. I must confess, however, that we do sometimes have a hell of a time beating each other.

In some ways it may be quite unfortunate that the time for a national election comes when we are involved in a great war—indeed, in the very midst of the greatest military effort the world has ever known. In such a crisis perhaps no other great nation would risk the internal strife and political disunity inevitable in a national election.

But, on the other hand, an election in 1944 offers, if not unprecedented, at least far-reaching opportunities to the American people. For one thing, it gives to the United States of America a chance to prove to the world the efficacy of self-government under the most trying circumstances. The fact that we can undergo the rigors of a Presidential and national legislative election preserving our essential constitutional processes and, at the same time, cast our mighty force against the enemy constitutes the best and most concrete evidence that free men can govern themselves even in the severest of crises.

Another thing—an election this year will afford the American people an opportunity to make some fundamental decisions in the most Democratic way at the ballot box on the conduct of the war and the course of our foreign policy. I think it may be singularly fortunate that these decisions can be made by the people, not after the immediate danger has passed, as was the case in 1920, but while the cruel necessities and the awful price of war are yet upon us.

In this critical time each political party has a serious responsibility of offering to the people the one man within each party who is best qualified for the tremendous job of national leadership as President and as Commander in Chief of the armed forces. Failure to do this would constitute a serious indictment against the two-party system. For any man to refuse such a call would be to shirk the call of duty.

Make no mistake about it. An election in wartime is deadly serious business. Perhaps no decision rendered by the popular franchise has ever been fraught with so much meaning as will be the case next November. The length of the war and the course of the coming peace may well rest upon that decision. Being fully conscious of this, it is my guess that the American people will take the measure of each party and each party's standard bearer more meticulously and more nonpartisanly than ever before in our history.

THE YARDSTICK OF FITNESS FOR THE JOB

By what standard will the American people measure the candidates and the parties? By the yardstick of fitness for the job. Instead of 3 feet I think this yardstick of fitness for the job will have three questions.

The first and paramount question which most free men and women of America will ask when they take free ballots in their hands on election day will be: "Who is best qualified to lead us to victory?"

The next question, and truly second only to the first, will be: "Who is best qualified to sit as the American leader in the councils of the world's great to formulate a lasting peace?"

The third question, for those few who have not determined their choice by answering for themselves the first two, will be: "What party and what leader can we best trust to handle the complicated domestic problems both during and immediately after the war?"

I would like to stand this yardstick of fitness beside the two men who are already the obvious choices of their respective parties as condidates for President—Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, of New York, and President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In measuring Governor Dewey with the yardstick of fitness for the job of national leadership in this hour of crisis, I do not mean, of course, to use such superficial standards as age or physical stature. In the realm of statesmanship, which he seeks to enter, those are not standards at all. For a wartime President, the American people are altogether interested in another kind of stature—the stature of statesmanship. The units of measure on this yardstick, therefore, will not be inches nor feet nor even years. It is rather a measure of intellectual, moral, and spiritual height, of vision and understanding, of foresight in the realm of international affairs, of ability to foresee pitfalls for America as well as opportunities. I think it was this kind of measurement that one of my good Tennessee constituents must have had in mind when he gave me his own peculiar appraisal of Governor Dewey. He was a farmer and he had that typically Tennessee salty habit of speaking in the language of his own world of soil, animals, and hills. "It's never a good idea," he said, "to change horses in the middle of the stream. But if I ever come to that pass where I've got to consider doing it, I will sure draw the line at changing to a Shetland pony."

This was not a reference to physical dimensions but it was his own characteristically shrewd way of expressing the measure of Governor Dewey's achievement, of what the man has said, of what he has done to qualify him for the Presidency at this critical time. These are the things that make men big or little in the high field that Governor Dewey wishes to enter, and these are things with which the ordinary people of America will measure the fitness of candidates for President this year.

FITNESS TO CONDUCT WAR

My constituent must have been thinking of Governor Dewey as a possible war leader. Who is there to say that he would make a good Commander in Chief? Who will say that he has an intimate knowledge of the make-up and disposition of our naval forces or that he has a broad conception of naval strategy? Has anyone said that Governor

Dewey is conversant with the strategy mapped out months ago for the impending offensives in Europe and in the Pacific, or that, without the experience of having participated in mapping that strategy with not only our own high naval and military officers but with Churchill, Stalin, and Chiang Kai-shek, he could be on equal terms with those chiefs of state in further meetings on world military strategy?

It is no answer to these questions merely to say that our trained generals and admirals will run the war. It cannot be dismissed so lightly. True, we have good admirals and four-star generals, but there has always been and there always must be a directing hand, a Commander in Chief. Good or bad, he will be the man we elect as President next November. That choice involves the chance of an earlier victory and fewer lives lost as well as the prestige, place, and best interest of the United States at the world's council tables.

Maybe Governor Dewey would be a good leader. We do not know. What the people do know is that he, like any other man new to the job, would be tremendously handicapped by a lack of experience and a lack of knowledge of what has gone before. To say the very least of it, it would take Governor Dewey, however great his capacity, a long period of time merely to gain an intimate knowledge of the organization, problems, and strategy of our own forces, to say nothing of either our allies or our enemies. It is, therefore, self-evident that selection of Governor Dewey as Commander in Chief would inevitably create a time lag in the march to victory.

FITNESS FOR LEADERSHIP IN WORLD PEACE MAKING

As a leader in foreign policy, though inexperienced, Governor Dewey has something in his favor. He recently made a speech on foreign policy which deserves careful consideration. Even though a bit hazy in spots, the address was commendable in at least two respects: First, it was, in effect, a candid admission that he had been wrong in some of his previous statements and attitudes; and, second, that the Roosevelt-Hull program is correct in its essential parts. I say this is commendable because it takes a man of no small caliber to admit not only his own error but also to acknowledge the rightness of the program of his opposition—something which a large number of Republican Congressmen have not yet done. For this conversion and public candor, Governor Dewey is entitled to compliment.

One cannot but wonder, though, what evidence there is to show that he has more foresight now than before. There is some considerable evidence that his foresight has not heretofore been up to the par of discerning statesmanship. For example, some half dozen years after the Roosevelt administration had given diplomatic recognition to Russia, Governor Dewey put his mental processes to work on that question and when he had given it what he undoubtedly considered sufficient thought, he pronounced the recognition of Russia as one of the greatest mistakes the Roosevelt administration had ever made. He solemnly announced his verdict in a public address to the American people.

In 1941 Governor Dewey applied his fullest caliber of statesmanship to the question of lend-lease. It was in January of that year that he announced to a group of newspaper men the result of his thinking on lend-lease, which has since been hailed as a magnificent success by the American people, and has been hailed around the world as a great instrument for victory and freedom. What did Governor Dewey foresee for the lend-lease program? He said that it would, and I quote, "bring an end to free government in the United States." Some prophecy! He said further that it would, and I again quote, "abolish Congress for all practical purposes." Some foresight!

I certainly do not wish to be unkind about this, for I am genuinely glad that Governor Dewey is trying to set himself right on foreign policy. After all, if there's a possibility of his being our President, then it is extremely important that he be on the right course on foreign policy because mistakes in foreign policy are tremendously costly in American life, blood, and substance.

I would wholeheartedly welcome any earnest effort to lift foreign policy above partisan politics. We Americans are proud to consider ourselves a preeminent Nation in world affairs. We are a grown-up Nation; there is no doubt about it. And it's high time we were acting like a grown-up in the world family of nations. What we need is not a partisanly Democratic or Republican foreign policy but a national foreign policy based on an intelligent and farsighted self-interest, the general course of which bears the endorsement of both of our great political parties. Then we could have our partisan fights over who had or could best actuate and project that policy. Perhaps this would be a pertinent question now.

Even though Governor Dewey may now be a sincere advocate of an enlightened foreign policy and even though he gives evidence of a new-found foresight, a very serious question arises as to the ability of the Republican Party or any leader of the Republican Party to put such a program into actual effect.

And let me warn, lip service would do no more good after this war than it did before.

I know that in Congress there are Republican Congressmen who would give wholehearted support to such a program. But I know, too, that there is a large block of Republicans who are yet unconverted, who are yet isolationists to the core. For instance, do you think that Mr. HAM FISH or Senator HIRAM JOHNSON would support a realistic program of international collaboration, Dewey or no Dewey? And, mind you, if the Republicans should take the reins of government, Congressman HAM FISH would be chairman of the all-important House Rules Committee and Senator HIRAM JOHNSON would be chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Do you believe that Republican Members of Congress, who even now continue to say that if we had stayed at home and minded our own business we would not have incurred the wrath of Tojo and Hitler and, therefore, would not have been drawn into World War No. 2, would suddenly, upon the election of a Republican President, bury their convictions and prejudices, which have become deep-seated through the years since the League of Nations fight? Would they overnight become intelligent supporters of a sensible and practical program of economic and political cooperation with other nations of the world? Or do you think that they would continue in their efforts to beguile the American people with such catch phrases as America First, meanwhile opposing even such helpful and practical measures of international cooperation as reciprocal trade agreements?

The fact is the Republican Party is so sharply divided on the question of any form of international collaboration that Republican leadership of the country in this field is hopeless. The schism runs deep throughout the party—from Senator CURLEY BROOKS and Representative HOFFMAN to Senator AUSTIN and Representative EATON within Congress and from Wendell Willkie to Colonel McCormick without. Any program on which all these elements within the party could agree would at best be an inadequate, milk-toast compromise.

The prospect of Republican leadership in his field appears no more acceptable when we undertake to judge their future performance by their past record. The record of the Republican Party between the two wars is awful. By defeating the great Woodrow Wilson's League of Nations, the Republican leadership succeeded in steering us into a rut going the wrong way. Unfortunately, a lot of people kept going that way. Some are still trying to.

Oh, how different the history of the world might have been if the American people had not committed the folly of following the between-wars Republican philosophy of isolationism and shortsightedness. I hope this is one time when history will not repeat itself.

FITNESS FOR DOMESTIC LEADERSHIP

As to how we might measure Governor Dewey's fitness as a President to deal with domestic affairs, I am somewhat at a loss to know unless we judge him by the past performance of his party when it was last entrusted with our National Government, or by the company he keeps. Again the record of his party is not very pleasant to contemplate. In fact, they led America on to the skids and what we skidded into will never be forgotten by those who lived through it—Teapot Dome, post-war inflation, synthetic boom and the awful bust-up, depression days when men were selling apples on the streets of America, four stands to a corner, with prosperity and employment, a chance for millions of ordinary people to live a decent American life, nowhere to be found—not even around the corner.

Former President Herbert Hoover is reputedly one of Governor Dewey's closest advisers. I do not think the country wants any more of Herbert Hoover—not even a Tom Thumb facsimile. We do not want to turn again our great American cities into Hoovervilles. We do not want our factories converted into post-war production of cobwebs, nor our farms into mortgage foreclosures.

My Republican colleagues in Congress seem to think that Governor Dewey could do better. I am sure he could not do worse. They are predicting that on next November 7 there will be a cloudburst of Republican votes, but my weather prediction for that day is that it will only be a little Dewey.

ROOSEVELT MEASURES UP

It is only when we stand this yardstick of fitness for the job beside President Roosevelt that we can truly appreciate the bigness and quality of the man as well as the urgent need to continue his leadership.

I do not have to draw for this audience a contrast between those 12 years of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover and the 12 years of the Roosevelt administration. You saw the rising of a leader equal to the task of rebuilding a Nation which had been economically debauched. You saw millions of American homes and farms saved from mortgage foreclosures; you saw American businesses, many of which seem now to have forgotten it, saved from bankruptcy; you saw the scourge of closing banks stopped and peoples' savings made secure; you saw human rights given precedence over property rights. Disagree with this or that as you will, over-all it is a record of unsurpassed achievement of which we are justly proud.

About Roosevelt's leadership in the field of foreign relations, volumes could be written but the American people do not have to read volumes to be convinced of his stature as a statesman. Every day confirms the rectitude of Roosevelt's position and our good fortune to have his leadership. America and the world need his vision, his understanding, his wisdom at the conference table where we hope and pray world peace will be made secure. How can we afford to change? In my opinion we won't.

The drums of an awful world war began to beat and soon they roared. Freedom in the world and our very existence as a free nation was threatened. If there was ever a time when this Nation needed great leadership it was then. If there was ever a time when America has had great leadership it was then—and since.

You have seen what America—America under great leadership—could do. The strength of a great nation has been mobilized quickly and effectively. Production goals which our enemies, and the President's critics, incidentally, said were impossible have been reached and bettered. We have supplied not only our own forces with the best war equipment the world has ever known, but have supplied, too, millions of our allies. The greatest navy, the mightiest air force, and the most stupendous mechanized military strength the world has ever known is now poised for the attack. Today the enemy is cringing with his back to his homeland. The light of victory begins to dawn.

All of this did not just happen so. Somebody had to plan it, somebody had to direct, somebody had to lead and inspire, somebody had to coordinate and command. Do you think it could have been President Roosevelt?

America, Wake Up!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "America, Wake Up!" delivered by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker before the War Dads Association, at Kansas City, Mo., on May 30, 1944. I commend its reading to the Senate.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For more than three-quarters of a century Americans have observed Memorial Day by placing flags and flowers on the graves of their loved ones who gave their lives for their country.

The thin, blue ranks and the fading, gray files of our Civil War veterans, in whose memory this day was originated, have almost vanished. And soon the familiar lines—

"Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment Day;
Love and tears for the Blue,
Tears and love for the Gray"— will be as much of a memory as the men in blue and gray, who served in the war between the North and the South.

But I have not come here tonight to make a traditional Memorial Day speech to this gathering of American war dads, their families, and their friends.

I have not come to talk about the past and its glories. I have come to talk about the present and its sacrifices—the future and its dangers.

Today, from Cape Cop to the Golden Gate, millions of Americans made sad pilgrimages to tens of thousands of cemeteries. They bowed their heads in prayer and placed flags and flowers on the graves of relatives and friends.

But while millions made this pilgrimages, tens of thousands of mothers, wives, and children of World War No. 2 were denied the privilege of placing flags and flowers on the graves of sons, husbands, and fathers who went off to war—never to return. Men, whose only tangible memorials are gold-star flags on window panes.

The golden constellation of American heroes who died in this war, up to now, makes up a firmament of more than 50,000 stars—for we have lost more than 50,000 men.

This Memorial Day of 1944 is not dedicated to gentle reminiscence into the history of the past. On the contrary, it is and it must be dedicated to history in the making—dedicated to history that is as recent as the latest radio news flash—history as current as the front page of tomorrow morning's newspapers.

It is a grim task to stand here tonight and urge America to wake up to the full realization that war is a grim business—because most of us, unfortunately, are not awake to our obligations and responsibilities.

When speaking of history in the making, our thoughts immediately revert to that section of the news printed in small type in our daily newspapers and known as the casualty list. It is there we find the high price that is being paid, day by day, for the winning of the war—the lives of the finest manhood of America.

Whenever I read that roster of patriots who have made the supreme sacrifice, I never fail to recall the sight of their resting places while visiting all our theaters of war—quiet cemeteries where crosses cast their peaceful shadows over the graves of men who so willingly gave their lives that we on the home front might continue to enjoy the American way of life.

Never have I passed, nor will I ever pass such a resting place without thinking of the hungry hearts of wives, mothers, and sweethearts at home who would give anything just to touch one single cross for just one single second.

But not all our war dead rest in peaceful cemeteries in the many theaters of war. Thousands of them have found oblivion in the ocean deep—thousands more in the slime, mud, and entangling jungles of the South Seas—still more thousands in the shifting sands of the African desert—in the ruin and rubble of Italian towns—or in the hinterlands of India and China, as well as the frozen wastes of Alaska and the Aleutians.

Some of those men died when their ships went down—some in tanks that were stopped by shells—some in planes that were shot from the skies—some in pillboxes, fox holes, or trenches—some on sun-drenched beaches—and some on open battlefields. But, no matter how they died—or where—those men are gone—more than 50,000 of them. That is tragic—but more tragedy is yet to come. More than 50,000 men have made the supreme sacrifice and, yet, many, many thousands more will give their all.

As a Nation, we must be prepared for even greater burdens of sorrow as greater casualties will come. We do not know what sorrow means yet. And our only haven will be our Heavenly Father. If we put our trust in Him, He will not fail us.

The road to victory will be long and hard. It will be red with blood and its markers will be the crosses on the graves of our loved ones.

I present this grim and realistic picture because from now, until the end of this bitter conflict, we of America, as well as our allies, must armor ourselves with fortitude against our losses.

I make the sad prediction that before this war is over, virtually every person in the United States will have some relative or friend on whom the god of war will have left his crimson mark. These are brutal facts, but war is a brutal business, and today our love, tears, and prayers should go not only to the dead, but also to the living, in the hope that they may be spared and come home to us.

So far, this war, on our part, has mainly been a battle of machines—planes, tanks, ships—and the casualties, therefore, have been comparatively light. But, as invasion starts in many parts of the world, it becomes a battle of men—we must be prepared for greater losses.

And yet, on the home front, there are people who fail to realize that what they fail to do, toward the speedy and victorious ending of the war, spells death for men who otherwise would live. To that segment of our Nation I plead, "Americans, wake up, you are shirking your duty"!

With greater feeling than I can find words to express, I sympathize with the wives and mothers of men in our combat forces. They carry a great burden of suspense—the agony of waiting—of endless worry.

And yet, the same strength of character and discipline of spirit that enabled the pioneer women of yesterday to carry their burdens with level heads and stout hearts are fortifying the women of today during these days of turmoil. No nation is greater than its women, and the fortitude American women have shown in facing the emotional stress of war and, at the same time, doing their share in the war effort, is truly monumental.

The quantity and quality of the sacrifice of the women of America are found in the fact that nearly all of the flower of our youth have been or are being transplanted to the theaters of war in the four corners of the world. I have seen them. I know how young most of the men are in our combat forces today.

Just think, few of our servicemen had seen the light of day when the foundation for this war was laid a quarter of a century ago by selfish peace planning at the close of World War No. 1. Up to now more than 50,000 of our young men have made the supreme sacrifice.

And why? What is there in this world that deprives youth of the right to live? Why should war deprive mothers of their sons? Why should wives become war widows? Why should children become orphans? Why? Why? Why? This is the reason why:

Because at the end of World War No. 1, we did not build a fortress of peace. We compromised with those who had nothing to lose. We were blinded by our ideals and mistook dreams for realities. We thought we saw, in the unsound peace terms, eternal proof that there would never be another World War.

Today that eternal proof of lasting peace is scattered in trillions of fragments all over the globe. A far more destructive war is sweeping the world with flames of violence. Could it have been avoided? Yes; it could.

It could have been avoided if those who had the opportunity to build the fortress of peace had also had the foresight to design and build the fortress on a firm foundation. But failure to do this cannot be placed on any single party, on any given group, on any individual. We are all to blame. In a democracy the people are responsible for its leadership.

Just think back—take a little self-inventory—and you will find that not so long ago most of us thought Mussolini was only a strutting clown; Hitler we regarded as a low comedian; and the Japs were funny little monkeys without tails. We either could not or would not permit ourselves to believe that any human beings could be so treacherous and dastardly.

What did we do during those years when the Japs, the Fascists, and Nazis were planning and preparing for conquest and control? For one thing, we almost scuttled our Navy—demobilized our Army—and clipped the wings of our military aviation.

What did we do when Hitler took the Rhineland—when Mussolini stole Ethiopia—and the Japs invaded China? We did nothing. Did we make ready and prepare when Europe erupted into war? We did not.

As recently as 1940 none of our major political parties or national leaders had the vision or the valor to read aloud the handwriting of Mars on the global wall. Sure, we sold destroyers to England, but we also sold scrap iron and oil to Japan. It was 1915–16 all over again. Let's wait! Let's watch! It can't happen here!

Now it is V for Victory. But in those days—4 short years ago—it was D for Delay and—at long last—D for Defense.

What the future held was as plain to see as a dive bomber over your roof, but those of us who sounded the alarm were met by boos of derision. And I firmly believe that many of the men who have given their lives might be alive today if we had not been caught with too little—too late.

We poured billions into the bottomless pit of the stock market in 1929, but we could not afford a decent Army, Navy, and Air Corps. We spent billions priming the depression pump, but we were too indifferent to prime our muskets. Militarism of any kind was frowned upon. Preparedness was unpatriotic.

Why, some were shocked at the very thought of exposing the boys in C. C. C. camps to the horrors of military training—not even small arms for drilling—just broomsticks. It is impossible to conceive in terms of human life what even that limited training would have meant in preparing inexperienced youth for battle.

Finally, when we did flounder out of our day dreams, we did not develop striking power. We concentrated on D again. D for Defense bonds—Defense stamps—Defense production—Defense training—Defense this and Defense that—until the bombs, shells, and torpedoes struck at Pearl Harbor. Then it was D for Defeat, Destruction, and Death.

Now we are talking V for Victory—but too many of us are talking in our sleep—indifferently.

To you, I say again—"America, wake up! You are shirking your duty."

For almost a quarter of a century, we permitted ourselves to be lulled into a world of false security. We were willing to believe anything but the truth, ready to see anything but the facts. And, even at this hour, many people lull themselves into the belief that victory can be won without greater costs and efforts than those we have already made.

They say the war is almost over, that rationing is nonsense, price control bosh, inflation a scarecrow, taxes too high, wages too low dividends too few, work too hard, hours too long, strikes too short. Why buy bonds, why give blood, why tend Victory gardens? There is too much thrift, not enough fun. They want to go back to the good old days when they got something for nothing.

Well, in the name of countless servicemen to whom I have talked in the four corners of the world, I can tell those who think along those lines, that they are in for a rude awakening when our fighting men again step out of uniform.

Speaking of what our men overseas talk and think about, let me take this opportunity to correct the widespread, but wrong, impression that they are a bunch of homesick kids whose only consolation is a pin-up girl.

Men who face death have other things to think about—and that includes politics. And, speaking of politics, the campaign platform they are interested in has only three planks:

1. Every American must help in producing the material and equipment that will bring victory at the earliest possible moment.

2. Full opportunity for all to make a decent living in the post-war world.

3. A sound and workable plan for lasting world peace that will mean freedom and justice for all.

There has been some talk that the men overseas believe there is not enough patriotism on the home front. That talk is well founded for that belief is widespread throughout all theaters of war and, in my opinion, there is justification for it.

Some of the men—whether right or wrong—even go so far as saying that the alarm clock America needs to wake it up is a first-class bombing raid. Be that as it may, the fact remains that there is considerable bitterness among men in combat over strikes, black markets, and political skullduggery on the home front. They fail to understand why such things should exist. And, frankly, what is wrong with that viewpoint?

Certainly, it is not right that one group of Americans is called upon to give their all, including life itself, while another group of American do only that which they think they should for profit, or for higher pay, or more power.

It is impossible for ayone who has not visited the battle fronts to know the danger, the filth, the suffering, the drabness, the boredom of combat living and to fully appreciate why it is that stories of the great sacrifices being made on the home front make the men on the combat front gag.

Not that the rank and file of soldiers believe that we are a nation of slackers on the home front, but they have no illusions about the job that lies ahead and they have deep contempt—and justly so—for anyone on the home front who fails to put his shoulder to the wheel.

Lately there has been a fear—a feeling that this attitude on the part of servicemen toward civilians may build up a wall between them when the war is over. And I regret to admit that there is a very real danger on this score. Therefore, we must do everything within our power to prevent such a wall from being erected. The only way to avert it is for everyone to do his or her share to speed the day of victory and at the same time to plan a post-war world in which our veterans will have freedom of opportunity for individual enterprise.

Most of our servicemen will not want to return to the good old days they left behind, for the simple reason that the good old days will not be good enough. The men who come home will not be the boys who left. I am now speaking of veterans in the late teens and early twenties.

They are intelligent. They are tough. They are hard. They know what they want. They have learned a lot. They have worked a lot. They have dared a lot. They have sacrificed a lot. They want to get on in the world when the war is over. And they justly deserve our help and assistance.

It is not enough to have Congress pass a G. I. bill of rights—though it is better than handing out coffee, doughnuts, and beggarly bonuses—or giving veterans apple boxes on selected street corners. The veterans will not want to take over America, but they will demand their proper share of opportunity and place in every council. Our veterans will want opportunity to use their new skills—opportunity to educate themselves—opportunity to live peaceful lives in a peaceful and prosperous world.

They will demand the right to work at any job for which the service has given them expert technological or mechanical skills, and they will resent having to pay a tax to union racketeers for the right to work and the chance to make a living. Some unions have taken a realistic and cooperative attitude toward this problem. They are to be congratulated. They show an encouraging awakening.

To provide opportunity for our servicemen—as well as peacetime employment for war workers—it is essential that our post-war plans must be better than the pre-Pearl Harbor levels. Capital and labor—lawmakers and executives must unite to provide and maintain mass production for mass buying power at reasonable price levels. This must be done now. We can't wait for peace, because even now servicemen are being mustered out at the rate of 75,000 per month.

We must provide rehabilitation for the disabled, employment for those who want work, college courses or vocational training for those who want to learn. Unless we take steps to plan for the proper care of our servicemen, America will indeed have a lost generation on its hands—a handicap, an overload that will leave us hopelessly behind in the world competition, which will begin even before the war is over.

Our military manpower for victory today is our brain and brawn power for progress and production tomorrow.

Americans, wake up to the fact that on the home front there are only two major groups of men left—those too old to fight—and those too young. Soon, those too old to fight will be too old to work. The young will still be too young to lead.

Therefore, the burden of the immediate future falls squarely on those who are carrying the burden of the war—our men and women in the military services. To make that load less burdensome, it will be our duty on the home front to build our fortress of peace so strong that no nation or nations would ever dare to assault it again.

The plan for this fortress of peace must be drawn now. We want to see it in black and white. We must avoid the pitfalls of personal foreign policies that undermined the peace efforts at the end of World War No. 1. Let us wake up to the dangers of being fooled by fancy phrases and glittering generalities.

We must have an all-out guaranty that there will be no more world conflicts. We must demand a foreign policy of intelligent self-interest. We cannot bring liberty and happiness to the world by giving up our own freedoms and opportunities for momentary advantage.

Let us wake up to our responsibilities. If we perform the duties that face us now and which must not be delayed, we will have made more than a hollow axiom out of the phrase—"they did not die in vain."

To the members of the American War Dads I say it is your God-given duty to assume the leadership of building a worthy memorial to our dead through the creation of a world of peace and progress for the living. You can do that by continuing your fight to have everyone work for victory—by demanding a realistic and workable blue print for our domestic and foreign plans for the future and the perpetuation of American ideals.

This Memorial Day of 1944 should be dedicated to a firm resolve rather than a sad reflection.

And in our quest for strength we must find it in the crucible of sorrow. Even as an alloy puts added strength in steel, so let our sorrow and tears for our loved ones put new force in our desire to support our fighting men with all the energy and determination at our command, for, with the return of these veterans, we will find that this Nation has been matured 100 years through the knowledge gained by them.

They will be the power of revitalization that this Nation so sadly needs. We must learn to think of the welfare of these United States in terms, not of 1 year or 10 but of 100 years.

It is our duty and obligation to try and understand all peoples of the world through having faith in America and ourselves first. We cannot hope to save all the peoples of the world with idle words or thoughtless promises, but by example create in them the desire to save themselves.

Many do not love us, but they do trust us, and they look to our statesmen as the only possible solution of many of their problems. We must revitalize our Diplomatic Corps scattered throughout the world and at home by starting to inject new and younger men with soldiering experience. I say a diplomatic corps with a soldier diplomacy because we shall be confronted by soldier diplomacy from all other leading nations of the world for the next 50 years.

For to our statesmen will fall the duty to see that there is not a repetition of this horrible catastrophe. They will have the opportunity to bring about a better understanding between the nations and thereby insure permanent peace.

Posterity will judge the statesmen of our time by the courage and intelligence with which they face this task. To meet this test, our representatives must cease to be mere politicians and prove themselves statesmen indeed. Undying fame will be the reward of those who lend their energies and influence to bring about a new dispensation in world affairs. Contempt, followed by complete oblivion, will be the portion of petty ones who will continue to play politics with this tremendous problem or use for party purposes the stupendous forces involved.

We must rededicate ourselves to the service of our country in a spirit worthy of the service and the suffering of our men and women in uniform. Within the next few years we shall face the greatest opportunity ever presented to any nation in history, the opportunity to make sure that the youth of all nations, who have shed their blood on every far-flung battlefield of the world, shall not have died in vain.

America, wake up. Let us unite, shoulder to shoulder to win the war as soon as we can and make the peace everlasting.

America, wake up. Let us plan with imagination and execute our plans with intelligence.

America, wake up. Let us fully realize that to have external strength in world affairs, we must have unity and internal strength in our domestic affairs.

America, wake up. Let us plan a future of preparedness, for a real peace can only be insured through a world order based on faith in a Supreme Being, justice, and confidence. Never again, too little, too late.

America, wake up.

Famous Polar Bear Association Whose Members Served With Fame in Russia in World War No. 1 Vote 625 to 1 to Support W. T. S.-C. P. T. Instructors and Trainees and Calls Upon War Department for Fair Treatment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions adopted by the Polar Bear Association at reunion in Detroit, Mich., on May 29, 1944:

Whereas the War Department of the United States did authorize the Civil Aeronautics Administration to enlist and encouraged the training of 25,000 aviation cadets and offered inducements that such cadets upon completion of their training course would be appointed staff sergeants, flight officers, or commissioned second lieutenants; and

Whereas documentary evidence exists that cadets enlisted in the Civil Aeronautics Administration program were given good reason to believe that opportunity was being afforded them to obtain aviation cadet training, and upon graduation to receive commissions in the Army Air Forces of the United States; and

Whereas the War Department has now canceled the C. P. T.-W. T. S. program after many thousands of students had devoted their time as cadets in training for a period ranging from 12 to 18 months and that no provision has been made to fulfill the obligations of the War Department and the Civil Aeronautics Administration of the Department of Commerce; and

Whereas under date of March 13, 1942, Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, by order of the Secretary of War, did issue Circular No. 75, amending Circular No. 204, War Department, 1941, providing for the enlistments to the Air Corps Enlisted Reserve Corps of students in the pilot-training course conducted by the Civil Aeronautics Administration and for the appointment of aviation cadets who met requirements as cadets of the United States Army, also that persons enlisted in the Air Corps Enlisted Reserve Corps, would be called into active service at the termination of the course; and

Whereas the Civil Aeronautics Administration of the Department of Commerce, under date of June 19, 1942, through its Acting Administrator, did address Mr. Lynn U. Stambaugh, national commander, American Legion, Indianapolis, Ind., advising that the Civil Aeronautics Administration is highly grateful that the American Legion will assist in recruiting 13,350 candidates for specialist pilots which the Army Air Forces have asked us (the Department of Commerce) to train, and further advised that it would be most helpful if the 12,000 posts of the Legion would spread the word, giving candidates proper information and assist in making applications; and

Whereas under date of October 8, 1942, the Headquarters Army Air Forces did issue a routing and record sheet on the subject of additional training for C. P. T. students, stating that graduates of C. P. T. instructors course will be called to active duty and receive instructions at schools under the jurisdiction of the commanding general, Flight Training Command, and upon completion they would be rated as service pilots, appointed flight officers or commissioned second lieutenants, A. U. S., and, further, it was definitely stated that commissions will be given to those outstanding graduates with performance in Air Force schools and in the Air Force units in which they may serve upon completion of training; and

Whereas under date of October 2, 1942, P. H. Walton, major, Air Corps, Assistant Chief, Aviation Cadet Section, Military Personnel Division, O. D. T., addressed the Adjutant General on the subject of promotion and ultimate rank of trainees who entered the Enlisted Reserve to take civilian pilot training, stating that cross-country, link-instrument courses, are classified as advance C. P. T. courses and that graduates of these courses will be assigned to air lines through the Air Transport Command as copilots, and to the Flight Training Command as instructor material. These reservists will receive further flight training and that those best qualified under this training will be rated service pilots and be commissioned as second lieutenants, A. U. S.: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Polar Bear Association does hereby call upon the War Department to make suitable provisions for fulfilling its obligations and promises to students in the cadet program, now being disregarded, which, in our opinion, is unfair and not in accord with the best interests of the United States and the war effort; be it further

Resolved, That we request the Congress of the United States to immediately enact suitable legislation providing commissions for those who have completed the primary, secondary, and cross-country flight courses and either the elementary instructor course or link trainer course; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senator VANDENBERG, Senator FERGUSON, Senator LA FOLLETTE, and Senator WILEY, and to all Members of the Congress from Michigan and Wisconsin with a plea to them that they support and encourage prompt passage of legislation that has been introduced for the correction of the problem resulting from the recital herein and that this be done at once before the Congress adjourns, and that the President of the Polar Bear Association appoint a committee to see that this work is done.

South Carolina's National Guard Artillery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURNET R. MAYBANK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Crack Carolina Artillery Outfit Backs Up French at Hitler Line," published in the Baltimore Sun for May 20, 1944. The article was written by War Correspondent Price Day and refers to the excellent and heroic work done by the former National Guard of South Carolina.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CRACK CAROLINA ARTILLERY OUTFIT BACKS UP FRENCH AT HITLER LINE—4,000 ROUNDS ARE FIRED IN SUPPORT OF INFANTRY ATTACK AT SANT' OLIVA, NAZI DEFENSE ANCHOR

(By Price Day)

WITH THE FIFTH ARMY IN ITALY, May 19.—From new gun positions high in the mountains, this crack South Carolina artillery outfit today has fired 4,000 rounds in support of infantry attacks on Sant' Oliva, one of the anchors of the Hitler line.

One hundred and fives and 155's are forward of the point where, by the book, light artillery should be, and are getting ready to move up again.

These guns have been firing steadily since H hour at 11 p. m., May 11, one unit leapfrogging another to set up advanced positions and then the batteries of the rear unit moving forward in their own turn.

Following the French, to whom they are attached, they have in the past week undergone the change from field to mountain artillery, and the men are eager to make any other adaptations that may be required.

WATCHED BARRAGE

They want to go wherever the French go, and the French are traveling.

On Wednesday, from a point near Esperia, I watched a wonderfully coordinated barrage laid on German positions on the slope of Mount d'Oo. I thought at the time it was French firing, but today I learned it was this outfit under French command.

These are also the guns which in the battle's opening barrage battered the slopes of Mount Faito so severely that the Germans fled into their own mine fields. The enemy had its strong points, up the slope from its living quarters, threaded by marked paths between mine fields. The barrage caught many of them in the bivouac area. Others ran into mined ground.

The work of burial was too great for the resources of the French, who themselves had many killed, and German prisoners are still on Faito burying their own dead.

V-MAIL BLANKS ARRIVE

Ammunition trains have been working day and night toiling over jagged mountain roads to supply the guns. Other supplies have also come forward. A package of V-mail blanks arrived today—next in priority after ammunition, incoming mail, and food.

Food has been plentiful, but until supper time tonight there had been no time to cook it, and men had been eating "charley" or C rations. Tonight the cooks prepared pork chops and new potatoes and apologized for being out of peas.

Men here would like a little sleep—"we've been moving too damn fast to get any damn sleep," they say cheerfully—but this is the way they like to live and travel.

SUPPORTED MANY TROOPS

They're used to it. They've fired their guns in support of many troops in many places. They've fought in Africa and Sicily and Italy. They assisted the British Eighth Army at Messina and took part in the winter's missions against Cassino, helping to make it look as it does today, like a mass of splintered bones and rotted teeth.

They've been attached to the Forty-fifth, Thirty-sixth, and Third American divisions and now the French of the Fifth Army.

"We just go with the one that's going," says Maj. Paul Godbey, of Columbia, S. C. "That's all we ask."

"It's fine being with the French," says Lt. Col. Ansel B. Godfrey, the outfit's commander, who comes from Clinton, S. C.

"Their officers know their business and their staffs are well organized. They worm up a hell of a lot of traffic jams, but when it comes to fighting nobody can beat 'em."

RESULT OF EAGERNESS

Everyone agrees that French traffic jams in the mountains—it is not unusual to sit for an hour in one spot—are the result of their eagerness to get everything they've got as far forward as possible in the shortest possible time. Everyone agrees, too, that they're doing it.

"They're magnificient fighters, those boys," says Godbey.

American guns aren't the only artillery in this area. Captured German howitzers and Skoda light field guns dot the roadsides to the rear, and at the outfit's last place of pausing it found batteries of German horse-drawn artillery.

Mules which had been hitched and ready to move when the Germans decided the guns couldn't be saved were shot in their harness.

One of today's missions from here called for 100 rounds on a road beyond Pontecorvo.

CYCLIST ASTONISHED

A spotter in a cub plane watched results and reported that one motorcyclist, astonished at so much personal attention, "slewed" his bike around and fled for his life up the road.

That most of the outfit's fire finds more important targets is attested by the fact that German prisoners, veterans of the fighting in Russia, say artillery fire here is more terrible than that at Stalingrad.

All men here, except a few replacements, are South Carolinians, and many have been in the unit for 6 to 8 years. They refuse to be detached. One man, First Sgt. William B. Dawson, of Abbeville, S. C., was left behind in England in the fall of 1942, because of illness. The next his company heard of him he had got a ride on a converted banana boat carrying TNT and was back.

Another man, a "kid" of 20, was wounded in Sicily and sent back to Africa. Scheduled to go into the manpower pool at a replacement center, instead he got to the Bizerte docks and "wangled" a passage to Italy on a PT boat. Another man walked for 3 days through a desert to catch up with his guns, arriving in rags and near starvation.

PICKS NEW HOME TOWN

Some of the men, who by ill luck aren't from South Carolina, have taken steps to remedy the fault. One, a dentist, has already picked his town and lined up his clients.

They're all a long way from home now and intend to go farther before they start back. Even on this bleak, wet afternoon—the first time since the start of the offensive when the mood of the weather has jibed with the mood of the war—their spirits are high.

Through his French connections, Colonel Godfrey has come into possession of a bottle of fine brandy. While the guns roar and crash on all sides he fills liquor glasses and proposes a toast:

"Here's how. On to Rome—and the beachhead."

A Better America—Not a New One

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEO E. ALLEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 2, 1944

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a portion of an address convincingly outlining the America of tomorrow and splendidly evidencing the contribution made by a great industry to the welfare of our country. This address was made by Mr. John M. Thomas, president of the National Board of Fire Underwriters, on the occasion of the seventy-eighth annual meeting held in New York City May 25, 1944:

Again we meet in anxious moments in the life of our Nation and the world. * * * To those whose hearts are troubled for the safety of their loved ones on the fighting fronts, these are dark days that can be lighted again only by their safe return. To others, and even to those whose boys have fought and died, these days can be great days of historic opportunity—great because, under Divine guidance, the sacrifices shall not have been in vain, and we shall have a better world secure against mass madness, wholesale murder, man-made conflagrations, and the whole mess of war's evils.

The worst has not occurred. The worst would be for us to show less courage in preserving at home what they are fighting for abroad.

Fundamentally, a stable and enduring peace stands on a spiritual concept.

We are all united in a common cause to save three great principles, three great freedoms that stand as a tripod supporting the structure of our Americanism.

AMERICA'S THREE ESSENTIAL FREEDOMS

First, is the spiritual concept proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence—that freedom to worship one's Creator as his own heart dictates. It marked the sunrise of liberty won through sacrifice and maintained by faith and courage.

Second, political freedom stemming from those God-given unalienable rights.

Third, economic freedom rooted in the same priceless heritage.

* * * * *

Next to spiritual freedom is economic freedom. If the citizen is not economically free, his political freedom is worthless. Enduring peace and the preservation of our country are as much a problem of economics as of statesmanship. No statesmanship resting on an unsound, unstable economic base can long preserve the peace.

* * * * *

It must be so sound and strong that it may bear the debt burden of the war's cost; care tenderly for the maimed and crippled to whom the titanic struggle will have brought years of suffering less merciful than death; produce food and creature comforts and give us spiritual as well as material and cultural progress for all of our people. Want can be abolished only by producing more to divide in the continuous exchange of goods and services, not by meticulous and mathematical dividing of what we already have.

To all of us these new days offer a challenge. Our great business has been a stabilizer of industrial progress and of higher standards of living of our people for more than 150 years, or nearly the whole life of the Republic.

When fire snatched away a man's factory and the livelihood of his workers, we made it possible for him to restore their productivity quickly. When new means of comfort and convenience were offered to the home, our ingenuity, research, and foresight found ways of making the new household safer than ever.

New processes of manufacturing, wider use of chemicals and other inflammables in creating new products, the more general use in the home of apparatus that can be dangerous without proper safeguards and testing in manufacture and design—all these problems of this new age of tomorrow give us new opportunities for serving the needs of the people in all walks of life, and for helping to create and maintain a sounder and safer America.

Already the war has created new wonders in the laboratories—wonders that properly tested and protected will ultimately add still more to the comfort and convenience of the American home. New products will need new instructions in handling for home owners, new lessons of safety installation for suppliers and service concerns. May of these now used exclusively on the military and naval war fronts will be utilized in factory, school, and home in our post-war history.

Thanks to the foresight and energy of our business in creating Underwriters' Laboratories, Inc., just 50 years ago, in setting and maintaining higher standards for protection from loss of life or personal injury hazards and from fire damage all over the Nation, the American people may use these new devices and new methods, secure in the knowledge that they are as safe to use as scientific planning and inspection can make them. * * *

Fire insurance is perhaps closer to the American householder than any other business in the Nation, and we want to make that relationship as serviceable, economical, and wholesome as possible. In millions of households we have a financial interest which we can lose, and a sentimental interest which we must never lose. * * * Just as we have an interest in virtually every home in the land, so, too, does every home in the land have an interest in us, in our continued stability, soundness, and solvency under the kind of public regulation that has been developed through generations of America's traditional regard for the nature of this business and its peculiarly local character.

The very nature of our business compels us to think both practically and sentimentally in terms of the entire fabric of our economic and social life. We are trustees pledged to safeguard the savings of the American people as they are invested in plants and machinery and homes and chattels. * * *

Throughout our history * * * capital-stock-company fire insurance has helped to stabilize national progress by reducing the risk to invested capital from all insurable hazards. * * * In the years to come its role will reach an unprecedented importance because jobs will be the immediate need when war production ceases, reconversion begins, and peacetime production looms ahead, because fire insurance is a great job giver and job preserver.

* * * * *

A burned-out factory produces no wages and no income for stockholders, and without the protection of fire insurance few businesses, and especially small businesses, would have funds for rebuilding.

* * * * *

Capital stock fire insurance, giving its protective and fire-preventive service to the small as well as the large business enterprise on the basis of the hazard at risk, helps to maintain employment in the large and small fields where jobs are found.

* * * * *

Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau said last fall that people with annual incomes under $5,000 are getting seven-eighths of the gross payments. That means wages and salary earners drawing $5,000 or less receive a total of one hundred and twenty-seven billion and those earning above that figure receive $18,000,000,000. The figures show the importance of jobs and the jobs, as already noted, spring from physical plants that capital stock fire insurance guards against fire and explosion and indemnifies if loss comes.

* * * * *

This guarding of capital investments of small business has a greater and deeper significance in the post-war period than ever before. Economists in the Department of Commerce have estimated that American business will have from eleven to twenty-two billion dollars left over for plant and employment expansion after financing reconversion to peacetime production. However accurate or inaccurate the ultimate facts may prove that estimate to be, only a small percentage of the total will be in the coffers of small business. The very nature of their set-up makes this a certainty.

Thousands of small enterprises impaired their working capital when they went all-out for war production. Additional thousands, unable to qualify as subcontractors on war work or unable to secure the business, watched reserves and working capital dwindle as they struggled desperately to keep going and keep their wage earners at work. For those in the latter class who still struggle bravely on complete refinancing will be necessary. For those in the first-named group working capital will be largely what they are paid when war subcontracts are terminated.

Security for loans rests on the protective guaranties of capital-stock fire insurance back of existing plant or planned extensions. It is likewise the ultimate protection of such capital investments as can be made to keep jobs and pay rolls going. So the duty and obligation upon our companies to maintain solvency and extend both coverage and service to the limit of maintaining that solvency are greater than ever in all our long and outstanding record of obligations met and promises fulfilled. This promise is a foundation of the economy of peace in our country on which a united people can build—and build well and enduringly.

In the midst of formulating what we hope may prove to be a farsighted program in meeting new public obligations and rendering new public services in the years to come, the Board is performing work of the utmost importance and usefulness in the war effort, in cooperation with the Navy, the Army, the Coast Guard and many other war and Government agencies. As it should be, this is all done as a patriotic war duty which we are happy to be able to do.

Our war record cannot yet be revealed in all its details, but when it can be told I am certain that all will agree that it ranks with the finest achievements in our long history and with the best records of all American business in cooperation with the war agencies.

We have the distinguished honor of formal recognition of our services in citations from both the Navy and the Coast Guard, extended not only to the Board but to our companies and the various organizations with which we are affiliated and who are giving their full share of assistance.

The Navy commended the Board for outstanding services rendered to the Bureau of Yards and Docks in furtherance of the Navy war-construction program. In the words of Vice Admiral Ben Moreell:

"It must be a feeling of great satisfaction to those connected with the National Board of Fire Underwriters of being able to point with pride to its long and enviable record of public usefulness in the interest of fire prevention and fire protection so that it now merits recognition as an institution of public service.

"The work of the National Board of Fire Underwriters should be encouraged, and the Navy Department is fortunate in having its services so generously contributed for the fire defense of naval shore establishments.

"Under its contract, the National Board of Fire Underwriters, together with its affiliated organizations, undertook to survey and advise on the adequacy of the fire-protection facilities of not only naval establishments, but shipyards and other firms supplying the Government with the supplies and implements of war.

"The contract provided the Government with this service for $1. Without any Government compensation whatever, some 112 field engineers have surveyed 431 properties in 25 States. These included 202 naval shore establishments, 197 shipyards, 3 hotels, and 29 schools.

"As a result of these surveys the Navy was enabled to remove or correct any fire hazards which were found."

The United States Coast Guard Security Shield of Honor, the first given to any agency assisting in the post-security program, was awarded to the board with the following inscription on the shield:

"For important contributions to the port-security program of the United States Coast Guard * * * thus making possible the safe and uninterrupted flow of our country's manpower and war materials to the battle fronts of the world and the hastening of the day of victory for the United Nations."

A citation from the Coast Guard, signed by Vice Admiral R. R. Waesche, reads as follows:

"Since the inception of this program, the National Board of Fire Underwriters has voluntarily placed the services of its trained personnel at the disposal of the Coast Guard in the development and operation of adequate fire-prevention and fire-protection measures for water-front facilities and vessels in port. As a result of the assistance so rendered, the incidence of fires in such facilities and vessels has been substantially reduced, thus assisting and facilitating the safe and uninterrupted flow of our country's manpower and war materials to the battle fronts of the world."

Cooperation with all branches of the Government in preventing fire from sabotaging the war effort has been carried on under a well-defined plan laid down in 1940 when the board first offered the expert knowledge of its engineering staffs.

Safeguarding Government property and war equipment from destruction by fire is a distinctive aid to victory. * * *

The very fact that, despite everything that could be done, losses in 1943 soared to $373,000,000—the highest since the $401,000,000 of 1932—shows what a crippling blow could have fallen on war production without this fire-prevention work. There has been no sweeping conflagration notwithstanding the accumulation of unprecedented values, the added hazard of new war construction in many instances, and large increases in employment of new people who had to be trained to new kinds of work with machines and materials they never handled before.

The fire-insurance business also inspected and reported upon the industrial plants throughout the country that had been converted to the production of war materials of every kind. It was an expert service without cost to the Government, and not available immediately from any other source, at any cost. In fact, in the long 78 years of the board's history, it has never made any finer record of devotion and achievement for our country than in the trying year since last we met in annual session. There is no glamour in this essential work, but its valuable aid in the war is inestimable. * * *

We do not claim any unique distinction for the war record to which I have referred. Such is expected of every good citizen. It is a curious anomaly, however, that in the midst of our war service, to say nothing of our long record of a civilian job well done, the fire insurance business should find itself today harassed by the greatest uncertainty it has faced in 75 years. Needlessly so.

Many of us in this room, leaders in the fire insurance business, were attacked 18 months ago under the anti-trust act although judicial decisions for 75 years have held that what we were doing in the interests of the policyholders themselves, in the interest of protecting the solvency of the companies insuring their risks, was not only lawful but in many instances required by law. We have been advised all these years that neither fire insurance itself nor the business of fire insurance was commerce. Never before in a half century of the anti-trust act, which is directed at monopolies and restraints of trade, has an Attorney General attempted to apply that act to fire insurance. By Supreme Court decisions and precedent upon precedent, the regulation of fire insurance was delegated to the States. A sound, effective, and workable system of State regulation has been built up over the decades.

Then suddenly we are confronted with a new theory applied to our business. The whole structure of State regulation is threatened and chaos knocks at our doors and the doors of business and householder alike.

As you know, the Antitrust Division lost in the lower court and appealed to the Supreme Court where the case has been argued, and a decision is awaited. Meanwhile, Congress now has under consideration legislation specifically declaring that the Antitrust Act does not apply to the business of insurance. The fire insurance business favors that legislation because it would settle this new and unexpected crisis so hastily created by a view of law directly contrary to generations of decision and precedent.

* * * * * *

It should be noted by our policyholders and our citizens generally that if the present system of State regulation of fire insurance which has the sanction of generations of legal precedent were set aside, the policyholders and the public at large would be the losers thereby. Certainly the experience of recent years with the activities of Federal bureaucracy does not encourage anyone to believe that this business would be as efficiently or economically regulated as it is today by the States. If the present system of State regulation were to have superimposed on it a system of Federal regulation, the additional expense which would necessarily accompany such a duplication of regulation would not only force a reversal of the present trend of broader coverage at lower cost, but also place an additional tax burden on our policyholders and the American public. * * *

The national board faces the challenge of its new oportunities for public service with a confidence born of our own history and achievements. We came into being to fill the need of a stabilizing factor in the chaos of insurance in the economic upheaval following the Civil War. * * *

To give stability to economic progress, to thwart the catastrophe of financial and industrial chaos, is still our role. * * * The problems of today and tomorrow are infinitely greater and more complex than those of the sixties that called us into being, but we come to grips with them not as a new force in the field. We, as a board, face it with the accumulated experience of 78 years of high service in peace and war to the Republic and all its citizens.

We seek a better America, not a new one. We plan and prepare to fight for a standard of living higher than even any we have known. We know that this better America can come only through a multitude of plans worked out in the brains and hearts of a multitude of Americans, each giving of his talents, be they few or many, to the common goal of a great and united people.

It is not in the plans that the menace to our country lies. It is in the controls. No super plan worked out by any theorist, however able, by any committee, public or private, however earnest and however honestly motivated, can do the tremendous constructive task of building that lies ahead.

It cannot be done now any more than it could have been done in crisis after crisis that has come and been conquered in the years that have gone since we emerged from the War for Independence, debt-ridden but determined that the vision of a nation of men free and equal should be transmuted into enduring reality.

This has been the land of the free citizen—free before his God and endowed with those "certain unalienable rights"—free from the interfering hand of government in the exercise of his liberties under law—free to work and earn and own—free to venture and to win or lose, serenely conscious that equality of opportunity necessarily implies inequality of reward and not a dead level of socialistic mediocrity.

To government, definite bounds and limits; to the honest achievement of the free citizen, none. This is the essence of our Constitution and our Bill of Rights. It was kept there by toil and sacrifice. We, God helping us, shall keep it there for the generations yet to come.

The Problem of the Retail Food Dealers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a talk that I delivered at the banquet of the Associated Food Stores of Milwaukee at the Schroeder Hotel, on May 7, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I speak to you this evening with pleasure. It is good to be back in Milwaukee. It is good to be back in Wisconsin. You know, a Senator to get elected must be quite human, and to look after the duties of his office he has to be almost superhuman, but if he fails in the slightest degree, then he is inhuman.

Tonight I am required, because of the occasion, to be very brief. You remember the incident of the teacher telling the young lad to write a biography of Benjamin Franklin, but make it brief. So he said: "Benjamin Franklin was born in Boston; took a ship to Philadelphia; walked up the street eating a loaf of bread; saw a woman who laughed at him; he married her and discovered electricity."

I believe there is no other group in America more concerned with the future of America than are the retail merchants. From their daily contact with the people they know America, its traditions, the feelings of the people. These retailers believe in the equality of opportunity, in justice administered impartially. They believe in the American way of life. They want to live and let live in an atmosphere of freedom, and they want to return as quickly as possible to the old days when they were not regimented and interfered with by a bureaucratic government. The retailers of America will spare no effort to win the war and to restore and reassert the principles and the philosophy of life and government that have made America great.

You know that the National Association of Retail Grocers recommends the continuation of the Price Control Act as a matter of necessity. Difficut as has been the experience under O. P. A., it is recognized by practically everybody that it is a war necessity. However, it could have been better administered. There were too many square-peg administrators, too many sophomoric brains on the job in the beginning. They were well-meaning, well-intentioned, but they had no experience in the practical affairs of life. We know that many asinine regulations were brought into being, followed by amendments and adjustments and new regulations, and before the ink was dry on the new regulations there would be more amendments. All this meant the retailer was harassed in refiguring of prices and remarking, their salespeople had to be re-educated, and the consumer became bewildered and angry.

I have spoken many times on the subject. I have contended for an over-all food administrator who should have complete control of prices at the source and all the way up the line. However, in spite of missing the boat, we have a lot for which to be grateful.

You know that retail food stores increased sales 1,320,000,000 in 1943—a 9-percent rise.

Food prices averaged 11.4 percent higher.

The total sales in 1943 were 16,620,000,000—the highest in history—and doubled 1933 sales.

Independent sales increased 18 percent. Chain sales declined 7 percent.

Number of food stores declined 48,000.

Forty-seven percent of hired employees were women.

Of course, there was shortage of merchandise, shortage of help. There was the problem many places of the migration of population, drafting of store owners and employees. There were rationing and war regulations; but we were at war, and the retailers of America did a great job, as great in their line as the farmers in their line, as the food processors in their line.

In spite of mistakes, interference, everyone knew this was war, and they rallied to the call of country to do a job. The result was there was no let down—food was distributed the morale of the people of America was kept high, and I know that no matter what crises we have to face in the future that the retailer of America will carry on gallantly.

You know that the average American eats better and buys more goods than before the war. Factory workers' pay has gone up between 70 and 80 percent since 1939, and living costs have gone up not over 25 percent. With family incomes in many millions of American homes having doubled since 1939 the people will continue to buy at present prices far more of the high-priced foods if they can get them.

In relation to meat, as you know, while some people are eating less meat than before the war, others are eating more. Many persons who before the war had low incomes are now eating more because they have more money.

Here is a little side light on food. Biscuit munching and cracker crunching, normally a side-line activity of the country, are coming to a top place on the national bill of fare. Wholesale business of biscuit industry has risen from 207,000,000 in 1939 to an estimated 400,000,000 annual volume this year. Per capita consumption of crackers and cookies has just about doubled in the past 5 years.

What about the war? you ask. You know that members of the armed forces are eating about one-fourth more food per day than they did as civilians. If we get into Europe, and I expect we will, we Americans this year will not get as much food, or as appetizing food, as we did in 1943. Our butter supply, our cheese supply will be limited. We will be turning more and more to eggs and starchy foods, and we may get sick of eating chicken, but in spite of all this, ours will continue to be the best fed stomach in the world.

You ask, "Why will food be less?" Well, when we get into Europe we will have to contribute toward sustaining the populations of the freed peoples. It will be far less expensive for us to feed those who have been under the control of the Axis than to police them. We have promised these poor, undernourished brothers and sisters of ours in Europe food, and we are going to keep that promise; and the best food they can get will be food like cheese and dried milk, which have more balanced food value per cubic foot of shipping space than any other food we could send.

Now let me spend a few moments on the subject of small business and its place and problems involving the subject of post-war readjustments.

The small businessman, like the farmer, constitutes the backbone of America. You are what Aristotle called the middle class, and he said the best political community is formed by the citizens of the middle class, and it is the middle class, he suggests, that prevents "either of the extremes from being dominant."

Therefore, it is most important that small business be kept healthy, prosperous, and expanding. In Congress we have been concerned about the growth and survival of the small businessman. I introduced a bill calling for the creation of an assistant secretary of commerce for small business; and by small business, of course, we include the family-operated farm, the rural bank, the grocery, the drug store, the machine shop, the filling station, the manufacturing establishment, with a relatively few employees.

In a free society there is what we call free consumers' choice. That means that the consumer isn't told by Government or anyone else where he shall go and what he shall buy, but he can go where he wants to and buy, and he can buy according to his means and his tastes. This is part of the equality of opportunity that has made America great.

Small business has indeed a fundamental place in the life of this Republic, and we must see to it that in the economic field, as well as in the political field no Hitlers arise that would paralyze our political vision or our economic vision.

As soon as the war ceases, and probably before, governmental restrictions and interference must be reduced to a minimum. As you know, in Congress we have committees studying the broader problem of determining the best way of constructively aiding small business and making sure that it is preserved as part of our economic life. We know that Government controls, regulations, and rules have weighed more heavily upon small business than on larger units. However, it is pretty difficult to prescribe any simple remedy in midst of a war where we are fighting for our very existence.

In the post-war period, it is for all Americans, farmers and villagers, management and labor, small business and big business, to meet the problems of that day with the same united front that we are meeting the challenges of the enemy today. We are all in the same boat. If we don't learn to pull together we may find that we will go on the rocks together. As Americans we have so much in common, so many great values that we own together, so many great inherent rights that we enjoy together, that we should apply the rule of unity we have learned to know and demonstrate together in this war period. I believe we will, and I will tell you why. In Europe, which has been the festering sore of war for centuries, those peoples we stem from apparently have not learned the art of living together, except in Switzerland and Scandinavia. And unless they learn it out of the suffering of this war we will not see the millennium for which so many pray.

But in this land we are not Germans, or Poles, or Britishers, or Scandinavians—we are Americans, a new breed. Our fathers came here and dug their roots deep down into the soil of America, and you and I are the result. In this very city of Milwaukee I have two grandchildren in whom flow the blood of old Norway, England, Wales, Germany, and perhaps Scotland. But they belong to the new breed called the American. And that breed stands for certain things.

1. It does not want to war with other peoples, but if attacked it will finish the fight.

2. It wants to live in peace and harmony with its neighbors and build a better world.

3. It wants to help other peoples so they can become self-sufficient.

4. It preaches by word and deed the doctrine that hard work and thrift and honesty and decency pay.

5. It believes in the republican form of government—a government of checks and balances where neither political nor economic tyranny can gain sway.

6. It believes in freedom of enterprise, in the rights of the individual, in the Constitution of the United States and its Bill of Rights.

7. It believes in work because it was work that built America.

That calls to my mind the story of the old darky, and with the telling of that story I conclude.

The darky was old and decrepit. He had lost his wife, his children were gone, his little home was taken away from him, and he started out a wanderer through the southland. Wherever he went there was no one who had a place for him. He ambled into one village. No one could do anything for him. Finally someone, seeing his forlorn condition, said there was an old shack and a half acre of land he could have. He looked it over. The windows were broken, the roof staved in, the doors were off their hinges, the half acre of land was filled with poison ivy, weeds, and stones. But the old darky went to work, fixed up the shack, shingled the roof, painted it, cleaned out the half acre of weeds and ivy and planted flower seeds and rosebuds—and then when spring came around his little plot of ground blossomed like the roses. One day the darky preacher came up to him and said, "Well, Mose, the Lord and you sure have done a great job here"—because it was a beautiful place to look at, it smiled in its beauty. And old Mose said, "Yes; but you should have seen it when the Lord had it alone."

I believe in this little tale there is the challenge to all of us not to become downhearted no matter what we have to face. We have so much for which to be grateful. It is for us to rejoice always, for we have a great deal to rejoice about.

Chattanooga Airport—Necessity for Appropriation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, on tomorrow the conference report on the Commerce appropriation bill, H. R. 4204, will be considered. Since time for debate is considerably limited, I set forth here some of the facts about an item of much importance to me and my district.

In the Senate the sum of $800,000 was added to the appropriation for Civil Aeronautics Authority. This sum was to be used to begin construction of landing strips at a new airport at Chattanooga, Tenn. The total cost to the Federal Government would be $1,422,000, the city furnishing the land, buildings, etc. The appropriation was agreed to by the Senate without a dissenting voice. The House conferees have refused to concur and now move to further insist on their disagreement. A motion will be made to recede and concur in the Senate amendment when the conference report is considered on Tuesday, June 6. This motion should be sustained for the following good reasons:

STRATEGIC LOCATION OF CHATTANOOGA

Chattanooga is located midway between Atlanta and Nashville, midway between Knoxville and Birmingham and also is on the line from Memphis to Greenville and Spartanburg, S. C. There is no other airport in the vicinity of Chattanooga to serve traffic between these points. Chattanooga is a rapidly expanding city of nearly 200,000 people and the airport there not only serves the city but the area within a 60-mile radius.

A usable airport at Chattanooga is of great importance from a military viewpoint. The control tower at the present field has been operated since April 17, 1943. Listed below are the number of aircraft using the field from then down to the present time.

Aircraft using Lovell Field from Apr. 17, 1943, to May 28, 1944 (from C. A. A. records)

	Commercial air carrier	Army, Navy, and other services	Transient, civil	Total for month
Apr. 17-31, 1943	90	1,691	85	1,866
May 1943	332	6,334	287	6,953
June 1943	298	5,865	259	6,422
July 1943	304	1,347	242	1,893
August 1943	308	4,196	238	4,742
September 1943	278	3,369	203	3,850
October 1943	306	3,908	159	4,373
November 1943	291	3,245	115	3,651
December 1943	271	3,790	86	4,147
January 1944	220	4,252	107	4,579
February 1944	162	5,025	100	5,287
March 1944	210	6,650	158	7,018
April 1944	230	6,715	191	7,136
May 28, 1944	218	7,774	183	8,175

It will be noted that during the month of May 1944, 7,774 military aircraft landed on the present field. The average each month is about 5,000. These aircraft consist of airplanes from the training command, aircraft engaged in maneuvers near Chattanooga, aircraft from the Army and Navy Transport Service and aircraft from other services of the Army and Navy. It is important to reiterate that approximately 5,000 Army or Navy aircraft have landed on the present field monthly during the past year.

Efforts have been made to secure certification by the Army or Navy of necessity of this project. One may wonder why, with so many military aircraft coming through Chattanooga, it has not been possible to get one of the services to sponsor this undertaking. The reason is that practically all of the air services of the Army and Navy use this field to a certain extent but no single one of them uses it sufficiently to convince it of the necessity of taking over and operating the airport. For instance a letter from the Army Air Forces pilot school at Smyrna, Tenn., has this to say:

"The establishment of a municipal airport at Chattanooga, Tenn., by that community, would be of value for training purposes if this station was allowed the use of same. (For the commanding officer.)"

However, the pilot school at Smyrna didn't feel justified in going all the way. The same situation is true of the rest of the services.

PRESENT AIRPORT INADEQUATE—NEW LOCATION DESIRABLE

The runways on the present airport have been practically demolished and are almost unusable because of the many heavy, four-motor bombers which have used the field. A telegram from the Honorable Ed Bass, mayor of the city of Chattanooga, about the condition of the runways is as follows:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., May 30, 1944.

Hon. ESTES KEFAUVER,
Member of Congress,
New House Office Building:

Lovell Field has been used constantly, as you know, by the Army and Navy and other services since the very beginning of the present emergency, and because of this very heavy traffic, especially heavy bombers, the runways have been broken up so badly that they are now unsafe for this traffic. This field, because of the unsafe condition, has been closed to all military aircraft except for emergency landings. The citizens of Chattanooga are up in arms and urge that you do everything possible to obtain favorable action on the bill which is now pending in the House in the amount of $800,000.

ED BASS, Mayor.

The present airport is on low ground, which is subject to flood. A ridge to the west of the airport and a hill nearby makes it impossible to secure the necessary and required 40-1 glide angle for landing on the field. Furthermore, the runways are entirely too short and in order to lengthen them to the present requirements of C. A. A. it would be necessary to divert the course of Chickamauga Creek, which is a sizable stream. Several accidents, which include the loss of an Army bomber and its crew of three, have occurred because of the difficulty in landing on the present field.

The cost of rebuilding the runways on the present field and of diverting the creek would be greater than the cost of building landing strips on the new site secured by the city of Chattanooga. This is clearly shown in the testimony of Charles I. Stanton, Administrator of C. A. A. before the Senate committee; see page 205. Mr. Stanton there said in part:

"It is our opinion, based on engineering studies, that it would not cost more to develop this new field which would be better, once completed, than to enlarge the existing field, which would never be as satisfactory. The enlargement of the existing field would require some very expensive stream diversion."

A letter from Mr. Stanton, dated May 23, 1944, had this to say:

"As a result of studies made by the airport engineers from our Atlanta regional office, it was determined to be more feasible to construct a new airport than to attempt to reconstruct the existing airport. There follows an extract from a letter from our regional superintendent of airports, Mr. H. Harvie Perkins, to the commanding officer of the Southeast Training Command, Maxwell Field, dated October 26, 1943:

"'A new site has been selected because of the fact that the existing airport is very low resulting in a very high water table and being subject to floodwaters, all of which would make its development into an adequate airport very costly, if not impracticable.'"

The cost of putting the old field in usable shape and the cost of building landing strips on the new site was thoroughly surveyed by Mr. William B. Todd, district airport engineer, C. A. A., Atlanta. A summary of Mr. Todd's report is attached hereto as an exhibit. It will be noted that he estimated the cost of putting the old field in usable shape as $1,615,000 and the cost of building landing strips on the new site would be $1,185,000.

In discussing the two sites Mr. Todd, in a letter of August 17, 1943, wrote as follows:

"It is the writer's opinion that the airport is rapidly becoming unsafe, and it is recommended that immediate steps be taken to make emergency repairs if the airport is to be kept open for traffic. These repairs, however, should only be considered temporary because it will be necessary to completely reconstruct the airport to serve all types of aircraft adequately and safely."

And:

"The proposed new airport site located south of the U. S. Highway No. 41 and approximately 4.4 miles south of Lovell Field is considered to have excellent possibilities for development. It has the advantage of being from 20 to 40 feet higher than Lovell Field, which will permit satisfactory drainage and at the same time would probably be freer from low-lying ground fogs. The site is located in a section of the valley between Missionary Ridge and East Ridge where it is much wider than the section where Lovell Field is located, and it appears that it will be possible to construct three runways 5,000 feet for instrument operations; that is, that there be no obstructions having a height exceeding one-fortieth their distance from the nearest end of the runways. This site is comparatively level and has expansion possibilities limited only to the extent that approaches over the ridges on the east and west meeting the minimum requirements can be provided."

The C. A. A. is anxious for the new site to be developed. From every consideration the new site should be developed. It is apparent from a military viewpoint there must be a good usable airport at Chattanooga.

ECONOMY REQUIRES AGREEING TO SENATE AMENDMENT

If the present airport is put in usable shape it would cost the Federal Government more than it would to build landing strips on the new site. Even then the field would not be satisfactory because of the ridge and the hill near it and because it is subject to floods. From the economical standpoint, it would certainly be wise to spend the money appropriated for the development of the new site which would be of great value now and in the future rather than spend more money for repair of the present field which would not be satisfactory now or in the future.

The city is to furnish the site and to build the buildings. From the viewpoint of the city and the section surrounding it, the money now spent should be on a site which will fill its needs in the future. From this viewpoint, money spent on the present site would be practically thrown away.

The same amount of materials will be used in repairing the old site as would be used in building the new one. A great deal more grading would have to be done in removing the hill and diverting the creek at the old site than would have to be done at the new site. So from the viewpoint of the materials to be used, the manpower involved, the money expended, the use to the armed services, and the use to the city of Chattanooga, the new site should be developed rather than the old one being repaired.

This is undoubtedly a case in which economy and good judgment should impel the Members of the House to agree to the Senate amendment.

Let us remember that 5,000 military aircraft have been using the field at Chattanooga each month, the runways are now torn up, accidents happen because of the unsuitable location of the present field, it would cost less to build the landing strips at the new site than to repair the old one, the Nation and the city would have an airport usable during the war and of great value during the future.

The following is a condensed report of a letter received from Mr. William B. Todd, district airport engineer, Civil Aeronautic Administration, Atlanta, Ga., under date of August 17, 1943, which was made after his inspection several days ago, also his estimate of cost for the reconstruction of Lovell Field and the cost of constructing a new field which lies partly in Georgia. Mr. Todd reports the following deficiencies existing at Lovell Field at this time:

(a) That all of the approaches to the present runways have bad approaches which make it dangerous for heavy aircraft to land.

(b) That because of inadequate drainage and high water table the subgrade under the runways has become thoroughly saturated which is causing much detrioration of runways. A great deal of this deterioration has been accelerated by the traffic of very heavy aircraft.

(c) That the airport is rapidly becoming unsafe and that immediate steps should be taken to make emergency repairs, if it is to be kept open to traffic.

(d) That it is necessary to completely reconstruct the airport to serve all types of aircraft adequately and safely.

Mr. Todd's estimate on reconstructing Lovell Field is as follows:

Clearing and grubbing	$10,000
Grading, 1,500,000 cubic yards	375,000
Blanket course underfill	100,000
Drainage	100,000
Paving	675,000
Lighting	20,000
Fencing	10,000
Total	1,290,000
To the above figures it will be necessary to add the cost of relocating the creek, estimated at	250,000
Plus cost of land, estimated at	75,000
Making a total of	1,615,000

Mr. Todd's estimate of cost on the proposed new site is as follows:

Clearing and grubbing	$25,000
Grading, 1,500,000 cubic yards	375,000
Drainage	75,000
Paving	675,000
Lighting	25,000
Fencing	10,000
Total	1,185,000

City of Chattanooga to furnish site and buildings.

Power Versus Conscience

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there appeared in the issue of June 5 of Life an editorial entitled "Power versus Conscience." I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POWER VERSUS CONSCIENCE—A SPOKESMAN OF THE ONE IS CHURCHILL, OF THE OTHER SENATOR LA FOLLETTE—WE NEED BOTH

In his speech to Parliament on British foreign policy last week, Mr. Churchill made the most cynical remark recorded of any Allied leader in this war. His only guides through the subject, said he, are "singleness of purpose and a good, or at any rate, well-trained conscience."

It would be unfair to single out this remark if the rest of his speech were not one long substantiation of it. It was one of Churchill's very best speeches, full of candor, eloquence, and news. But the news and the candor seemed deliberately chosen to blast away any wisps of idealism that may still cling around Allied war aims.

"In one place (Greece) we support a King, in another (Yugoslavia) a Communist. There is no attempt by us to enforce particular ideologies," said Mr. Churchill. To prove it he appealed outright for kindlier feelings toward Franco, the Fascist dictator of Spain, in whose internal affairs "it is not for us to meddle."

Power, naked and unashamed

It will not surprise Life readers to learn that expediency is the favorite tool, and national power the prime post-victory objective, of British, Russian, and American leaders in this war. Nor is this necessarily a crime. As was pointed out on this page last week, nationalism can be an instrument for progress toward internationalism, and at the present juncture of human affairs it is probably the best possible instrument. Mr. Churchill, however, exceeded the most realistic expectations of his American admirers. He not only offered small comfort to believers in the four freedoms; he went out of his way to discourage them. His war aim, he made clear, is not so much permanent peace as permanent victory. The world is to be dominated by Russia, Britain, and the United States. If lesser nations have a voice, it is to be as members of an assembly whose relations to the "controlling power" Mr. Churchill is "in no position to define." He hopes for "fraternal association" with America, but his 20-year alliance with Russia "is the foundation of our policy." If war, as Clausewitz said, is the continuation of politics by other means, Mr. Churchill sees peace as the continuation of victory by the same means—i. e., armed might.

Now it is quite true that peace cannot be maintained without power. Practically all Americans realize by now that they are in the game of international-power politics for good, and that joint action with Britain and Russia is the best way for them to play it. America, whether Republican or Democratic, is not likely to shrink from this game. We have been a bit Mortimer Snerdish about it in the past, but we can take care of ourselves and we have an almost unlimited stack of chips.

However, there is more to world peace than power. Even if Americans could not reason this out, they would feel it in their bones. For the American conscience, whether better or worse than Mr. Churchill's, is not well trained.

By chasing ideology out of the United Nations' cause, Mr. Churchill did not dispel the world's ideological confusion. One would expect some political party or other, at least in America, to display an outraged conscience at the Churchill cynicism. Well, what party? Not the Democrats; Mr. Roosevelt is playing too much the same game. Not the Republicans; they are reluctant to seem anti-British.

Not the Communists. Some radical party, then? Radicals are supposed to respect conscience more than power. They took exception to Churchill's Franco line, but in general, said the Daily Worker admiringly, "it is clear that the spirit of Teheran is working." The major liberal and internationalist groups felt the same way. The labor leaders intent on reelecting Roosevelt paid no attention. Indeed, few Americans of any party, radical or conservative, seemed greatly perturbed. Perhaps, bemused by the new power game, the American conscience is asleep.

A free-minded radical

Yet there is in America a deep, old strain of radicalism which neither the Communists, nor the internationalists, nor the liberal and labor leaders really represent. It is the indigenous radicalism of the frontier, whose goal is not merely peace, prosperity and slum clearance, but economic justice and individual freedom. For evidence that this kind of radicalism still exists, turn to Wisconsin. Politically, Wisconsin is confused, but not ideologically.

There Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE'S Progressive Party, which has run Wisconsin off and on for years and still holds some shreds of power in Wisconsin, recently came out with a new 1944 platform. It is an old Progressive boast that practically all the planks in its platforms, beginning in 1908, get adopted by a major party and turned into national legislation sooner or later. That is the true function of a radical party: to discern reforms which are in the main stream of American progress, and to start fighting for them before they are practical. On the very good chance that the Progressives are still performing this function, their 1944 platform is worth looking at. They may be what President Conant of Harvard asked for in his plea for a native American radicalism last year: "* * * the missing political link between the past and the future of this great democratic land."

The Progressive's platform favors the prosecution of all monopolies, the reform of the patent system, a rebirth of small and independent enterprise, a program of planned public works and the use of Government power to secure "full production and full employment" and "equality of opportunity for all." It is against regimentation "of right or left." LA FOLLETTE thinks the Roosevelt administration, which he has supported in the past, has been practically taken over by "the forces of monopoly and reaction."

In foreign policy, Progressives oppose any compromise with fascism, and take bows for having warned against Pearl Harbor. Quite wrongly, they opposed the President's prewar aid-to-Britain policy, hence earning the label of isolationist; but their reason was neither cowardly nor ignoble; they suspected a diversion from the New Deal's domestic reforms. They now fear another Peace of Versailles, which "betrayed the common people" of all countries. They still favor self-determination for small nations. They hate and fear imperialism and cartels. They favor a federated Europe and an attack on what they regard as the causes of war. They also favor international cooperation "with the forces which share their ideals for political freedom and economic opportunity." And by such forces, they don't mean Churchill.

This platform has been called a rebirth of Midwestern isolationism. To read it is to know that it is nothing of the kind. Impractical? Just now, yes. Too morally ambitious for a sinful world? Sure. The Progressives are a radical party.

Our "ideology" is freedom

As such, they will never come to power. That is one of the merits of our two-party system. In power, the Progressives might indeed lead us into isolationism, of the dangerous monastic kind that fears to sully American ideals by contact with the Churchills and Stalins of this world. But transmuted into the practical politics of a major party, the Progressive ideals will be heard from yet. When the American conscience reawakens, and power without "ideology" turns out to be not good enough, we will be able to thank the Progressives for keeping alive and uncorrupted an American "ideology"—belief in universal freedom.

Meanwhile, of course, the Republican or Democratic United States Government will cooperate with Mr. Churchill. We can even go along with him in keeping hands off, if necessary, on the fine old grounds of "nonintervention," a cornerstone of international law. Yet neither Franco, nor Britain's rule in India, nor our own many shortcomings, nor any form of tyranny is permanently safe so long as America harbors her La Follettes, her democracy and her beliefs. Said Oliver Wendell Holmes, "Not by aggression, but by the naked fact of existence we are an eternal danger and an unsleeping threat to every government that found itself on anything but the will of the governed."

Eighty-seventh Birthday Anniversary of Timothy W. Crowley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, on May 20 of this year Mr. Timothy W. Crowley, of Hartford, Conn., celebrated his eighty-seventh birthday anniversary. I wish to make note of the fact, for I wish to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an account of the birthday celebration which was published in the Hartford Times of May 20, 1944.

Mr. Crowley is not known to many present Members of the Senate, but there was a time when he was well known here. He was one of the labor leaders of the United States when many of the Johnny-come-latelys were not even in existence. More than 52 years ago he was president of the Connecticut Federation of Labor. He was a friend of my father all his life, and I wish to take special note of the occasion to the end that I may notify Mr. Crowley that there are some of us who still have very great regard and affection for him.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"TIM" CROWLEY, VETERAN LABOR LEADER, AT 87 ALL READY TO DUPLICATE BIRTHDAY CAKE FEAT

Those who remember the "Night of the Big Wind," when Tim Crowley blew out 86 candles with one breath on his birthday cake a year ago tonight, are expecting him to duplicate the feat tonight with an extra candle.

Timothy W. Crowley, 303 Sigourney Street, says he won't disappoint anybody when the cake comes in tonight at the celebration in his honor given by the Patriotic Irish-American Societies of Greater Hartford, of which he is president.

Hale and hearty and rarin' to go, Tim got out his fiddle today to see whether he can still play a tune. He can. Once a well-known musician around Connecticut, the old master hasn't lost his touch.

Crowley has been the most active union and labor man in the State since almost anyone can remember. While he was playing the violin he organized musicians' unions in Meriden and Bridgeport. Samuel Gompers recognized his good work here and appointed him an official organizer for the American Federation of Labor. He was president of the Connecticut Federation of Labor 52 years ago.

Tim is particularly proud of a gold-headed cane presented to him by the Central Labor Union of Meriden when he was president of that body. He also has twice been elected president of the Hartford Central Labor Union, the last time only 4 years ago. He is still its most active member, giving speeches throughout the State.

An ardent politician, Tim reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD religiously every day, "keeping tabs," he says, "on what's going on in Washington."

Small Business Plank for Political Platforms

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an open letter by George J. Burger, publisher of the magazine National Independent, and a proposed 1944 plank on small business as suggested for endorsement by the national conventions of the Democratic and Republican Parties, all of which appear on the frontispiece of the May 1944 issue of the National Independent.

There being no objection, the letter and proposed plank were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL INDEPENDENT PROPOSES A SMALL-BUSINESS "PLANK"

To Leaders of the Democratic and Republican Parties—Anticipating Their June and July 1944 National Conventions:

Respectfully, we submit for earnest consideration a small-business plank for insertion in each party's 1944 platform.

We can think of no other step of an economic character that is more important at this precarious moment in the history of our country.

The special committees of the Senate and House of Representatives respectfully, have performed yeoman's service for small business. By what they have done, they probably have actually saved the day for American small business.

These worthy Senate and House committees on small business require more power and authority in their endeavors to protect and preserve the American small-business system.

The 1944 National Conventions of the Democratic and Republican parties can render prompt and valuable aid to American small business—if their leaders have the will to do so—by adopting a small-business plank recommending the permanent establishment of the existing small business committees of the Congress of the United States.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE J. BURGER,
Publisher.

A 1944 "PLANK" ON SMALL BUSINESS PROPOSED FOR ENDORSEMENT BY THE NATIONAL CONVENTIONS OF THE DEMOCRATIC AND REPUBLICAN PARTIES

RECOGNITION OF A CONSTANT, VITAL RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN DEMOCRACY AND THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF SMALL BUSINESS

We recognize the existence of a constant, vital relationship between democracy and the American system of small business. The two are coincident and coextensive. Neither can survive without the other. Small business is fighting for its life. Centralization, anathema to small business and to democracy alike, stalks the land as never before. Therefore, we earnestly recommend to the Senate and to the House of Representatives of the United States that proper steps be taken at the earliest possible moment to establish the existing special committees on small business of the Senate and the House, respectively, as permanent, standing committees with full privilege of making reports directly to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

Hon. James V. McClintic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 15, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting excerpts from a letter written by our distinguished former colleague, Hon. James V. McClintic, of Oklahoma, which is in line with some of the statements of President Roosevelt, Secretary of State Hull, and other leading Americans.

Mr. McClintic's letter reads, in part, as follows:

TRUTH CRUSHED TO EARTH WILL RISE AGAIN

Washington, D. C., May 10, 1944.

Mr. DREW PEARSON,
Care of the Washington Post,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: My attention has been called to the following statement emanating from your journalistic bureau:

"McClintic served in a chair-warming job as Special Assistant to the Secretary of the Interior and, after 9 years, Ickes proposed transferring him to work outside Washington, to which he was better suited. But McClintic refused to go, whereupon Ickes let him out."

As a matter of fact I was with the Interior Department a little over 2½ years instead of 9 years, and the records will so show. The work outside of Washington related to the mining of anthracite coal in Pennsylvania concerning which I knew nothing. Therefore, I advised the office of Mr. Dan H. Wheeler, Director of the Division of Coal Mines, that I would secure a transfer to another department of the Government. As to your statement that "Ickes let him out," this is one of those "circulating lies" that Senator MCKELLAR branded you recently with in the Senate. If you had checked the records of the War Department as Congressman JED JOHNSON and I asked your office to do, you would have found that they showed that a requisition had been approved by the War Department for my transfer before any person in the Interior Department knew about it. Further, on January 22, 1944, I personally advised Secretary Ickes that I was leaving his Department to accept a position in the War Department.

Since the President of the United States has already described you as a "chronic liar" and the Secretary of State has called you a "purveyor of monstrous falsehoods," naturally I am not surprised at the above falsehood which you have manufactured out of whole cloth. Your excursions into the field of mendacity and exaggeration * * * are so well known to the people of Washington and the country, that even your attempted character assassination of the Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States occasioned little surprise.

I do not have the misfortune of personal acquaintanceship with you but occasionally I do hear you and a "diploma mill" quack nauseating the American people over the air by extolling the virtues of a cathartic whose all-purpose efficacy the Federal Trade Commission is now investigating.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure I express the sentiments of all the Members of this House who served with him when I say there is not a more loyal, a more sincere, or a more patriotic man connected with this Government than our distinguished former colleague, James V. McClintic of Oklahoma.

Our Way Still the Best

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, while New Dealers, like WALLACE and Tugwell, talk and write about remaking America, about a coming revolution; while Sidney Hillman, the new political dictator, and the labor racketeers functioning under the name of committee for political action, and Earl Browder, the ex-convict released from prison by the President to campaign for a fourth term, and now heading the Communist political association, are attempting to take over and remake constitutional government into a form of dictatorship, here at home the cold, hard facts of the war demonstrate that our way, the way of the forefathers, the way which prevailed until the coming of the New Deal, is still the best; still will produce the most in the shortest possible time; still bring more of all desirable things to the people of a country.

If you do not believe it, read the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of June 3, 1944, and check with your own knowledge of the facts:

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE IN WAR

The Anglo-Russian parliamentary committee is circulating in London reprints of an article from the Russian journal, Bolshevik, praising the Soviet's war machine, with particular emphasis on war industry and agriculture. The article, written by M. Kalinin, chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, extols the Soviet system and discounts the contributions of the United States to Russia. It says nothing about the great number of superior weapons that Russia got from us and declares that lend-lease food is "only auxiliary—nothing more," adding that Soviet agriculture is "the foremost in Europe."

The collectivists obviously are out to prove that their system of economy is the best, and it would be most difficult for them to complete that proof if they had to start off by attributing to a capitalistic power a large part of the credit for their successes.

Sensible people certainly will not deny the might of Soviet Russia's armies as shown in their 3-year struggle with the best that Hitler has had to offer. Nor will anyone be inclined to detract from the valor of the Red fighting men, their tenacity, courage, and skill, and the brilliant Soviet generalship which resisted the siege at Stalingrad, has driven the Germany Army back into old Poland, and has freed the greater part of Russia from the invader.

If the apologists for the communistic and socialistic systems are going to take credit, they would be wise to confine it to that type of success. When they start shouting about the might of the Soviet war industries and Soviet agriculture, they are exposing their chins.

Soviet Russia has a population of nearly 193,000,000 persons, as against a population of about 132,000,000 in the United States. It has an area of nearly 9,000,000 square miles as against less than 4,000,000 square miles in the United States and possessions. The Bolsheviks have had more than 25 years to perfect their system of economy and have been able to draw upon the experience of the capitalistic countries liberally in developing industrial procedure.

With these facts acknowledged, anyone would think that Russia, if communism is so superior, would have produced at least as much in war material and services as the United States, where the system of private enterprise still operates, much to the disgust of the American Communists.

The Royal Institute of International Affairs, a British association, has published during the last few months a series of statistical accounts on the economic war effort of the principal nations of the world. Statistics of this type are extremely difficult to assemble for purposes of comparison because of the different systems of bookkeeping in the various countries, because of differences in exchange and purchasing power, and because a good deal of information has been kept secret.

Certainly the statistics in the Royal Institute bulletin are not loaded in favor of the United States. The British author, for instance, declares that the standard market basket, an economist's measure of food costs, sells for 75 percent more in the United States than it does in England; American shipbuilding costs are known to be 60 to 100 percent higher than English, and American book costs probably exceed those of the British by 50 percent. Therefore, he sets the English pound sterling as between $6.50 and $10, instead of $4, the current rate of exchange. This may or may not be factually accurate, but it surely does not lead to any exaggeration of American achievement.

With due apologies for educated guesses and estimates where figures are lacking, the British author says that expenditures for war goods and services during 1943, at British prices, stack up about as follows (in millions of British pounds sterling):

Russia	5,000
Greater Germany	9,000
United States	11,500
United Kingdom	4,000
British dominions	1,500
Japan	1,600 to 1,700

This means that the "war effort" of Russia is considerably less than half that of the United States, measured according to a British denominator which also places capitalist England and her dominions together about on an equal footing with Communist Russia. The figures do not, in any case, credit lend-lease goods to the production of the country receiving them. In other words, Russia's figure is what she has done for herself in the war during 1943, which is what the Communists are talking about.

With a lot fewer citizens to do the work, and less than half the land area to draw upon, the United States produced more than twice the war supplies during 1943 than the Russians did under communism, and we had not yet reached our peak.

There is no doubt that Russia has done well by her standards, but America has done twice the job under an economic and political system which preserves rights and freedoms for the citizens found nowhere else on earth.

Mayo and A. D. Canulette, Jr., Establish Record as World's Youngest Boat Builders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the Canulette Shipbuilding Co., of Slidell, has demonstrated its ability and distinguished itself in the construction of one of the most important naval vessels that is needed in the war effort at this time. Several days ago it was my pleasure, opportunity, and good fortune to be present at the launching of what is known as a submarine boom net tender. At this launching Navy officials, Army officials, Canulette Shipbuilding Co. officials, and the workmen who produced this necessary and marvelous instrument for our part in the war were present. The boat is an unusual-looking boat and is perhaps one of the most powerful ships of its size that was ever designed. This vessel is one of the most important ships that are utilized in this war, as it is used for laying submarine nets, mines, and other extremely important work.

The Canulette Shipbuilding Co., which is owned by two distinguished families of Canulettes, demonstrated long before the war as builders of some of the finest marine equipment and dredge boats that were ever constructed.

A. D. Canulette, Jr., and Mayo Canulette are not only the principal operators of this company, but they constitute perhaps the two youngest boat builders in America, A. D. Canulette being 27 and Mayo Canulette 25. With their limited water facilities they have done not only an outstanding job, but have practically done the impossible, as many experts predicted that they could never build, launch, and float these vessels with the water facilities that were available to their yard. Several of these boats have been constructed and commissioned, and several more are under construction. These boats cost over $1,000,000 and are as powerfully equipped as any boat of their class in the world. Perhaps one of the most inspiring spectacles at the launching of this boat was the honor as sponsor given to the wife of the chief mechanic of the yard, Mrs. John Panks, Jr. She was assisted by her daughter, Mrs. Robert Rugan.

To be present at this launching ceremony was truly a great inspiration, especially when you saw the multitude of workmen who had constructed that great vessel, the Army and Navy officials, the Canulettes, and the sponsor start the boat sliding briskly down the ways with the traditional breaking of the bottle of champagne. Naturally it was a proud moment for myself as this shipyard is located in my district, and to be present was indeed a signal honor. I am proud of those who produce such ships by their hours of sweat and toil, of the Canulettes, who have demonstrated their genius as boat builders, and of all those who worked so hard to produce another vast instrumentality that we know will lead us to total victory in this great world struggle and conflict.

The Atlantic Charter as It Relates to Finland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 5 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, Hon. O. J. Larson, former Congressman from Minnesota, a resident of Duluth; Rev. Paul A. Heideman, of the Finnish Apostolic Lutheran Church of America, at Calumet, Mich.; Henry Puranen, of the Finnish American League for Democracy, Fitchburg, Mass.; and V. K. Nikander, president of Suomi College and Theological Seminary, the Finnish Lutheran Church of America, at Hancock, Mich., on May 20, 1944, addressed a letter to the President of the United States. The writers of this letter and those whom they represent are sincere in their desire to help preserve the principles of the Atlantic Charter as it relates to Finland and other small independent states. Therefore, I feel that their thoughts should be known to all Members of this body, and for that reason I ask to have a copy of this letter inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 20, 1944.

The PRESIDENT,

The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Representing the overwhelming majority of Americans of Finnish stock may we further petition your aid in bringing to an end the hostilities existing between Russia and the Republic of Finland?

Heretofore our committee has made representations in person and by letter to Secretary of State Hull and has been received by Assistant Secretary of State Long and Mr. Cumming, of the Department. We have endeavored to point out the great moral cause of American participation in the war and how it would be served at this juncture by an amicable settlement of the existing hostilities between Soviet Russia and Finland.

There can't be any doubt—and this has been officially recognized—that in the case of the Finnish-Russian fight, the winter war of 1939–40 as well as the present conflict, Finland has been the victim of Russian attacks. Whatever may be the social and official taboos of the present day in this regard, the fact remains that Finland, with a population of less than 4,000,000, has not attacked Russia, has not joined the Axis, has at no time fought for aggrandizement, has been motivated purely by purposes of defense of her homeland and the right to govern it according to the will of her own people, and in the main the people of America so recognize the situation between Finland and Soviet Russia.

May we not petition you today, Mr. President, to intercede in this matter, in true accord with the spirit of the second article of the Atlantic Charter, remembering that of the post-war democracies founded in Europe after the last war, Finland is the only one that survives today with its original constitution. We choose to believe that this is due to the fact that it is founded on the identical principles of our own Government and the basic tenets of true representative government of justice, peace and democracy.

And may we reiterate what we have previously maintained, that:

1. Democratic, peace-loving, and progressive Finland is entitled to continue its existence as a free and independent nation for, as Lincoln pointed out in his first inaugural address, a country and its institutions belong to the people who inhabit it. From the birth of our Nation the traditional policy of the United States has been one of friendship and help to the small democratic countries.

2. Finland is entitled in all fairness to know the terms on which peace is made. Unless Finland is advised beforehand of those terms, its powerful and ruthless enemy may later demand conditions which mean Finland's complete annihilation as a nation. To accept the present Russian terms would be tantamount to committing national suicide. Finland is not dominated by Nazi Germany, for if she were, how could she even have begun to discuss the conditions presented by Russia, especially when the conditions include the demand for internment of German troops.

3. The present war in which Finland is involved is a continuation of the war which began with the invasion of Finland in 1939 and for which aggression Russia was expelled from the League of Nations.

4. Finland has given evidence of her good faith in seeking peace by welcoming territorial and governmental security guaranteed by Great Britain and the United States. Her sole threat to permanent peace and maintenance of genuine autonomy and independence is from the side of Soviet Russia.

5. Deep-rooted attitudes of a people do not change overnight. Filand continues to want peace, and wants only the freedom to continue to govern herself. Accusations of atrocities on the part of the Finnish Army and suggestions that Finland has committed herself to the Axis do not ring true.

6. Finland's outstanding record of honest dealing with the United States, as well as her record as a democracy from the beginning of her independence, are the proper criteria from which to judge her present dilemma. It is our earnest plea that she will not be deprived of the sustaining friendship of our great Nation at this crucial moment.

7. The recent exchange of notes between the Finnish and Soviet Governments, as to possible peace terms, plainly states the reasons why the Republic of Finland cannot accept the terms and conditions laid down by the Russians. Neutral circles which laid the foundation for the conversations between the two countries have likewise been shocked by the severity of the Russian terms. Translated into realities, the size of the indemnity and the insistence of the Russians upon retaining the fruits of her former war of conquest over Finland will mean the utter extinguishment of national life and independence in the Republic of Finland.

In submitting this plea to you, Mr. President, we voice the sentiment of Finnish American religious and other groups representing a membership and affiliates of approximately 500,000 people. Among these are the following: The Finnish Evangelical Lutheran Church of America, also two large Finnish Apostolic Lutheran bodies, the Knights and Ladies of Kaleva Lodges, temperance groups, the Finnish American League for Democracy, and the coperative groups, both farmers' and consumers' cooperatives, and all the noncommunistic fraternal organizations, all of which have a Nation-wide membership. Eight Finnish-language newspapers in our country, whose patriotism and loyalty to our country are unquestionable, are of the view we are voicing.

Very respectfully yours,

O. J. LARSON,
Former Congressman from Minnesota.

A Plea for the Faith of Our Fathers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. H. CARSON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. CARSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein a timely article written by Mr. E. J. Landor, of Canton, Ohio, who during a long and useful life has been an outstanding example of a true American; and an exponent of the principles upon which our country was founded, developed and will continue to stand. The following message by Mr. Landor in connection with I am an American Day is an inspiration to all of us in these dark days when Americans are fighting to preserve and perpetuate the faith of our fathers:

A PLEA FOR THE FAITH OF OUR FATHERS
(By E. J. Landor)

We need to remember our history, to read again of that God-inspired man whom we call the Father of our Country. We need to note, on every occasion when success comes to our armies in the fight for freedom, how George Washington gave the credit to an allwise Providence, and when defeat came again and again he ascribed the result to his belief that Providence withheld victory for good reason.

We need to turn to the noble Lincoln, with his love and trust of the common people, of whom he said, "God must love them since He made so many of them." Time and again the common brotherhood of man was revealed to us by Lincoln who walked humbly, yet confidently, trusting the people as no one before had done—completely, anticipating their desires, but pointing out what had to be done to secure them and, withal, seeking guidance from the Creator of us all.

We need to turn to our own beloved citizen, William McKinley. When he realized that the Philippines had dropped into our lap, he confessed he did not know what to do with them. He sought counsel from all sides, but got little help. He walked the floor of the White House night after night. At last he got down on his knees and prayed to Almighty God for light and guidance, and one night it came to him that we could not give them back to Spain—that would be cowardly and dishonorable—we could not turn them over to France or Germany—they were our commercial rivals in the Orient—we could not leave them to themselves—they were unfit for self-government. There was nothing left for us to do but take them and educate the Filipinos, uplift and civilize and Christianize them, and by God's grace do the best we could. And McKinley tells us how he then went to bed, went to sleep and slept soundly.

The next morning he sent for the chief engineer of the War Department (our map maker) and told him to put the Philippines on the map of the United States. "There can be no imperialism," said William McKinley. "Those who fear it are against it, so that there is universal abhorrence for it, and unanimous opposition to it. Our only difference is that those who do not agree with us have no confidence in the virtue or capacity or high purpose or good faith of this free people as a civilizing agency, while we believe that the century of free government which the American people have enjoyed has not rendered them irresolute and faithless, but has fitted them for the great task of lifting and assisting to better condition and larger liberty those distant peoples who through the issue of battle have become our wards. A self-governing people will never permit despotism in any government they foster and defend. The burden is our opportunity; the opportunity is greater than the burden."

Again, the American people will be faced with an issue not unlike that faced by President McKinley: Shall we retreat into our isolationist shell, or shall we, realizing how gracious God has been to us as a Nation do our best "to educate, uplift, civilize, and Christianize" the backward races and by our example lead the more forward ones to do likewise; in other words, to realize "the burden is our opportunity and that the opportunity is greater than the burden"?

Let us not forget it was the labor of missionaries, 70 years or more before Pearl Harbor, who so influenced the Papuan race of New Guinea that our boys lost in the jungles of that wild country found not savages but friendly people who aided them.

We may not reach the heights that George Meredith outlined but we can aim to do so, aspire to do so. He is quoted as saying: He who looks for a future which he himself will not enjoy reaches the height of nobility and valor. This is the supreme achievement of self-mastery, self-discipline, and self-sacrifice, and the finest magnanimity we may have upon earth."

After the fall of France, a workman of France sent us a warning, in part as follows: "We persisted in our errors * * * we persisted in leveling the nation down, in imagining that the state would prove an everlasting milch cow. Our awakening has been rude * * * we old men do all we can to help, morally and materially, the nation. We shall have to bow our heads but no force on earth will be able to break our hearts. Tell this to the Americans, warn them at the same time of the perils that may befall democracy when it forgets free men have duties as well as rights."

As an aid toward this high ideal, let me suggest that when we pray we first ask to be given grace so as to deserve to be heard; then let us pray for courage, the royal gift of courage, that we may do each disagreeable duty at once.

We should follow this with a prayer for a keen sense of honor; that we may never give ourselves the benefit of the doubt; that we may be especially just to those we find it hard to like, and that we may own up manfully when we have done wrong.

Then let us ask for a true sense of humor, that its kindly light and healing power may rule life's tension; and further let us ask for a restrained and well-ordered ambition that we may not miss things that are noble and beautiful.

But above all, let us ask that we may be true and loyal to the best and highest we know and that we may show this truth and loyalty in every activity of our common life, and so live to the glory of our Creator.

Keeping Promises to Our Flying Instructors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, I think it imperative that the Army Air Forces of the War Department keep their promises to thousands of our boys who signed up in good faith for a certain branch of service. To give a clear picture of what is taking place I insert a resolution and other tables and statements:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT REUNION OF POLAR BEAR ASSOCIATION, DETROIT, MICH.

Whereas the War Department of the United States did authorize the Civil Aeronautics Administration to enlist and encourage the training of 25,000 aviation cadets and offered inducements that such cadets upon completion of their training course would be appointed staff sergeants, flight officers, or commissioned second lieutenants; and

Whereas documentary evidence exists that cadets enlisted in the Civil Aeronautics Administration program were given good reason to believe that opportunity was being afforded them to obtain aviation cadet training, and upon graduation to receive commissions in the Army Air Forces of the United States, and

Whereas the War Department has now canceled the CPT-WTS program after many thousands of students had devoted their time as cadets in training for a period ranging rom 12 to 18 months and that no provision has been made to fulfill the obligations of the War Department and the Civil Aeronautics Administration of the Department of Commerce; and

Whereas under date of March 13, 1942, Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, by order of the Secretary of War, did issue circular No. 75 amending Circular 204, War Department 1941, providing for the enlistments to the Air Corps Enlisted Reserve Corps, of students in the pilot training course conducted by the Civil Aeronautics Administration and for the appointment of aviation cadets who met requirements as cadets of the United States Army, also that persons enlisted in the Air Corps Enlisted Reserve Corps would be called into active service at the termination of the course; and

Whereas the Civil Aeronautics Administration of the Department of Commerce under date of June 19, 1942, through its Acting Administrator, did address Mr. Lynn U. Stambaugh, National Commander, American Legion, Indianapolis, Ind., advising that the Civil Aeronautics Administration is highly grateful that the American Legion will assist in recruiting 13,350 candidates for specialist pilots which the Army Air Forces have asked us (the Department of Commerce) to train, and further advised that it would be most helpful if the 12,000 posts of the Legion would spread the word, giving candidates proper information and assist in making applications; and

Whereas under date of October 8, 1942, the Headquarters Army Air Forces did issue a routing and record sheet on the subject of additional training for C. P. T. students, stating that graduates of C. P. T. instructors course will be called to active duty and receive instructions at schools under the jurisdiction of the Commanding General, Flight Training Command, and upon completion they would be rated as service pilots, appointed flight officers or commissioned second lieutenants A. U. S., and further it was definitely stated that commissions will be given to those outstanding graduates with performance in air force schools and in the Air Force units in which they may serve upon completion of training; and

Whereas under date of October 2, 1942, P. H. Walton, major, Air Corps, assistant chief Aviation Cadet Section, Military Personnel Division, O. D. T., addressed The Adjutant General on the subject of promotion and ultimate rank of trainees who entered the Enlisted Reserve to take civilian pilot training, stating that cross-country link instrument courses are classified as advance C. P. T. courses and that graduates of these courses will be assigned to air lines through the Air Transport Command as copilots and to the Flight Training Command as instructor material. These reservists will receive further flight training and that those best qualified under this training will be rated service pilots and be commissioned as second lieutenants, Army of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Polar Bear Association does hereby call upon the War Department to make suitable provisions for fulfilling its obligations and promises to students in the cadet program, now being disregarded, which, in our opinion, is unfair and not in accord with the best interests of the United States and the war effort; be it further

Resolved, That we request the Congress of the United States to immediately enact suitable legislation providing commissions for those who have completed the primary, secondary, and cross-country flight courses and either the elementary-instructor course or link-trainer course; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senator VANDENBERG, Senator FERGUSON, Senator LA FOLLETTE, and Senator WILEY and to all Members of the Congress from Michigan and Wisconsin with a plea to them that they support and encourage prompt passage of legislation that has been introduced for the correction of the problem resulting from the recital herein and that this be done at once before the Congress adjourns, and that the president of the Polar Bear Association appoint a committee to see that this work is done.

BRADLEY R. TAYLOR,
Chairman,
BOB GUNNIS,
HARRY COSTELLO,
LARRY SALTER,
Resolutions Committee.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY AIR FORCES,
Washington, October 2, 1942.

Subject. Promotion and ultimate rank of those trainees who enter the enlisted reserve to take civilian pilot training.

To The Adjutant General.

1. It has been brought to the attention of this directorate that C. P. T. regional directors are not in all cases well informed as to the changes of promotion and ultimate rank of those trainees who enter the Air Corps Enlisted Reserve to take civilian pilot training.

2. Accordingly, it is requested that the Adjutant General recommend to the commanding generals of the Service Commands that they coordinate their recruiting efforts with the regional directors of the Civilian Pilot Training and advise them that under present policy:

a. All students meeting the requirements for liaison pilot, whether they be assigned for duty with the Army Air Forces or with the Field Artillery, will be appointed Staff Sergents with liaison pilot rating.

b. All class A glider pilot students obtained from the C. A. A. program will be promoted to Staff Sergeants upon graduation from an Advanced Army Glider Pilot School.

The length of the Army glider pilot course is:

Elementary, 4 weeks, 30 hours.
Basic, 4 weeks, 30 hours.
Advanced, 2 weeks, 15 hours.

c. Cross country link instrument, and instructor courses: These are classified as advance C. P. T. courses. Graduates of these courses will be assigned to the air lines through the Air Transport Command as copilots, and to the Flying Training Command as instructor material. These reservists will receive further flight training. Of those assigned to Flying Training Command as instructor material, only those who become best qualified under this further training will be rated service pilots, commissioned second lieutenants, Army of the United States, and assigned as instructors in basic Army schools. Those among the instructor material who do not qualify as above indicated, but who do qualify to instruct in elementary schools, will be assigned to civil contract schools. All reservists who do not qualify as indicated above will be assigned to duty in a capacity for which they are best qualified.

d. Graduates of the C. P. T. flight officer schools at Burlington, Vt., and Houston, Tex., will be transferred through the Air Transport Command to air lines. They will remain on an inactive status in the Air Corps Enlisted Reserve and will be assigned on a civil contract basis.

e. Eliminations: Reservists who are eliminated from any of the higher groups of training as measured in flying time requirements will be given opportunity to qualify for an appropriate lower group as measured in flying time requirements as follows:

(1) In addition to assigning washouts from the instructor, link instrument course, and cross country course to training as control tower operators, many may be appointed staff sergeants with liaison rating or made available for glider pilot training.

(2) Washouts from elementary C. P. T. will be called to active duty as privates and assigned to appropriate training in an enlisted capacity.

For the commanding general, Army Air Forces.

J. M. BEVANS,
Colonel, Air Corps, Director of Personnel.
By P. H. WALTON,
Major, Air Corps, Assistant Chief, Aviation Cadet Section, Military Personnel Division, O. D. P.

CHICAGO, ILL., December 11, 1942.
VANS AIR SERVICE,
Municipal Airport, St. Cloud, Minn.:

Authority granted to continue enlistment of flight instructors mechanics and apprentice mechanics in accordance 3CPT-484 up to midnight December 15 in case of individuals actually employed on CPT work on December 5. Letter must be furnished by CPT representative certifying such employment. Release forms 190 not needed from draft boards. Physical examinations will be given at enlistment center War Department instruction enlistment stations to give priority such enlistment applicants. Men so enlisted not to be called for minimum 6 months and will be commissioned immediately upon being ordered active duty. Procedure for temporary deferment such employees who are not enlisted by December 15 will be in Accordance Bulletin 3WTS-4 being issued today.

W. E. BARTON,
Civil Aeronautics Administration.

This is a true copy of what these men have been promised at the time they enlisted. These men are all volunteers. They should be given what they were promised as follows:

The former trainees of War Training Service who have completed certain courses satisfactorily, should be put on flying status and receive the grade which was indicated they would receive upon successful completion, as outlined in the War Department memorandum of October 2, 1942, signed by Col. J. M. Bevans for the commanding general, Army Air Forces. The instructors in the War Training Service program should be given equivalent grades on flight status for which they are qualified.

The men have kept their promise—will the Congress keep the faith with these men who only want to serve in the capacity for which they were trained?

Edward Wester Creal

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character and public service of Hon. EDWARD WESTER CREAL, late a Representative from the State of Kentucky

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the opinion of everyone attending the memorial exercises on last Wednesday, May 31, that they were beautiful and very impressive.

It is very timely and appropriate that the Congress should at least once a year conduct memorial exercises, engaging in prayer and song in paying honor and respect to our colleagues who have been called to answer the last roll call here on earth.

I cannot let this occasion pass without paying a brief tribute to my beloved colleague and friend, who was an important member of the Agriculture Committee of the House, of which I am chairman. I refer to the late EDWARD W. CREAL, of Kentucky.

He was a man of ability, conscientious, and deeply interested in his people and his country. He was the type of Congressman who did not play politics. He preferred rendering service, advocating and working for constructive legislation.

For many months prior to his death he was a sick man, but he did not shirk from doing his full duty. It might well be said that he truly gave his life for his people and his country.

We so often speak of the casualties of war. The passing of EDWARD W. CREAL was one of these casualties, for he gave his life in service for his country.

I prized very highly his work on my committee as well as his personal friendship, and shall miss him.

There is one thought which I would like to pass on to his loved ones and his friends, that is, in his passing he has been relieved of sickness and all pain, and, while his body is resting beneath the soil of his beloved State, Kentucky, his soul is basking in the beautiful sunshine of peace and rest, awaiting an abundant entrance into that beautiful home prepared for those who love the Lord.

Discharge of a House Employee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD M. KLEBERG

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement issued by me to the press today:

Certain charges were made in morning newspapers today and over the radio last night concerning the firing by me of a boy on my patronage list, because he complained of deductions being made in his salary. I have investigated the case of this boy and the following are the facts:

The boy was placed on the pay roll under my patronage by my late secretary, Bill Elliott, who died of a heart attack some weeks ago. Bill Elliott had my implicit faith and confidence and he was in complete charge of the running of my office and the making of my congressional patronage appointments. I do not know what arrangements, if any, Bill Elliott might have made with this boy when he was placed on the pay roll.

I now find that deductions were made in his salary that went to defray office expenditures for duties which he could not perform. This arrangement operated from the time of his employment on February 4, 1944. The boy was not fired by me and my office has given no instructions to anyone to remove him from the pay roll. In pursuing my investigation of his case, I was informed this afternoon by Mr. R. R. Roberts, doorkeeper of the House, that he, Mr. Roberts, had fired the boy for failure to report for duty.

This is all I know of this case and these are the facts.

Address by the President on the Capture of Rome

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the radio address delivered by the President of the United States on last evening be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Yesterday, June 4, 1944, Rome fell to American and Allied troops. The first of the Axis capitals is now in our hands. One up and two to go.

It is perhaps significant that the first of these capitals to fall should have the longest history of all of them. The story of Rome goes back to the time of the foundations of our civilization. We can still see there monuments of the time when Rome and the Romans controlled the whole of the then known world. That, too, is significant, for the United Nations are determined that in the future no one city and no one race will be able to control the whole of the world.

In addition to the monuments of the older times, we also see in Rome the great symbol of Christianity, which has reached into almost every part of the world. There are other shrines and other churches in many places, but the churches and shrines of Rome are visible symbols of the faith and determination of the early saints and martyrs that Christianity should live and become universal. And now it will be a source of deep satisfaction that the freedom of the Pope and of Vatican City is assured by the armies of the United Nations.

It is also significant that Rome has been liberated by the armed forces of many nations. The American and British Armies who bore the chief burdens of battle found at their sides our own North American neighbors, the gallant Canadians. The fighting New Zealanders from the far South Pacific, the courageous French and the French Moroccans, the South Africans, the Poles, and the East Indians—all of them fought with us on the bloody approaches to Rome.

The Italians, too, forswearing a partnership in the Axis which they never desired, have sent their troops to join us in our battles against the German trespassers on their soil.

The prospect of the liberation of Rome meant enough to Hitler and his generals to induce them to fight desperately at great cost of men and materials and with great sacrifice to their crumbling eastern line and to their western front. No thanks are due to them if Rome was spared the devastation which the Germans wreaked on Naples and other Italian cities. The Allied generals maneuvered so skillfully that the Nazis could only have stayed long enough to damage Rome at the risk of losing their armies.

But Rome is, of course, more than a military objective.

Ever since before the days of the Caesars, Rome has stood as a symbol of authority. Rome was the republic. Rome was the empire. Rome was the Catholic Church, and Rome was the capital of a united Italy. Later, unfortunately, Rome became the seat of fascism—one of the three capitals of the Axis.

For a quarter century the Italian people were enslaved and degraded by the rule of Mussolini from Rome. They will mark its liberation with deep emotion. In the north of Italy, the people are still dominated and threatened by the Nazi overlords and their Fascist puppets.

Our victory comes at an excellent time, while our Allied forces are poised for another strike at western Europe—and while armies of other Nazi soldiers nervously await our assault. And our gallant Russian allies continue to make their power felt more and more.

From a strictly military standpoint, we had long ago accomplished certain of the main objectives of our Italian campaign—the control of the sea lanes of the Mediterranean to shorten our combat and supply lines, and the capture of the airports of Foggia from which we have struck telling blows on the continent.

I would be unwise to inflate in our own minds the military importance of the capture of Rome. We shall have to push through a long period of greater effort and fiercer fighting before we get into Germany itself. The Germans have retreated thousands of miles, all the way from the gates of Cairo, through Libya and Tunisia and Sicily and southern Italy. They have suffered heavy losses, but not great enough yet to cause collapse.

Germany has not yet been driven to surrender. Germany has not yet been driven to the point where she will be unable to recommence world conquest a generation hence.

Therefore the victory still lies some distance ahead. That distance will be covered in due time—have no fear of that. But it will be tough and it will be costly.

In Italy the people had lived so long under the corrupt rule of Mussolini that, in spite of the tinsel at the top, their economic condition had grown steadily worse. Our troops have found starvation, malnutrition, disease, a deteriorating education, and lowered public health—all byproducts of the Fascist misrule.

The task of the Allies in occupation has been stupendous. We have had to start at the very bottom, assisting local governments to reform on democratic lines. We have had to give them bread to replace that which was stolen out of their mouths by the Germans. We have had to make it possible for the Italians to raise and use their own local crops. We have to help them cleanse their schools of Fascist trappings.

The American people as a whole approve the salvage of these human beings, who are only now learning to walk in a new atmosphere of freedom.

Some of us may let our thoughts run to the financial cost of it. Essentially it is what we can call a form of relief. At the same time we hope that this relief will be an investment for the future—an investment that will pay dividends by eliminating fascism and ending any Italian desires to start another war of aggression in the future. They are dividends which justify such an investment, because they are additional supports for world peace.

The Italian people are capable of self-government. We do not lose sight of their virtues as a peace-loving nation.

We remember the many centuries in which the Italians were leaders in the arts and sciences, enriching the lives of all mankind.

We remember the great sons of the Italian people—Galileo and Marconi, Michelangelo and Dante—and that fearless discoverer who typifies the courage of Italy, Christopher Columbus

Italy cannot grow in stature by seeking to build up a great militaristic empire. Italians have been overcrowded within their own territories, but they do not need to try to conquer the lands of other peoples in order to find the breath of life. Other peoples may not want to be conquered.

In the past, Italians have come by the millions to the United States. They have been welcomed, they have prospered, they have become good citizens, community and governmental leaders. They are not Italian-Americans. They are Americans—Americans of Italian descent.

Italians have gone in great numbers to the other Americas—Brazil and the Argentine, for example—and to many other nations in every continent of the world, giving of their industry and their talents, and achieving success and the comfort of good living.

Italy should go on as a great mother nation, contributing to the culture and progress and good will of all minkind—and developing her special talents in the arts, crafts, and sciences and preserving her historic and cultural heritage for the benefit of all peoples.

We want and expect the help of the future Italy toward lasting peace. All the other nations opposed to fascism and nazi-ism should help give Italy a chance.

The Germans, after years of domination in Rome, left the people in the Eternal City on the verge of starvation. We and the British will do everything we can to bring them relief. Anticipating the fall of Rome, we made preparations to ship food supplies to the city, but it should be borne in mind that the needs are so great and the transportation requirements of our armies so heavy that improvement must be gradual. We have already begun to save the lives of the men, women, and children of Rome.

This is an example of the efficiency of your machinery of war. The magnificent ability and energy of the American people in growing the crops, building the merchant ships, making and collecting the cargoes, getting the supplies over thousands of miles of water, and thinking ahead to meet emergencies—all this spells, I think, an amazing efficiency on the part of our armed forces, all the various agencies working with them, and American industry and labor as a whole.

No great effort like this can be a hundred percent perfect, but the batting average is very, very high.

I extend the congratulations and thanks of the American people to General Alexander, who has been in command of the whole Italian operation; to General Clark and General Leese, of the Fifth and the Eighth Armies; to General Wilson, the supreme allied commander of the Mediterranean theater, and General Devers, his American deputy; to General Eaker; to Admirals Cunningham and Hewitt; and to all their brave officers and men.

May God bless them and watch over them and over all of our gallant fighting men.

They Are Not Dead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following introductory remarks of Hon. W. Nelson Page, of Winchester, Va., as well as the remarks made by me at the Confederate Memorial Day exercises in Winchester, Va., on June 6, 1944:

REMARKS OF W. NELSON PAGE, INTRODUCING A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, CONFEDERATE MEMORIAL DAY, JUNE 6, 1944

We are gathered here on this morning of June 6 for the seventy-ninth celebration of Confederate Memorial Day, and sad it would be for the traditions of Winchester if its observance was ever discontinued. However, I feel that as long as we have citizens with such spirit and loyalty as Miss Lucy Kurtz and the other members of the Stonewall Association, the memory of those who lie beneath this hallowed ground will never be forgotten.

Time flies fast, for it seems to me that it was only a few years ago when the streets of Winchester, on the morning of the 6th of June, were as crowded as on the days of our recent apple blossom festival, waiting for the parade to pass by. The outstanding feature of this parade was the Turner Ashby Camp of Confederate Veterans, which was largely made up of the fathers or grandfathers of many of those present today. Today not one is left. Only their memory remains.

It has always been the custom to hold these exercises on this same spot, within the shadow of that impressive shaft standing there as guard over the 829 unknown and unrecorded Confederate soldiers who lost their lives on the battlefields around Winchester, with its inscription, "Who they were, none know; what they were, all know." At these exercises distinguished speakers have always given us inspiring speeches. Today will be no exception to this rule.

It is not necessary for me to introduce the speaker to this audience, for to most of us he is well known, having served you faithfully and well for many years as your Congressman in Washington. Having known him intimately for over 30 years, I have a few things I would like to tell you about him which you probably do not know and which I think especially qualifies him for your speaker at these exercises. Major ROBERTSON is a member of the Jamestown Society. Such memberships are extended only to those whose ancestors either lived or owned land on Jamestown Island prior to 1700. Major Robertson's forebears fought in the Revolutionary War and in the War of 1812. His great great grandfather, Isaac Willis, served with distinction as a captain. His son, while too old to serve in the Civil War, sent 10 of his sons as his contribution to the Army of the Confederacy. Capt. Archie Robertson, the grandfather of Major Robertson, was killed at Cold Harbor, while leading Company I of the Nineteenth Virginia Infantry.

During the First World War Major ROBERTSON and I attended the second officers' training camp together at Fort Myer, Va. He served throughout the war with distinction and rose to the rank of major. He has taken an active part in the Sons of Confederate Veterans and served as commander of the army of northern Virginia in this organization. He was awarded the Confederate cross of honor at a meeting of the Virginia Daughters of the Confederacy held in Norfolk in 1940.

Major ROBERTSON since his childhood has always had a warm spot in his heart for Winchester, for it was here that his mother, who is now 86 years of age, attended school which was operated by her uncle, Edward Willis. With this background I believe you will agree with me that Major ROBERTSON is well qualified to make the address for us today.

I take pleasure in presenting Maj. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, Member of Congress from the Seventh Congressional District of Virginia; Major ROBERTSON.

THEY ARE NOT DEAD

(Address of A. WILLIS ROBERTSON at the Memorial Day exercises in Stonewall Cemetery, Winchester, Va., June 6, 1944, under the auspices of the Stonewall Memorial Association and the Turner Ashby Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy)

Eighteen months after the close of a bitter, unfortunate, and unnecessary struggle in which the Valley of Virginia was one of the major battlegrounds, this cemetery was dedicated to the memory of those who had died in defense of the principle of self-government. On that day, October 25, 1866, was interred here the mortal remains of a great cavalry leader, Turner Ashby, who fell on June 6, 82 years ago, while leading on foot a charge against Federal troops after his horse had been shot from under him. Previously, there had been interred in the cemetery the bodies of 2,494 Confederate veterans who had fallen in numerous battles around Winchester, in which the city gained the unique, if undesired, distinction of having changed hands in the period of one war more often than any other city in the world. Not even Jerusalem, before whose walls more armies have contended than before any other city in the world, can claim the distinction of having changed hands 87 times in all of recorded history, much less in the period of 1 war.

The people of Winchester felt deeply on the subject of States' rights before the armed conflict of 1861-65 commenced and much more deeply before that conflict ended. The great English military writer, Lt. Col. G. F. R. Henderson, said of Winchester, in his monumental work on Stonewall Jackson:

"In Winchester itself the feeling against the North was exceptionally bitter. The town was no mushroom settlement; its history stretched back to the old colonial days; the grass-grown entrenchments on the surrounding hills had been raised by Washington during the Indian wars, and the traditions of the first struggle for independence were not yet forgotten. No single section of the South was more conservative. Although the citizens had been strong Unionists, nowhere were the principles which their fathers had respected, the sovereignty of the individual State and the right of secession, more strongly held, and nowhere had the hereditary spirit of resistance to coercive legislation blazed up more fiercely."

As I read that description of the people of Winchester, written nearly half a century ago but just as true today as it was then, my thoughts reverted to that first struggle for independence to which Colonel Henderson had referred, and to that incomparable Revolutionary leader, Daniel Morgan, whose ashes repose in the adjoining cemetery of Mount Hebron. Unlike Gen. Turner Ashby, General Morgan did not spring from an aristocratic family, but like Ashby, he was a natural leader of men. General Morgan came to Winchester as a 16-year-old runaway boy escaping from the severe apprenticeship of a Welsh ironmaster. Like Ashby, he did not attend any college nor receive previous training in any school of military science, but, like Ashby, when the call came to take up arms in defense of a principle in which he believed, he promptly raised a company of volunteers and was selected as its captain. Both leaders were men of great personal charm, both were men of exceptional vitality, personal courage and driving force, although in stature Morgan was built on the lines of the broadsword, while Ashby on those of the rapier. Both were known far and abroad for their superb horsemanship. In a service of a little more than a year Turner Ashby rose from the rank of captain to that of brigadier general, while in a service of nearly 7 years in the Revolutionary War Morgan rose from the rank of captain to that of major general. Morgan's victory in the battle of the Cowpens was possibly the most brilliant victory won by the American forces during the entire Revolutionary War. Stonewall Jackson's valley campaign is considered by all military writers to have been the most brilliant handling of a small body of troops against greatly superior numbers in the annals of modern warfare. While the fame for the strategy of the valley campaign justly belongs to Jackson, the trained soldier and the great tactician, historians are agreed that it was the bold dashing operations of his cavalry leader Ashby, skillfully screening Jackson's turning movements and his utilitization of strategic interior lines against greatly superior forces that made Jackson's success possible.

After the Revolutionary War had ended a committee of the new Congress decided to send out questionnaires to all who had played an important part in winning the war, including, of course, General Morgan. Whereupon, the General in great disgust, did what a lot of businessmen today would like to do, turned the questionnaire over and endorsed on the back: "Fought everywhere, defeated nowhere." Had it been the pleasure of Him who governs in the affairs of men to have permitted Turner Ashby to have survived his leader, Jackson, and to have ridden with the immortal Lee at Appomattox, he could still have made the same endorsement upon a similar questionnaire, because, as Gov. Henry A. Wise said when he dedicated this cemetery: "A lost cause! If lost it was false; if true it was not lost."

The Daughters of the Confederacy, whose inspiring motto is "Love makes memory eternal," have proven it is not a lost cause. And while keeping alive through these annual memorial exercises the memory of those who have died in order that we might live in a democracy, have likewise proven the eternal truth of Pericles' statement that "the whole earth is the sepulcher of famous men; and their story is not graven only on stone over their native earth but lives on far away, without visible symbol, woven into the stuff of other men's lives." Over the graves of 815 unknown soldiers, the first monument in this country ever erected to an unknown soldier, they caused to be inscribed on that magnificent monument of marble the words: "Who they were none know, what they were all know." Knowing what they were, as well as the principles for which they fought and died, has been the motivating spirit of the people of Winchester through succeeding generations.

I am glad Colonel Henderson saw fit to record in his life of Stonewall Jackson, which is a standard textbook in the English military schools and has been read by the military leaders of all nations, Mrs. Jackson's tribute to the women of Winchester, in which she said:

"The Winchester ladies were amongst the most famous of Virginia housekeepers, and lived in a good deal of old-fashioned elegance and profusion. The old border town had not then changed hands with the conflicting armies, as it was destined to do so many times during the war. Under the rose-coloured light in which I viewed everything that winter, it seemed to me that no people could have been more cultivated, attractive, and noble-hearted. Winchester was rich in happy homes and pleasant people; and the extreme kindness and appreciation shown to General Jackson by all bound us to them so closely and warmly that ever after that winter he called the place our 'war home.'"

Everyone who has ever visited in Winchester knows how well merited that tribute was in the winter of 1861 and how well merited it is today. But that is but a part of the contribution of the ladies of Winchester to Virginia and American history. In the Revolutionary War, when there were only some 300 families, they gathered together the gear of the longriflemen who followed fighting Dan Morgan of the Long Rifles; like Spartan mothers, they sent their boys into the wilderness with hearts that were unafraid and with memories of a hearthstone worth fighting for. In the spring of 1861 the women of Winchester helped equip the members of the old Second Virginia Regiment, quartered at Halltown, near Harpers Ferry, then serving without benefit of commissary or quartermasters department. At the head of that women's organization was a distinguished and patriotic woman, Mrs. Philip Williams, ably assisted by her sister-in-law, Mrs. A. H. H. Boyd, who soon gathered around her an army of earnest workers who from that time until the close of the war devoted themselves to feeding, clothing, and nursing Confederate soldiers. And shortly after the war (as I have previously indicated) the Memorial Association was organized with Mrs. Philip Williams as president; Mrs. Boyd, Miss Mary Kurtz, Miss Tillie Russell as vice presidents; and Miss Lucy Williams, secretary.

In World War No. 1 the patriotic women of Winchester joined Red Cross units to make dressings and bandages for the boys overseas and contributed in many ways to the victory we won on the battlefield and lost at the peace table. True to their inherited traditions, the women of Winchester and the citizens generally of Winchester have nobly responded to every demand that has been made upon them in World War No. 2, and have gone over the top in every drive for the sale of War bonds and in contributions to the Red Cross and other service agencies.

When, in the spring of 1917, the call came again to take up arms in the defense of a principle of Government, we had another illustration of the meaning of those words "woven into the stuff of other men's lives." Winchester sent into World War No. 1 some of the bravest men who ever died that others might live. On the roll of fame was written high another Winchester name, Capt. Robert Y. Conrad, who fell on October 8, 1918, while leading his company to victory on the Meuse-Argonne battlefield. No one yet knows who the outstanding hero from Winchester in World War No. 2 will be, but there are plenty of boys from Winchester in the service in whom the qualities of heroism are bred in the bone. Typical of the Winchester spirit was the action of young Beverley Byrd in securing a transfer from the Field Artillery to the Paratroop Service, the most hazardous service of this or any other war. When the invasion of Fortress Europe commences I can think of a lot of places I would rather be than floating down behind the German lines. All paratroopers are volunteers. Of all who successfully complete the paratrooper precombat training the world can stand up and say, "Here is a man." But that was the spirit of Morgan and Ashby—always happiest when most exposed to danger.

We told those who fought in World War No. 1 that we would make secure our democracy at home by making the whole world safe for democracy. The bodies of some of those who fell in that struggle are sleeping in Stonewall Cemetery. If today their spirits could speak to us from the pearly parapets of paradise, they would express their pride in the fact that the torch they flung us from their falling hands we have again held on high; but they undoubtedly would also express the hope that after victory this time on the battlefield we will not again permit the forces of evil to recover from their defeat and to commence another world war for the slaughter of the innocent and the destruction of personal freedom. In the "Life of Turner Ashby" by his biographer, Dr. Thomas A. Ashby, the author said:

"The Civil War will probably be the last great struggle the people of this Nation will ever see, and it is not probable that great international wars will ever again occur among the civilized powers of the world. The war between Russia and Japan and the recent struggle between the Turks and Balkan powers teach the lesson of more peaceful solutions of international differences."

After those lines were penned but before the book in which they were included left the printing presses, World War No. 1 had commenced. The War between the States was a war between gentlemen in which the rights of noncombatants were recognized, and the lives of women and children were protected. That fundamental fact was indubitably proven by the treatment of Lee and his generals by Grant and his generals at Appomattox, and further reflected in the treatment of a Union officer by the Confederates of Winchester shortly after Appomattox. Capt. William McKinley, of an Ohio regiment, was visiting in a Winchester hospital with the regimental surgeon and observed the unusually friendly relations between the surgeon and certain wounded Confederate prisoners of war. When he inquired of the surgeon the basis of those friendships, the surgeon replied, "It is because we are brother Masons." Whereupon Capt. William McKinley exhibited one of the qualities that later caused him to be elected President of the United States, when he said: "I would like to be a member of such a fraternal organization." Winchester Masonic Lodge, Hiram No. 21, made Capt. William McKinley an entered apprentice, passed him to the fellowcraft degree, and on May 3, 1865, raised him to the exalted degree of Master Mason, Worshipful Master J. B. T. Reed conferring the degree. But World War No. 1 was not a war fought between gentlemen, and its present sequel is not that kind of a war. We are fighting tyrants who exult in brutality, unrestrained by any principles of humanity or common decency. And if we have the misfortune to be involved in another global war, it will undoubtedly be fought on the basis of complete extermination.

It is idle to speculate upon when scientists will learn the secret of splitting the atom and the development of an explosive force 10 times, perhaps a hundred times, more destructive than any explosive now used in warfare. We give thanks, of course, that German scientists have not so far discovered the secret ahead of us, although a few months ago there was a rumor to the effect that they had and would disclose to us their new and secret weapon when we invaded Hitler's Fortress Europe. We already know enough about the destructive power of the modern engines of war to know that this global war must be the last global war. To the veterans of World War No. 1, who justly feel that their comrades died in vain, I express the hope that the Recording Angel will blot out with a tear the black page of our history when we stumbled in our march toward the goal of a lasting peace.

As I stand here today on the ground hallowed by the ashes of those who were true to their trusts and who were unafraid to die in defense of their principles, I promise the veterans of World War No. 2 that we realize the price they are paying for our failure to win the peace after World War No. 1 and that we will not fail again. In the words of our distinguished Secretary of State, we shall "dedicate ourselves to the great task yet remaining before us." My earnest prayer is that the women of the Nation unite with the patriotic and Christian women of Winchester and Virginia in demanding a peace after victory on the battlefield which will be lasting as well as just. Throughout recorded history no empire founded by a ruthless dictator has survived. George Washington could have been a king; George Washington could have been a dictator. The empire founded by him survived because he had no ambition save to excel in the service of his fellow men, and the torch of personal liberty he lifted in 1776 has for a century and a half been the hope of oppressed people throughout the world.

Those who sleep in these two cemeteries—heroes of three great struggles—would be glad to know that we have again lifted high the torch of personal freedom. In the greatest instrument ever struck off by the hand and purpose of man, in which was guaranteed constitutional liberty in a representative democracy, and a system of private enterprise under which a penniless boy like Daniel Morgan could die seized and possessed of 250,000 acres of land, our ancestors laid the foundation, not only for our peace, happiness, and prosperity but likewise the foundation for world leadership in the cause of world peace, based on equality, justice, and freedom. They measured up to their opportunities. We will be untrue to their memories if in this crisis we fail to measure up to ours. The American boys on the fighting fronts have been true to a glorious heritage. On the fighting front they will win for us this war. On the home front we must win for them the peace.

Observer Sees Fourth-Term Issue as Independence Versus C. I. O. Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank R. Kent from the Washington Star:

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS—OBSERVER SEES FOURTH-TERM ISSUE AS INDEPENDENCE VERSUS C. I. O. CONTROL

(By Frank R. Kent)

From the confusion of the preliminary Presidential campaign there is now emerging an issue of such vital importance that it should be made clear to every voter. Particularly, it should be understood by those in the armed services, here and abroad, who will cast their ballots by mail.

But, it is unlikely this can be done, as the politicians in one party are interested in not having it made clear and those in the other apparently lack the courage to do so.

However, if some way is not found to bring the facts home to the Nation as a whole, it may wake up next year to find a form of government riveted upon it wholly foreign to the American idea and entirely unpalatable to the American taste.

The essence of this issue is whether the people of the United States are ready to have the country run by the radical bosses of one labor faction—to wit, the C. I. O. That is really the question.

This is no partisan exaggeration. It is a simple statement of fact, which neither the war nor the administration propagandists should be allowed to obscure.

EVIDENCE OF DOMINATION

Evidence that C. I. O. domination of the next administration is bound up in the success of the Roosevelt fourth-term attempt is sufficient to convince almost any detached observer. As a matter of fact, few would deny that the C. I. O. has highly flavored this administration in the past 8 years.

The point is that under existing conditions another Roosevelt reelection will enhance its power far beyond any previous conception, will, in fact, place it in a controlling position.

Before stating the case, it is worth recalling that since its inception in 1935 Mr. Roosevelt and the C. I. O. have consistently operated as a political unit.

From the sit-down strikes of his first administration on up to the recent national-service proposal which, though he recommended it on the insistence of his military heads, he has allowed to languish following C. I. O. opposition, there has been no public question upon which they have been divided. The C. I. O. supports the President on every domestic policy; the President supports the C. I. O. on all labor matters.

Again and again, since the war began, he has complimented the C. I. O. upon its "magnificent record" at a time when many war contracts were being held up by C. I. O. strikes, and the C. I. O. has exuded fulsome eulogies of Mr. Roosevelt's management both abroad and at home.

The link between the C. I. O. and Mr. Roosevelt is strong beyond dispute. It has existed for more than 8 years and has been mutually beneficial. Mrs. Roosevelt is a member of the C. I. O., and it was the C. I. O. which Attorney General Biddle meant when he proclaimed the New Deal "a political party tied in with the labor movement under an able political leader."

He certainly did not mean the A. F. of L., which does not endorse candidates and contains many Republicans opposed to the fourth term. It is the C. I. O., with which the "tie-up" was made before the 1936 election and, except in 1940, when Mr. Lewis broke personally with Mr. Roosevelt, but failed to carry his following into the Willkie camp, there has been nothing to mar the complete political cooperation.

IN THE LIGHT OF THE RECORD

To appreciate its true significance, the present situation must be viewed in the light of the above record. The facts about the 1944 campaign to reelect Mr. Roosevelt are clear.

The fourth-term movement was inaugurated by the C. I. O. leaders and is being managed by them. The demand for his reelection has come from them; and their unions, claiming 5,000,000 members, have been unanimous in his endorsement.

A fund, the lowest estimate of which is $750,000, has been raised for the preconvention work, and the active agency is known as the Committee on Political Action. It is headed by two former members of the administration and close friends of the President—Sidney Hillman, the director, and C. A. Baldwin, deputy director.

In every part of the country this committee is active in Mr. Roosevelt's behalf. It is far bigger, much better financed, much better directed, and with much better publicity facilities than the Democratic National Committee, which it seems to be completely overshadowing

True, it is saturated with communism, filled with radicals and racketeers, but it is 100 percent for Mr. Roosevelt. In other words, if Mr. Roosevelt is reelected he will owe it to the C. I. O. The war, the Negro vote, the Federal job holders, and other elements will contribute, but the C. I. O. is his basic and indispensable asset. Without it he cannot win.

If he wins, the C. I. O. will have a right to claim it elected him. He is its candidate. He will, if elected, be its President, and its influence in the administration—and the Democratic Party—will be controlling. That is the logic of the situation and the only possible deduction from the record.

The question is whether the American people—especially the American soldiers—are ready to turn their Government over to this particular labor union through continuing in office a President under that kind of obligation and with that kind of hook-up. As a result of this election, either the C. I. O. will have its heel heavily on our neck or we will have declared our independence.

Servicemen's Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker:

There sometimes arise cases of extreme hardship involving dependents of servicemen. Many dependents, and even members of the armed forces themselves, are not fully acquainted with the two emergency agencies set up for the express purpose of helping such persons in need.

These two agencies have many branches over the country. They are the Army Emergency Relief Fund, whose functions have recently been assigned to the Red Cross, and the Navy Relief Society.

ARMY RELIEF FUND

Any member of the armed forces in the Army can appeal to the Army Relief Fund at the special offices set up in each Army camp in the United States and overseas or through the Red Cross if he is not in camp, for needed immediate financial assistance, and he will receive courteous and willing assistance at all times. The fund is open to all dependents of men and women in the Army. Should anyone know of any servicemen's dependents at home or any serviceman in immediate need of financial assistance, advise them to get in touch at once with the Army Emergency Relief Fund direct or through the local Red Cross office.

Another agency is the Navy Relief Society. Any dependent of a man or woman in the naval forces can appeal to this agency for urgent financial assistance. Any member of our naval forces in urgent need of financial help can appeal to this agency, and his needs will be taken care of. To get immediate action from the Navy Relief Society, it is advisable to take up the case through the local chapter of the Red Cross. The Red Cross is in a position to expedite these matters.

ONLY FOR SERVICEMEN

These two agencies were set up to take care of the urgent critical cases of men in the service who are in need of immediate financial aid. This service is available only to men actually in the armed forces and is not available to servicemen who have been discharged. Likewise, the service is available only to dependents of men in our armed forces, and not to dependents of a discharged soldier or sailor.

If urgent need actually exists, it should not take more than a few hours to get financial help for anyone who is in financial distress. The Army and Navy emergency relief funds reach out into every community in the country. This emergency help is available at all times, and our service men and women and their dependents should have no hesitation in making application for it when in real need.

Should you know of any critical case in your neighborhood, you will perform a real act of kindness by calling on that person and advising him that this service is available. Have them get in touch with the Army Relief Fund officer, 1360 Civic Opera Building, 20 North Wacker Drive, Chicago 6, Ill., or contact your local Red Cross. Should any further question arise on what to do in cases for emergency aid for members of the armed forces or any of their dependents, see your county veterans' service officer, or write to me, Congressman WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Townsend National Recovery Plan Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER A. RAMEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, as of this hour, 188 Members of this House have attached their signatures to discharge petition 17 which would bring H. R. 1649 out of the Ways and Means Committee and on to this floor for debate and a vote.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that we need, all told, 218 signatures to accomplish this step, which means, in turn, that we now lack 30. Nor do I think it is necessary for me to add that H. R. 1649 is commonly known as the Townsend National Recovery plan bill, sponsored by a national organization of some 10,000 organized clubs and with a 10-year history behind it of consistent, progressive, constructive effort.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to stand here and plead with anyone to join me and the other 188 Members of this House who have signed discharge petition 17. I wish only to say that those who have not signed this petition, regardless of their personal sentiments on this legislation, are denying us for no sound reason the right to debate the issue. If there is something wrong with H. R. 1649, let us find it out on the floor; if there is something good about it, let that be known, too. A pigeonhole is no place for a bill which I can safely state affects, under its provisions, every citizen of this country and is ardently desired by millions of them.

If the facts were known about H. R. 1649, there would be practically no limit to its supporters. I can safely state that it is only because we have not been permitted to make the facts known that I find any need to limit myself at all.

Mr. Speaker, there are Members of this House who, I know, sincerely, for one reason or another, are not inclined to indicate their support of H. R. 1649. I am not asking them to support it. I am not asking them to say one word for it. I am not asking them to vote for it. I insist, however, that by signing discharge petition 17 they are not lending support to the bill itself. They are merely giving us an opportunity to be heard.

H. R. 1649 is not an old age pension bill except in that it does provide for annuities to citizens over the age of 60. But when one stops to consider that millions of those beneficiaries will be stepping out of the pay rolls on which their names are now to be found—in most cases at the risk of their lives and certainly at the risk of their health and give way to jobs for returning veterans, this measure ceases to be an old-age pension bill and becomes, as it really is, a national post-war recovery plan.

It is even more a national recovery plan in the sense that every dollar thus expended in the form of annuities must be spent within 30 days of receipt by the beneficiary. We are worried about purchasing power in the post-war years. H. R. 1649 has the answer. We are worried about unemployment in the post-war years. H. R. 1649 has the answer. We are fretting because the present clumsy, inadequate social security set-up does not include farmers and farm workers, small businessmen and domestic help, professional men and a host of others—well—H. R. 1649 includes them all as any adequate social security system should and includes them as a matter of right.

In my considered opinion, no Member of this House has a right to deny us a hearing on this matter by refusing his signature on discharge petition 17. He can vote as he pleases. I do not care about that. That is none of my concern. It is my concern to do everything I can to insure that full discussion and an actual vote is taken on H. R. 1649.

Let that be remembered. Congress, these last many years, has lost ground in public respect, because Congress, in some degree at least, has ceased to be the inspiration of legislation and has become, in too large measure, the passive "yes man" to somebody else's suggestions.

As I understand my history and my Constitution, the basic job of Congress is to legislate the will of the people. I can assure you that H. R. 1649 sprung directly from the people. The least we can do is to give them a chance to have their day in court.

HON. HARRY SAUTHOFF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, my friend, Gene Chloupek, has written several poems during this war emergency which have received favorable attention. His best known poem, My Neighbor's Boy, has appeared in publications all over this country, and has been broadcast a number of times over the radio.

Gene Chloupek loves the young folks and writes to 200 boys and girls in our armed forces. Like all of us he was deeply affected by the news of the invasion and wrote this prayer during this solemn hour:

IN HUMBLE PRAYER

We come in humble prayer, this day,
For liberation we all pray.
We ask, oh God, Your helping hands,
To rescue those on ravaged lands.

We ask Your help for all the weak
Throughout the world, for whom we speak.
And even those who have been strong,
The battle has been much too long.

We millions, Lord, raise anguished cry,
As tortured thousands daily die,
And souls of children suffocate
Within the walls of cruel hate.

When trumpet calls proclaim D-day,
We're pleading that You'll lead the way
As Christian soldiers march to war,
To vanquish evils we abhor.

Oh God, protect our valiant men,
And bring them safely home again,
Our banners soaring in the sky,
The cross of Jesus ever high.

In the Midst of War, Prepare for a Just and Lasting Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in the midst of the greatest war known to history and on the day of the invasion of the Continent of Europe we gird ourselves for the sacrifice that faces us. On December 7, 1941, our Nation was attacked by the stealthy and merciless aggressor, Japan. War in all its terror struck an incredulous people without warning, and a peace-loving Nation realized that in order to live in future peace we must engage in a period of war. It is not my purpose to engage in theoretical arguments with anyone who takes the position of absolute pacifism. I do not condemn the conscientious objector to war. I realize the horror, the loss of life and limb, the sorrow of those bereft of loved ones, and the suffering of the innocent caused by war. With all my heart and soul, with every fiber of my spiritual being, I abhor war.

We who believe in the teachings of our great spiritual leaders, who in all good conscience strive to follow the law of the spirit, find it hard to wage the war of the flesh. We realize that world peace will never be established unless it be established on the spiritual principles as set forth by the Prince of Peace, the lowly Nazarene. We further believe that some day those principles which we believe in will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. But we are confronted with the forces of evil—not in a spiritual way—trying to convince us with logic or persuasion, but with all the misdirected force and ingenuity which the devil in carnal flesh can wield. As a Christian nation, we are faced with powerful antagonists who make no pretense of a belief in a God of mercy and love. They openly disavow the principle of universal brotherhood which we espouse. The Japanese worship as their diety the person of their Emperor as well as multitudinous Shinto idols. The German-Nazi state not only denies the divinity of the Christian God but advocates the idolatrous worship of the mythical pagan gods and idols of German antiquity.

Although we disagree with these philosophies, we still, as a tolerant people, have made no move toward restraining the Japanese and German nations from their worship of the philosophy of their choice. This spirit of Christian tolerance was neither appreciated nor understood by our enemies, for the philosophy which they espouse does not contain either the corresponding quality of tolerance or the fundamental concept of the equality and brotherhood of man. They look upon tolerance and mercy as decadent weaknesses and their supreme Fascist state religion is founded on the theory of the master race—applied to themselves—and the classification of the balance of mankind to the status of an inferior race. To these people, logic and peaceful indoctrination or persuasion has no place. Might makes right, and physical force is the answer to all argument. They revile the God we worship, deny the spiritual principles we espouse, and kill and torture our people. I ask the pacifist: Is it God's will that we submit without a struggle to the forces of evil? Shall we stand with abject mien and unprotesting arms while the light of civilization is extinguished and the cross of Christianity burned on the sacrificial altar of paganism? Shall we stand supinely by and meekly bow before the armies of the devil as they despoil our homes and loved ones, and consign humanity again to Dark Age centuries? As one who has studied theosophy and in the full knowledge of spiritual teachings, I cannot answer "Yes" to these questions.

Abhorring war as I do with all my strength, I still make no apology for our part in this unwanted war we are engaged in. As Jehovah of old led the armies of the children of Israel against the idolatrous nations which threatened to engulf them, I believe that we have the power of God behind the armies of the United Nations. I believe there is an inherent strength in the cause of righteousness. We fight for the freedom and dignity of the individual soul, without which spiritual strength and growth is denied and without which true worship of God is impossible. We fight for the recognition of the brotherhood of all men everywhere, even those who are now our enemies, and unless the brotherhood of man is established universally, we can only pay lip tribute to the fatherhood of God. We fight for a better world than we've had before—a world "wherein dwelleth righteousness"; where an environment can be established in a physical and material way that will encourage spiritual growth among the children of men. These are the things we fight for, whether consciously or unknowingly.

In my opinion only a goal which includes these great spiritual aims justifies the travail which humanity is presently enduring. It is only through securing such a world for the men and women in our armed forces, to come back to, that we can justify the sacrifices of those who fail to return.

We who have on our shoulders the responsibility of waging this war also have the responsibility of formulating the peace. Future generations will evaluate our contribution to world stability; for weal or woe. We cannot escape the judgment of posterity. The decisions made by the United Nations after victory will determine the destiny of untold millions living and yet to be born.

Only a knave would approach this monumental task lightly. All the frailty, selfishness, and prejudices of human beings are handicaps we must overcome. I am confident we will win this war, because we fight in harmony with and for spiritual principles. I am confident that we will win the peace if we harmonize our approach to the peace table with those same spiritual ideals we fight for.

By recognizing the principle of the universal brotherhood of man, we establish a basis broad enough in scope to encompass every person living upon the globe. There are many specific peace plans and types of world organizations which are at present being advocated. It is not my present purpose to advocate any specific plan or order. I wish to comment along general lines, however, regarding certain broad principles I believe to be practical.

The United Nations must take the initiative in forming an international organization to function as a parliamentary, judicial, and executive body on global questions. Because of the present preponderant contribution in the war of liberation of the United States, British Empire, and Russia, these three nations must take the lead in establishing such an international organization. It is my opinion that China, because of her long fight against aggression and her potential strength in Asia, should also be given prime recognition. Before someone questions the scope of this international organization, let me state that I do not advocate limiting the membership to the four nations named. I believe that all the members of the United Nations and nations now considered neutral should be invited to join with the Big Four. I realize, however, that from a practical point of view the Big Four are contributing the most toward United Nations victory and, therefore, they will be in a position to contribute most toward world peace.

It is my opinion that world nuclear organization should be formed before victory, if possible, and that the present unity which exists primarily because of military pressure, should be utilized before the reason for this unity is weakened by victory. I advocate this reason for present action, in view of the almost immediate collapse of allied unity following the armistice of World War No. 1.

The first steps toward an international order is mutual agreement on broad principles of international procedure during the balance of this war. Many of these principles will extend into the post-war period. The various conferences between Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin, either together or through emissaries, have, I believe, established many of these fundamental, broad understandings. I refer specifically to the Atlantic Charter, the Casablanca, Teheran, and Moscow Declarations of intent. A close study of these documents will give many of us who desire a just and lasting peace, cause for hope and encouragement. The impractical person or the person who does not realize the tremendous complications involved in a permanent peace, is inclined to pass over these preliminary steps too lightly, but the student of international relations appreciates their importance. I consider these declarations as the first important steps toward international agreement in the post-war world.

In my opinion, the people of the world are entitled to ask their leaders to embody in their plans for an international order three great principles in order that we may have global peace. The principles I suggest are: International security, international justice, and international welfare of peoples. If these principles are embodied in the formulation of an international world order, we can have a permanent and lasting peace. If they are ignored, in part or together, world peace will be impossible. Volumes can be written on this subject. Space forbids proper elaboration on these three principles, but before I close these remarks, I wish to explain briefly my understanding of these terms in the order of their mention.

First, what do I mean by international security? By international security I mean that freedom from fear of military aggression shall be the universal possession of the people of every nation or race regardless of size or geographical location. This can only be accomplished through complete demilitarization of the aggressor nations on a permanent basis. It means that the international world order shall have control of all military power through conjunctive action, for power is as necessary for law and order among nations as it has been within the state since the beginning of domestic order. The belief that the public opinion of mankind, without organized power or force at its disposal, could restrain or prevent aggressor nations from crimes against their neighbors was the greatest fallacy embodied in the League of Nations. Power is and must be the final argument among nations for many centuries, I believe. The international organization must control and direct, through joint action of the "big four," adequate military power to preserve international law and order and to stamp out at their inception aggressive crimes of violence between member or nonmember nations. As the community of nations becomes more secure, the problem of international military policing will recede as it does in our domestic communities.

The second principle I wish to speak about is the principle of international justice. During the centuries we have evolved a tremendous and valuable dossier of international laws. Fifty-three nations have signified approval by becoming parties to these statutes. The Permanent Court of International Justice exercises judiciary function on international disputes. To preserve the cumulative procedures and experience of this great body is most important. Its continuity must be preserved. Its scope must be broadened to include all phases of international relations, whether they be problems resulting from war or commerce. As our domestic societies became more civilized and our commercial and social activities more complex, we have developed a more extensive system of legislative and judicial procedure. The same conditions of complexity in international relations has occurred and we must enlarge and expand international law and procedure to a commensurate standard. The development of such international machinery for mediation, arbitration, and enforcement of decrees will provide a just and fair alternative to war between nations, even as our legislative, judicial, and executive machinery has outlawed personal violence and established peaceful procedure in our domestic society.

The third principle I wish to explain is the one I call "international welfare of the peoples." More powerful than armies for the preservation of peace is the contentment of peoples. The policeman's club is a reminder of the need for maintaining law and order, but it does not replace the necessity for a successfully organized domestic economy. The problem of law enforcement in a well-organized and well-balanced community is a minor one. A community with basic strength in its economic, educational, and social relations, is a peaceful community. This is fundamentally true of a nation and by all the rules of reason and spiritual conception, it would be true internationally. Welfare and contentment of all peoples then, should be our goal. Development of backward and economically deficient nations is an imperative if we desire global peace. Can we attain this goal immediately? Even the most hopeful among us would say "No." However, we must publicly set the goal before the hopeless millions now in bondage—and work toward its achievement. Each advance, each improvement in the welfare of peoples, brings global peace nearer and eliminates the basic cause of war.

As the welfare of the people increases through full development of their domestic economies, conforming as nations to fair and just international laws in their relations one to the other—as they move toward a higher standard of living, free from the necessity of carrying the burden of oppressive armament programs, and free from fear of aggression—a new feeling of international security will be born in the hearts of men. When mankind turns toward God and starts practicing the principles of love, mercy, and brotherhood, then indeed will come true the prophecy of Isaiah the prophet:

They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: Nation shall not lift up sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any more.

Personal Affairs of Dependents of Men and Women in Our Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, there are in existence agencies to which persons in our armed and naval forces and their dependents, former members of these forces and the dependents of deceased members may go to secure information and advice on personal problems. I am sure most Members of Congress have had experience wherein they learned of a serviceman being bewildered and worried, due to some emergency, or where the dependents encountered difficulties which could have been averted had they known where to turn for help in the solution of their problems.

I refer to the fine jobs being accomplished by the Personal Affairs Divisions of the Army and the Welfare Division of the Navy.

These agencies, like good counsel, analyze the problems presented and then determine the appropriate action to be taken. When funds are required they make arrangements through the American Red Cross or Army Emergency Relief or the Navy Relief Society to meet the needs. Such funds are secured without interest or service charges and, in many cases, outright grants are made. Liberal arrangements are provided for the repayment of the money borrowed.

My experience with cases involving personal problems has led me to believe that many dependents and members of our armed forces are at a loss as to where to turn in emergencies. The multiplicity of agencies administering rights or benefits to which the individual may be entitled has created a complicated maze almost unsolvable to the serviceman and his dependent. These Army and Navy agencies are doing a marvelous job in offering the much-needed counsel to which our men in uniform and their dependents are so richly deserving. These agencies are available all ver America, and it would do well for all people to become acquainted with their services so that they might advise bewildered dependents and members of our armed forces just where and how they can get the needed information.

ARMY PERSONAL AFFAIRS

Any member of our armed forces in the Army can contact his personal-affairs officer who is stationed at service command headquarters, Army posts, camps, stations, and air forces installations and he will receive individual attention as respects his or his dependents' personal problems.

The personal affairs officer is also available to the dependents of military personnel. The dependents will receive courteous and sympathetic attention. Should anyone know of any dependent at home or any member of the Army who needs help concerning his personal problems, whether it be financial assistance, family allowances, allotments of pay, insurance, legal advice, medical care, maternity care, and so forth, advise him to communicate with or see the personal affairs officer as soon as possible. In northwestern Minnesota for immediate action contact the personal affairs officer, Fort Snelling, St. Paul, Minn., the local chapter of the Red Cross, or Congressman HAROLD C. HAGEN, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

NAVY PERSONAL AFFAIRS

Any dependent of a man or woman in our naval forces can go to the nearest naval station for information and advice on personal problems. Any member of our naval forces who finds himself in need of assistance or advice can contact the naval officer designated at his station to handle such matters. Should anyone know of any dependent of our naval forces in dire circumstances advise him to take it up with the Navy Relief Society. Should anyone know of any member of our naval forces needing assistance advise him or her to contact the Navy Relief Society. To get immediate action from the Navy Relief Society it is best to take it up through your local Red Cross. The local Red Cross will best handle the request for aid if the dependents concerned are connected with our naval forces.

NO NEED FOR MISERY

These agencies were set up to take care of urgent and critical cases in need of immediate advice and assistance. Should you know of any such critical case in your neighborhood, you would perform a real service by calling on that person and advising her or him that this service is available. This service is available to persons actually in our armed and naval forces and to their dependents, to former members of these forces and their dependents and to the dependents of deceased members. Prompt consideration is given all problems presented and the solution of the problem is speedily accomplished. There is no reason why any dependent or member of our military or naval forces should be confused and worried because of unsolved personal problems.

For information and advice, if connected with the Army, contact the personal-affairs officer, Fort Snelling, St. Paul, Minn., or the local chapter of the Red Cross.

If connected with the Navy, contact the nearest naval station or the local chapter of the Red Cross.

If you know of any case of a member of our military or naval forces or their dependents in need of information or advice concerning his personal problems, these suggestions should be helpful. Should any question arise concerning these services, contact Congressman HAROLD C. HAGEN, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

PAY SCHEDULE OF MEN AND WOMEN IN OUR ARMED FORCES

Mr. Speaker, questions are frequently asked about the rate of pay for men and women in our armed forces. I have prepared a pay schedule which many service families will desire to retain for the duration of the war because the occasion might come when knowledge of the rates would be helpful in connection with handling a matter for the service man or woman or his dependents.

This information is valuable to the people back home in the collection of gratuity-payment and arrears of pay in the event of a death casualty. For that reason I wish to place in the RECORD, summarized pay schedule of the men and women in our armed forces. Women in service receive the same pay as men in each of their ranks. The pay schedule follows:

Annual pay of commissioned officers

Navy	Army	Salary per year
Admiral	General	$8,000
Vice admiral	Lieutenant general	8,000
Rear admiral (upper half)	Major general	8,000
Rear admiral (lower half)	Brigadier general	6,000
Captain	Colonel	4,000
Commander	Lieutenant colonel	3,500
Lieutenant commander	Major	3,000
Lieutenant	Captain	2,400
Lieutenant (junior grade)	First lieutenant	2,000
Ensign	Second lieutenant	1,800

NOTE.—This is the base pay only. Subsistence is not included in the base pay schedule.

Monthly pay of other men and women in our armed forces

Navy	Army	Salary per month
First-grade petty officers (chief)	Master sergeant	$138
Second-grade petty officers (first class)	Technical sergeant	114
Third-grade petty officers (second class)	Staff sergeant	96
Fourth-grade petty officers (third class)	Sergeant	78
Fifth-grade nonrated men (first class)	Corporal	66
Sixth-grade nonrated men (second class)	Private, first class	54
Seventh-grade nonrated men (third class)	Private	50

NOTE.—This is base pay only.

YOUR CONGRESSMAN OFTEN CAN ASSIST IN FEDERAL MATTERS

Mr. Speaker, the fact that the Office of Dependency Benefits is handling in excess of 300,000 cases every week, is evidence of the many problems involved in the administration of this, the broadest program of its type ever undertaken by any nation. The war effort on the home front has become so involved in rules, regulations, and orders that many of our citizens are reluctant to even participate in any of the benefits fearing the red tape and effort necessary.

If any of the citizens of the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota have any fears of this nature, I should like to allay them now, for I will gladly cooperate with them and represent them at the offices of the Office of Dependency Benefits, if necessary or desirable.

One of the main problems has been for our service families to ascertain just to what benefits they are entitled.

In this respect, I would like to call the attention of my people to the fact that a Congressman's office is the best and surest way of getting help in straightening out Federal matters.

It is a Congressman's duty to help in difficult matters confronting his people. A Congressman is the people's representative in Washington. He is their agent. If undue delay or effort results from collecting the allotment or any benefit due, a Congressman is the best bet to contact to help take care of it and speed up consideration.

In my long experience here I have already helped in the adjustment of hundreds of dependency allowance cases and in other veterans matters. In my 10 years of time in congressional work I have helped to straighten out hundreds of insurance claims, and other problems of the veteran or his family of both First and Second World Wars.

FINANCIAL CLAIMS MAY BE HANDLED THROUGH A CONGRESSMAN'S OFFICE

Should anyone have a claim against the Government for a family allowance or any war benefit, it is best to first ask for help from the local Red Cross, local veterans' service office, or the service officer of your local veterans' post.

These local agencies will do everything they can. Sometimes, however, something goes wrong and the claims are not settled, or it takes too much time to get it completed. If that happens, it is suggested that you write to your Congressman and explain everything to him in detail. Your Congressman often can find out what is wrong and can help in getting settlement.

Should you know of any person whose claim is unduly long in being settled—remind that person that a Congressman's office is a most effective clearing house. Your Congressman has a direct connection with all offices in Washington. He can serve his people very effectively.

Your Congressman has received splendid cooperation from the offices here in settling claims and cases of various kinds. He can help you just as he has helped hundreds of others. Whether it be a claim for labor or service, an insurance claim, a dependency claim, a pension claim, or any other claim or Federal matter, use your Congressman if your previous efforts and contacts have not resulted in satisfactory action and results. Your Congressman will be glad to help you, as he has helped others.

For the people of this Ninth District of Minnesota the name and address is Representative HAROLD C. HAGEN, 1620 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Investigation of Farm Credit Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. R. POAGE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, about a year ago this House adopted a resolution (H. Res. 119) creating a select committee of seven members to investigate the activities of the Farm Security Administration. These seven members were all members of the Committe on Agriculture. They are Mr. COOLEY, of North Carolina, chairman; Mr. FLANNAGAN, of Virginia; Mr. ZIMMERMAN, of Missouri; Mr. PACE, of Georgia; Mr. HOPE, of Kansas; Mr. ANTON J. JOHNSON, of Illinois; and Mr. RIZLEY, of Oklahoma. These gentlemen have done a capable piece of work. They have recommended legislation which is now before the Committee on Agriculture. While very few, if any, Members will agree with every detail of the proposed legislation, the chief objection that has been leveled against it has been the fact that it does not attempt to reorganize the entire farm-credit program.

There are undoubtedly many features of the Farm Credit Administration that need attention. This committee is in a position where it can do this work promptly and efficiently. There is now pending a resolution—House Resolution 525—which, if adopted, would authorize this select committee to investigate the activities of the Farm Credit Administration with a view of determining what, if any, amendments to the laws administered by such administration are necessary or desirable. I hope the Rules Committee will report this resolution to the floor and that the House will adopt it without delay.

Yesterday the Committee on Agriculture of this House passed by a unanimous vote the following resolution:

Be it resolved by the House Committee on Agriculture, That we appreciate the splendid and diligent work of the special committee investigating the Farm Security Administration, that the Committee on Agriculture recognizes that this special committee has done an excellent piece of work and deserves the thanks of the Congress and of the Nation; be it further

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Committee on Agriculture that it is desirable and essential that a thorough and prompt investigation be made of the entire Farm Credit Administration, and that since this work is so closely associated with the work already done by this special committee, that this further investigation should be conducted by the same special committee that has conducted the investigation of the Farm Security Administration; therefore be it further

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture endorses House Resolution 525, authorizing this special committee to make further investigation of the Farm Credit Administration, and that we ask the Rules Committee to favorably report such House Resolution 525.

Mr. Speaker, I consider this a remarkable tribute to the services of this select committee. I hope that its members will be authorized to do another needed job for this House.

Liberation Day Is Here, a Prayer for Our Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the long-awaited moment has arrived. We were all electrified by the announcement this morning of the invasion of the Continent of Europe. This is undoubtedly the greatest military venture in the annals of history. The years of preparation, the mass production of military equipment and its transportation to the embarkation ports, the drilling and training of over 10,000,000 of our military personnel has pointed toward this day's venture. The impatience of the uninformed, the criticism of the misinformed is now a thing of the past. Action is the order of the day.

The bridge of ships and planes is now in operation across the channel which Hitler could not pass. The losses of Dunkerque and Dieppe will be avenged. This time we are assured by our military leaders that we have the men and equipment to smash the vaunted west wall of Hitler's Europe. Great pressure has been exerted during the past 3 years for the opening of the second front as applied to continental invasion from the west. England and the United States have been criticized because of their refusal to invade before we were properly prepared to invade, successfully. This pressure was withstood by our leaders, because they knew the futility of an invasion which lacked sustaining power. Our leaders knew that such an invasion meant the sacrifice of millions of our men and women.

But today, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared. Today we have the concentrated power in the air and on the ground to sustain our invasion properly. We know that our armies are the best equipped and best trained troops in the world. We know that their morale is at the highest. They are anxious to get on with the job of eliminating nazi-ism from the face of the earth. As this mighty avalanche of military power moves forward toward Berlin, we who are at home join with the liberated millions of Europe in the prayer that victory will crown our efforts quickly. We earnestly pray that the sacrifice of the precious lives of our loved ones be as few as possible. May God crown our efforts with speedy victory and bring our loved ones in the armed forces home to us soon.

Aged Citizens Become Victims of Higher Prices as Assistance Payments Remain Unchanged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, some years ago the attention of the Nation was on the plight of the forgotten man.

Today I want to talk about the abandoned man.

He has been left beside the road to eke out his existence under high wartime prices, and he cannot even sell apples on a street corner lest he fall victim of some bureaucratic regulation of which he is not aware.

The "abandoned man," Mr. Speaker, is symbolic of the venerable aged citizen, both men and women, of this Nation. A few years ago we started out to do so much for them. We planned a social-security program. A start was made. Small payments to them were begun in the various States. Then along came the war and all went blank—there was no further program nor increased payments. Their distress, their needs that accompany old age and medical relief for their aches and pains were no longer considered. The war program swept all that aside.

Soon industrial workers were realizing a good income from the sweat of their honest brow. Manufacturers of defense supplies were at last realizing a good margin of profit—even if it was under Government surveillance. Domestic servants realized substantial increases in wages as they literally went on the wage auction block as the manpower shortage forced housewives to bid against each other for help.

Despite price control, clothing prices went up. The price of medicine advanced. Other items increased in price.

Realizing that there were certain advances in living costs, despite the efforts to "hold the line," Congress began to authorize certain pay increases. Properly it increased the salaries of its Federal employees. Certain veteran benefits were somewhat liberalized—though not wholly adequate. Other steps were taken to raise wages of certain groups.

But through it all the recipients of benefits under the old-age assistance program continued to receive the same amount. These persons are extremely hard hit by the war. Their age or physical condition in many instances prevent them from participating in good wages paid in defense plants. Yet nothing has been done to adjust their allowance in line with wartime increases in prices.

With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, I introduced a legislative measure, H. R. 4167, on February 10, 1944, providing a 20-percent increase in the Federal contributions to the States for old-age assistance to the States, with the thought in mind that this be passed on directly to the recipients in the amount of 20 percent more of the Federal portion they now receive.

The text of my bill follows:

A bill to provide for a 20-percent increase for the duration of the war in the amount of the Federal contributions to the States for old-age assistance and in the amount of Federal old-age and survivors' insurance benefits under the Social Security Act

Be it enacted, etc., That during the period beginning on the 1st day of the quarter following the date of enactment of this act and ending on the last day of the quarter following the date of the termination of hostilities in the present war, as proclaimed by the President—

(a) The amount which the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay to each State having an approved plan for old-age assistance pursuant to section 3 (a) (1) of title I of the Social Security Act, as amended, shall be increased 20 percent and shall be calculated by not counting so much of the sum expended under the State plan with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds $48; and

(b) All Federal old-age and survivors' insurance benefits payable under title II of the Social Security Act, as amended, shall be increased 20 percent.

The Minnesota Delegation in the House of Representatives recently unanimously signed an urgent communication to the Ways and Means Committee of the House asking early action on H. R. 4167. Under the unanimous-consent privilege accorded me, I desire to read that letter into the RECORD. It follows:

MAY 4, 1944.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: Truly the forgotten men and women of this war are those venerable aged folks whose better years were spent in building up this Republic and its standard of living, and who now must rely on a meager Federal old-age assistance check for support because they are unable to participate in high war wages due to age, infirmity or disability.

Congress has seen fit to help Federal employees meet the high cost of living by wage increases. For the laboring man's wages there is the Little Steel formula, etc., and we have had roll-backs, rent control, and price control, and other aids for many other employed people.

But for these fine elderly people, their income has been frozen at the pre-war level because Congress has not authorized any increase in the grants to the States, but their rent, food, and other essentials are paid for at Government established war prices. They, along with many wage-frozen white-collar workers are the forgotten group in our country today.

There is pending before your committee, H. R. 4167 (introduced by a member of our delegation) which would provide an emergency 20 percent increase for the duration of the war in the amount of the Federal contributions to the States for old-age assistance and in the amount of Federal old-age and survivors insurance benefits under the Social Security Act.

We, the undersigned, respectfully petition the Ways and Means Committee to hold hearings on H. R. 4167, with a view to reporting it to the Congress for consideration at an early date.

(Signed by all House Members of the Minnesota Delegation in Congress.)

Persons in many States of the Union have written me concerning this legislation. They feel that these worthy elder citizens should have their assistance benefits adjusted to meet the wartime increases in their living expenses. It should be borne in mind that there are still items not covered by price control and among these are the services utilized by these folks.

From one State I have received a letter saying:

We have to pay as much as anybody else—and they had their wages raised—for food when we go to the store, and do you know that the poor old people are begging for money to buy food at the offices for the aid of the aged.

Another person in still another State writes:

Thanks for advocating a 20 percent Federal increase in old-age allotments. We sure need it.

And another said:

With the increases in living costs and not living costs alone, but shoes, clothing, and everything you need is sky high. I should think other Representatives would be willing to go along with you and get that bill passed as soon as possible.

A man in a seaboard State writes me that he received $20 a month and is badly in need of eyeglasses. He was told by his case worker he would have to purchase these out of his monthly allotment of $20.

I am sure everyone here in Congress has in his file cases revealing the distress of these older citizens who are the abandoned folk, along with white-collar workers of the war period.

The pressure of events has caused some discord on the home front, which is also reflected in the morale of the men on the battle fronts. This is due largely to the inequality of sacrifice of different groups and individuals. Some of our leaders have offered solutions to some phases of the problems, but none of them seem able to offer a solution of the over-all problem.

This is a great challenge to Congress and this issue must be considered and solved.

I sincerely hope that we may have an opportunity at an early date to give this matter serious consideration on the floor, and I do not believe we should recess until we have taken action of some sort to adjust upward the monthly allotments for our aged citizens.

National Health

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAY J. MADDEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial by H. B. Snyder, editor of the Gary Post Tribune, Gary, Ind.:

Tucked away in two congressional committees is a bill which, we believe, merits early consideration of our convention-minded legislators. It is a bill appropriating $10,000,000 to the United States Public Health Service for investigation and control of tuberculosis.

This country has done a good job on tuberculosis, but it could do better. Through research and treatment, through State-built sanitariums and the yearly purchase of Christmas seals by millions of Americans, tuberculosis mortality has been reduced by more than half in the past 30 years.

Meanwhile, however, the Public Health Service has been able to do little. It has never been able to afford a separate tuberculosis control division, and it is only since the war began that its tuberculosis budget has been raised from $150,000 to $250,000 a year.

This is obviously insufficient to help check the spread of a prevalent disease which generally strikes those least able to pay for treatment. It is much more prevalent in wartime.

Thus far, fortunately, there has been no notable rise among civilians except in three industrial States. But as the war continues it is likely that the rise may come, through the long hours of heavy work that millions of Americans are doing, even though our nutritional level remains high.

Even with its limited budget, the Public Health Service has X-rayed about three-quarters of a million war workers in the past year. It was found that 1.3 percent of them had tuberculosis. Of that 1.3 percent, 60 percent had minimal cases, 30 percent were moderately advanced, and 7 percent were far advanced.

Before these tests were taken, only 10 percent of patients presenting themselves at sanitariums had minimal cases. The rest were advanced. The contrast clearly shows that there is much tuberculosis that can be detected and cured early, if facilities for diagnosis and treatment are available.

Such facilities can save many lives, forestall untold anxiety, and prevent an economic loss of millions of dollars. The bill now before Congress would be a long step in that direction. Even at a time of political absorption, it should be given a hearing and a favorable vote before the strain of war work begins to undo the splendid anti-tuberculosis work so valiantly begun.

Conservation of Our Timber Resources

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY CORDON

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, on May 31 at the Governors' Conference held at Hershey, Pa., Gov. Earl Snell, of Oregon, delivered a most timely and interesting address entitled "Conservation of Our Timber Resources." I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The forestry problem presents a challenge to the States that demands action now. If the States fail to meet that challenge we may expect to see further power and authority over our forests lodged with bureaus and departments of a Government centralized in Washington, D. C.

At the present time there are approximately 500,000,000 acres of commercial forest lands remaining, which is about 60 percent of the original acreage in the United States. The present acreage of standing saw timber is only about one-third of the original stand. Of the remaining stand of saw timber, 90 percent is of the softwood varieties; 80 percent of these are in the West.

In the early years of our country agriculture was the main, if not practically the sole pursuit or activity. The trees were considered a hindrance. The ever-present cry was: "Get rid of the trees." That philosophy of destruction of a never-ending and inexhaustible supply of timber marked the first step in our methods of handling this important resource. We have passed through three cycles or eras in the handling of our forest lands and are now entering the fourth: (1) Destruction, (2) exploitation, (3) conservation, and now (4) planned-forest management.

The fourth—planned-forest management—includes not only the adoption of the necessary safeguards of protection and conservation but also adoption of polices and a program that will insure full utilization of this valuable and important resource on the basis that timber is a crop.

The two chief reasons for the early exploitation of forests are no longer valid. In colonial times the forest was a menace which harbored enemies and encumbered the land needed for crops. These conditions no longer obtain, the more forest land now reverts to forest use annually than is cleared for fresh agricultural use. Secondly, there was an enormous demand for a cheap, universal construction material during the period of rapid national expansion.

A relatively steady use of forest products can now be forecast in place of past unpredictable expanding use. In normal times plans can be made for the orderly harvesting of timber as a crop.

It is true that current drain on the forests exceeds current forest growth, which would seem to challenge the crop concept. That is one of the problems to be solved by the adoption of modern forestry practices. The barriers to successful forest management are well known. Forthright action by individual States to surmount these barriers will keep local forest lands productive, and in the aggregate will protect and enhance the national forest resource.

The public policy of one of the forward-looking forested States is declared to be "the preservation of the forest and the conservation of forest resources for the equal and guaranteed use of future generations * * * the protection of forest and water resources and the continuous growth of timber on lands suitable therefor." If this policy is implemented with intelligence and integrity in State legislation and administration, and proper Federal-State relations, there need be no concern for the future of forestry in America.

CURRENT SITUATION

Of the nearly 500,000,000 acres of commercial forest land there are 214,000,000 acres in saw timber. Given adequate management this area will produce annually more timber than has ever been cut in the United States in a single year.

The Federal Government owns or manages 60,000,000 acres of saw timber; States, counties, and municipalities, 4,000,000 acres; and in private ownership there are some 150,000,000 acres. It is with the latter two classes of ownership that state forestry programs are particularly concerned. There are no figures available on the present status of State, county, and municipally owned lands, but a recent survey of privately owned industrial forest land discloses these facts:

1. 16.6 percent is managed in line with modern forest practices and is 80–100 percent stocked.

2. 29.6 percent is managed for continuous production and is 40–80 percent stocked.

3. 47.5 percent is less than adequately managed and less than 40 percent stocked.

4. 6.3 percent is nonproductive.

This is pretty largely the balance sheet of the forest industry as a whole, because publicly owned forests have made but a negligible contribution to forest production thus far. For the decade 1933–42 the cut of saw timber on national forests averaged slightly over a billion board feet while the total cut for the industry averaged over 25,000,000,000 board-feet. Production on public forests must of necessity become more important as private forests are increasingly cut over, but it is still the private forest land which produces the bulk of America's lumber.

The timber industry in normal times has provided as much as 50 percent of the industrial employment in some States, and the value of forest products at the mill nationally has exceeded $1,000,000,000 annually in recent years. Thus the continued productivity of the private forest will continue to be a significant factor in the economy of many States, and a matter of concern to all States.

OWNERSHIP

Casting policy aside, the ownership of forest lands, in a sense, is relatively unimportant if they are all properly managed and conserved and the benefits are available to the citizenry in general. It is important that minimum forest practices be required on all ownerships in order to protect the stability of the industry.

There are two legitimate fields of public forest ownership: (1) Noncommercial lands of greater service for other uses than for forest products, and not necessarily self-sustaining. In this category would fall watershed forests, research and demonstration forests, recreational areas, and wildlife refuges. (2) lands bearing commercial timber in certain quantities for demonstration or industry stability; and those on poor sites, inaccessible or fire-denuded areas. In general, private ownership should be encouraged when and where it is possible to carry on long-term operations at a profit, and in such a manner as will insure sustained production on the area.

TAXATION

The problem of forest taxation is one which deserves special consideration because of the long period required to produce merchantable timber. Property taxation has been the principal source of revenue for local Government in rural America and is based on the annual cropping of agricultural lands. The annual taxing of a crop which requires many years to produce has done much to discourage sound forest management on private lands. In Western States the tax problem is also very much complicated by the vast public ownership of forest lands. In my State of Oregon the Federal Government owns 53 percent of our total area and acquisition is continuing at an average rate of more than 100,000 acres per year. At least partial solution can be found by giving consideration to the following:

(a) Privately owned lands should bear their fair share of the cost of local government. The valuation for property-tax purposes might well be based on the productive capacity of the forest land.

(b) Taxes—Federal and State—should be applied in such a manner as to equalize the payments between the operator who grows trees and the one who purchases mature timber. Progress along this line has been made.

(c) Equitable and reasonable payments in lieu of taxes should be made on publicly owned forest lands.

(d) State and Federal inheritance taxes should receive consideration in the light of their effect upon sustained production.

FIRE AND INSECTS

In recent years we have multiplied public opportunity to set fire without equally multiplying public responsibility for such fires. Improved transportation and roads have made private forest lands available to the public with a resultant increase in fire hazards. In some sections of the country smokers and incendiarists set more than 50 percent of the forest fires. The public's attention should be called to this critical condition to the end that more adequate measures are put into effect by State and local governments.

Forests are at times extremely vulnerable to both insects and disease, attacks of which may completely liquidate holdings. It is not feasible for private forest landowners unaided to undertake sanitation measures for the prevention of epidemic diseases or infestations. This is, however, largely a province of public forest agencies—a project in the general public interest akin to flood-control work and similar public works.

Forestry is a long-time enterprise, subject to unusual hazards, yielding only modest returns on the investment. Commercial credit rates present some difficulty for the operators who prefer to work on a sustained production basis. Because of prevailing hazards, insurance premium rates are disproportionately high for the coverage obtained, and financial risks are added to the physical difficulties of private forestry.

Present standards of utilization do not permit full realization of all timber values and impose severe restrictions on the development of private forestry. Present limited markets for wood, and long-established market practices force the logging and sawmill operators to leave 30 percent of the wood in the forest, and 43 percent of the log in the mill. Wood technology has not kept pace with the advance in the utilization of metals, plastics and other wood substitutes.

FEDERAL APPROACH TO PRIVATE FORESTRY

I. The history of Federal action in respect to forestry in the States is about as follows:

1. Development of national forest system beginning in 1891 which set aside unappropriated areas of the public domain within the States as Federal forests.

2. The Weeks Act of 1911 initiated programs of Federal land purchases and cooperation with the States in forest fire control.

3. The Clarke-McNary Act of 1924, among other things, authorized Federal financial aid to the States on a matching basis for organized forest fire protection on State and private forest lands.

4. The Norris-Doxey Act which authorizes Federal expenditures for farm forestry in cooperation with the States was enacted in 1937.

5. The amendment to the Internal Revenue Act in 1944 provides tax relief by classifying some forest revenues as long-term capital gains rather than annual income.

II. What the Federal Government should do:

1. Recognize that private ownership of forest land is a keystone in the economy of many forest areas; and aid in the development of sound and permanent private ownership (a) through the operation of the Sustained Yield Act of 1944; (b) by the release from Federal ownership through exchanges or other means of conveyance of such lands as can and will be operated under sound forest management principles.

2. Recognize the very great public responsibility in the occurrence of forest fires, and provide a fair share of public funds for fire control in each State. Forest fires do not respect State boundaries.

3. Forest insects and diseases also respect no State boundaries and national efforts at control are logical. Adequate continuing appropriations should be made so that the gains of one year are not lost by inadequate appropriations in following years.

4. Problems of forest utilization likewise transcend State lines, and forest-products research should continue on a national scale, particularly as it pertains to products of national scope. This will require continued support of the Federal forest-products laboratory at Madison, Wis.

5. As part of the post-war program, the Federal Government should provide cooperative funds with which State forestry departments could rehabilitate State, local, and private forest lands. Provisions of such funds should be contingent upon (1) the proven technical ability of the State department, and (2) financial backing of that department by the State government adequate to assure success of the program.

6. Federal forestry agencies should correlate their activities.

7. It is recommended that State approval be first obtained before extension of Federal ownership within the State of lands of any character.

8. Congress should give immediate consideration to forestry measures designed to promote the national welfare. Particular attention is called to pending legislation providing for an annual payment in lieu of taxes on federally owned lands.

STATE APPROACH TO PRIVATE FORESTRY

I. What the States have done:

Compared to the needs the States have done relatively little in the protection, development, and utilization of the forest resources.

In general, the States have not made adequate appropriations for forestry. Chiefly by default, this important field of State sovereignty or responsibility has largely drifted into Federal ownership and under Federal jurisdiction; and, what was not acquired by default in the past seems certain to be acquired by other means in the future, unless prompt and effective measures are undertaken to counteract this movement.

A few States have been active in one or more phases of forestry, but by no means have the forested States met their forestry responsibilities. No State has a comprehensive, entirely satisfactory, adequately financed forestry program. The greatest advances have been made in forest protection, generally in cooperation with the Federal Government under the Clarke-McNary Act; but even in this instance there is a wide disparity in the standards of protection prevailing in different States.

II. What the States should do:

1. The States should finance their forestry departments on a basis which will permit the competent performance of essential forestry functions.

2. Enact legislation adopting modern forestry practices. If the States do not do so, the Federal Government will.

3. Revise taxation inequities which restrain private forestry.

4. Support research in local forestry problems not covered by the Federal forest experiment stations.

5. Improve personnel standards and provide compensation adequate to attract able men to State forestry.

6. Acquire forest lands where and when advisable. Rehabilitate forest areas. Retain certain State forest lands for demonstration, research, recreation, and watershed forests and other essential uses.

7. All forestry States should consider the forest resource in all plans for the development of the State as a whole, particularly in respect to public works post-war planning.

The Sixth General Assembly of the Council of State Governments, at its meeting in Baltimore, January 1943, adopted a resolution instructing its president to appoint a committee of five to study the timberland problem and to make recommendations at the next conference of the council as to the most effective course that may be pursued to promote the highest utilization of the timber resources of the Nation.

Pursuant to the provisions of that resolution President Herbert R. O'Conor, Governor of Maryland, appointed as members of the Forestry Committee the following: State Treasurer D. Hale Brake, of Michigan; State Senator William T. Dean, of Georgia; State Forester Perry H. Merrill, of Vermont; State Senator Ed. Fletcher, of California, and your speaker as chairman of the committee. Mr. Hugh Gallagher of the Council of State Governments is doing an efficient job as secretary. This committee has made a rather exhaustive study of the various problems affecting forestry throughout the Nation and will have a definite recommendation to make to the Council of State Governments at its next annual session. However, I know that I reflect the unanimous opinion of the committee when I say to you that the preservation of the sovereign rights and authority of the states and definite encouragement to competitive enterprise and individual initiative are important and essential to the future economic and social welfare of our Nation.

We hear much discussion about the question of States' rights. However, we must do far more than just talk about it. The States must become active, virile political subdivisions and really do something about these forestry problems as well as other problems wherein States' rights are involved. And, if we do not do something about it we may expect further encroachment—may expect more government by orders and directives emanating from bureaus and departments centralized in Washington, D. C.

The challenge is before us and in my opinion the States will not be found wanting.

Regulation of Radio Broadcasting

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial on the subject of the regulation of radio broadcasting, published in the newspaper Labor of June 3, 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEELER-WHITE BILL IS A GOOD THING—PROPAGANDISTS WHO HAVE BEEN POISONING THE NEWS FOR THE BENEFIT OF THEIR SPONSORS SHOULD BE DRIVEN OFF AIRWAYS

Senator WHEELER (Democrat, Montana) and Senator WHITE (Republican, Maine)—two gentlemen whose economic views are sometimes as far apart as the poles—are sponsoring a measure to eliminate some of the obvious evils of radio broadcasting. Among other things, they propose to end the control of news broadcasts by big corporations and other concerns.

They insist that if broadcasting companies desire to supply listeners-in with a summary of the day's events they should hire their own broadcasters, confine them to reports of outstanding events, and cut out all editorial comment.

In a word, the Senators would ban the flood of vicious propaganda which has been pouring over the airways for years, and give the American people a chance to hear all sides of controversial questions and then form their own opinions.

There are many other excellent provisions in the proposed legislation, but the opposition has concentrated its fire on the one mentioned.

Practically every big paper we have seen cries that the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech is menaced by the Wheeler-White proposal. There is no foundation for that argument.

The owner of every newspaper claims the right to print anything he sees fit in his columns. He calls that freedom of the press. He hires columnists whose writings are agreeable to him.

If he hates labor unions, then he never, by any chance, engages a columnist who has a good word to say for collective bargaining. He pursues the same policy in reference to other outstanding public issues.

He denies his readers the right to get both sides, and he sternly denounces anyone who would interfere with his dictatorship.

Now, the airways belong to the people of the United States. Radio might be described as their newspaper, for through that channel, if they exercise their right of ownership, they can get the facts which will enable them to form intelligent opinions concerning what is going on in the world.

Being the owners of radio, they have the undoubted right, through their chosen representatives in Congress, to say to the broadcasting companies: "We are permitting you to temporarily use our property. We are not charging you anything for the privilege. Possession of the airways enables you to reap rich profits. In return, we demand that you give us clean and accurate reports of domestic and international events."

What's wrong with that propcsition? There is nothing wrong with it from the people's point of view. Of course, there is a great deal wrong with it from the point of view of those influential interests which desire to control public thinking. They hire radio commentators to twist the news—to suppress this fact and to exaggerate that fact. They use the people's radio to confuse the people's thinking.

In the judgment of this newspaper, the commentators now talking over the air—with a mighty few exceptions—have done more to mislead the American people—and particularly during this war emergency—than any other single influence.

Among these commentators are men who never hesitate to broadcast the most fantastic and demoralizing falsehoods. They have been exposed and denounced on innumerable occasions, but they continue to poison the public mind because certain rich "sponsors" profit from the lies and half-truths which they are constantly pouring into the ears of the American people. Only on the rarest occasions is anyone permitted to reply.

Senators WHEELER and WHITE are to be commended for at least making a start toward cleaning up this intolerable situation. Their bill is really very conservative. To the north of us in Canada, where the people own a Nation-wide broadcasting system, the Government is going much farther.

In Canadian regulations just issued, news commentators are told they must present the facts without "strong personal bias or expression of opinion."

If the commentator wishes to interpret the news, then the broadcasting company must set up a balanced panel of commentators of contrasting views.

Canada will no longer tolerate such vicious propaganda as Herr von Kaltenborn, who may be taken as a fair example of all that is bad in news broadcasting, is constantly giving the radio audience.

It would be a good thing if every Member of the American Congress would study the Canadian regulations. Such a study would probably result in strengthening the Wheeler-White bill, and in any event, it would go a long way toward assuring the passage of that measure.

Prayers for Victory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, this day marking the invasion of Europe, brings to every home in America prayerful and anxious moments. In many communities the citizens today assemble in churches of all denominations for prayer. They assemble with troubled and fearful hearts. They are praying for the safety of loved ones fighting on many fronts in this terrible war. It is well that the Nation pause in prayer and seek the guidance from the Master of us all. There is a power in prayer which is comforting to the soul of mankind. In this Nation today there are tears of joy, and there are tears of fear and tears of sorrow. We have all been fearful of the invasion. We all hesitate to face a climax in life which may well mean the turning point in the history of our own individual life or that of our Nation. That crisis has been reached. The hearts and homes of America today are apprehensive and are praying that across the channel there may be few lives sacrificed and that our victories may be large and complete. Because the days are dark and anxious and apprehensive is the reason that we seek divine guidance from our Creator.

While our flesh and blood may be sacrificed in this tremendous undertaking, we find some comfort in the fact that our soldiers are well equipped. They possess the indomitable courage and faith that the undertaking will succeed. The Nation's industry has given the invading forces the finest of equipment. No expense will be spared for equipment and for their safety. No effort will be left undone which may provide relief for the wounded and for their rehabilitation. This is as it should be.

The radios and presses of the Nation now attract the attention of the world. Millions will listen hopefully for each encouraging word. They will cheer our boys in victory. They will pray for an early victory and a permanent peace.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the American people in this crucial hour and in the days ahead should be given the unvarnished truth about our military successes or reverses if that must be. Our boys have been steeled and tempered for this test. They have had long months of training. The people at home are also ready and they should know the truth at all times.

That our successes will be assured, no one doubts. The results of the next few days or weeks may well tell just how long this war will last. I personally feel it will be swift, hard, and not too long.

The American people, after this successful invasion, will look to the leadership of our country to write a peace which will be just. If this is not done then the war will have been fought in vain. So, it is well, Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, that there are millions of prayers on this day for the success of our military operations.

The House stood in silence a few minutes ago. Their prayers, united with the fervent prayers and pleas of millions more, will have a far-reaching effect. We ought to pray not only for an early victory but for a permanent peace. I believe that no peace can be permanent unless it embodies some of the teachings of the Christ Man, who, more than 2,000 years ago said, It is better to give than to receive, and to love thy neighbor as thy self.

May the vision of the prophets unite with the prayers of the multitude and guide not only our armies in this crucial hour but the statesmen of the world in writing a peace which will be honorable and lasting.

Evasion of Hog Marketing Regulations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Whereas we, the undersigned, local representatives of the United States Department of Agriculture and others, acting under instructions from our superior officers, in 1943 urged farmers to maintain a high rate of pork production as a patriotic duty, assured that they would at least receive the Federal W. F. A. floor price for their hogs, and

Whereas farmers did respond by producing for the 1943–44 market one of the county's largest hog crops; and

Whereas farmers, in marketing their crop, have been forced to accept prices much below the floor price established for the area and promised them by the Government; and

Whereas farmers have been obliged to submit to unusual, unorthodox and unethical practices on the part of buyers in their (buyers') effort to bypass the intent of the floor regulations; and

Whereas pork products are retailed to consumers on the basis of O. P. A. ceiling prices independent of prices paid to the farmer; and

Whereas packers are subsidized $1.30 per hundredweight on all pork products slaughtered (regardless of weights) to enable them to pay floor prices or better for live hogs: Be it hereby

Resolved, That we, the undersigned members of the United States Department of Agriculture War Board for Whitley County, Ind., petition the respective Federal authorities in charge—

1. To keep faith with hog producers by making the support prices apply to all weights of hogs, thereby eliminating "floor dodging."

2. To provide that packers who resort to unusual practices not common prior to floor regulations, thereby securing unusual shrink in weight or otherwise evading the intent of the floor's objective, be made to disqualify themselves for subsidy payments in so doing;

3. To investigate the hog marketing system in this area; to withhold subsidies past due from all packers who have in any way evaded, or colluded with others to evade, the intent and purpose of the floor; and to make the withholding retroactive on all such evasion purchases; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the War Food Administration, the Office of Price Administration, the United States Senator and Representative in Congress for this county, the national and State U. S. D. A. war boards, the U. S. D. A. war boards of other counties in this marketing area, and to the press.

WILSON BENNETT,
Chairman, County Agricultural Adjustment Association.

A. LEIGH BOWEN,
Field Supervisor, Farm Security Administration.

H. K. WAUGH,
Manager, County Rural Electric Membership Corporation.

WOODWARD ENGLE,
Field Agent, Albion Production Credit Association.

LEROY HARTMAN,
Chairman, Whitley County Cooperative Association.

CARL THOMSON,
Chairman, County Extension Committee.

B. V. WIDNEY,
County Agent, Cooperative Agricultural Extension Service.

James F. Scoggin, Jr., Mississippi Cadet, Wins 11 of 17 Awards at West Point

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, from every home in America prayers are going up today for victory and for the preservation of our young men who are fighting on the various battle fronts of the world. Heroes are being made, or I should say, being revealed, at this hour. Out of the fiery furnace of this war will come the great leaders of the future.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox once said:

Weep not for the vanished ages
With their great, heroic men,
Who live on history's pages
Or dwell in the poet's pen;

For the grandest times are before us,
And the world is yet to see
The noblest worth of this old earth
In the men that are to be.

If you will bear with me, I should like to call your attention to the recent achievements of one of our young military leaders of the future.

Some years ago I appointed a young man to West Point by the name of James F. Scoggin, Jr. A few days ago I received a letter from him with reference to his graduation, which contained the most profound expressions of gratitude I have ever read. I find under an Associated Press item date-lined yesterday, the following article:

MISSISSIPPI CADET WINS 11 OF 17 AWARDS AT WEST POINT

WEST POINT, N. Y., June 5.—Eleven of 17 academic awards presented at the third day of commencement week activities of the United States Military Academy yesterday went to Cadet James F. Scoggin, Jr., State College, Miss., honor man of the graduating class.

Cadet Scoggin received 10 War-bond awards for standing first in general order of merit for 4 years; for having the highest ratings in economics, mechanics, English, mathematics, chemistry and electricity, physics, law, and military hygiene, and for standing first in graduation merit. His eleventh award was a set of books for the highest rating in military engineering and military history.

This is indeed gratifying news to me, and to all the rest of the people of Mississippi, who are justly proud of this young man, and tends to assure us that the traditions of the great leaders of this country will be carried on.

Resolution To Welcome the People of Italy to the Family of Liberated Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the tramp, tramp, tramp of American soldiers is heard in the streets of the Eternal City. The forces of righteousness are on the march. The allied armies have attained the first great goal toward the liberation of the human spirit from Axis tyranny and oppression.

The fall of Rome makes it especially appropriate at this time that Congress should adopt House Concurrent Resolution No. 50 which I have introduced. That resolution proposes that the Congress speaking for and in the name of the people of the United States, shall extend a welcome to the people of Italy to the family of liberated nations.

Nothing that Congress could do would be more stimulating and encouraging not only to the long-enslaved people of Italy but the peoples of all of the countries under Axis domination than the adoption of this resolution at this time. It would have an immediate and electrical effect in bolstering the morale and fighting spirit of the nations we are trying to help and on whom we depend for cooperation. Congress, being the body closest to the people, speaks directly for the Nation and the adoption of this resolution would make those unfortunate peoples, who are low in spirit and morale, feel that America really cares for them. It would be people speaking unto people, in the language of the heart.

The State Department and the Office of War Information have endorsed this resolution. It has been broadcast to the people of Italy and the effect has been to arouse keen interest, although of course it as yet has no official sanction. The Italian-language newspapers of the United States, expressing the sentiments of the millions of our people of Italian ancestry, have endorsed it with great unanimity and have printed editorials urging its adoption.

The resolution has been pending in committee nearly 9 months. It is too important a resolution to be allowed to die in a committee pigeonhole. The great Committee on Foreign Affairs, for which I have profound respect, at least owes to the millions who believe in this resolution the courtesy of acting on it.

The text of the resolution follows:

Whereas the Congress of the United States, democratically elected by the people, is in a position to convey to the people of Italy, the victims of Fascist rule, and to downtrodden oppressed peoples everywhere, our Nation's sympathy and friendship for them; therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States, speaking in behalf of the people who elected it, welcomes the people of Italy to the family of liberated nations. We congratulate them on the overthrow of the horrors and slavery of fascism. We sympathize with them in the struggle that is before them in reclaiming their country from the Nazi invader and in reconstructing their nation. In the cosmic evolution that is going on the might of America is pledged to support by all reasonable and constitutional means the freedom, peace, and security of all right-thinking and right-doing men. We hail the overthrow of fascism in Italy as the dawn of freedom for all of the Axis-ridden countries and as pointing the way to the final consummation of a peaceful world of self-governing peoples.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

Whereas W. F. A. hog price ceilings for the northeastern Indiana area are 10 cents per hundredweight lower than are the ceilings for the central Indiana area; and

Whereas the hogs from the two areas are consigned largely to the same Eastern packers; and

Whereas the hogs from the two areas are believed to be of the same grade and quality; and

Whereas the freight rates from the two areas to slaughterers are practically identical; and

Whereas W. F. A. ceilings are said to have been determined on the market histories of the respective areas, indicating a long time discrimination against the northeastern Indiana area: Be it hereby

Resolved, That we, the undersigned members of the United States Department of Agriculture War Board, for Whitley County, Ind., petition the Federal Office of Price Administration, the War Food Administration, and the director of the Purdue University Agricultural Experiment Station, to (1) establish the cause or causes for discrimination in price against hogs marketed from the northeastern Indiana area and (2) that State and Federal agencies with authority take the necessary action to correct and eliminate said discrimination in price ceilings and market practices; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be submitted to all Federal and State agencies concerned, to other county U. S. D. A. War Boards of the area and to the press.

Wilson Bennett, Chairman, County Agriculture Adjustment Association; A. Leigh Bowen, Field Supervisor, Farm Security Administration; H. K. Waugh, Manager, County Rural Electric Membership Corporation; Woodward Engle, Field Agent, Albion Production Credit Association; LeRoy Hartman, Chairman, Whitley County Cooperative Association; Carl Thomson, Chairman, County Extension Committee; B. V. Widney, County Agent, Cooperative Agricultural Extension Service.

Cotton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELMER THOMAS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Cotton," by Tom Linder, commissioner of agriculture of the State of Georgia.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COTTON

(By Tom Linder, commissioner of agriculture of the State of Georgia)

I have before me eight samples of cotton goods from a department store in Atlanta, Ga.

Each sample is a different pattern and a different weight.

The heaviest sample weighs 6 ounces to the yard. The lightest sample weighs 3 ounces to the yard.

The 3-ounce goods is marked $4.98 a yard. This is $1.66 an ounce, or $26.56 a pound—$26.56 for 1 pound of cotton goods out of cotton that sold for 20 cents.

The heaviest of these samples weighs 6 ounces to the yard and the price is $2.50 a yard. This is 41 cents an ounce, or $6.56 for a pound.

In these goods, you pay $6.56 for a pound of cotton goods out of cotton that sold for 20 cents.

The other samples vary in between these two extreme figures.

If we average these figures, we find that these eight different kinds of cotton goods are selling for $16.56 a pound.

At this rate one bale of cotton cost $8,280—82 times as much as the farmer received for growing, picking, ginning, and hauling the bale of cotton.

Forty years ago the general rule was that a farmer received 1 yard of cotton goods for a pound of cotton.

That, of course, meant common, ordinary cotton goods, such as gingham, calico, homespun, and the like.

Nice dress goods cost two or three times that much. When cotton was 10 cents a pound you could buy practically any cotton goods from 10 to 40 cents a yard.

For the sake of argument, let's say that all these eight samples were worth 40 cents a yard when cotton was 10 cents a pound.

That meant that the farmer would have to give 4 pounds of cotton for 1 yard of this kind of cotton goods.

The average price per yard of these eight samples now is $3.75 a yard.

If the farmer purchased 1 yard of these goods with 4 pounds of cotton, he would have to get 94 cents a pound for the cotton.

In other words, if the farmer today was getting 94 cents a pound for cotton, he would only be receiving parity, insofar as these eight samples of cotton goods are concerned.

RAYON

We very often read in newspapers and hear great men in Congress and New York talk about rayon supplanting cotton as a textile.

They say that the farmer will have to produce cotton cheaper in order to keep rayon from taking the cotton market.

We hear a lot of talk about labor-saving machinery. We hear that labor-saving machinery has made the cost of production of industrial goods much cheaper. But the fact of the matter is that the farmer is producing today cheaper than anyone else.

If the farmers were paid as much to cover cost of production as industrial cost of production, the world would be hungry and naked within 12 months. Yet, they say the farmer is not producing cheap enough.

Well, let's see. If a yard of cloth contains 6 ounces of 20-cent cotton, that is 7½ cents worth of cotton in a yard of cloth. The 7½ cents worth of cotton in the form of a yard of cloth sells for $3.75.

If the farmer actually gave away the 7½ cents worth of cotton and did not get anything for it, it could not reduce the price of the yard of cloth more than 7½ cents. The yard of cloth would cost $3.67½ made out of free cotton, where it now costs $3.75 made out of 20-cent cotton.

The fact of the matter is that it is high prices of cotton goods that make rayon manufacture possible.

If the price of cotton goods were in line with the price of raw cotton the rayon mills would close down. They couldn't operate.

If the prices of cotton goods were in line with the price of raw cotton the demand for cotton goods would be so great that the Cotton Belt could not produce enough cotton to supply the domestic demand here in America. We would not have to worry about foreign markets.

The white-collar man, the merchant, the banker, the lawyer, and the doctor has just as big a stake in this as the farmer.

In the Cotton Belt, the farmers' income determines the income of all other groups.

The earnings of the banker, the merchant, the store clerk, the lawyer, the doctor, and the blacksmith are no better and no worse than the income of the farmers.

CHANGE OF LABELS

If you will go into the stores, you will see that the brands and labels in many cases have been changed from what they were before the creation of the O. P. A.

If you will take the catalog of mail order houses, you will see that in many cases the identical articles cannot be purchased. Many labels and brands have been changed.

This is because the manufacturers are smart enough to outwit the O. P. A.

When the O. P. A. fixes a ceiling on one brand or one label, the manufacturers simply quit making that particular brand and put out a new brand at a higher price.

The farmer cannot change his brands. The farmer still sells cotton. Everybody knows it's cotton. There is no way that the farmer can increase the price that he receives for his cotton. He is helpless in the hands of Government agencies and the cotton exchanges.

The O. P. A. was created for one purpose only. That purpose was to hold farm prices down. All the balance of the O. P. A. is 95 percent camouflage. If there were no farmers, there would be no O. P. A. The O. P. A. is the child of Bernard Baruch, Leon Henderson, Henry Morgenthau, Jr., and Ginsburg.

Cotton—God's gift to America—has been crucified on a cross of gold.

Cotton, the greatest food crop and the greatest clothing crop on earth, lies prone in the defiling clutches of the internationalists.

The men and women who till the land through the long grinding hours of the hot summer sun, are merely pawns in the hands of international forces who build their golden calves on the miseries of these toilers.

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over Station WBNF on June 3, 1944:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my congressional district, tomorrow is Townsend Day at Ross Park. It is the eighth year this gala occasion has come about.

This day has always been significant to me because it brings out people in all walks of life who are interested in our republican form of government. This day has always meant a lot to me because many of my best friends gather for the purpose of hearing the personal message I bring back home from the Nation's Capital.

As your Representative in Congress I am expected to remain in Washington practically all the time during the session. That means I cannot keep in as close touch with the home folks as I could if I were in Binghamton all the time.

I miss seeing my friends. That is one of the prices I pay for the honor of serving this most patriotic district in Congress. That is why I enjoy so much getting back for events like Townsend Day.

At this time I wish to extend the invitation to all my countless friends in the Triple Cities to come to Ross Park tomorrow afternoon. There will be a tremendous crowd present. The message I have to give you will prove most interesting.

Therefore, I urge you one and all to join with us in the celebration tomorrow. Let's make it, in addition to Townsend Day, an American Day. Let's renew our faith in what our boys are fighting for. Let's talk about America, think about America's future, and determine to preserve America.

Remember now, I will be looking for you tomorrow afternoon at Ross Park, Binghamton, at 2 o'clock.

This time of year, when everybody is paying tribute to the heroes of America's wars, past and present, I always think about the future. A few days ago Congress passed the G. I. bill, known as the Magna Carta of veterans' rights. I voted for this bill because I saw in it a step in the right direction.

Of course the success of the G. I. bill depends upon future legislation. Congress has chartered a bold, new course. It is the first time the future of our veterans has been assured.

But the real work has not yet been accomplished. Great hospitals and adequate medical care for the maimed and the wounded must yet be built. New laws must be passed guaranteeing the details in a most general plan.

Then, again, what about reeducation of the veteran? The G. I. bill has done a good job in telling us what to expect. But it does not dare to contemplate the endless work which must be done in setting up the thousands of facilities which veterans must have to complete their interrupted learning by trade, by vocational and by specialized guidance.

If the returning soldier wants to be a bricklayer, or a sheetmetal worker or an electrician, I think he should be allowed to be one. If he wants to be a farmer, or a doctor or a lawyer, I think he should be allowed to be one, provided he makes the grade.

There should be no ceiling put on how high our war heroes can go when they come back. There should be no fixing of limits on their opportunities to equip themselves for a better America and a better world.

Rehabilitation, reeducation, reemployment, those are the things our new veterans will want. Those things they must have, if we are to continue to be a great Nation, and a great force for good in the world.

Unity on the Fighting Front Should Bring Unity at Home

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, the invasion has begun. We await its outcome in breathless and prayerful expectation.

However, the success of the Allied Armies on the Italian front in recent weeks, now climaxed by the liberation of Rome from the clutches of the Nazis, occasions great rejoicing. It is an epic moment in the course of the war, and as we contemplate the military triumphs in Italy, we cannot fail to be impressed by the fact that it was achieved by the combined and unified operations of brave fighting men of many nationalities and of divergent races and creeds. The French forces, embracing units of African tribesmen, the British Eighth Army, embracing regiments of natives of British India, brigades of Poles, Canadian divisions, New Zealanders, and our own Fifth Army, Americans of every color and creed, fought side by side in a common cause, facing a common danger, to a common victory.

It seems to me that this affords a great moral lesson. It demonstrates that under the stress of great peril and common danger men will sink all personal differences and prejudices and join hands as comrades.

We, here in America, should take this lesson to heart and resolve to make it equally possible for men and women of differing races and creeds to live and work side by side in harmony and with complete racial and religious tolerance after the present common peril is ended and we return to peace and security.

I am firmly convinced that unless we do maintain racial and religious tolerance the peace and security and restoration of freedom for which we are now making such heavy sacrifices will be shadow without substance.

Unfortunately, there are some persons here in America—some persons in private life and some persons in public life—who seek to capitalize on the racial and religious differences among our people. Instead of striving for tolerance and harmony, they deliberately attempt to foment intolerance and strife.

Just as the Nazis picked on the Jews and persecuted them on account of race and forced other governments under Nazi domination to do likewise, so today we find in our own land persons of narrow and bigoted minds who seem to feel that it is smart to attack the Jews or to attack the Catholics or to attack the Negroes solely because of race or religion or color—persons who by their shouting and loose charges try to create prejudice while at the same time attracting public notice to themselves. This is not the American way. In fact, it is intolerable in any free country and enlightened society, whether these loose charges and appeals to prejudice emanate from private citizens or from public officials.

Let us have an end to this kind of demagoguery based on anti-Semitism, anti-Catholicism, Jim Crowism, or any other racial or religious difference. It is doing immense damage. It is sowing seeds of future trouble. It is weakening America when every effort should be exerted to strengthening America. Let us put out of office and silence those who cater to prejudice and who try to capitalize on racial discrimination. Let us be tolerant and fair both in word and in deed.

Republican Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, although in the minority in this House today Republicans have a responsibility to the Nation equally as great as the party in power. We should assume that responsibility without shirking or pussyfooting. We realize, and the Nation realizes, that there is a definite rift today between the so-called New Deal Democrats and the old-line Jeffersonian Democrats, and because of that rift the Republicans hold the balance of power in this House today. Holding the balance of power places a responsibility upon our party that must not be shirked.

The following article by David Lawrence, published in the Washington Evening Star, Monday, June 5, 1944, expresses the thoughts I have in mind much better than I can, so I include the article in my remarks. It is peculiarly pertinent at this time because we begin a 4-day debate on the continuation of the O. P. A. The article calls attention to the great need today to preserve our civil rights and states that this can only be done by providing for court review of all "edicts or decrees" issued in the form of "directives." The Republicans should take the initiative in this fight to protect the civil rights of the American people.

G. O. P. SEEN FAILING TO GUARD CIVIL RIGHTS—CONGRESS MINORITY COULD ACT TO FORCE ISSUE IS BELIEF

(By David Lawrence)

Many people are going to be asked soon to decide whether the country will be any better off under Republican than Democratic rule. If the record as a whole of the Republican Party in Congress, therefore, is to be taken as a criterion, maybe the country will decide to settle down to a continuation of the Democrats.

For the Republicans have stood idly by while civil rights have been taken from the citizen. They have failed to use their power as a minority to secure the liberties which their campaign speeches will soon tell the people the Democrats are taking away.

There is, for instance, the simple matter of court review of acts of the executive agencies. Here is an issue of transcendent importance. It's an issue any child who has studied our form of government can understand. The Democrats, of course, don't want court review. They are subservient to the Executive and wish to give him a free hand. Their Attorney General has already defied Congress by saying that irrespective of specific statutes on seizure of industrial plants, there is an aggregate of powers in the Commander in Chief enabling him to do as he pleases. Certainly the country cannot expect the preservation of civil rights by the Democrats in Congress, especially in an election year when so many of the Members must hang on to the President's coat-tails to win their own seats.

COULD MAKE IT AN ISSUE

There is a majority in both Houses for civil rights if the Republican Party cares to make it an issue. There are enough Democrats from the South who would vote with the Republicans if the latter asserted themselves. But it begins to appear that the Republicans, too, are going to play pussyfoot politics this year. It is said they don't want to offend anybody—and the possibility of offending the C. I. O. or the labor vote is beginning to be considered by some Republicans.

There's a piece of legislation pending, however, to which amendments on court review can be offered. It's the bill to extend price stabilization and wage control. The whole system of price control comes to an end June 30 unless extended by Congress, and if such amendments imperil the extension of this measure there are some who think the risk is worth taking. For if civil rights are abolished, price and wage control is of little avail. Arbitrary edicts and decrees can then be added at will by executive regulations without a chance for court review.

What seems most surprising is that union labor allows this reactionary trend to go on without a protest. Thus the other day the United States Circuit Court of Appeals rightly decided that there was no provision in the law for court review of the War Labor Board's orders. The fact is court review was omitted from the Smith-Connally law by direct pressure from the War Labor Board Chairman and by the administration. A threat of a veto is said to have been sent to Capitol Hill while the measure was in conference, so court review was omitted. But the bill was later vetoed, anyhow, even with court review omitted, and was passe over the veto.

LABOR SHORT-SIGHTED

For many months the War Labor Board operated without any legislative sanction at all, and the Smith-Connally bill gave the Board its first real authority. The omission of court review was a deliberate step to put over compulsory arbitration in America.

Labor unions may be the temporary beneficiaries of administration favor, but they are short-sighted if they oppose court review. For if the precedent is once established that no action of the War Labor Board is subject to court review, the way is opened to the complete control and domination of labor unions by governmental agencies.

Incidentally, it has been mistakenly reported in the press that the decision by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals here vindicated the Attorney General's claim in the Ward seizure case in Chicago. The issue settled was only that the War Labor Board orders are not reviewable. The seizure of property by the President can still be passed on by the courts in specific cases to determine whether any arbitrary act has been committed. For court review in seizure cases is derived from the Constitution itself, which specifically prohibits "unreasonable searches and seizures."

Comparison

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert into the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Citizen-News of Los Angeles, Calif., which compares the C. I. O. political-action movement in America with that of the Fascists in Germany:

COMPARISON

A prominent Tennessee Democrat and lawyer, Malcolm McDermott, visited Germany in 1936 and 1937 to study national socialism.

He came to the conclusion that national socialism, "stripped of all fanfare, simply means a system of government that readily enables those who gain control to exploit the entire nation for their particular purposes."

He wondered how an intelligent people, such as the Germans were, would let themselves be duped. His studies led him to an outline of some of the steps taken in Germany and then to the conclusion that there is a deadly parallel between the national socialism of Germany and the poltical trend in the United States.

The lawyer outlined some of steps which he believes leads to the exploitation of a whole nation by a few people, as follows:

1. The people are made to feel their utter helplessness and their inability to solve their own problems and to turn to a leader and his bureaucracy for the cure of all their ills.

2. The principle of local self-government is wiped out.

3. Constitutional guaranties are swept aside.

4. The lawmaking body is intimidated.

5. Economically the people are kept under the burden of a great public debt.

6. A general distrust of private business and industry is kept alive.

7. Governmental bureaus are set up to control different phases of the citizen's life.

8. The education of the youth of the Nation is taken under control.

9. A steady stream of Government propaganda is kept flowing to the people.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee that will spend hundreds of thousands of dollars this year for the election of President Roosevelt to a fourth term and the election of Congressmen favorable to their cause could bring a Hitlerian type of dictatorship to this country if a majority of the people accepted a steady flow of propaganda.

That propaganda would not extol the virtues of state socialism or those of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. That propaganda would be designed to cause voters to turn against many trusted public servants and to accept the unknown and the untried.

Appeals would be made to religious and racial prejudices. Hatreds would be stirred. The truth would be forgotten and facts would be twisted to appear in false forms.

Freedom of the press could be destroyed in a few months by sending in the Army to carry out the publishers who fail to respond to the dictates of the Government.

Freedom of speech could be destroyed by imposing governmental penalties on those who express themselves contrary to the will of the Government.

But 95 percent of the people of the United States are opposed to a dictatorial form of government regardless of whether it is called liberalism or socialism or communism. Only if 51 percent of the people can be led through false propaganda into turning their Government over to those seeking to execute a master plan for power can the real sentiments of the people go for naught.

If the principle is right that the Army can be ordered to take over a retail establishment the same principle can be used to take over newspapers and thus control the reading matter of a people.

But we are not as worried as is the Tennessee lawyer. We think that the people would wake up before it is too late.

Germans have always liked regimentation. Americans dislike it. Germans were regimented into following a program until they had lost all their liberties.

Americans can be regimented only so far, we think, before they will revolt.

The C. I. O. Political Action Committee may be able to control the next Congress and the next President of the United States, but not for long enough to completely direct all governmental power into the hands of a few men.

Save Free Enterprise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, the start of the European invasion draws immediate attention to pending legislation that must be speedily enacted by Congress if we are to be fully prepared to meet the obvious results of a successful invasion drive. Undoubtedly many bitter and costly battles lie ahead, and I am sure that the American people join in the prayer that the sacrifices our men are making will not have been made in vain.

We are going to win the war and in order to win and preserve the peace we must begin to take the steps that are necessary to preserve our national economy at home. We want to insure the fact that our returning veterans will come back to a country that has maintained the system of free enterprise which will guarantee them jobs, security, and freedom.

Of primary importance, therefore, is the necessity for immediate passage by the Congress of legislation providing for an orderly system of contract termination, as the demand for military equipment and supplies decreases, as well as the prompt enactment of statutory authority for vesting the control over the disposal of surplus Government supplies and commodities under one head.

The need for such action was very ably and forcibly called to our attention last February by the Baruch committee report on war and post-war adjustment policies. Various congressional committees have had the necessary legislation under consideration for months but, so far, nothing has been approved. We have already waited too long and to delay further is to invite economic chaos.

The recent sudden termination by the Navy of the Brewster contract is a case in point. A wave of such unexpected and unannounced terminations can only lead to disaster. Let us not repeat the mistakes made after the last war. We do not want to throw millions of American men and women out of work, we do not want to see business enterprises forced to close their doors while waiting for slow-moving Government wheels to grind out contract payments piecemeal.

If we do not move at once to do the things that are necessary to guarantee the life of free enterprise and free employment we shall be faced with the grim specter of national socialism, or worse. Let us wake up.

Over the First Hump—November Is Next

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD the following editorial taken from the Plane Facts, which is the west coast U. A. W.-C. I. O. weekly newspaper. This will not only show what the political-action group has done, or has taken credit for doing, but its intentions for the future:

OVER THE FIRST HUMP—NOVEMBER'S NEXT

The pattern for a people's victory in political action has been cut.

It was cut last Tuesday when the C. I. O., organized labor, and the people generally scored impressive victories in the primary elections.

All labor-endorsed candidates swept in as their party's nominees for the final elections in November. Several, meaning Representative CECIL KING and District Attorney Fred N. Howser, won their elections in the primaries and won't have to face a run-off in November.

On the whole, last Tuesday's elections were gratifying. But gratifying is not enough. We know how to win.

The pattern for a people's political victory was cut very sharply in the Fifteenth Congressional District.

There JOHN M. COSTELLO had held sway. For 10 years COSTELLO had misrepresented the people of his district. For 10 years he had insolently thwarted their wishes. For 10 years he had said, "Labor doesn't count. I don't care what the people think."

Today he knows—and does care—what the people think. JOHN COSTELLO is now a lame-duck Congressman. He has been dumped. By 10,000 votes he lost the Democratic nomination to Hal Styles, and, as a Democrat, it was necessary for him to win the Democratic nomination in order to run for office again.

That he won the Republican nomination while losing his own party's nomination was only final proof of labor's contention that Costello was a Republican parading under a Democratic tag. May his political epitaph be: "Dead—One Good Republican."

But what was more significant in the Fifteenth Congressional District than that John Costello was dumped and Hal Styles elected to represent the Democratic Party in the November elections was the manner in which that victory was accomplished.

The Styles campaign offers many lessons to those of us who still have to do a job for Clyde Doyle, for Ned Healy, for Helen Gahagan Douglas, for Arch Young, for Chet Holifield, for Ellis Patterson, for Jerry Voorhis.

Chief lesson to be drawn from the Styles campaign is that intensive neighborhood work can elect any support-the-war, support-the-President, plan-the-peace candidates.

In no other district, perhaps, was there the amount of good old-fashioned neighborhood work through Democratic clubs and political action clubs than there was in the Fifteenth Congressional District.

Out of the neighborhood clubs came persons who canvassed their precincts with Styles literature, who talked to their neighbors, and who went out on election day and brought Styles voters into the polls.

Ward-heelers, who, on the whole, have been mighty successful in politics for a heluva long time, have always followed the same technique. And it's always paid off for them. It paid off for us last Tuesday.

In the Fifteenth Congressional District members of organized labor put most of their efforts into neighborhood work rather than shop work.

That doesn't mean there's anything wrong with shop work. But people vote where they live. Similarly with political action. You do it where you live.

So the pattern for victory has been cut. Now let's use it.

In the pre-election registration campaign labor did another tremendous job. It set a new record for registrations in Los Angeles County. While we were carrying the ball we did all right. But we kind of dropped the ball election day. Only about 50 percent of the registered voters turned out to the polls last Tuesday.

Come November, when a President will be elected also, we're going to have to turn out the complete pro-war, pro-Roosevelt vote. Using the primary vote as a basis, it's quite obvious that we're going to need every vote we can get.

But it's just as obvious that if we get all the pro-war, pro-Roosevelt votes we will win hands down.

We've got a big job in front of us. But we've got 5 months or more to do it in. If we start today we can do it.

Sugar Industry of Puerto Rico on Verge of Collapse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BOLÍVAR PAGÁN

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. PAGÁN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House, I include a resolution recently adopted by the Puerto Rico Farmers' Association. This resolution outlines the handicaps and difficulties of the sugar industry in Puerto Rico, which is the backbone of the island's economy. I support fullheartedly said resolution. I expect that the action requested will be taken by the proper committees of Congress, to help our sugar industry which, with its related products, constitutes the source of over 70 percent of the total income of Puerto Rico and which provides the source of living for the great bulk of our workingmen. I hope that the main industry of that American Territory, inhabited by approximately 2,000,000 American citizens, will deserve the attention and protection of Congress. The resolution reads as follows:

Resolution requesting of the Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ and JASPER C. BELL, as chairmen of their respective committees in the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Seventy-eight Congress of the United States of America, that an immediate and thorough investigation be made to determine the causes responsible for the present ruin of the sugar industry of Puerto Rico, its effect on the economy of the island, and to recommend ways and means for its rehabilitation

Whereas as of 1939 the total world sugar production was approximately 30,000,000 tons and at present 40 percent of the sugar-producing area of the world with a total normal production of approximately 12,000,000 tons of sugar is either under domination of the Axis Powers or has been crippled or destroyed to such an extent by acts of war, thereby reducing the available supply of this essential commodity and its byproducts for the United Nations and neutral countries; and

Whereas as of July 2, 1943, the Honorable President Franklin D. Roosevelt expressed:

"When I talk of important key commodities I do not mean fur coats or tailored suits or caviar. I mean the necessities of life, things like bread, milk, butter, sugar, coffee, ordinary meats, fats, and canned foods. Things the plain working folks must have"; and

Whereas a direct request has been made by the Government of the United States of the producers of sugar of the island of Puerto Rico for an increase in production of such a vital commodity; and

Whereas sugar and its related products constitute the source of over 70 percent of the total income of Puerto Rico, providing employment for nearly 150,000 family heads and the main source of income of 13,000 small farms; and

Whereas in normal years $100,000,000 worth of American goods, manufactured or grown in the continental United States by American labor are purchased by Puerto Rico, and due to the present condition of our main industry the island is on the verge of losing the greater part of its purchasing power for these same American goods; and

Whereas the majority of the 13,000 independent producers of sugarcane in Puerto Rico operate under adverse conditions due to poorness of the soil, lack of equipment, lack of irrigations, small-scale operation, lack of capital reserves to meet contingencies, and other factors not affecting the largest operator; and

Whereas the Federal Government is deeply involved in the sugar industry of Puerto Rico through (1) P. R. R. A. control of 2 cooperative mills with over 1,500 grower members supplying the cane they grind and being for the most part heavily mortgaged to the P. R. R. A., (2) F. S. A. development of several projects in which the lands were purchased and divided among the growers with the F. S. A. taking mortgages on the land, and (3) the Federal land bank through the Intermediate Credit Bank, the Bank for Cooperatives, the Production Credit Corporation, the Emergency Crops and Seed Loan Agency, has loaned millions of dollars to sugarcane farmers in Puerto Rico for the purchase of land, seed, and cultivation expenses; and

Whereas the Government of Puerto Rico, through the land authority, is carrying on several programs connected with the operation of sugar lands for the benefit of workers; and

Whereas unless the present conditions of the industry are corrected the financial structure of all the above-mentioned enterprises and programs are bound to crumble with the consequent misery to countless thousands of small farmers and workers and their families, and the loss to the Federal Government of millions of dollars of taxpayers' moneys; and

Whereas while the Puerto Rican sugar industry is on the verge of a complete collapse, the sugar industries of Cuba and Santo Domingo, foreign countries, are thriving in an era of expansion and prosperity largely due to concessions, grants, and prerogatives granted them; and

Whereas Puerto Rico as part of the United States is naturally influenced, and has a right to aspire to a standard of living for its people in accordance with American standards prevalent in the United States; and

Whereas price ceiling for all farm products in the continental United States have been fixed, maintained, and adjusted taking into consideration the cost of production plus a reasonable margin for the farmer; and

Whereas the adjustments in prices of commodities that the island buys have been adjusted upward from time to time and sugar prices have been maintained at fixed levels with the effect of reducing Puerto Rico's purchasing power; and

Whereas it is an accepted fact by all in Puerto Rico that if the sugar industry is to continue to exist, it is essential that labor receive a just wage in accordance with the cost of living, that the colonos receive a just and equitable price for their sugar cane sufficient to meet costs of production and leave a reasonable return on the capital invested, that the mills must be able to operate under similar conditions, that the maximum of balance is necessary for the proper functioning of the industry as a whole, and that adequate capital reserves should be created to meet contingencies for market fluctuations, weather conditions, disaster, etc.; and

Whereas irrespective of certain local actions of the insular government which have impeded the functioning of the sugar industry; its stability, progress, and development have been seriously disturbed by actions of Federal Government agencies and commissions which have increased the cost of production far in excess of the value of the product and therefore to a large extent have brought about a reduction in the production of sugar in Puerto Rico, as well as the present disastrous condition in the industry; and

Whereas the Office of Price Administration on January 3, 1942, by the issuance of Maximum Price Schedule No. 16—Raw Cane Sugar, set a ceiling price of 3.74 cents a pound for raw sugar, duty paid basis, which ceiling price continues to be in effect as of the present time and therefore limits the price which the grower of sugarcane in Puerto Rico can receive for his cane and the price that the mill can receive for its raw sugar; and

Whereas the Office of Price Administration has not been able to hold the line on the prices of the items that the sugarcane growers and sugar mills must buy for the operation of their business as it has on the price of raw sugar, the increases in the prices of fertilizer over the levels prevailing at the time the present ceiling price was set alone amounting to approximately 30 cents per ton of cane; and

Whereas Federal agencies, such as the United States Maritime Commission and the War Shipping Administration, controlling shipping and ocean freight rates, on January 3, February 17, and March 30, 1942, after the present ceiling price was set on raw sugar, raised the ocean freight rate on raw sugar shipped from Puerto Rico from 20 to 35 cents per 100 pounds; only 7 cents of this 15-cent increase having been absorbed by Federal agencies; and

Whereas the Secretary of Agriculture and the War Food Administration provided for substantial increases in wage rates to sugarcane labor above the rates established pursuant to the sliding-scale arrangement contained in the local collective-bargaining agreement between the sugarcane growers and labor at the ceiling price of 3.74 cents a pound, these increases being made to compensate labor for the higher cost of living resulting from rising prices and being of such an extent that the labor cost in growing sugarcane has been raised $1.66 per ton of cane since 1942; and

Whereas, the War Food Administration in its determinations of farming practices with which sugar can growers must comply to be eligible for payments under the Sugar Act of 1937 has required such growers in Puerto Rico to plant from 7 to 20 percent of their sugar cane acreage in food crops, an interpretation of the powers granted in the act that never was intended by legislators, and the growth of these crops has caused increases in cost in 1943 and 1944 amounting to approximately 10 cents per ton of cane grown, such losses not being entailed at the time the present ceiling price was set; and

Whereas, the Navy Department through the Commandant of the Tenth Naval District, by an order issued around the middle of March 1942, closed all of the ports of Puerto Rico except San Juan, Guañica, Jobos, Mayaguez, and Ponce as a security measure, thereby forcing the sugar industry to ship much of its sugar from one of the closed ports to one of those remaining open and increasing the expenses of shipping and selling sugar and thereby reducing the income of the sugarcane growers from the level when the 3.74-cent ceiling price was originally set; and

Whereas, the Government of the United States, through the Anglo-American Caribbean Commission, reached an arrangement with the Government of the United Kingdom that had the effect of withholding fertilizer from sugarcane growers in Puerto Rico, even that fertilizer on hand in the island, so that the combined effects of the lack of fertilization and the drought, conditions that had a much more detrimental effect than they would have had if there had been fertilizer and the cane had got off to its usual vigorous start, and reduced the island's sugar crop from 1,148,000 tons in 1942 and 1,039,000 tons in 1943 to a low of about 725,000 tons in 1944; and

Whereas the increase in the cost of producing sugar and marketing it resulting principally from these actions amounts to 1.2 cents a pound of which only .07 cents of the excess ocean freight and .04 cents of the excess intra-island shipping expenses having been absorbed by Federal agencies, leaving an increase of 1.1 cents a pound to be borne by the industry or nearly 30 percent over the total market value of the product; and

Whereas as a result of these cost increases and fixed prices, both the growing and processing branches of the industry, as a whole, are sustaining substantial losses; and

Whereas appeals have been made to the Office of Price Administration for adjustments in the ceiling price on raw sugar without avail; and

Whereas in the negotiation with Commodity Credit Corporation for the sale of the 1944 Puerto Rico sugar crop, assistance was asked by the industry and treatment in line with that accorded to other areas by the same agency was requested and was denied on the grounds that Commodity Credit Corporation could not cushion for the industry the impacts of war conditions; and

Whereas it seems that the industry has exhausted the administrative possibilities for relief from the burdensome conditions that are rapidly bankrupting it: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Puerto Rico Farmers Association, meeting in general assembly in San Juan, P. R., May 21, 1944, That Hon. DENNIS CHAVEZ and Hon. JASPER C. BELL, as chairman of the subcommittee of the United States Congress appointed to study economic and social conditions in Puerto Rico, be requested, to make a thorough investigation of the facts recited herein to ascertain the reasons for discriminatory treatment to Puerto Rico on the part of Federal agencies and to recommend that due action be taken which will protect the backbone of the island's economy and preserve the large-scale employment and wages that the industry has provided in the past.

I certify that the above is a true copy of the resolution approved unanimously at the general convention of the Puerto Rico Farmers' Association held at San Juan, Puerto Rico, on May 21, 1944.

Address of Rupert Hughes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. NORRIS POULSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Rupert Hughes delivered on May 20, 1944:

There is intense suspense while we wait for the invasion news to break, but the home front resembles a civil war and mutual denunciations are filling the air as if the D-day of election were at hand, though the rehearsals of the nominating conventions are still some weeks away.

For many years now certain factions have been telling us in no uncertain terms that anybody who runs a business and pays salaries or wages to anybody else is a public enemy, and a dangerous criminal who must be heavily shackled if allowed at large at all. The bigger his business and the more men he employs, the more vicious and untrustworthy he is. Freedom of spech belonged to all but the employer He could not even indulge in repartee. He must himself finance open rebellion against his business and his business judgment.

To plead with his employees not to take steps against their own interests and not to endanger the very existence of their jobs—that privilege was denied him.

Then last week a court decided that an employer who criticized certain elements trying to take over and conscript his own employees was not necessarily in contempt of court. A judge actually ruled that an employer might still be an American citizen and talk frankly to his employees without going to jail—provided he did not seem to intimidate or threaten.

Granting employers a certain modicum of free speech is not the only boon conferred on them lately. A judge has actually apologized to businessmen for unjust slander heaped on them.

In Denver this week, United States District Judge Symes actually threw a case against employers out of court and rebuked the Government for branding as conspirators and criminals a group of 10 meat-packing concerns and 22 individuals, though none of them had broken any law or done anybody any harm or violated in any respect the Anti-trust Act.

In his dismissal, Judge Symes expressed his regret that the men and firms accused had been driven to years of delay at great expense to save themselves. In his own words, they were "branded as criminals, and we cannot now fully restore their good names."

After this judicial protest, the assistant to the United States Attorney General said he agreed whole-heartedly with the judge's criticism and was withdrawing the charges.

But the harm has been done, the smear still sticks to the innocent victims, and they can, as we say, pocket their losses and thank heaven they were not added to a jail sentence.

We have gone a long way from the harsh old times when employers had all the rights and employees had none. Hours and conditions were cruel and the wage slaves were at the mercy of their employers. The pendulum swung slowly for a century almost to the opposite extreme, and now wage slaves are wage masters and employers have few rights.

The pendulum seems to be dropping back toward the center where both sides have rights and work together in harmony. But, alas, a pendulum never rests at the center. It seems to be a law of nature and of human nature that mankind forever rushes from extreme to extreme. Everything pendulates. If the pendulum sticks at the center, the clock also stops.

The ideal thing would be to narrow the pendulations, avoid a swing too far either to the right or to the left. But there is an inevitable tug-of-war between the wage payer and the wage receivers. It is human nature for each to strive to get the better of the other. Yet it should be a friendly contest, not a life-and-death struggle, for worker and manager cannot exist without each other.

People have always been fighting and dying for words and slogans and imaginary inherited mottoes without really understanding of caring much about meanings. Thus the words "capital" and "capitalist" have taken on a false color from an association with wealth ill gotten, by oppression of the poor. But that is not their true scientific and practical meaning.

The American Economic Foundation is trying to reduce things and ideas to their simplest and most real meanings in simple and direct words. Clouds and fogs are shapeless and bewildering. Condense them to rain drops and they are clear, understandable, and life saving. So, in a scientific view of human life, capital means nothing but tools, things to make things with, things that may be exchanged for other things made with other tools. Thereby the man with leather and a knife and needles can make enough shoes to trade some of them with the man who has flour and an oven and can make more bread than his family needs. So the shoemaker does not have to eat leather and the baker does not have to go barefoot.

Tools are capital, and the man who owns them and uses them or rents them is a capitalist. That is all there is to it. But almost nobody understands it or acts on it.

Furthermore, as the American Economic Foundation makes plain, the man we call employer is really only a middleman, an agent, go-between between the worker and the customer. The customer is the real employer and sets the wage scale and the volume of sales. If there are no customers or few, the so-called employer is as much out of luck and out of a job as the wage earner with nobody to pay his wages.

If the worker or the agent puts the price beyond the reach or the whim of the customer, there is no sale, the so-called employer gets no rent for his tools, or capital, and the worker gets nothing for his toil. Most important of all, and therefore most ignored of all, the workers are themselves customers. We are all customers of one another, employers of one another. Unless we cooperate and keep the markets humming, we all suffer. It is not merely a matter of cutting off our noses to spite our faces; it is cutting off our hands to starve our teeth.

The great railroad magnate is the hireling of the people who pay their pennies to ride in his cars. If the fare is too high, he goes "broke" and they go afoot, but not very far or fast.

Wisdom and experience proclaim that we are all customers, and so we are all employers and can harm others only by wrecking ourselves. Ambition, ingenuity, assiduity, courage, and freedom of thought and debate will always be necessary if progress is made. The inventor and the adventurer and the explorer must be free, or the pendulum swings the proudest and most prosperous nation back into poverty and impotence.

It was never so important as now that we should recognize the true truth about the people we call employers and grant them freedom and encouragement to speak their minds and use their wits for our sakes as well as their own. For we are drawing nearer and nearer to the most critical peace that ever followed a war. The plants will close or try to shift their products with the release of millions of workers at the same time when millions are released from the armed forces.

It will be all too easy to find labor free—all too free. But it will not be easy to find capital. We owe a vast part of our conquest of this continent and of our leading place in the industrial world to the courage of what is called venture capital and to the ingenuity of it. But adventurers will not risk all without hope of profit and venture capital will not venture forth if it is promised only its own destruction and enslavement for its reward.

Bitter feelings have been aroused and will continue bitter because of another lost battle against the Constitution. That was the matter of the poll tax. Its defeat is another victory for the restoration of State rights. In the early days of our Republic there were many restrictions on the ballot. Certain property requirements were made in all the States. In many States officeholders had to belong to a State church. It was not till about 1836 that anything approaching a universal white suffrage was attained. In a few States this was long delayed.

For nearly a hundred years women appealed for the ballot, but did not gain it till nearly 80 years after a constitutional amendment gave the franchise to the Negroes with the end of slavery.

The proper way to remove the poll tax is by amendment or by action within the State, not by congressional vote. You cannot build liberty by destroying its safeguards. The latest attempt to force the Senate into this illegal deed was defeated by the determination of its opponents to talk it to death, by filibuster, which could be prevented only by a vote to limit debate by what they call cloture.

The cloture bill would have required a two-thirds majority to pass, and it barely reached a one-third minority.

In these lively preconvention battles each party will inevitably try to shift the blame for everything evil to the other party and claim for itself all the good. The leftists, whose chief endeavor is to spread discord while howling for unity, their brand of unity, naturally shout that the Republicans are to blame for the defeat of the anti-poll-tax bill, yet more Republicans voted for it than against it, and more Democrats voted against it than for it.

It is reassuring to read that steps will now be taken to attack the poll tax legitimately by constitutional amendment. It would have been a quicker way than the long, vain, and improper effort to persuade Congress to step in where it has no right to tread.

Meanwhile, Congress continues to refuse to call out of committee the equal rights amendment granting women the equality they have earned by inherent human rights and by their magnificent work in every field of the war effort.

The poll tax affects only the Negro voters in a handful of States. The failure to submit the equal rights amendment to the Nation affects every woman voter, Negro or white, in the whole Nation—that is to say, more than half the voters of the whole country. Yet, strangely enough, the leftists and extremists, who are shrieking to high heaven for the repeal of the poll tax, are opposed to removing from women the last legal inequality under which they suffer.

Speaking of women and their amazing emergence into practically equal rights with men to every hard and dangerous task in the war, I have been bowled over by certain very recent items in the so-called society columns—the ones devoted to brides and bridegrooms.

None of the front-page banners concerning the war has given me such a start and such a pop-eye of amazement as one smallish headline over a brief item in a New York paper last week.

Take a firm grip on your chair and don't sue N. B. C. if you fall out of it. I actually read in a reputable newspaper this incredible line: "Marine officer is a bride."

That's right. You heard it the first time; but for the benefit of anyone who may have come in late or tuned in by mistake—that's the only way I get any listeners—I repeat. I read in the paper this line:

"Marine officer is a bride."

We used to say of a tall story too tall to be believed: "Tell it to the marines." Of late the marines have been telling us how tough they are, and proving it. But really now, for a marine to become a bride.

And of all things, the marine officer is named "Georgette."

Oh, wait a minute. I've just read on and I find that the bride is a member of the Marine Corps Women's Reserves. My apologies to her and my congratulations to the major in the Marine Air Corps who won her.

On the same page is a picture of a handsome lady who is a lieutenant commander in the WAVES, and she is marrying a mere captain in the Army.

The Army has its scandal, too, and furnishes this dumfounding dispatch from Algiers:

"Colonel weds a colonel in Army bridal."

The story goes on: "Two lieutenant colonels of the United States Army were married today in a colorful ceremony. The bride was Lt. Col. Bernice M. Wilbur, director of nurses in the Mediterranean theater, and the bridegroom was Lt. Col. Stewart F. Alexander, chief of chemical warfare medicine."

Here is a picture of a nurse at the battle front laughingly washing her underclothes in her helmet. Here is the story of a shattered soldier having his wounds dressed by a nurse and seeing Japanese bombers coming over. He begs the girl to dive for a foxhole but she goes on calmly with her bandaging while the shells crash.

This sort of thing indicates a revolution far more profound and lasting than any that is likely to come from the mad chaos of this war. In our Revolutionary War tough old Molly Pitcher won immortality by loading a cannon, and there were a few women who passed for a while as soldiers till they were discovered by being wounded.

Today we read without a tremor, "Colonel Marries Colonel" and "Marine Is a Bride." The armed forces are screaming for more women to come out of the homes and help them fight. The factories are wailing for women to come to the machines.

But the equal-rights amendment languishes in committee because we must protect the weaker sex. At that we may be doing it, for in shackling women we are protecting, and confessing ourselves, the weaker sex.

Bible Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include the following excellent editorial which appeared in the June 2, 1944, issue of the Bee, Lawrence, Mass.:

BIBLE SHORTAGE

We appreciate the fact that the Government hasn't attempted to define what publications and what types of books are "important" in issuing regulations for the rationing of paper. We realize that if paper was rationed on the basis of what a few men in Washington considered worth-while reading matter a form of censorship would be created which would be objectionable to everyone.

In general, therefore, we agree that the plan to allot paper on an equal basis to publishers of all kinds, regardless of text matter, is the safest method. But even a good rule must have exceptions, as was proved to us by a recent story about a shortage of Bibles.

The demand for Bibles has been reaching new records since the war started, but because of paper and printing problems the supply has not kept pace with the demand. When we think of all the cheap so-called comic magazines that glut the newsstands, plus the tons of trashy novels which swamp the bookstores, we realize that the paper-rationing rule needs some hasty revision. We don't care how it is done, but we do know that there should be no excuse for people not be able to buy Bibles when they can buy worthless reading matter by the ton.

Good Luck, Soldier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WINIFRED C. STANLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Miss STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by William Rose Benét:

GOOD LUCK, SOLDIER!

(By William Rose Benét)

To you on the day of invasion,
Written by one not worthy,
Now of your waiting,
Now of your meeting the moment of culmination,
The fiery instant,
The day, the hour, the time of terror and God,
Of the things we can imagine and cannot imagine,
Of the thousand clocks on the tick of the world's destiny,
Turn of the world's history:
In this hour,
Now and forever,
Good luck, Soldier!

To graduates of Howard or of Harvard,
Men from Stanford, V. M. I., Ann Arbor,
City College, Tuskegee, Sacred Heart,
Groton, The Hill, P. S. Such-and-Such-a-Number:
Boys from no school at all;
The lad from the cold-water flat in West Manhattan,
The Southern sharecropper's or the Okie's son:
To men of every description from Everywhere:
Government Issue, clad in waterproof suits
In the assault-boat: doughboys tensely waiting
For the bows to drop like a drawbridge: guys swarming
Down cargo-nets into the landing-barges,
Spurning the sand on the beach-head, flopping to cover
On the Channel coast at any likely spot;
Facing emplacement, battery, redoubt,
Massive concrete, guns imbedded in hills—
Under smoke screen, aircraft high or low,
Hedge-hopping Mustangs, high-up Flying Forts,
Naval gunfire: these and the paratroopers
Hitting the silk: the air-borne, those in gliders:
Light and heavy platoons with the drifted weapons,
Looking for ground signs, ready to seize the junction,
Corral the airfield: engineers with explosive,
Dodging from shell crater to shell crater,
Wire men, walkie-talkies, radio men,
Bars, Bazookas, Bren-gun carriers,
Flame throwers, mine detectors, those with grenades and torpedoes,
Through the tornado of shells and machine-gun bullets,
The demon shriek and crump,
The ping like piano wire suddenly severed:
Roar and concussion, concussion and roar continuous,
As the advance goes forward, as counter-attack
Gathers, looms, and thunders—
This is not written—
No, it is not writing, not even a scrawl!
You will write it in letters of blood and fire,
In fountains of earth and a canopy of cordite,
In wounds and shock and death—
In that mortal hour
Good luck, Soldier!

You in the battle dress, with Garand and carbine,
With axe and garrote of the scout, feeling the land,
Sighting along the azimuth, clinging earth
And your other mother, Darkness: you in the scrabbled foxhole,
Behind brush, in the slit trench, under barrage,
Flattened by the bombardment, creeping, crawling,
Worming forward, getting beneath the wire:
You in the tank attack, under the eighty-eights,
Stunned; on fire and bloody; twisting the tourniquet,
Finding the sulfa drugs, inching on digging elbows
Back through the din, teeth clinched, lips bitten,
In the flare and the black, between the black and the flare—
Good luck, Soldier!

It came. It was met. The threat, the inconceivable
Unfolding of their huge elaborate scheme
That seemed a dream at first, something we scoffed
Till that was aloft which blotted out the sun,
Afoot which shook a continent,
Done which stunned.
For the earth sprang suddenly armed, and we
Who thought to be free, tasted terror and pain,
Felt iron rain—who now, by land and sea,
Bring them their war again.
That is why. And because mankind
Was deaf and dumb and blind,
Not caring how close we all are bound, how men
May never pass by on the other side again;
How the world is knit, the whole world, however wide
The distance seem.
Soldier, our G. I. Joe,
Now, if you dream
In barrack or tent the old familiar thing:
The leggy colt in the pasture; the path through the wood to the spring;
The girl under apple blossoms; the screen door flapping
To the fragrant kitchen; the old dog twitching and napping
On the scuffed steps; the slack mule leaning
Black at the skyline furrow on a sun-red sky—
All the simple things of home that once had meaning,
Seeming completely to go
On this hurricane that still is shrieking by—
Why, in spite of danger, death, or doom,
They are the things you go to bring to bloom
Now, everywhere on earth: Man's simple right,
To know his home and loved ones safe at night,
To sleep at night by his helpmate's side
In peace, to know his children and his dear
Free from such mortal fear
As grips all Europe, in blood of Asia dyed
And shuddering to its core:
The creed of the sword, the red morass of war.
So this is written for you
By one unworthy, but the words are true.

Now, on the tick of the watch, as the sands fall,
Forward in multitude you go for all
Our hope, our faith, our fixed and furious will;
Therefore, with all the human love they coldly thought to kill,
Good luck, Soldier.

A Trainee of W. T. S.–C. A. C. Program Explains in Detail How the A. A. F. Failed to Keep Their Word and Double-Crossed Them

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES H. MORRISON
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following reply to testimony before the House Military Affairs Committee from a former C. P. T.–W. T. S. trainee:

The writer is an authority on neither military affairs nor aviation, but he does possess one very important qualification for commenting upon this testimony: He was a trainee of the C. A. A. war training service from November 15, 1942 until January 16, 1944. He participated in four of the W. T. S. courses and knew intimately a great many of the other trainees with whom he flew, lived, and received military training at seven different posts and colleges. As an intelligent observer with 8 years of college and university training, three university degrees, and a college teacher's background, he gathered a fairly comprehensive idea of the caliber of W. T. S. men and the general outlines of the W. T. S. program. For these reasons he feels prepared to point out some very fundamental errors and misunderstandings relative to the hearing.

MEASURING UP TO AIR FORCE STANDARDS

A great deal was said at the hearing about the alleged failure of the W. T. S. trainees and instructors to measure up to Army standards. We wonder just how and where, specifically, they fell short.

Was it physically? Then reflect that every one of these 4,687 W. T. S. men had passed their Army 64 physical examination shortly after being inducted. And every one of the C. A. A. instructors had met the rigid physical requirements for the commercial license and instructor's rating. (It is true that very minor physical defects existed among some of the men who first entered the C. A. A., war training service program. But these men were eliminated from further training at the time of their activation and these men are not among the 4,687 or the instructors.) Now, if these pilots have passed the identical examination given flying cadets of the A. A. F. or if they have met the C. A. A. instructor's physical standards, it can hardly be physical qualifications to which the testimony referred.

Was it mental? It was not idle thinking that prompted Major Booth, commanding officer of the Twenty-third Training Group of Jefferson Barracks to address a thousand of these W. T. S. men as "the most intelligent and best educated" group of men ever sent to that post for training. Major Booth knew something of our original C. A. A. screening examination scores, our Army general classification test scores, our Army mechanical aptitude test scores, the grades that we made during a thousand hours of W. T. S. ground schooling, and our scores on other Army and C. A. A. examinations. If the 201 files of these men could be consulted they would disclose a surprising number of men who had been lawyers, teachers, students in professional schools, and owners of successful businesses in civilian life. Compare their annual earnings in civilian life with the Army average. Far from being an inferior group they will be found exceptionally qualified mentally. Finally consult such Army Air Forces officials as Lt. Col. Robert D. Moser (3321 Old Dominion Boulevard, Alexandria, Va.), as to his opinion of the W. T. S. men. Colonel Moser interviewed and studied the records of hundreds of us at Keesler Field in September and October, 1943. His opinion would throw considerable light upon any question as to our mental capacity. Now that leaves the matter of age to be considered.

Was it our age? We had the misfortune of being born prior to 1917, those 3,713 of us who could not transfer to Aviation Cadets Training. The instructors are pretty largely over cadet age limits also. But, since the proposed WASP program will take married women with young children, mothers who are as old as 38, we fail to see why our age should discriminate against us. None of us is beyond that age. That leaves but one category to be considered:

Was it our flying ability? And at this point it is necessary to clear up a matter that is generally and completely confused. No one is proposing that either these former W. T. S. trainees who were cut off in the various—but generally advanced—stages of their training, or these thousands of instructors—for all their hundreds of hours—be put to ferrying fast and heavy aircraft immediately. But it is proposed that both groups of these men be given just a small fraction of the training that WASPS receive and that they then be checked against Army methods and flying procedures. (Standards is the wrong word. Army and C. A. A. flying do not differ in fundamentals or quality but only in standardized procedures and practices where it differs at all. Let anyone compare the C. A. A. and Army requirements for an instrument rating, for example. They will be found virtually identical Of course, one must not compare the civilian standards of years ago against present-day Army standards. We are speaking of men who learned to fly according to today's C. A. A. rulings and standards, men whom it was supposed from the first would go into Army flying within a few months.)

It is true, of course, that C. A. A. men have flown as a rule the lighter and slower types of aircraft (there are notable exceptions, such as the Beechcraft C–43), but the point is this: Insofar as our courses have taken us, we are flying as ably as any group anywhere, WASPS not excepted. Our safety record will testify to that. Bear in mind that Sam Foss and 700 other men who have been decorated for flying in the armed services "bear the C. A. A. brand on them in some way or another."

If, then, it is our flying ability that is questioned, keep clearly in mind that we are not completely trained. Many of us could fly many of the Army's planes with complete satisfaction to all at once but we make no pretense of being able to handle the most advanced trainers and fighters and bombers without additional instruction. But give us just the final 20 percent of the training that the WASPS receive, and we will meet every standard that the Army can demand.

Summary: We have failed to find evidence of any lack of physical or mental qualifications on the part of the C. A. A. W. T. S. men. Their age is acceptable by the Army Air Forces. Their flying will be second to none if they are permitted to complete their training with relatively few hours of instruction in Army aircraft by Army instructors. Many are immediately prepared to fly many of the Air Force planes.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE AIR FORCES FOR C. A. A. TRAINEES

On page 10 of the report of the hearing, in reply to the question: "You are not responsible for them (the W. T. S. trainees) coming into this training program initially?" the testimony reads: "We were probably indirectly responsible because we announced to the public our need for additional personnel, directly no."

Here is unmistakable inference that the Air Forces had no working agreement with the C. A. A. in this matter. Yet every man among us, when he took the oath of enlistment at the Army recruiting offices, thought that he was entering a jointly sponsored program. Evidently the C. A. A. thought likewise for they wrote in their official publication, the Civil Aeronautics Authority Journal, April 1, 1942, of the new plan for training pilots full time and of its plans being worked out by cooperation between the C. A. A. and the Army Air Forces.

Senator MCCARRAN likewise thought that an agreement existed for he said (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 26, 1943, p. 3796):

"The Army called upon the Civil Aeronautics Authority to train a group of men, and, pursuant to the request of the Army, the Civil Aeronautics Authority is now in fact training those who are going into pilot training for the Army. The Authority promised this group of men that when their training was completed they would be given employment."

Senator Lodge had the same understanding of the situation (ibid, p. 3794):

"The Army * * * entered into an agreement with the Civil Aeronautics Authority for the training of service pilots, transport pilots, and glider pilots."

These two Senators were members of the committee which had just received testimony as to the status of W. T. S. trainees, at the time these statements were made. At the same discussion on the floor of the Senate, General Harper, Assistant Chief of Air Staff Training of the Army Air Forces was quoted:

"They (the W. T. S. trainees) have been training under an agreement with the Army Air Forces, so that we receive their product."

We read the documents that we signed when we joined up for this training. We were not misled. An agreement did exist. But the A. A. F. has apparently repudiated its end of that agreement.

Moreover we were told definitely in the agreements that we signed that, upon successful completion of the courses offered by the C. A. A., we would be either (1) taken over by the Army for further flight training or (2) commissioned by the Army and given flying status, or (3) employed as a flight instructor by the Army and retained on an enlisted reserve basis.

These promises were in black and white. Let C. A. A. forms be consulted in proof thereof. The alternate promise of a commission was stated just as definitely as it is to anyone in the Army Air Forces. These promises were tendered by the C. A. A. We had every reason to believe that they were made in good faith and with full Army cognizance. But the promises were not kept and in view of the proposed expansion of W. A. S. P. training, the excuse "exigencies of war" carries no weight.

Summary: Although the testimony denies direct responsibility of the A. A. F. toward former W. T. S. trainees, the testimony of the official C. A. A. publication, two Senators, and the Assistant Chief of Air Staff Training stands to the contrary. C. A. A. forms will show that the promises made to the men who enlisted in the W. T. S. program were more than implied.

THE MANPOWER SHORTAGE

The testimony included a great deal about the manpower shortage and the need for putting round pegs into round holes. Now it is presumed that these potential women pilots are not unemployed prior to their enlistment in the WASPS. The type of woman who can free herself sufficiently from home responsibilities to enter military service is probably already working at some reasonably useful work if she possesses any patriotic sentiment whatever. Moreover she can—if she has a mind to—do what is expected of her in a defense factory. (What psychologist would subscribe to the existence of a type of woman who possesses the strength, endurance, coordination, and intelligence to fly Army aircraft but is incapable of doing a simple factory job?) The question becomes then: Shall these women be taken from their present work, put into many long months of training at great expense to the Government, and finally emerge able to do the flying jobs which were promised to thousands of highly qualified men whose training is almost complete? And shall those same men be put into the status of privates in the ground forces and forced to begin some other long course of training which has nothing whatever to do with flying? Where could one find better examples of the use of square pegs in round holes than in such a proposal?

FAVORITISM

It is one thing to be chivalrous; it is another thing to display outright favoritism. These WASP trainees are "professional women," we are told, "like nurses." Are they professional with but 35 hours of flying time? (Let us be realistic. No great number of already-qualified women pilots will be brought to the service by this bill; it is the training aspects of the bill that are important.) Does the Army classify as nurses women who have completed 15 percent of their hospital training?

Those women who do not complete the WASP program of training should be returned to civilian life, we are told. Not since the end of Volunteer Officer's Training School has that sort of generosity been proffered as a policy. If a WAC fails to make the grade in WAC Officer's Candidate School, is she returned to civilian life? By such a policy any girl who finds the training a little too rough for her or who is bored of the routine, needs only to skid a few turns and overshoot a few landings and she will be en route to her civilian status. The recent WASP publicity such as the movie, Ladies Courageous, and the article in the March issue of the Ladies Home Journal is calculated to bring that very "fly-by night," glamour-seeking, just-out-of-high-school type of child into the WASP training program.

CONCLUSION

The complete story of the W. T. S. program is long and complex but the essential facts are these:

1. The C. A. A. trainees and instructors are a highly qualified group of men, physically and mentally.

2. The average age of these men is well below that of the top limit for women pilots and only a few years above that for combat pilots.

3. The training of these men is well advanced and could be completed with a small fraction of the time and expense required to train sufficient women pilots.

4. The Army Air Forces has a responsibility toward the men who enlisted, sacrificed, and were dropped from training through no fault of their own.

5. The proposal to fill with women who are as yet untrained the jobs which were promised these men from their day of enlistment would be a grossly inefficient utilization of manpower.

6. The WASP program, smacking of favoritism, extra concessions and glamor, is utterly unfair to the taxpayers because it forces them to pay for training that has already been paid for and delivered but never utilized.

7. Former C. A. A. W. T. S. trainees and instructors should have their present flying skill carefully and fairly assessed, their training should be continued by the Army from that point, and each man should be utilized in the various noncombatant flying duties just as quickly as he qualifies for a given type of flying assignment.

A Year of Decision

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein a copy of a speech entitled "A Year of Decision" made by my colleague the Honorable EVERETT M. DIRKSEN, of Illinois. This talk was delivered last night at the Mayflower Hotel at a banquet tendered Congressman DIRKSEN by many of his colleagues of the House in recognition of his outstanding ability and service to his Nation over the 12 years that he has been a Member of the House of Representatives. I place this speech in the RECORD so that those who were not privileged to hear this splendid talk will have the opportunity to read it:

My colleagues and friends, this is both a happy and a solemn occasion.

It is solemn because since early morning we have taken account of what is happening on the invasion front and the progress of young Americans far afield who are moving in the direction of victory.

Grim as the thought may be, we cannot escape the feeling that these are the last days on earth for many young men.

In the deathless language of Colonel McCrae who left for us the touching and poetic legacy of Flanders' Fields, we think of young soldiers who were nurtured and suckled on the bosom of this Republic as living, throbbing vital young men who short days ago, lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow, loved, and were loved, and now they are engaged in grim and undramatic business to which they freely give their all.

Where they are on the battle front is but an extension of the home front where we are.

We cannot ponder their absence today on a mission of victory and freedom without breathing a gracious prayer that they may manfully endure the hard tasks which lie ahead.

We cannot ponder their absence today without experiencing a new burst of faith, a new hope for the future of this world, and a new reverence for the obligations which are ours on the home front.

It is for us to invest the victory that they will soon achieve with a durable purpose by a complete and moral worthiness for the sacrifices which they now make.

Let there be devotion and humility in our hearts this day.

II

This is also a happy occasion. I could not be other than humble by the fellowship which is so abundant here because it reaches to the heart.

I am so grateful for that measure of esteem and good will on your part which months ago, prompted you to urge me to seek some recognition on our Republican national ticket.

Perhaps it is not immodest to hope and believe that you were moved by the conviction that one who has served for substantial period in the Congress and who may have developed some familiarity with the highways and byways of a complex and sensitive government structure, might add strength to the Republican cause in the days ahead and because of your action, I felt an obligation to make a campaign and visit in many sections of our blessed land.

There has been opportunity to journey into more than one-half of the States of the Union, and I can report to you that it has been an enriching and stimulating adventure.

It gave me a chance to visit with your people back home and to give them an appraisal of the diligence, the earnestness and the loyalty which you have brought to your task and to the problems with which we have wrestled.

It supplied a chance to audit the thoughts, the hopes, and the reflections of your people and to find inspiration in the resolve and quiet courage with which they keep the vigil on the home front.

It offered an opportunity to see and to find new hope in the incredible genius and versatility of this Republic.

Above all else, it afforded a chance to enjoy a rich fellowship with Americans everywhere who in their hearts and souls still keep step with the music of the Union. Many of them were the fathers and mothers of young men who are this very da landing upon the shores of the Old World to combat the brutal idea that might makes right and to restore peace, serenity, good living, and sweetness to a world which for a generation has been steeped in bitterness and unrest.

What an adventure of the spirit that really was, for in them one finds no dreamy despair nor the dross of defeatism.

The refining fires of war have burned away whatever of dross there might have been and left only a quiet resolve that calls for audacious action, for victory, for the crown of peace, for a new spirit of amity in the world, and for a maintenance of that freedom for which young men are this day being bruised in body and mind.

Truly, my colleagues and friends, there was about all this a majestic adventure like the stars whispering to the soul, and to you, who made it possible, I shall be ever grateful.

III

Let us go back to these good people in every section of the land.

What do they say and for what do they hope in the days ahead.

In their questions, one could easily trace a common pattern which is a gracious testimony to the fact that to know our country, we must look into the common heart.

When will the war end?

When will peace come?

When will our boys come back?

It's not just, When will the boys come back?

It's when will our boys come back? In that one pronoun, you see the kinship of Main Street to the struggle which engrosses the attention of the whole world.

Will we achieve a peace this time which will have a chance to endure?

What are they fighting for and when its over, what will be the effect upon our future.

These are the thoughts and hopes with which we must deal as we prepare to make a bid for the trusteeship of power for the next 4 years.

It should suggest to us that the spirit in which we seek responsibility and power is everything.

It suggests that as we frame policies and select leaders, that we be moved by a constant courage which is worthy of the millions of young Americans who are this day on freedom's frontier.

It suggests that the danger and jeopardy to which they are exposed shall have a value and that if the way to the stars is hard, let us go the hard way if it is right.

It suggests that the course which we chart for the future can become a pin-up charter in every American heart.

IV

But let's go back to these good people in all parts of the land who think, who hope, who ask questions, and whose hearts are prayerfully attuned to the undramatic business now at hand.

"When will our boys come home?" they ask.

That blessed day will come.

A telegram or telephone call will one day announce to a proud father and anxious mother that a soldier son is back in the land of his birth and soon he will be home.

What preparations there will be to give him a welcome that befits a hero and what anxious hours and days must be endured until familiar steps upon the stoop will unmistakably declare that he surely is back home.

Then the joys of homecoming will be complete.

A mother in the hard and vigorous embrace of a soldier son. A son encircled by the loving arms of a mother who day in and day out prayed for his safe return but also that he manfully perform the tasks that were assigned by the cause of freedom.

What a recital it will be. What adventures he experienced from the day he enlisted or was inducted until that glad day when a deafening stillness was heard round the world and peace had returned to assuage the long and engulfing and costly bitterness which afflicted mankind.

With drama and gesture, he will tell where he was and what he did.

Then, of course, comes the inevitable $64 question. What's been going on back home while I was gone?

Then comes the time for us on the home front to give an accounting of our stewardship.

V

It is the key to the real issue before us and it can be phrased in the form of a question: "What will he find over here when it's over over there."

From the statements and speeches which one encounters from time to time that unity and morale are in issue. They are not issues. They are duties which every American gladly embraces. Morale is the spiritual reserve upon which we must draw as the casualty lists throw their lengthening shadows upon the land.

It will be said and is being said that victory is the issue. It is a bit strange that such an issue should even be suggested because victory is the grim unfinished business of the whole Nation.

It is said that peace and cooperation are in issue. How can there be an issue in the great spiritual hope which moves every thinking person to seek a workable pattern which carries with it the assurance that peace will have a full and fair opportunity to endure and that young men will not again be bruised and broken upon the altar of war.

All these are not issues. They are tasks for the task force on the home front.

The real issue will be "What will he find over here when it's over over there?"

Will the hopes and prayers which are uttered in the fox holes on the battle front be rendered into ashes by the ideologies and policies which come from the fox holes in the home front?

Will the American system which rests upon the morals of individualism become the victim of a pious collectivism and will freedom be just a word or a way of life?

When we find the answer to that question we shall know whether victory had a durable purpose.

VI

Conflict today is in the realm of ideas as much as in the field of parties and personalities.

You who have labored so long and so earnestly in the national scene and have had a chance to see and to assess the forces which are at work are fully familiar with the fact that collectivism is on the march. It is more than a mere footnote to economic discussion. It is no longer hearsay but accepted gospel in high places.

More and more we see the effort to chain the individual and individual rights to collective and group action, and when it becomes complete, what happens to freedom and the moral basis of the American system.

Collectivism in which the individual is considered as but a part of the mass or group is but another name for totalitarianism and if that should be the destiny of our Nation, what a mass frustration we would see in days to come as bewildered young men, inspired by the pride which will be justly theirs for having achieved victory, peace, and freedom for other peoples of the earth, should find that freedom forclosed at home.

In the record of the immediate past one may easily read the march of collectivism, control, and management by Government and one may also read the tragic impairment of those institutions which have always been regarded as the safeguards of freedom and it will be none too reassuring as we re-echo the question, "What will they find over here when it's over over there?"

VII

That record needs but brief highlighting on this occasion because it is so familiar to you all.

People have been rendered dependent and submissive.

The Constitution gets rough treatment and much lip service.

The Price Control Act bears living witness to the fact that the jurisdiction of the courts has been destroyed to achieve an economic purpose and the amazing thing is that many groups clamor for the continuation of this destruction of the power of the courts.

Amazing interpretations of the commerce clause are gradually reducing the States to the obscurity of governing units and after a while the very grass roots of democracy will have been destroyed.

The independence of Congress has been assailed from time to time and it remained for no less a personage than the majority leader of the Senate to state with vehemence and vigor upon the Senate floor that the veto message of February 22, 1944, was "A calculated and deliberate assault upon the integrity of every Member of the Congress."

Blank checks and broad Executive powers are envisioned as the very hope of our economic future, and we see such distinguished men as Dr. Alvin Hansen, adviser to the Federal Reserve Board, prophesying that Congress will surrender its power to tax and to direct the spending of public funds and that most if not all of the present extraordinary powers will be retained by the Executive.

The gospel of defeatism, maturity, and despair is being preached in high places and is being used to condition the people for that day when all social and economic decisions are made by Government.

More and more power has been lodged in administrative hands, and today we see a steady flood of directives and decisions, some of which are capricious and arbitrary, and which carry us further and further along the road of total action.

Thousands of men and women are manning the propaganda mill of the Federal Government today, issuing releases, speeches, lectures, movies, and radio scripts to make control and management palatable.

Nearly 3,000,000 men and women, more than 80 percent of whom are scattered throughout the 48 States bear witness to the growth of bureaus, boards and commissions.

Here are but some of the weapons which have been steadily forged in the fires of a collective philosophy and as he appraises their potency and the determination of those who would force a collective way of life upon the land, he can but re-echo what has been asked countless times, "what will they find over here when it's over over there."

VIII

Sometime ago, Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, wrote an article which was widely publicized and which bore this challenging title "America Is Being Made Over—And We Won't Like It."

We know the American system is being made over and we won't like it.

It is being recast in the image of what in 1935, Dr. Rexford Tugwell called disciplined democracy.

Control is the essence of discipline.

When people learn to dislike it enough, the soul will stir and then we must again go through the agony of recapturing freedom no matter what the price.

The spread of collectivism can be arrested and we can again return to the high road of freedom and individualism at the end of which there lies the greater glory of this Republic.

It is for the people to make that determination. They shall have a chance on November 7, 1944.

That will be a day and this is a year of decision.

IX

Now permit a personal word.

At your suggestion, I made myself available for such national service as the party might determine.

If in the wisdom of the party leaders, they see fit to accord me the honor of a place on the national ticket, I can only say that I shall bend what light I have to the task of converting a growing hope into a victory.

If it be otherwise, I shall still have found a rich and abiding reward in the service which the people have privileged me to render and in such further service as they shall command in the days to come.

X

In this solemn moment could we do better than out of humble and contrite hearts offer not one prayer but two. Let our first prayer be for them and may it give them strength to manufully pursue that grim task that destiny has assigned. Let our second prayer be that when they return from over there, they will find us practicing the very freedom and justice for which they fight.

Business Failures in 1943 Decline to 21 Percent of 50-Year Average, Lowest on Record—Liabilities to 16 Percent—Small Businesses Show Substantial Progress

---

REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, business failures via the bankruptcy route in 1943 were not only the lowest on record in the past 50 years but were 21 percent of the average for this half century. Liabilities were also the lowest in this same period and but 16 percent of the average. In 1944, for the first 4 months, the number of failures are even less, being 26.7 percent of last year, while liabilities are running at the rate this year of 39 percent below 1943. These figures prove the high financial condition of business in general and small business in particular.

The total number of failures in 1943 were only 3,221 while the commercial and industrial liabilities were but $45,339,000, according to Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., noted authority on such facts. These failures include manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, construction and commercial service and are an accurate cross-section from large to small businesses. As chairman of the House Committee on Small Business, I consider this data of vital importance.

For the first 4 months of 1944, the total number of failures are just a fraction over any one month of last year numbering 479, whereas in the same period in 1943 they were 1,652. With respect to liabilities the total loss in 1943 for 4 months was $22,465,000 as compared with only $8,800,000 for the same 4 months of this year.

From these figures it is apparent that business as a whole is in a most prosperous condition. This is emphasized by the fact that from 1894 to 1943, inclusive, failures in the 5 groups of businesses averaged 15,190 per year compared with 3,221 in 1943. On the other hand, liabilities in the same 50 years averaged $284,880,000 per year, yet in 1943 they were reduced to $45,339,000. Thus the number of failures last year were but 21 percent of the 50-year average, and liabilities only 16 percent in comparison.

SMALL-BUSINESS FAILURES 26 PERCENT UNDER 10-YEAR AVERAGE

A break-down of the failures and liabilities of each of the five classifications is only available for the past 10 years, or from 1934 to 1943, inclusive. The retail trade and commercial service groups of businesses afford the most striking evidence that "little business" has not suffered through failures.

In the 10 years, the total number of retail merchants of all types who failed numbered 67,249, giving them a 10-year average of 6,725. In 1943, the failures among every type of retail merchant were 1,761, or but 26.2 percent of the 10-year average.

The liabilities of these failures over the period of 10 years were $599,011,000, which means an average per year of $59,901,100. The 1943 liability loss for retail merchants was $12,722,000 or but 21.2 percent in comparison with the 10-year average.

The next smallest type of business activity is the commercial service trades. These represent dry cleaning, laundries, barbers, and so forth. The total number of failures in this classification in 10 years was 5,531 and an average for each year of 553. In 1943 the failures were but 237, or a percentage of 43 of the 10-year average.

With respect to liabilities the total was $152,476,000 for 10 years, giving an average of $15,247,600 per year, whereas in 1943, they were $4,995,000. Thus liability losses were only 32.7 percent of the last decade. The service trades to a large extent are extremely small concerns and a high rate of failure might be expected yet they have not suffered when failures are so much under the average.

As previously pointed out, the total number of failures the first 4 months of this year was 479. Of these 128 were among manufacturers, 37 were wholesalers, 198 retail merchants, 63 engaged in construction, and 53 representing the commercial-service trade. These total a little more than any one month of last year.

The 1943 decline in number of failures and liability losses would be even less than these figures if it were not for the fact that since 1939 Dun & Bradstreet expanded its system. In addition to bankruptcy court cases it has included voluntary liquidation with recorded loss to creditors. This automatically increased the number of failures and losses through liabilities.

A business failure, as defined by Dun & Bradstreet, occurs when a commercial or industrial enterprise is involved in a court proceeding or a voluntary action which is likely to end in a loss to creditors. Specifically, the Dun & Bradstreet record of failures includes discontinuances following assignment, voluntary or involuntary petition in bankruptcy, attachment, execution, foreclosure, and so forth; voluntary withdrawals from business with known loss to creditors; also enterprises involved in court action, such as receivership, and since June 1934 reorganization, or arrangement, which may or may not lead to discontinuances; as well as businesses making voluntary compromises with creditors out of court.

Prior to 1939, the Dun & Bradstreet explanation says:

> Some branches were not reporting all voluntary discontinuances with loss to creditors or all small concerns forced out of business by attachments, executions, foreclosures, etc., with insufficient assets to cover all claims. Efforts to obtain complete coverage of such cases resulted in the addition of 3,360 failures with liabilities of $14,316,000 to the record for 1939. Two sets of figures for 1939 are presented, the original for comparison with previous years and the revised set comparable with subsequent years. In the calculations and subsequent ones the higher figures for 1939 are taken into consideration.

MANUFACTURER LOSSES 75 PERCENT UNDER AVERAGE

In the manufacturing field the same results are disclosed as to the decrease in number of failures in 1943 as compared with the 10-year average, which also applies to liabilities. The failures in the 10 years were 20,574, with an average of 2,057. This represents 27.5 under the 10-year period. The liabilities totaled $759,193,000, the average yearly loss was $75,918,000 while the decrease is 25.1 percent of the average for 10 years.

There is no exception to this trend of lower failures and liabilities in the wholesale trade due to the improved condition in business. Failures in this industry for 10 years were 10,293, meaning an average of 1,029. The failures in 1943 were 257, or an average of but 25 percent under the 10-year basis. Liabilities were $249,074,000, or $24,907,400 yearly average. The losses in 1943 were $3,108,000, or but 12.5 percent of the average 10-year losses.

In the construction trade in 10 years there were 6,382 failures and a yearly average of 638. This 62.8 percent of the 10-year average, with 1943 failures of 399. With respect to liabilities they were $149,126,000, thus an average per year of $14,912,600. In 1943 the liability loss was $5,455,000, or 36.6 percent under the 10-year average. This industry appears to have suffered most due largely to the fact that construction business declined except for the war effort and urgent housing necessities. All unessential building has been banned for the duration.

In the 10 years, therefore, the total failures for manufacturing, wholesaling, retailing, construction, and servicing industries, the failures amounted to 109,131, making the average 10,913 a year. Since there were but 3,221 failures in 1943 the overall percentage shows but 29.5 of all such failures in the entire period of 10 years.

Liabilities over the past 10 years were $1,908,880,000, and the yearly average $190,888,000. The losses through bankruptcy and otherwise were but $45,339,000 in 1943. In other words, losses have decreased to the extent of 23.9 percent in 1943 of the 10-year average.

FIFTY YEARS' COMPARISON

Considering the 50 years' figures, the lowest previous record of failures occurred in 1919, with 6,461. The lowest commercial and industrial liabilities took place in 1899, and totaled $90,881,000. The highest number of failures were in 1932, of 31,822, and the heaviest liabilities were in the same year, consisting of $928,313,000.

As to total 50 years' figures there were 759,517 failures, for an average of 15,190. This compares with only 3,221 in 1943, or 21 percent of the half-century average. Commercial and industrial liability losses in the same 50 years amounted to $14,244,417,000, which represents a yearly average of $284,880,340 and a percentage of 16 percent in 1943 in comparison with $45,339,000 liabilities.

The heaviest failures, both in number and losses, occurred between 1921 and 1933. In these 13 years the number of failures was 302,314, an average of 23,255, or a little less than half of the 50-year period. The liabilities were $7,515,537,000. This provides a yearly average of $578,119,231 and is more than half of the 50-year total of $14,244,417,000. In comparison with 1943 this is only 0.0032 percent. Year by year for these 13 years the figures are as follows:

	Number of failures	Liabilities
1921	19, 652	$627, 401, 000
1922	23, 676	623, 895, 000
1923	18, 718	539, 387, 000
1924	20, 615	543, 226, 000
1925	21, 214	443, 744, 000
1926	21, 773	409, 233, 000
1927	23, 146	520, 105, 000
1928	23, 842	489, 559, 000
1929	22, 909	483, 252, 000
1930	26, 355	668, 282, 000
1931	28, 285	736, 310, 000
1932	31, 822	928, 313, 000
1933	20, 307	502, 330, 000

FAILURES AND LOSSES DECLINE SHARPLY

For the succeeding 11 years since 1933 there has been a steady decrease with a few exceptions and culminating in 1943 with the extremely low number of 3,221 failures and $45,339,000 liability losses. The average of failures for these 11 years was reduced 11,465 and the losses to an average of only $217,945,000.

	Number of failures	Liabilities
1934	12, 091	$333, 959, 000
1935	12, 244	310, 580, 000
1936	9, 607	203, 173, 000
1937	9, 490	183, 253, 000

Failures, Mr. Speaker, represent the state of business of the Nation. It cannot be said, therefore, that business has been injured except where the war effort interfered. Business as a whole has been prosperous as earning statements prove.

It should be remarked here, however, that there have been retirements from business which do not enter into this picture as there are no records of an authentic nature available. The fact that the number of failures and losses in business have declined so perceptibly as these figures show demonstrates beyond question that business, and especially small business, has been going forward instead of backward.

As a consequence creditor losses have been substantially to where last year they amounted to only $871,135 per week whereas when compared with the 50-year average, the losses to creditors were $5,476,539 per week.

The American Cotton Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Oscar Johnston, president of the National Cotton Council, at a meeting held at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., June 6, 1944.

I have had an estimate made of the cost of printing the article, which is $190.67.

There being no objection, the adress was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, distinguished guests, the National Cotton Council of America appreciates deeply and sincerely your interest in the problems confronting our industry, as manifested by your presence here tonight.

Tonight we hope to outline some of the problems confronting one of the Nation's major industries. We are doing this to the end that we may have the benefit of your advice and your aid in our efforts to solve them. We also want you to know something of the National Cotton Council of America, its composition, its aims, its ideals, its policies, and its methods.

First, let me call your attention to a fact already known to many of you, namely, that the raw cotton industry is one of America's major interests and activities. Cotton is produced in substantial quantities in 18 of our 48 States. It is a major economic factor in 14 of our 48 States. More than two and one-fourth million farm families consisting of between ten and twelve million persons—or more than 8 percent of the citizenship of America—live on cotton farms and depend primarily upon the production of cotton as the major item contributing to their support. Some 40 percent of our population are persons residing upon the farms and dependent upon farm production for a livelihood. Approximately 25 percent of these farm people are producers of cotton. More than 2,000,000 other citizens of the United States make their living from handling, transporting, processing, and merchandising cotton, cottonseed, and its products. Tonight, in using the word "cotton," I shall use it, unless otherwise indicated, in its generic sense as including fiber and seed and the thousands of products manufactured from the fiber and seed. Manufacturing indeed is an important part of the cotton industry in peacetime; more workers are employed in the mills engaged in spinning and otherwise processing raw cotton than are employed in any other single industrial activity in America. As you undoubtedly know, cotton has made a most important contribution to the war effort. I shall not take your time to emphasize this contribution other than to quote from Maj. Gen. E. B. Gregory, whose statement in substance is that, second alone to metal, cotton is the most important and essential war material.

The raw cotton industry consists of 6 branches: The producers or farmers; the cotton ginners—who operate the 11,000 gins at which the fiber and seed are separated; cotton warehousemen, who concentrate, store, compress, and make cotton ready for the market; cottonseed crushers, who first process and divide the seed into their constituent elements of linters, hulls, meal, and oil; the cotton merchants or shippers, whose function is to merchandise or market cotton fiber; the spinners or textile manufacturers, at whose plants the fiber is initially processed and spun into yarn. These 6 interests make up the raw-cotton industry.

The National Cotton Council of America represents the raw cotton industry as a whole. The council consists of 244 delegate-members. Forty-six represent the producer or farmer interest. Forty-two delegate-members represent each of the ginner, warehousemen, shipper, and crusher interests; and 30 represent the spinner or manufacturing interest.

For administrative purposes the Cotton Belt is divided into 14 State units for the selection of delegates from the first 5 interests named, and into 5 districts for the selection of spinner delegates. We shall not attempt here to go into a detailed discussion of the structural set-up of the Council except to mention two fundamental provisions of the by-laws that insure complete cotton industry representation by the council.

In the first place, the delegates who represent each of the six branches of the industry are selected at the State level by the organizations or associations representing that particular branch of the industry in that particular State. Thus, in each of the 14 State units, the producer delegates are selected by the one or more recognized producer organizations in the State, the ginner delegates are selected by the ginner association, the crusher delegates by the crusher association, and so on with each branch of the industry. Thus the council is an over-all cotton interest organization, its delegate membership composed of representatives of all the recognized organizations and associations operating for the benefit of any one or more branches of the cotton industry in all the areas of production from California to Virginia.

The second fundamental provision of the bylaws is that the council cannot take a position on any matter unless a two-thirds majority of the delegates representing each of the six interests, voting separately, approve that position. This means that at least a two-thirds majority of the producers must approve a proposal, that at least two-thirds of the ginners must approve, and so on with each of the four other interests. On the other hand, if more than one-third of any one of the six branches dissents even though the other five groups approve unanimously, a proposal before the council would not carry. Thus, when the council does take a position on a matter we can all rest assured that the position meets with the approval of a vast majority of the leadership of each of the six branches of the raw cotton industry in all areas of production.

We believe these provisions in the council's bylaws are unique and that they make for the most democratic and representative organization possible.

The council was established for a sole purpose and with a single objective, namely, to expand throughout the world the consumption of American cotton, cottonseed, and their products, at price levels that will give to each branch of the industry a fair return on its services and investment. The Council has no other purpose, no other objective, and no other reason for existence. The council is entirely nonpolitical and certainly nonpartisan. The council, however, will support any legislation, Federal or State, which, in the judgment of the council, will promote the consumption of cotton and its products. The council will oppose any proposed legislation which, in its considered judgment, will interfere with the consumption of cotton and its products for legitimate and economically sound purposes. The council, likewise, will favor the repeal of any legislation, Federal or State, which, in its considered judgment, is believed to exert a depressing or retarding influence upon consumption of cotton or cotton products.

Before we begin discussing the problems of cotton and other problems, I want to emphasize one thing. We do not come before you tonight with any specific plan or program requiring governmental action, although some of these problems will certainly require governmental action in the future. Nor are we here to discuss several matters of vital concern to the cotton industry which are now pending before Congress and some of the administrative agencies of the Government. Our thought is that tonight we should review the broad, fundamental problems that will confront cotton in the post-war period and try to look at the facts involved in those problems. It is our feeling that if these facts are known, the first great stride toward a solution of the problems of cotton has been made.

With us tonight we have some of the best informed men in the country on all phases of cotton. I am going to single one of them out for mention. He is our presiding officer, Senator JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD, of Alabama. He is without doubt one of the great agricultural statesmen of the country. The cotton farmers and all phases of the cotton industry own him a debt of gratitude. There are other congressional leaders here from cotton-growing States who, like Senator BANKHEAD, have taken an intelligent interest in the problems of cotton and other fundamental economic questions. We are depending upon these men to help, not only with cotton, but with the other multitudinous problems that will come with peace.

As we are here assembled tonight, millions of our men and women are fighting and dying on far-flung battle fronts all over the globe. Our Nation is engaged in a titanic struggle, not for territorial gain or economic aggrandizement, but for the continued existence of the fundamental principles of democracy upon which our Nation was founded and has been built.

Our consciousness of the justice of our cause, our knowledge of our own might, of our own power, and of the power of our allies fully justifies our absolute confidence that we and our allies will triumph; that we shall destroy the agencies of oppression and aggrandizement; and that we shall participate in the restoration of peace on earth and good will to all men. When this goal which we are so confident of achieving shall have been attained we shall have only crossed the threshold leading into responsibility perhaps even more serious and grave than we face in wartime. The victorious nations shall then be faced with the necessity of demonstrating to the world that we are equal to the occasion; that we are strong enough to bear the burden, and courageous enough to discharge the obligation which we shall have assumed toward all mankind.

Most of us here tonight will agree that one of the big reasons for fighting this war is to maintain our traditional American economic system. Our reaction against Germany arose not only from the ugly and oppressive character of the Nazi regime, but the threat to free enterprise which it contained. Let us assume, for the sake of discussion, that a victorious Germany would not have attacked the United States. Just the same, Nazi trade methods, regimenting business and labor toward one end, would have put us at a hopeless disadvantage in world markets. The United States could have overcome this disadvantage in only one of two ways. The first would have been to adopt the Nazi trade system. The other would have been to become more and more isolationist. This, in turn, would have required more and more regimentation to keep our economic system going. One of the reasons for the growth of the totalitarianism in the world has been the dwindling stream of world trade and the series of economic crises that have resulted.

Let us examine briefly the position of the United States as it will be when the threat of German and Japanese aggrandizement shall have been removed. We will emerge from this war one of the strongest, if not the strongest, of world powers. We will be the only power whose productive capacity, both industrial and agricultural, will not have been seriously crippled by the war. If future world peace is to be maintained, we of the United States of America must work day in and day out at the specific and particular business of maintaining peace. This effort will be expensive. The war is expensive. This war will cost us several hundred billion dollars. Our children and our children's children for many generations will be called upon to contribute from their earnings substantial sums to liquidate the indebtedness incurred by reason of this war. In time the debt will be paid, but neither time nor money will restore sight to men and women who shall have lost their vision from wounds inflicted by the war. Neither time nor money will restore the maimed and crippled to full health and vigor and physical capability. Neither time nor money will restore the victims of this war to their families. Neither time nor money will ever efface all the ugly scars resulting from this war. These things being true, it will behoove us to make whatever contribution may be necessary in the way of goods, merchandise, and money toward the establishment of the world upon such a basis as will guarantee a peace which will endure for many years—may we hope, for many generations.

The surest and safest guaranty of peace will be an adequate military force. At the same time one of the most dangerous and serious threats to a democratic life is the existence of an enormous military force. We, as a senior partner in the copartnership of nations, will have to recognize our responsibility, realize our strength, and, at the same time, avoid even the appearance of being, or desiring to be, a dictator or a bully. Unless the nations, upon whose shoulders devolves the responsibility for restoring democratic principles to the peoples of the world discharge their duties and obligations fearlessly and unselfishly, we shall soon find that the war we are now fighting will have been fought in vain. While it is important that we take a place in the world commensurate with our power and our responsibilities, it is equally important that we preserve our national rights and provileges. Our participation as a copartner with other national powers must be one that is mutually profitable—profitable to us and profitable to our associates.

In this connection, my idea of isolationism is failure on our part to develop to its fullest extent in the immediate post-war period, international trade on a scale sufficient to keep our traditional capitalist economy functioning.

This war will, we believe, soon be over. Belligerent dictatorship will have been defeated and its leaders brought to justice. The end of the war and the meting out of appropriate punishment to Tojo, Hirohito, Hitler, and—if he survives so long—to poor old Mussolini, will not obviate the threat or the possibility of a dictatorship either abroad or at home. If we are to preserve what we call the American way of life, we must insure a tremendous revival in world trade. Hitler gained power and developed his Nazi theory in Germany, at least in part, because of the inability of the German people to find markets for their products. So I repeat, if we are to avoid a dictator, either from the left or from the right, we must insure a tremendous revival of world trade. This is not only essential to the maintenance of a measure of economic and political freedom at home, but it is also the way to peace.

What has all this to do with the problems of cotton? It has everything to do with them. An enduring peace is not built upon a foundation of generalities. The solid stones for such a peace are practicable settlements for our many specific problems; the problems of cotton, both fiber and seed; of wheat; of livestock; of dairying; and of our many industrial commodities. More than any other one thing, the duration of the peace will depend upon economic arrangements and the extent to which these arrangements will insure world prosperity. Assurance of world prosperity, a general lifting of world living standards through the years ahead would be assurance of a lasting world peace.

Now let us talk about cotton for a while. Cotton faces, and must solve, a number of problems. First, let us deal for a moment with cottonseed and its products. There is, and probably will continue to be for some time to come, a very substantial demand for cottonseed products, both at home and abroad. To be sure, the products of cottonseed—oil, meal, hulls, and linters—each have aggressive competitors. But, if this country and the rest of the world have anything approaching an adequate diet after the war, the highly nutritious food and food products of cottonseed should be in great demand; and cotton linters, which are the purest source of alpha cellulose, should have a ready market in the great chemical industries of the post-war world. It is, of course, a matter of serious concern to our industry that certain cottonseed oil food products are barred from a large portion of our domestic market by Federal and State trade barriers right here in our own country. We have no doubt, however, that, in due course, when the consciousness of the Nation has been awakened to the injustice done by these restrictions, they will be removed.

The future of cotton fiber is not quite so bright. It is here that we meet our major difficulties, and it is those difficulties that we shall try to face realistically tonight.

While the problems of cotton are many, virtually all of them spring from one great need—the need for greater cotton consumption; the need for more and bigger markets to consume our fiber. Therefore, the first thing we should examine is cotton's markets, both present and potential.

In the past, we have generalized entirely too much about our cotton markets. We have talked about them as if there were only two—the domestic market and the foreign market. Actually, there are, of course, hundreds of cotton markets and they must be appraised not so much by where they are as what they are. Cotton's markets are the literally thousands of end-use products into which cotton goes and which the consumer buys—bags, sheets, shirts, dresses, overalls, tire cord, bedspreads, fish nets, oilcloth, underwear, window shades, tents, sewing thread, and so on down the list.

If we are to know anything about where cotton stands, we cannot look at these markets as a whole; we must consider each one of them separately. We must analyze cotton's position in each because it is in these individual end-use markets that cotton must meet the competition of other materials. There are three points on which this competition must be met in every market if cotton is to get the business.

It must be met on quality; it must be met on price; and it must be met on sales effort.

The relative importance of each of these three factors varies greatly in the different end-use markets. For example, in the automobile tire cord market quality is the most important factor. Here cotton must meet certain exacting specifications on quality or it will not be used. Price is only of secondary importance after the quality specifications have been met and sales effort is of practically no consequence.

In the bag market, however, price is the all-important item. Sales effort is of considerable help and quality plays a minor part, but, in the final analysis, the price of cotton is the biggest item in the cost of a bag. If cotton bags cost much more than other kinds of bags, people simply will not buy them.

In the women's dress market, particularly in the better types of dresses, we find that sales effort is the principal factor. The quality of the fabric, of course, plays an important part. The price of the raw material in a finished dress is of virtually no importance. However, smart styling and aggressive sales promotion are effective weapons in this field and cotton must have them to get the business.

It is clear then, that, if we are to increase or even hold our present consumption of cotton, we must meet and better cotton's competitors on the points that count most in each of the many end-use markets.

Now, what are these competitors and how do they compare with cotton on quality, price, and sales effort? The major competitors are (1) the coarse natural fibers, such as jute, hemp, sisal, etc.; (2) paper; and (3) the synthetic fibers such as rayon, nylon, and a number of others that are just coming into existence.

Least formidable of these are the coarse natural fibers. Produced largely in the Orient by the cheapest coolie labor, they sell for less than a third of the present parity price of United States cotton. However, the nature of these fibers limits their use principally to such markets as bags, bagging, cordage, twine, and allied products. These markets are very important to cotton, but the coarse fibers may not give us much more competition for them in the future than they have in the past.

Paper is an entirely different story. It is already in direct competition with cotton in scores of important markets, ranging from bags to tablecloths, and each year brings a host of new paper products. It isn't directly competitive with cotton from such quality standpoints as service and durability, but it makes up for this by being so cheap it can be discarded after one use. In those markets where sales effort is effective, paper uses it to the limit, far exceeding anything cotton has ever done in the past.

Most dangerous of all cotton competitors, however, are the synthetics—foremost among which at present is rayon. In the case of the coarse fibers and paper, cotton feels the competition only in the end-product market. A burlap bag is substituted for a cotton bag or a paper towel is used in place of a cotton towel. With rayon it is entirely different. Here the competition strikes cotton in the first raw fiber stage. A rayon fiber is made in the image of the cotton fiber, is substituted for cotton on the same cotton-spinning frame that formerly spun cotton, and is woven on a cotton loom. Cotton is cut before the first ball crosses the plate.

In 1920, rayon consumption in the United States was the equivalent of only a few thousand bales of cotton; by last year it had grown to the equivalent of almost 1½ million bales of cotton. Over the same period the price of filament rayon declined from above $6 per pound to 55 cents per pound. Rayon staple fiber, which is most directly competitive with cotton, is down to 24 cents per pound. Rayon at 24 cents is highly competitive with cotton at 2[illegible] cents because of the waste in cleaning the cotton. Futhermore, it is reliably reported that rayon manufacturers plan to make substantial price reductions after the war—even to as low as 15 cents per pound.

From the standpoint of quality, rayon has undergone a complete transformation. A notoriously poor quality fiber a few years ago, rayon is now chief competitor in quality markets.

On sales effort, rayon heads the list of all fibers. The millions of dollars spent annually by the rayon industry on advertising and promotion, pale into insignificance the sales efforts put forth in the past by cotton and all the other fibers combined.

The tremendous advances made by rayon are merely an example of what can be expected from the other synthetics, especially nylon which, even in its infancy, is showing amazing potentialities.

Thus far, we have been dealing with the competitive position of cotton as compared with those other materials. What has been said applies to all cotton regardless of the country in which it is grown or in which it is consumed.

Unfortunately, however, the problem of our United States cotton does not stop here. In addition to the competition of these other materials in our man[illegible] markets, both in this country and in the foreign countries, we also face in the foreign countries the competition of foreign-grown cottons. Here, again, we must examine our position not only from the standpoints of quality, price, and sales effort, but also from the effect international trade barriers are having in reducing the dollar exchange available to foreign countries for the purchase of American products.

On quality and sales effort our American cotton is certainly the equal and, in most instances, better than the foreign cottons. When we come to price, however, we again find ourselves at a competitive disadvantage. Brazilian and other foreign cottons are now selling at about 8 to 10 cents per pound under American cotton.

On the matter of exchange we are also at a great disadvantage. The high tariffs, import quotas, and other trade barriers adopted by the United States of America and other countries have greatly restricted the volume of world trade and correspondingly reduced the dollar exchange of our potential foreign customers. This is a vital point in securing consumption of United States cotton in foreign markets. For, even if our cotton were fully competitive with foreign cottons and the other materials in all other respects, foreign customers cannot buy our cotton if they cannot obtain the exchange with which to pay for it.

The facts which I have presented to you certainly are not encouraging. However, I do not think they need be particularly discouraging if we will face them realistically and adopt a sound course of action to meet the issue confronting us. Briefly summing up these issues, we are going to have to improve the quality of American cotton; we are going to have to reduce its cost; we are going to have to intensify our efforts to sell it; and we are going to have to scale down the international trade barriers that are blocking us out of important foreign markets.

Now, how can these things be done? They can be done, and they can only be done, by the United States cotton industry applying with intelligence and determination the same sound business principles and practices that have produced results in every successful industry throughout the world.

To improve the quality of American cotton we are going to have to expand tremendously our cotton research activities. We must not only grow better cottons, we must gin them better, handle them better, and process them better into their many end-use products. Only through research can these things be done. The cotton industry, through the research programs of the National Cotton Council and a number of private research groups, has made a good start. The Federal Government and a number of the cotton States likewise have substantial cotton research programs under way. All of these efforts must be greatly expanded.

To reduce the cost of American cotton we are going to have to reduce the cost of producing it. And here I wish to especially emphasize one point. I am not talking about reducing the cost of producing cotton by reducing the net income of the cotton producer. If, in order to meet the price competition of foreign cottons and other competing materials, it should be necessary for the American cotton farmer to return to the low standard of living which he has had to endure in years past or to lower his standard of living to the level endured by cotton producers in many of the other cotton producing countries, then, speaking as a cotton producer, I say to you definitely that the farmers of this country will not do it. They will withdraw their lands from cotton and plant other crops that will give them a return more commensurate with our American standard of living. I do not feel that this alternative is necessary, however. Cotton producers will not necessarily insist upon any set price. If they can make money out of a price that will enable them to undersell their competitors, provided, of course, that it gives them a decent return for their efforts, they will accept that price gladly. If the cost of cotton production can be substantially lowered, cotton prices can be lowered proportionately. What the farmer is interested in is his net return from cotton production; a high price means nothing if it is eaten up by high production costs. And while we are trying to cheapen production costs let us not forget that the cotton farmer has received too little for his efforts in the past and that one of our primary objectives should be to improve the net incomes of cotton producers.

The other great crops of America have reduced their production costs substantially by developing higher-yielding varieties, by lowering their labor costs through the mechanization of their farming operations, and by increasing the efficiency of their production generally. The same thing can be done for cotton not only in the production field but also in the subsequent stages of ginning, handling, and processing. All this, in the aggregate, would greatly improve cotton's position from a competitive standpoint in the end-product markets of the world. Again, research is one of the primary ways by which this must be done.

Obviously, cheapening the production costs for cotton is something that cannot be done overnight. After the war there will be a period when the demand for both textiles and raw cotton will be very great. I doubt, however, whether this demand will be sufficient to use the surplus world supply of cotton which will exist when the war is over. The situation which existed before the war is likely to return comparatively soon. Cheaper foreign growths will be competing actively for world markets that cannot absorb all the cotton the world has to sell. The transition process that I am trying to outline will take time even if all goes well. The cotton industry must depend upon the Government not only to help work out a sensible long-time program, but to help it through the difficult years that lie immediately ahead. I do not think this country wants to give up its export markets for cotton. I do not think it can afford to give up its export markets for cotton. I hope to see the day in the not-too-distant future when American cotton can compete freely on a price basis with all foreign growths. Pending that time, American cotton may need some assistance to compete. The nature and extent of that assistance will be something which the Congress of the United States probably will decide.

The industry's reliance upon Government, however, does not extend to an aggressive and effective sales effort. This is the industry's responsibility and the industry must not shirk it. For a long time we have assumed that cotton did not need selling. It was the story of the old established and conservative firm going ahead complacently while the younger and more active competitors overtook it. Not only do we need competent research to find new uses for cotton and improve old ones, the cotton industry needs to tell the country and the world about the virtues of its products. We have been overly modest and we are finding that modesty, so far as the cotton industry is concerned, does not pay. There are many fields where cotton is definitely superior for many reasons. The customers and prospective customers of cotton need to be told about that superiority. The National Cotton Council has embarked upon a thorough sales-promotion program to do this job and that program is being expanded rapidly.

As I stated earlier, cotton's problem of meeting the competition of other materials is by no means confined to the United States alone. Other countries growing cotton are just as interested as we are in meeting this competition in all of the world's markets. I am certain that other cotton-producing countries will be glad to join the United States in research and sales programs that will put cotton's best foot forward on a world-wide basis.

Of course, world-wide consumption of cotton after the war is inextricably bound up with the future of world trade. If we remove trade barriers and world trade expands vigorously, our task will be relatively easy. The cotton problem in world terms definitely is underconsumption and not overproduction. For example, just before the war the United States was consuming cotton at the rate of 32 pounds per capita annually. In the balance of the world the rate was about 6 pounds per capita. If the per capita cotton consumption of the world were brought only one-fourth of the distance between its present standard and that of America the world would require 56,800,000 bales, or 26,000,000 bales more than it required in the years immediately preceding the war. An increase of even 1 pound per capita throughout the world would wipe out the average surplus of world production over world consumption and would leave orders for 2,800,000 bales unfilled.

I do not need to tell you that the principal reason for low cotton consumption outside the United States was low incomes, resultant low living standards, and the inability of the average person to buy cotton goods that he needed and wanted. As a nation, one of our post-war responsibilities will be to do all we can to improve world living standards. To some this may seem impracticable. To some it may even smack of international boondoggling. When examined, however, this proposal will be found to be both realistic and practicable. We may quarrel over the means to achieve the objective, but we certainly cannot quarrel over the objective itself.

Our efforts to increase the world standard of living does not mean that we should not increase our own living standards and consequently our own consumption of cotton. Even though our per capita consumption averaged more than five times the consumption of the world, literally millions of our own people did not have enough cotton clothing, or enough towels, sheets, and other household goods made from cotton. One of the paradoxes of the age was the cotton grower clothed in rags.

The effort to improve world living standards goes back, in my opinion, to world trade. There are other ways of raising the world standard of living than by an increase in world trade. It is, however, to my way of thinking the most fundamental and most important step of all. The methods to be used in promoting international cooperation and international trade rest primarily with government. In the last analysis, Congress probably will decide our foreign policy. It is our feeling that the time has come when the United States will take its place in a world whose primary concern will be the maintenance of peace, and toward that end, the attainment of the prosperity upon which peace and stability must rest. I have confidence that we will have learned enough from two great and destructive wars to see the imperative necessity of taking the steps required to keep the peace. One of these steps, let me emphasize, will be a sensible and workable plan for restoring world trade.

The National Cotton Council will be glad to help all that it can toward this end and in any other ways that may develop as time goes on. We have established two special committees to work on some of the main problems we have been discussing here tonight. One of these committees deals with cotton exports and the other with increased efficiency in cotton production, processing and marketing. These committees are meeting here in Washington this week to confer with various governmental agencies concerned. They will undoubtedly be calling on many of you from time to time and we shall appreciate any courtesies and assistance you may give them.

I need not emphasize what will happen to the cotton industry unless it faces its problems in a practical, realistic and adequate fashion. At the last annual meeting of the Council, there was ample evidence that the industry has begun to do this. The very fact, however, that the Government is furnishing the farmer price protection could prove a narcotic. So long as the Government takes the cotton under loan at a relatively high price, the producers may not understand the extent of the potential disaster ahead. One thing is certain. The Government will not continue indefinitely to pile up cotton for which there is no market. The adjustment to the realities of the situation can come gradually or abruptly. All of us together will decide whether the transition that lies ahead is gradual and orderly, or whether it is sudden and calamitous. The future of cotton will be reckoned by the future of cotton consumption. In turn, the future of cotton consumption will depend upon the ability of cotton to meet competition both at home and abroad.

This raises another question which might as well be faced frankly. Should the raw-cotton industry abruptly cease to be a factor in our national economy, the Nation will undergo an economic revolution. Lands now utilized in the production of cotton will not lie idle. These lands will be put to other agricultural uses. They will enter into competition with lands in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and other States in the production of dairy products. They will enter into competition with Kansas and the West in the production of wheat, oats, barley, and rye. This is in no sense a threat. It is a calm and deliberate statement of fact. Other sections have a stake in the future of cotton. It is to their interest to keep the industry flourishing and strong. It is to their interest to see that any adjustments come gradually and that we avoid vicious, uneconomic, intersectional competition.

It is in the national interests, therefore, to work out a sensible and adequate program for cotton. It is our duty toward this end to keep the Government informed of our needs. I think it is our duty to work with the legislative and executive departments as closely as possible. It is our duty to work closely with the representatives of agriculture from other areas. Cotton will get nowhere by itself.

While we may not always agree on each successive step toward the goal, all of us want a prosperous world as a prerequisite to an enduring peace. I see no way to assure this prosperity other than the friendly and intelligent cooperation of Government and business. Together, we may be able to make a contribution toward a more prosperous and peaceful world. If this is true, the sacrifices that are being made in this war will not have been in vain.

Keynote Speech at South Dakota Republican State Convention by Hon. Harlan J. Bushfield, of South Dakota

OF

HON. HARLAN J. BUSHFIELD

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, on May 29 last I delivered an address at the Republican convention at Watertown, S. Dak., and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, delegates, and friends, it is with a feeling of homecoming that I come to Watertown today, homecoming to the State I love and the State where all my hopes and interests are. Truly the grass seems a little greener, the landscape a little more lovely, the air a little purer, and the handclasp a little warmer in South Dakota than anywhere else in the world.

You have honored me by inviting me to give the keynote speech to this convention. I am grateful for this high honor and I hope I may say something worth while for your deliberation.

Thomas Jefferson once said, "A wise and frugal government which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government."

Have we in this Nation today either a wise or frugal government? With your permission I want to discuss that question today.

But, first, I want to say a word in appreciation and in praise of your congressional delegation. Their cooperation with each other could not have been better. It has been a pleasure to work with them.

KARL MUNDT, Congressman from the First District, is rapidly achieving prominence and leadership in his chosen field in the House of Representatives.

FRANCIS CASE, Congressman from the Second District, is one of the leaders in the House and an authority upon appropriation matters.

Senator GURNEY has been most cooperative and I want to express public appreciation for that.

This does not mean that the members of the delegation have always seen eye to eye in legislation or that we have agreed upon all things, but in every case where the welfare of our State was concerned we have been a unit working together for the best interests of South Dakota.

In my inaugural address in 1939, I said in part:

"Our program should promote water conservation. Countless instances in the history of the world show migration of people from one territory to another because of the failure of water. We in South Dakota have had a taste of what the failure of water may mean. Let us, therefore, promote a program for the building of dams."

Throughout my terms as Governor I was deeply interested in a program of Missouri River improvement. That program was started by our State Historian Doane Robinson almost a generation ago. Governor Nor-beck devoted much time and effort to furthering it. It was he who caused a complete survey of the river to be undertaken. Nationally known engineers, Mead and Seastone, made this survey. Because of the inability of the State to shoulder the burden of such a tremendous undertaking, further steps had to be delayed. But in 1941, because of the imminence of war, it appeared to those of us who were interested in this matter that an opportune time had arrived to start promotion of river improvement, with irrigation, flood control, power, and navigation as the objectives of a new program.

With the cooperation, assistance and advice of M. Q. Sharpe and the Missouri River Improvement Association, I began the preparation of an application to the Federal Power Commission to consider the immediate development of the river and the construction of dams thereon for the multiple purposes just mentioned.

In November 1941 I went to Washington with a comprehensive brief and application for presentation of the cause of South Dakota in Missouri River improvement. With Senator GURNEY'S, Congressmen CASE'S and MUNDT'S assistance we presented our case to the Federal Power Commission, to the Reclamation Service, the War Department and other Federal agencies interested in this project.

Since his advent into office Governor Sharpe has made the carrying out of this program one of the major activities of his administration. Now, by his wise direction, by his insistence upon the main issue, we have before the Congress a new flood-control bill in which Missouri River improvement is incorporated. For the first time in our history we approach the culmination of our labor and hopes of many years and I believe that this Congress will enact legislation authorizing construction of a flood-control plan for the Missouri River Valley, which will incorporate the multiple purposes heretofore mentioned.

Under thhe present plans of the Army and the Reclamation Service, South Dakota is the most benefited State in the valley. Upward of a million acres of land, if those plans are approved, will be brought under irrigation. Power projects will be developed from three or four dams, which will give power and light to all the people of our State.

It is a rosy picture for the future of South Dakota which this plan presents. I know that South Dakotans generally favor it, but let us exert just a little more effort, a little more pressure to see that this golden opportunity for South Dakota is not passed by.

I congratulate Governor Sharpe upon his work and I believe the people of South Dakota approve and will return him and his administration to office this fall by overwhelming majorities.

Nationally every indication points to 1944 as a Republican year. I believe that we will control both Houses of Congress and the Presidency, together with a majority of State administrations after next January, but I want to express a word of warning that in our feeling of confidence we do not let down in the continuous and forthright work that has been carried on in party administrations for the past 10 years. Catastrophe often follows over-confidence. Let us not be overconfident. Let us continue the united effort that has yielded such rich dividends in party success. I want to remind Republicans of this convention that the year 1932 was such a year of over-confidence in State affairs. By no seeming possibility, or so we thought, could the Democrats unseat our beloved Governor Green, and yet by a political landslide of unheard proportions the Governor was removed from public office and the entire State administration was defeated.

When I was placed in charge of the party activities in 1935 we held no State offices, the party was in debt and many of our precinct committeemen were afraid to acknowledge their membership in the Republican Party. The turn-over which began the next year and was completed in 1938 was not the result of accident nor of wishful thinking. It was the result of hard, continuous work by hundreds of loyal patriotic South Dakota citizens, who were determined to rescue our State from the clutches of those who then held control. Political victories, my friends, are not won by wishful thinking, nor retained through an overweening confidence that defeat cannot come to us.

I am sure we all want a continuation of the excellent party machinery that we have built in the past 10 years. I hope that no let-down will occur in that party work between now and election day. I hope that South Dakota, which was the first State west of the Allegheny Mountains to regain her sanity and return to the Republican column, will continue as the most Republican State in the Union.

I know that the delegates to this convention are deeply concerned with the national picture and I am, therefore, going to give you a brief review of some of the things that I have observed since I went to Washington.

In the spring of 1934 Dr. William A. Wirt, superintendent of the Gary, Ind., city schools, startled the country with a statement that the Roosevelt administration was planning to destroy our Government and to substitute in its place a Fascist state with complete power over the lives and activities and property of the American people.

A special committee to investigate this charge was selected by the House of Representatives and Professor Wirt was summoned to appear and tell his story.

It was at a time when the New Deal was riding high. They were in complete possession of the Government. Nothing could be denied them. They occupied all the offices, their doings filled the newspapers from coast to coast. Their demands and Washington-prepared legislation dominated the State capitols of the country. The power of the new President was almost unlimited.

As always, in the exercise of power, this top-heavy New Deal majority was careless of the rights of individuals and of minorities.

The Indiana school teacher when called as a witness before the committee, was denied the right of counsel. He appeared alone with his wife to tell his story, but was not even allowed to tell that without interrupation, ridicule, and abuse.

He testified that he had heard the plan for remaking our Government discussed at a dinner party given for New Deal officials by one of them. He had been a guest at the dinner, but his testimony of the conversation that had been had at this dinner party was denied by each one of the guests attending as well as by the hostess. Mr. Wirt was made to appear ridiculous, unworthy of belief, and before they were through he was completely discredited. The impression was created by those desiring it, that he was not a very clever liar and he had imagined the whole story.

But the story was not a figment of his imagination. It was not a dream. If we may judge by what has happened since, there is little doubt that Dr. Wirt told exactly what he had heard and that the New Dealers who flocked to Washington with Mr. Roosevelt planned to remake this country just as he said they did. Fortunately, the Supreme Court, before it was revolutionized by new appointments, threw out as unconstitutional many of the plans of this group.

Today, after 11 years, the President says that the New Deal is dead; that he wants it respectfully buried with flowers, and that he does not want it mentioned again. His new slogan is "Win the war."

Most Americans have believed that this was not a New Deal war but was an American war, fought by all of us for the survival of the American way of life. The New Deal does not have any patent right upon this war. Your son and my son are in this conflict not because they are Republicans, or Democrats, or New Dealers, but because they are Americans, and they hope to come back to the America they knew when they left home.

There are those within the President's own group who do not agree with him that the New Deal is dead. The Vice President is one of those. The New Deal has followed a certain pattern from the very beginning. In spite of the President's wishes, in spite of the very evident fact that the New Deal is sick and will be buried next November, those of the inner circle of this unique organization of parlor economists are still at work charting and planning our future for us.

The people are tired of and disgusted with the kind of government we have been getting during the last 10 years. Totalitarianism, for that is what it is, represents a philosophy of government as alien to our shores as that administered by the Japanese Emperor or Adolf Hitler. Our constitutional form of government is a government of the people, by the people, and responsible to the people.

A totalitarian government is the complete opposite. It assures the people that what it is doing is for their good, that the regulations and restrictions are imposed for the welfare of all the people, but these regulations are never released when once imposed. From the cradle to the grave we are under its paternalistic care. The individual as such disappears. He becomes dependent upon government. His initiative is gone. His will to work, to progress, to acquire, his purpose in life disappears. He drifts along with the tide rudderless and helpless, waiting for orders

Such is the course of every totalitarian state in history. Such is the pattern of government through which we are now traveling.

For proof turn to the record of the last 10 years showing the demand for and assumption of emergency power year after year. None of those powers has ever been surrendered and every attempt on the part of Congress to repeal them is fought bitterly.

I have a letter from a soldier in which he discusses the new pattern for America. In this letter he says:

"What do they mean fussing around about what kind of an America we servicemen want when we get home? Do they value America as something that can be changed with the seasons, the same as women's hats and clothes?

"We can't escape the notion here that some people back home are trying to fashion new patterns for America, running around with tape measures, shears, chalk, and things, and quarreling among themselves as to what style of a tailor-made country will please us after the war.

"You tell these self-appointed designers to let Uncle Sam alone. When we get back we want to see his swallow-tail coat still there and his boot straps, tall hat, and everything else that's familiar. His way of dressing has been all right for a long time. It's what we're fighting to keep all right for a long time to come. Leave him be. Just have him there to say 'Hello' when we return, dressed the way we know him.

"When that period is over all that we want is to be free to work at what we can do best."

Maybe it is just as well if we do not undertake to revolutionize this country while 11,000,000 soldiers are tied up in a war. Maybe it is just as well if the planners let nature take its course until the boys come home. I, for one, believe so. I see no necessity for rushing into plans for the future before the future has disclosed itself and before the boys most concerned can take part in it.

We have another job today far more important than planning what we will do next year or next decade, and that job is to defeat the enemy, for all our plans and hopes will be useless if we fail.

Personal power is a heady wine and if imbibed too freely or too long causes the victim to lose all sense of responsibility to the people who first granted this power. The intoxication which comes from drinking this wine will in time bring a feeling of invincibility and indispensability. It causes the victim to lose his sense of proportion so that he views other people as though looking through a reverse telescope—distantly and reduced in size and importance. Far worse than the evil of alcohol, it creates an insatiable craving for more and more power until in the end he becomes subject to his own delusions of grandeur and authority.

The Chicago case of Montgomery Ward & Co. illustrates what I mean.

In this day of military display on every hand we become accustomed to the sight of generals, but we have just witnessed something new and different in generals—something novel and ludicrous, something shocking and vicious. We have seen Attorney General Biddle, a member of the President's Cabinet, put aside the dignity of his high office and assume the character of a police court prosecutor leading a bawdy house raid.

Acting under authority of and by the direct order of his Chief, the General flew to Chicago from the National Capital. In the city made famous by the Hinky Dink and Bathhouse John type of politics, one of the highest officials of our Government ordered United States troops to seize the property of a mercantile concern that was not connected in the slightest degree with war work. Into the store charged Mr. Biddle's troopers with fixed bayonets and rifles. In the office of Montgomery Ward & Co. they found, seated in a swivel chair, quietly attending to the business of the store, an elderly man of nearly 70 years, Sewell Avery. Biddle ordered his soldiers to seize Mr. Avery bodily and throw his out of the store. This was done. This elderly, harmless, and certainly not violent old man was carried to the sidewalk, ejected from the property which he had been chosen to manage and protect, and Montgomery Ward & Co. ceased to be a free enterprise operated by free American citizens.

The majesty of force was exemplified by Attorney General Biddle when he declared:

"The President does not need any law to seize private property. His power rests in the fact that he is Commander in Chief."

And then Mr. Biddle made the astounding statement:

"In time of war the courts should not set up their opinions against that of the President."

Thus is dictatorship established and government overthrown.

And to climax this outrageous and unlawful procedure we have an opinion by Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter, in which he says:

"The notion that because the words of a statute are plain, its meaning also is plain is merely pernicious oversimplification."

Not until Americans realize the enormity of this lawless act and throw out of office the administration that perpetrated it will our liberties be safe from further acts of violence. Until that is done no one is secure. The corner grocery, the farmer, the druggist, the milkman, every business in America may be seized just as Montgomery Ward was seized. If the Roosevelt administration has done nothing else—even if we forget its 11 years of usurpation of power, its wastage of the people's earnings, its wrecking of popular government, its arraying of class against class—this one act of lawless seizure of Montgomery Ward & Co. is sufficient reason for removing these men from office.

Popular government has been sadly damaged during the last 11 years. Laws have been set aside by misinterpretation and new laws issued by Executive order. Congress has been smeared, belittled, and flouted. We will be blind, indeed, if we fail to realize and understand what has been going on. Public officials who should be our strongest supporters have deliberately planned the overthrow of our Government.

Congress, under our Constitution, enacts all legislation. The executive department enforces the laws. But this administration has created boards and Government corporations, each with the power to issue orders, rules and regulations having the force and effect of law without either consultation with Congress or approval by it. The Members of Congress receive their commissions direct from the people. These bureaucrats, who now run the Government, are responsible to no one except the President.

Between January 1941 and April 1942, the President issued 500 Executive orders, all having the full force and effect of law. They were not written by Congress. Congress was not given an opportunity to study them or debate them or to approve them. They were issued by the President on his own responsibility. And during that same period of time more than 4,000 regulations and orders, each with the full force and effect of duly enacted law have been issued by the various bureaus and agencies created by the President. Since 1933, 195 new Federal agencies have been created.

In this new and constantly growing bureaucracy we are astounded when we learn that in 1933 the executive branch of the Government had 572,000 civil employees, but in 1943 the pay roll had increased to 3,286,000—1 jobholder for every 40 of our population. During 1942 the jobholders were being hired at the rate of 4,000 a day.

To assist in building public approval for these expanding bureaus, a publicity bureau, employing 8,000 people and spending $70,000,000 a year, was created without authority from Congress. This propaganda mill occupies 33 acres of floor space.

According to the Department of Labor statistics, not including the Army, Navy, or Air Force, the State of New York has 275,000 Federal employees and right here in South Dakota we have 9,200 Federal employees.

With the national debt fast approaching $300,000,000,000, one may be forgiven for wondering what the outcome will be. Personal income taxes have increased 1,800 percent since the year 1939. The national debt is more than twice the total assessed valuation of all the property in the United States. Did you ever stop to think what a billion dollars is? If we were to start counting now and count one hundred every minute, we would count one thousand in 10 minutes, six thousand in 1 hour, forty-eight thousand in an 8-hour day, two hundred and forty thousand in a 40-hour week, twelve million four hundred and eighty thousand in a year, but it would take us 80 years, 6 weeks, 3 days, 2 hours and 40 minutes to count one billion. If we were to count at the same rate until we reached the amount of our national debt which this administration has placed upon our shoulders, we would be counting for more than 20,000 years. The individual share of this enormous public debt due from every man, woman, and child in America is upward of $5,000.

Senator BYRD, of Virginia, one of the outstanding Democratic leaders of the United States Senate, recently said:

"The President attempted to pack the Supreme Court. He failed.

"He next attempted to purge Members of the Senate who disagreed with him. In this, too, he failed.

"He then proposed to reorganize the departments of government so that by Executive order he could consolidate, destroy, or move any department or official according to his whim of the moment. He failed again.

"Balked in these attempts, he next conceived the scheme of creating Government corporations. There are 57 of these corporations today and they have spent $30,000,000,000. They have never been authorized by Congress. They have never been audited by the Comptroller General, but they carry out the President's plans without law.

"His second step was the control of business, of industry, and of free enterprise. This was carried out by Government competition with private business, by senseless and unnecessary regimentation, by excessive and exorbitant taxation. In the Department of Agriculture alone there are 20 loaning agencies which could be and should be consolidated in one. Each agency has a complete staff of employees and each agency is competing with private loaning agencies, with this difference—the agencies' administration expense is all paid by the Government. Private loaning agencies pay their own expenses.

"There is a bill before Congress today that will regiment all the doctors in America, abolish private practice by instituting public medicine and place doctors, dentists, and nurses under direct control of a Federal-appointed official. If passed it will cost $3,000,000,000 a year to maintain.

"Then, too, we have the senseless and annoying procedure of Government bureaus issuing questionnaires and reports and idiotic forms. This was done to the amazing total of 7,715,000 in the last year.

"Branching out from business the Government has gone into the field of buying real estate, and today owns the stupendous total of 43,000,000 acres of land, one-fifth of all the land in the United States, all purchased within the last 5 years. This comprises an area as large as Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Vermont, and one-half of Maine. Since the war started the War Department has acquired 557 hotels, many of them purchased outright. Some of them were never used. Some of them were returned to their owners and some of them were sold at a stupendous loss to the Government.

"Every field of private endeavor in America has been invaded by this administration.

"We are still paying for 151 Roosevelt-sponsored resettlement projects started in 1935 under the notorious Rexford Tugwell. Every single one of them has failed utterly and has cost the Government $137,000,000."

We no longer stand at the crossroads—with the choice as to which highway to travel. We have long since passed the crossroads. We have gone down the wrong road, the road that leads to destruction of Government and eventually to anarchy. The choice that we must make next November is whether or not we will keep on going down that wrong road, or retrace our steps until we get back to the right road. There is nothing basically wrong with America. There is nothing wrong with our people. With 531 Members of Congress on the job we need have little fear that all of them will go wrong. With a Supreme Court of nine members there is little fear that they will all go wrong, but it is mighty easy for one man running a one-man government to go wrong. That is the danger in our situation today. Until we remove that one man, until we remove the communists and the crackpots and the stargazers, who fill all government offices by appointment by that one man, there isn't a chance for us to succeed.

We are being told by administration supporters that the President is our Commander in Chief and we must follow him, but he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy only, not of the civil population. Modern wars are fought by experts trained and skilled in the art of military science. Our armies are in capable hands with men guiding them who have spent a lifetime in the study of the art of war. Let us hope those military leaders will continue to handle the war without interference from civilian officials.

One again, as was heard 4 years ago, we hear that old saw that we cannot change horses in the middle of the stream, but did you ever ask yourself why we are in the middle of the stream after 11 years of New Deal failure? If the President is ever going to get us across, 12 years should be sufficient to cross most any stream. Or putting it another way, if our horse goes lame or falls down in the middle of the stream as this one has done, are we so foolish that we will sit in the ater waiting for him to get up, or will we get a new horse that can and will deliver us to our destination?

The indispensable man! That, too, is being used again.

A vast flood of publicity is pouring out of Washington to make the people think Mr. Roosevelt is indispensable. Perhaps he has come to think so himself, but any man who has the record he has of 11 years of administrative failure needs a vacation.

Too, there is a growing conflict between the Chief Executive and Congress, irrespective of party. Hardly a day passes that the executive department is not assailed by individual Members of Congress. Hardly a week passes that the President or some of has appointees do not assault Congress with a verbal barrage of mud slinging. The President's influence in Congress is shrinking daily. There is no possibility of winning it back. Why, then, should the American people want to retain in office a man who has lost the confidence and the support of the legislative body of the Government, whose reelection can only mean the continuation of squabble and turmoil and bitterness. Again I say, the President needs a vacation.

But when we do change Presidents next January, what do we Republicans propose to do? Of necessity our program must contain the following proposals:

Funds voted to the Executive for war purposes and unexpended should be returned immediately following the war to the Treasury.

Our monetary system must be placed on a sound basis. It can neither be left to star-gazing theorists, nor to any financial group for private exploitation.

Labor, industry, and agriculture require sympathetic understanding by Congress.

Wartime government regulations must be promptly repealed.

The emergency powers of the President must be repealed.

War agencies must be demolished lock, stock, and barrel.

Utopian plans should be forgotten.

America should be made self-supporting so far as possible.

Our rubber plants must be maintained at full capacity.

Industry must be retooled and remachined and the war plants of the country reconverted to peacetime work to supply domestic needs and to provide jobs for our soldiers.

Internationally our program should be a declaration by the President now of our peace terms.

The necessary and fundamental requirements of peace are few and can be quickly named. They are:

Complete disarmament and demobilization of the Axis countries.

Trial of those responsible for the war.

Return of or payment for all loot taken by them.

Complete demobilization of all plane, gun and munition factories in enemy countries.

Commercial air lines and radios in the Axis countries should be under Allied supervision.

Feeding the people of the war-ravished countries must be by joint contribution, not America alone.

Adjustment and terms of final settlement of our lend-lease accounts with other governments should be completed.

Complete restoration of the pre-Pearl Harbor status of the Philippine Islands or immediate independence.

Sufficient air bases, American owned and controlled, throughout the world to insure our own defense.

An organization of nations working together in cooperation to insure peace. The Pan American Union was organized in 1890. It has functioned well for 54 years. Why not a similar union of European and Asiatic countries?

A world court to settle international disputes.

An army, navy, and air force of sufficient power to protect us against any aggressor.

There are those who say we should not talk politics while the war is going on, but the things for which politics stand are the things for which we fight. Destroy or suppress that right of discussion and we have lost the incentive to fight. We have cheated the men who are away from home doing our fighting.

Under such a plea, tyranny enters and civil liberties disappear. Republicans, those are specious please cloaking an attempt to thwart the people in their constitutional right to choose their President in open, free, and unhampered elections.

Whether intended or not, it will defeat and cheat not only the men in our armies, but men and women everywhere, who are in war to preserve the things we most desire. Those things are of supreme importance to us.

We fight for the right to own our own homes, to raise and nourish our children in their innocence and gayety and trust.

We fight for the right to hold public meetings, free from Government interference.

We fight for the right to public schools undominated and uninstructed by alien philosophies.

We fight for the right of worship whether it be in church, cathedral, or synagogue.

We fight for our right to sow and reap in our fields, to buy and sell in our shops, to pursue the profession or trade of our liking without dictation from Washington.

We fight for the right to publish our newspaper or make a speech without censorship.

We fight for the right to join the Grange or the Farm Union, the Masons, the Odd Fellows, or the Elks, the Ladies' Aid, the chamber of commerce, or the Rotary Club without interference from any source whatsoever.

We fight for the right to attend dances and steal the other fellow's girl, to go to a baseball game and cuss the umpire, to turn on our free radio or turn it off for fireside chats, to condemn the New Deal and criticize Eleanor—in fact, to do any damn thing we please without taking orders from any man on earth.

These are the things we fight for, and be they great or small, important or inconsequential, they are America. They are things our boys are longing to return to.

It is for you and me—for every last one of us who is worth his salt, to see that those boys come home to just that. And the way to do our job is to change horses now and clean out of Washington every vestige of communistic New Dealism.

That is the job for South Dakota Republicans. Are we equal to the task?

Christ and the Unity of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an outstanding address delivered at the Pan-American Day celebration in Philadelphia recently by the Rev. Dr. Joseph B. Code, director of the Inter-American Institute of Kansas City, Mo.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The current crisis in inter-American affairs demonstrates the necessity of a permanent long-range policy in bringing the countries of the Western Hemisphere closer together. Many of those who are the enthusiastic supporters of the good-neighbor policy, as it is envisioned by the present administration, as well as those who have been critical of the activities of certain Government agencies endeavoring to promote better hemispheric relations, seem to feel that something has gone amiss or rather that the result of so much effort, such great expenditures, is slightly discouraging. On the other hand, there are those who insist that wastefulness, boondoggling, lack of the most elemental understanding of our southern neighbors, and a starry-eyed philosophy of what should be done has characterized our activities, with one result—that Latin Americans regard us as amateurs in much which they believe themselves to be experts in, and meddlers, both annoying and dangerous, who mistake the cooperation of governments for public opinion. It is a problem which calls for solution, for much of the future, not only of the Americas but of the world, depends upon the unity and peace of the Western Hemisphere. Certain European countries realized the importance of Latin America a long time ago and they acted accordingly. It is not too late for us to exert every effort, employ every means at our command, to unite the countries of America.

But when I say us I mean the people of the United States, since it is the people of Latin America we must deal with. As I stated in my address from Havana, given over the C. B. S. network, after my visit to Latin America, the unity of the Americas cannot be achieved unless there is a better understanding among the peoples of our hemisphere. Much has been accomplished to bring the governments together, but much has yet to be done to influence public opinion.

Of course, there may arise the question as to how far we have influenced even the governments of Latin America. Recent developments in Chile and Paraguay, to say nothing of those in Bolivia and the Argentine, seem to indicate that there is a challenge in Latin America to the "good-neighbor" policy. And this in spite of the sincere desire of the United States to collaborate and assist, to dispel the idea of the Colossus of the North, to improve trade relations and sanitary conditions. Since Pearl Harbor we have worked hard for hemispheric unity. We have kept war away from the western hemisphere. Yet many feel that the success of our program with regard to the governments of Latin America is as debatable as the efficacy of our efforts in influencing public opinion. And this in spite of the very great personal popularity of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull in our neighboring republics.

Be that as it may, there are two facts which one should keep in mind in dealing with this subject: (1) That the unity of the Americas is not an impossible task, but (2) that certain factors make it extremely difficult.

The unity of the Americas is not an impossible task because of what the countries of the western hemisphere have in common: Their heritage of freedom, their civilization, their basic need of regional security. Added to this is the desire of Latin Americans to know the United States, their admiration of much we have achieved in scientific and material development, their desire to cooperate in terms of interchange of ideas, economics, trade, and cultural advancement. Differences of opinion, even regarding fundamentals, exist, it is true; but this constitutes no insurmountable barrier where so much good will is evident.

However, there is a regrettable tendency to ignore certain factors which divide the peoples of America. It is unbelievable that this should continue to exist since it is recognized that these factors loom large in the failure or success of the "good neighbor" policy.

The first and most important of these factors is religion and morality. To expect to achieve even the minimum of success in understanding our southern neighbors without taking the religious and moral elements into consideration is the sheerest kind of folly. Any agency which for any reason whatsoever approaches the subject without a realization that the differences which exist between the two peoples are largely the result of differences of culture and mentality is wasting its funds and energy. An understanding, and a sympathetic understanding at that, of the culture and mentality of Latin America is fundamental to the cooperation of the two hemispheres.

The culture and the mentality of Latin America is Catholic. Not that every Cuban or every Chilean or every Brazilian is a Catholic. There are those who take no part in the life of the church or are even religious. Yet to understand even them—their presence in a Catholic milieu—we must understand the church, Catholicism's collective institution, in the making of America.

One of the first steps in this direction is to discover the true relationships of church and state in Latin America, and to be fully conscious of the differences of development between the church in the United States and that in our neighboring republics. Thus will it be possible to underline and, let us hope, correct the many misconceptions which are at the basis of so much of what is being written and said about Latin America. For instance, there are those who are of the opinion that because peoples of Latin America are predominantly Catholic that church and state are on the friendliest of terms; others that the church dominates the state, while others think that because certain governments are not in sympathy with the church or are even hostile to it, Catholicism has ceased to be a force worth reckoning with in Latin America.

All of these notions are equally false, due no doubt to the common mistake of identifying governments with public opinion. This is a particularly dangerous thing to do in the case of Latin America. The brand of democracy which obtains in certain sections of Latin America is not the democracy we know in the United States and Canada. But this is not surprising to one who knows the story of the evolution of government among our southern neighbors. Once that the colonies had separated from Spain and Portugal, the efficiency and competency of the vice regal rule came to an end and the people had to manufacture statesmen. They took ideas and forms of government from other democracies, which in turn were still young and inexperienced. They merely borrowed the language of freedom without putting into practice some of its principles. Their lack of wisdom was lamented by the really two great leaders of independence in Latin America, San Martin and Bolivar.

One institution in particular fell victim to these statesmen. This was the church. Unfortunately Latin America had been participating in the patronato real, or royal patronage, a privilege first accorded the kings of Portugal and Spain for their defense of both religious and civil liberty. But the privilege had led to abuses of all sorts and for some time the people of Latin America had been engaged in freeing the church from what was in reality secular bondage. As a matter of fact, the abuses of the patronage was one of the causes of the revolution. But when independence was gained, the new rulers held fast to the patronage. Thus the rift continued between the governments on one hand and the people and the church on the other, until in some countries it widened into persecution, such as in Guatemala, Venezuela, and Mexico.

Such was the setting for other elements inimical to the church—the anticlericals who labeled everything opposed to them as reactionary, the atheistic philosophy of nineteenth-century "liberalism," and the anti-Catholic forces from the outside—to which the politicians gave support in the name of liberty. It was but natural that the people's deeper sympathy was with the despoiled and often persecuted church rather than with governments which were anything but democratic.

Today there is a resurrection of catholicism in Latin America. Today, also, the people are assuming a new importance in the long-range policy of inter-Americanism.

Thus is it particularly necessary that the position of the people in relation to the governments be seen in its true perspective and that the position of the church in relation to both be fully appreciated. If this is done, many pitfalls will be avoided in promoting hemispheric unity, and an end will be put to that part of the black legend which has been an attack upon the position of the church in the history of education, social welfare, politics, and economics for over a century.

It is heartening to note that the recent report of the committee of the American Council on Education recommends the elimination of the falsehoods regarding Latin America from the teaching materials on inter-American subjects. Such a report focuses attention on the jaundiced eye with which the majority of North American writers on Latin America approach their subject. This is true especially of the popular writers, the textbook compilers, the magazine contributors, and, most unfortunately of all, those professors of history who see another culture through protesting eyes, not yet participating in the new research, nor benefiting by it, but following in the footsteps of those responsible to a great extent for the amazing and erroneous idea which so many North Americans have toward their southern neighbors.

When Bancroft wrote his history he put into it some of the deep prejudices of the typical nineteenth century New England mentality. Prescott was only better informed regarding the church in Latin America. It was only when such men as Bourne of Harvard and Bolton of California—both Protestants—began their work in the Latin-American field that the first real step toward a better understanding of Latin America was taken by American scholars. They have been followed by others, many of them their students. But as yet their researches and their fairness have not taken hold of the professors, or of the writers of popular books and magazine articles. Hence this latest development to clear the textbooks of the rubbish which has encumbered them, and which as a result has encumbered the minds of so many North Americans, even those particularly interested in Latin-American affairs, is indeed what the report terms it, "A milestone in the adjustment of American education to the international requirements of our era."

It is more than that. It is a milestone in the adjustment of North American mentality to the intellectual requirements of the good-neighbor policy.

When this adjustment is made, when the assumption of superiority and hypercriticism gives way to intelligent understanding, then may we expect a change of attitude toward the United States by our southern neighbors. Unfortunately there is a widespread feeling in Latin America that the United States is trying to modify, if not to change, the fundamental structure of its mentality. In other words, that through the press, the screen, and other agencies an attempt is being made to destroy what is essentially Latin American, which is all a part of the larger scheme of the United States to dominate the two Americas.

Whether we like to acknowledge it or not, it is true that the average Latin American looks upon the United States as a Nation of materialists, agnostics, scoffers of religion, intent upon sewing religious disunity throughout the hemisphere. He has been misled by the inadequacies and distortions of the press of North America, its radio and its movies and by the kind of Americans—including many of the so-called good-will ambassadors—with whom he has come in contact. The millions of dollars which we have poured into Latin America has been accompanied with little or no concern of the damage which certain Americans have been doing to the spiritual and moral welfare of the people of those countries.

The situation is critical, for as yet there appears to be no general awakening on the part of those engaged in promoting hemispheric unity of the spiritual implications of the good-neighbor policy. When I say spiritual implications I mean the realization on the part of North Americans that the culture and religion of Latin America is something to be reckoned with. To continue to ignore, to say nothing of attack, either directly or indirectly, these two important elements is fatal to cooperation, unity and regional security.

When those engaged in promoting the good-neighbor policy, and those who write and talk on matters dealing with our southern neighbors, begin to realize that Catholicism is the greatest unifying principle in the Western Hemisphere then may we be sure that we are on the road which will lead us into the hearts of Latin Americans. Then may we hope to change the attitude of many toward North America. Then, through the common tongue of faith, may we be able to convince them that the majority of North Americans, despite their differences in religion, condemn that which would destroy morality or spirituality among their fellowmen; that although there is separation of church and state in the United States, there is no official attempt to separate the people from religion; that on the contrary more than ever before do those in authority pay tribute to the value of fixed religious principles in the lives of the people. They need also to be assured that this country is not a nation of materialists, simply because of its material advancement, but rather, that this advancement is but an indication of what has been achieved in the past through cooperative action, and as a signpost of what might be expected, even in a material way, through a closer cooperation among the nations of this hemisphere.

Nor should Latin Americans be allowed to think that the United States believes in encouraging the undermining of the spiritual forces of another nation, or of turning into a market place of contending religious groups any nation which for centuries has had religious unity within its boundaries. They should be assured that those who might be engaged in such activities, if they be Americans, are not representative of that which is solid or respectable in their own country, and because of whatever resentment they arouse among those who have given them hospitality they do irreparable harm to the cause of religion, as well as to the cause of unity. It should be made quite clear to our neighbors to the south that the United States has had sufficient experience of its own of what division among religious groups can do to national unity without being unmindful of the danger to international unity should this unfortunate commodity be exported; that she encourages every effort to unite men of good will for the sake of civilization.

Finally our neighbors should be informed that the United States is not a country of agnostics, of scoffers of religion, or of frivolous men and women impervious to morality; on the contrary, that it is a nation much different from that which is presented to Latin Americans. Unfortunately, the real United States is scarcely known to the south of us: Our institutions of learning, of charity, of social welfare; our love of fellow man, often for the sake of God, which inspires thousands of men and women to sacrifice time and income for things which will be paid back only in eternity. Indeed, the United States may provide examples of heroic sacrifice—heroic holiness—unsurpassed elsewhere in America. Yes; much is to be seen beyond the smoke-screened skylines of northern cities: An America of little towns and simple living; of honest, hard-working men and women; of simple pleasures and much liberty; of all those homely things dear to man everywhere.

In order to bring this message to the people of Latin America through the common tongue of faith, the Most Reverend Edwin V. O'Hara, bishop of Kansas City, founded in March of 1943, the Inter-American Institute. The growth which, under God, it has seen and the enthusiastic reception it has received, not only in this country but through all of Latin America, is sufficient proof that religion even more than language determines the attitude of one people, toward another. From Mexico to Chile, and from Argentina to the countries of the Caribbean, men and women in every walk of life welcomed the institute as the long sought solution to the problems of correcting mutually false impressions, of bringing men otherwise so widely separated into mutual respect and understanding. They were of the opinion, also, that it is not sufficient to strike upon a working policy with the governments of the Americas but that the people must be convinced that in working for a united hemisphere the culture and the religion of Latin America will not be endangered from the north, where Catholics may also be found in numbers and importance who worship the same God before the same altar, and who partake of the same sacraments.

This is where the Catholics of the United States can play an important role. Above all others can they reach the heart of Latin Americans. They possess the same philosophy and the same faith; they talk the same language with regard to that important relationship of man with God. Indeed, they hold in their hands much of the future of the Good Neighbor policy.

Unfortunately there are those who say that it is not feasible to solve the problem through the Catholic church—that is to draw the peoples of Americas together by the common ties of faith—because of the reaction it might cause among certain non-Catholic groups and individuals. This is indeed a short-sighted policy and one that reveals insufficient appreciation of the seriousness of the problem. If the same crisis were to obtain with regard to the predominately Lutheran countries of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, or to predominately Calvinistic Holland, American Catholics would be lacking in patriotism, to say the least, were they to object to an organization directed by American Lutherans or Calvinists which might effectively reach the peoples of these countries through either Lutheranism or Calvinism. Because the vital role which America will assume in our post-war economy it is high time that prejudices and specious reasoning be eliminated from inter-American activities.

A few days ago I received a letter from a distinguished scholar of the Argentine and a true friend of this country, who wrote with great concern:

"Feeling between this country and the United States is hardening down into a settled sulky dislike from this angle. The war will pass by, but that feeling will long outlast it. That is why your institute is destined to do a great service to both our nations. Spadework is needed for a solid friendship which will stand outside and apart from momentary political issues; the best hope lies, it seems to me, in the intellectual contact and understanding."

The Argentine situation brings to the surface all that is artificial in the inter-American set-up, all that, by being artificial, helps to poison the strong elements of genuineness in it. This artificiality is obscuring the chasm which divides the peoples of North and South America, a chasm which must be bridged as quickly as possible. But to bridge this chasm one must know how wide it really is. All one needs to do is to go to Panama or Puerto Rico, where the two cultures meet, perhaps for us the two best observation posts in Latin America. Here may be seen how necessary it is to begin immediately to bridge the chasm, by making use of the abutments already in place on either side—the Catholic Church in the United States and Canada and in every country of Latin America.

The Inter-American Institute has chosen as its motto, "Unum in Christo," and Our Lady of the Americas, its special patron. Under these we work, convinced that just as love of freedom and democracy has bound the countries of the Western Hemisphere in a destiny which must not be shattered by separation or disaffection, the spiritual forces of the Americas must be utilized to defend these principles. As Pope Pius XII has pointed out in his encyclical, Darkness Over the Earth, "the loss of faith in God is followed by a loss of moral principles and finally by the loss of all that binds man to man in spiritual brotherhood."

America still has faith in God and in what binds man to man in spiritual brotherhood. That is why she intends to erect her great lighthouse cross in the Dominican Republic, as an act of gratitude to her Christian discoverer, and as a sign of the only true basis for unity in the Western Hemisphere; furthermore, as a challenge to the New Barabarians of Europe and Asia that the cross which Columbus planted has taken on a new significance; that through a united America it will redeem those held in bondage and once more save man and civilization.

The cornerstone of this great lighthouse cross is a stone from the ruins of La Isabela, the first town founded in the Western Hemisphere. Four centuries ago above this very stone the cross first rose on this side of the Atlantic; the stone itself served as the base of the altar on which, on that glorious epiphany of 1494, the incense of the first known eucharistic sacrifice rose to the skies of the Americas. "O Crux Christi, in quo est salus, vita et resurrectio Americae," O cross of Christ, in which is the salvation, the life and the resurrection of America.

The night before I left Rio, a member of the Brazilian Academy of Letters and a great intellectual said to me: "Carry in your heart, Father, with our friendship, our southern cross. And may the cross once more illumine the world and guide poor men."

This is the farewell of a poet. Brazil is full of poets and so is all of Latin America. But a poet's soul cannot be touched by money; nor a warm sentimental heart won with a cold 20-year contract. Twenty years mean nothing in Latin America; only manana is real. But in the depths of their Catholic souls, drenched with centuries of timeless truths, they understand eternity. And so we, their brothers in Christ, can couch the terms of our contract of fellowship in the common tongue of faith, sign it with the cross of Christ, and bind it in eternity.

This is the contribution of the Inter-American Institute to the unity of America.

Brand Name Manufacturers Face a Challenge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. President, with the eyes of the world today on our great mass production system, which is causing serious concern to our enemies on the fighting fronts, it seems proper from time to time to remind those on the home front that this tremendous production is possible because in America we have built well.

There has come to my attention a very interesting article in the Apparel Manufacturer magazine, written by A. O. Buckingham, vice president of Cluett, Peabody & Co. This article is a most forceful expression by an outstanding manufacturer regarding the responsibilities faced by all manufacturers during the war days and in the post-war period. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As our fighting forces come to a death grip with their enemies on the battle fronts of the world, manufacturers, perhaps more than any other group, face a threefold challenge and responsibility at home.

First, and foremost, they face the challenge and responsibility of assuring arms and equipment for our ever-swelling supply lines to our fighting men.

Second, they face the challenge and responsibility of assuring the maximum quantity of goods and commodities possible for our civilian population as they back the attack.

Third, they face the challenge and responsibility of assuring that, when victory comes, there will be jobs for the men and women now in the armed forces, war plants, factories, shops, and offices, to the end that our country will continue to prosper and move forward in its traditional way.

It should be a great source of pride to everyone on the manufacturing front that this threefold challenge and responsibility is being met. It is being met solely because over a long period of years we built a solid foundation for mass production. Without this mass production we could never turn back the dictators' surging hordes on the wide rims of the earth.

The keystone in this arch of mass production has been, and must continue to be, brand-name manufacturing, brand-name merchandising, and brand-name buying. In other words, production with the incentive always to make something better and consequently pay high wages to workers; selling with satisfaction and reasonable profit and buying with confidence and protection.

Here it might be pointed out that war conditions always have testing governments, ideals, and institutions. War periods are times when people everywhere become alert and take stock. History is replete with instances where war years provided opportunities for the advocates of change. We have such advocates with us today. They advocate grade standardization of goods and commodities, with a ceiling on the American standards of living. It is this challenge that manufacturers must face, and face courageously.

The way to face it is for manufacturers to realize that they are not merely the medium whereby raw commodities are turned into usable products but are the trustees of a system that has provided the American people with necessities that are considered to be luxuries most everywhere else in the world. This system is based on the principle of brand names.

The benefits of the brand name system can be summarized quickly. It has meant better products at constantly lowered prices. It has afforded the highest assurance of quality. It has offered freedom of choice for buyers. It has assured new products, because they could be brought very quickly into popular demand. It has given the highest standard of living ever attained by any people. It has created safeness in investments. It has stabilized markets and employment. It has assured high wages for workers. It has afforded the highest degree of all-around security for everyone. It has brought forth minimum regimentation and regulation over a long period of years. And finally, the brand name system has conceived the greatest opportunity for progress through merit and service—the very basis of constitutional guaranties.

All this does not mean, however, that all is well. Here again comes responsibility. I refer to the practice whereby manufacturers make brand-name goods and commodities and then sell virtually the same product under a nonbrand name at a much lower price. These manufacturers must realize that they are providing a vulnerable and focal point for the advocates of standardization and change. They already well know that this two-way practice could not exist if it were not for the prestige behind brand name advertising.

The very lifeblood of brand-name production and merchandising is advertising. The $2,000,000,000 advertising industry upon which radio, periodicals, and the press depend for their existence, and the ability to give our people a free press, would not exist long without brand names. Over a period of years advertising constantly has cleaned house and won a high degree of public confidence. Wartime advertising, in particular, has been a real help in winning the war, a real service to the country, and has built new respect for its sponsor. It must continue to go for its sponsor. It must continue to go forward with our country, and it will go forward.

Another phase of the problem is regulation. We must always expect reasonable and sound regulation of any and all enterprises in the interest of the people. But as we accept this regulation we must resist, to the very limit, unwise and unsound regulation conceived in the name, but not in the interest of the people. The brand-name system simply is an outgrowth of the creative ability of individuals who have won a name for themselves and their goods.

This system cannot and will not be destroyed by any group or combination of groups if manufacturers face the challenge and their responsibility.

Address by Hon. Aime J. Forand, of Rhode Island, to Postal Employees of Buffalo, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Honorable AIME J. FORAND before the employees of the Buffalo, N. Y., post office in the Hotel Buffalo, June 4, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I am happy, indeed, to be with you this morning. I am glad to have this opportunity to meet so many of Senator MEAD's friends because, like yourself, I admire and respect him. Jim, in my opinion, is an outstanding example of what a public official should be—he is honest, energetic, efficient, and democratic.

I congratulate the people of Buffalo for giving to the Nation a man of his type, and I am proud, indeed, to have him as my friend.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES ARE GRAND PEOPLE

I served for 4 years as a member of the Post Office Committee of the House, the first 2 years under JIM MEAD as chairman, and during that time I learned that postal employees are grand people.

Yours is one group that is not only fair in the demands it makes of Congress, but also very understanding of the problems that have to be faced by your employer, the Government of the United States.

I enjoyed working with those fine national representatives you have in Washington and it was with a great deal of reluctance that I left the Post Office Committee last year to take membership on the Ways and Means Committee.

However, when the leadership of the House suggested that I seek election to this most important and hard-working committee of the Congress, I realized that next to the majority leader I was the ranking Democrat from New England in the House and that it was my duty to accept the responsibility of representing that section of our country on that committee. Therefore, I would not shirk my duty.

I realized also that I could perhaps do more for the postal employees in that post than as an individual member of the Post Office Committee because I would have a part in selecting those who were to serve on the Post Office Committee, and I think you will agree that we have assigned some pretty good men to look after your welfare.

Both the House and Senate Post Office Committees have been very active during the present Congress and have brought out what I consider to be a well-rounded program of legislation for the benefit of all classes of postal employees. You are aware, I am sure, that there are still many important bills on the calendars of both committees that all of us feel should be acted upon, but we must admit that the record of postal legislation in the Seventy-eighth Congress is a good one. To name only a partial list of postal legislation, I might mention the so-called Mead-O'Brien war-bonus bill, providing a $300 increase in pay for the duration; additional pay for maintenance of equipment of rural carriers; extending the provisions of the Civil Service Reclassification Act to custodial employees and bringing them into the postal service; increase of compensation for substitutes, and, to aid the war effort, legislation was enacted permitting postmasters to assign clerks and carriers interchangeably during the emergency and also providing clerical assistance to post offices, branches, and stations serving military and naval personnel, and only this past week general agreement was reached on the Fay bill, providing overtime pay for postmasters and supervisory personnel. No group or class of postal workers has been forgotten by the Seventy-eighth Congress

All the friends of the postal workers realize that the $300 increase is a war measure, and they feel that postal employees are entitled to a permanent increase in pay. It seems queer to me that while no one questions the loyalty and efficiency of postal workers, there are always obstacles placed in the way of granting them an increase in pay.

Senator MEAD and Congressman O'BRIEN of Michigan have taken the initiative to correct this situation. They have introduced companion bills providing a permanent increase of $400 in your basic pay to take the place of the so-called war bonus.

Of course, there will be opposition to these bills on the ground that postal workers are already enjoying a $300 increase and that this proposal should wait until the war is over. When that time comes the cry will be for reductions in Government expenditures or some other excuse will be found by the opponents of these measures. It's going to be an uphill fight, but I am confident that we will win it. All fair-minded people will admit the proposal is fair and that it deserves serious consideration at this time. If its enactment cannot be had during the war the matter should at least be studied now and be ready for enactment before the so-called war-bonus law expires.

MISSED CONTACTS

Do you know I miss the intimate contacts I used to have with your national representatives. I used to look forward to their visits just as the businessman, the doctor, the lawyer, and the housewife look forward to the daily visit of the letter carrier. Although he has to bring messages of sorrow, as well as messages of happiness and cheer, the letter carrier is one person whose visit we all look to with anticipation.

The mailman in civilian life is everybody's friend. He is loved and respected by the people on his route, and is always most welcome. I know of only one group more welcome, and that is the mailmen in the armed services. You have nearly 37,000 of your former coworkers who are today handling mail in our armed forces, and they are doing a swell job.

They say a soldier has three first needs: 1. Good mail service; 2, movies, radios, and phonographs; and 3, cigarettes and candy. Note well that item number one on the list is mail, and they are getting it.

That your former coworkers are living up to the high traditions of the Postal Service is well exemplified by the recent award of the medal designated as the "Mailbag Cluster" to Corp. Max Wendroff, of Passaic, N. J.

Maj Gen. Howard Davidson, commander of the Tenth Army Air Forces fighter-bomber group in India, personally pinned the decoration on Wendroff and read the following citation:

"Corporal Wendroff as a message-center clerk made 100 missions to and from the postoffice, accomplishing them with great distinction. These missions, involving extreme operational hazards such as rough roads, cattle, goats, chickens, children, and adverse weather, were carried out with courage, coolness and determination, despite the expectation, probability, and eventuality of long, fruitless waits for mail. On several occasions he encountered delays ranging up to hours, sorely testing his patience, endurance, and fortitude. As a result of the courage, ability, and persistence of Wendroff, much benefit was brought to the morale of his organization and various other correspondents of military importance."

CONGRATULATIONS

I want, also, to congratulate you, the postal employees here in Buffalo, for your turn-out this morning. It was a most impressive sight to witness your public profession of faith in Almighty God.

To see a group of men and women marching is always an attraction, but to see such a group marching in a body from a Government building to a church and to see them lining up at the altar rail to partake of the body and blood of the Savior of Mankind is an inspiration and gives encouragement to the American people.

It matters not whether one is a Catholic or a non-Catholic, one cannot help feeling that it is because of men and women like you that America is the best country in the world. God-fearing folks lead a model life and set an example for all whose ideals are high and worth while. Again, I say to you, congratulations.

Your profession of faith in God and your performance today as Catholics reflect the fine religious training you received in your childhood. It reflects the spirit of religion which you have inculcated in the minds and hearts of your children, many of whom are today in service uniforms and scattered all over the world fighting and conquering the most brutal warriors the world has ever known.

While our enemies are turning from God, American servicemen, many of whom neglected their religion in civil life, are returning to their faith under the stress of battle.

Recently I heard over the radio of a young German soldier, wounded at Cassino, who was brought to a dressing station by American medical corpsmen. The doctor, realizing the seriousness of the soldier's condition, asked him if he would like to see a minister or a priest. "Hitler is my priest," the wounded German snapped back. "All right," replied the American doctor, "if you will hold out long enough we'll get him."

This made me curious as to just what our boys were doing in a religious way, so I asked the Chiefs of Chaplains of both the Army and the Navy, about it. Both of them pulled from their files hundreds of cases and gave them to me. Here are just a few which I picked at random:

An Army Chaplain while visiting wounded men at an evacuation hospital in the South Pacific noticed a soldier very much bandaged up and asked him what had happened.

The soldier replied: "Chaplain, today I became a humble man. All I can say is, thanks to God."

Further questioning brought out that the wounded man was a pilot who had returned to his base with 185 bullet and shrapnel holes in his plane. He had 9 Zeroes on his tail at one time, but in spite of that fact he successfully protected a torpedo plane, the safety of which was his particular responsibility. This pilot was wounded in the head, wrist, leg and foot. Upon safely landing his craft, he collapsed.

Here are two excerpts from a letter written by Chaplain Willard, of Pennsylvania, to his wife, after the marines landed on the Solomon Islands.

"I took part in the landing operations, and saw friends brought in dead and wounded. Also men right beside me were shot down. But God was good to me and spared my life.

"* * * The night before the battle a group of men came voluntarily to my room for prayer. You should have heard some of those prayers, such as that of a lad who said, 'Dear Lord, if anyone falls in the battle tomorrow, may it be me. Because I know Christ is my Savior and Lord. Give some of those poor fellows who do not know Christ another chance, and take me if it be Thy will, oh Lord.' As far as I know, none of that group who came to my room to pray were killed or wounded."

Father Gehring, of Brooklyn, N. Y., a Navy chaplain, who was awarded the Legion of Merit for services with the marines at Guadalcanal in September 1942, says in an article he wrote for the Sunday Observer:

"If there is one single good thing about this terrible war it is the realization of religion."

Further in this article he says:

"One would not think of looking for religion at the battle front of today's war but that is where we find it. Ask any chaplain; he'll tell you the boys are flocking to him for consolation, help, prayer books; for a better understanding of what religion means. The prayers boys learned at their mothers' knees now come to the fore."

I was given hundreds of examples like these, but these suffice to prove what I have said, that the enemy turns from God while our boys turn to God.

I want to pay my humble tribute to the chaplains in our armed forces.

It may interest you to know that as of March 31, 1944, there were 7,291 Army chaplains; 1,997 Catholics, 5,090 Protestants, and 204 Jewish.

In the Navy there are 2,024 chaplains; 1,310 Protestants, 681 Catholics, and 32 Jewish.

Thirty-seven Army chaplains have died in service of illness or accident, and 23 were killed in action.

Navy figures show 4 chaplains killed in action, 3 died from accidents, 4 from illness, 1 is missing in action in the Pacific theater, and 5 are prisoners of war.

These men of God are doing a fine job not only by keeping up the morale of our fighting men by providing recreation and diversion for them but also by providing them with facilities to practice their religion.

These self-sacrificing chaplains can be found wherever our soldiers and sailors are. Under the most arduous battle conditions, right in the front lines, chaplains are on the spot to cheer those who are discouraged, to aid the wounded, and to conduct services for the dead.

I am sure it is gratifying for you to know that in these days of tribulation our boys are fortified by the religious training they received at home and the constant companionship of the chaplains.

PROOF WE ARE WORTHY OF IDEALS AND PRINCIPLES

While our men in uniform have to engage in the ugly business of kill or be killed, we at home must work harder and longer to make sure they have all they need to win the war and hasten their return to us. If ever in the history of our country we were given an opportunity to prove worthy of the ideals and principles of our forefathers, that time is now.

We are proud to be Catholics. We are proud to be Americans. We are proud to live in a democracy. The principles of catholicism are the principles of democracy and free men, and it remains for us to fight, both abroad and at home, to defend these principles if we want to remain free men. We have to fight on two fronts because, as our declared enemies abroad are striking in the open, so also, the hidden enemies of America, here at home, by deceitful and clever propaganda, are boring at the very vitals of our Government. We must ever be on the alert against them. We cannot relax for even a moment.

On the battle fronts in every part of the world, our fighting men—in the air, on the ground, on the sea, and below the surface of the sea, are rendering a good account of themselves. The newsreels and the press bear testimony to that fact.

On the home front, although there has been some griping and grumbling about restrictions brought on by the war, we have, nevertheless, performed miracles of production.

We are indeed proud of our accomplishments. We boast of our greatness as a people. We publicize and advertise our achievements. We tell the world that we, the American people, a great peace-loving nation, do not start wars, but that we finish them—that we have never lost a war and that we will not lose this one.

PRICE TO PAY

All that is true, my friends. We have really done wonders. We are going to continue our effort, I am sure, and victory will, in the end, be ours. But for that victory we will pay dearly in tears, in blood, in limbs, in life and in treasure.

Whatever the cost may be, we will have to pay it, and we will pay it, but let us hope and pray that when victory is won we will not lose the peace.

Let us be well prepared to go to the peace table with terms that can be agreed to and which will insure a lasting peace so that our grandchildren, the children of those boys fighting today's battles, will not have to take up arms 25 years from now.

Our peace terms must be fair and just, but they must also be stern and enforced. To those who advocate a negotiated peace and urge that we be not too harsh on Germany and Japan, I say: Listen to this:

American battle casualties up to May 6 last, were 206,227.

The Army reports 161,113 and the Navy 45,114, divided as follows:

	Army	Navy
Killed	28,059	19,546
Wounded	65,779	12,089
Missing	35,496	9,026
Prisoners	31,779	4,453

That is the price in lives, blood, and suffering we have paid to date. With little hope that the war will be over soon, and considering the impending invasion of Europe and the obstacles still barring our way to Tokyo, this terrible price is sure to increase greatly. Let us keep this in mind when we consider the cries for a negotiated peace.

To the advocates of peace at any price, I say further: Read the Associated Press dispatch from Stockholm, dated May 26, just a few days ago. Here's what it says:

"NAZI ARMY MANUAL LOOKING TO NEXT WAR

"A new instruction manual issued by the German high command, a copy of which was received here yesterday, gives evidence that the German high command already is preparing for the next war.

"Conscious that it now is fighting a losing battle, the Prussian military clique expresses concern about Germany's declining birthrate as a factor which could dangerously weaken the nation.

"Called 'Merkblatt Fuer Den Kompanie Unterricht,' the manual declared 'every stout boy born in 1943 can become a brave soldier in 1963.'

" 'Every new-born healthy boy is one strong soldier more in 20 years,' the book said. 'But if the 1-to-19-year-olds in Germany are totalled one establishes that recruits will drop steadily from 750,000 20-year-olds in 1942 to 500,000 in 1953. In 10 years that means a loss of 1,750,000 men subject to military service.'

"The booklet said 'the more Germans there are in the world the more stable the new great Reich will stand and the more certain is peace in the world.' "

I ask you in the face of our casualty lists—not considering the billions in tax dollars this war is costing America—and in the face of information that Germany is already preparing for another war 25 years hence, can we afford to negotiate peace with the Axis nations or even to impose upon them peace terms they can soon forget? I hold to the theory that nothing but unconditional surrender will suffice.

It is my considered judgment that while we should be fair and just in our peace terms we must be stern and unbending in enforcing them if we intend to insure a lasting peace.

United States Navy Avengers—Navy's TBF's Proved Effectiveness of Torpedo Bombing and Reaped Revenge for Torpedo 8 in Thrilling Action in Pacific

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. STERLING COLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 6, 1944

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, this is the second anniversary of the performances of Torpedo 8 Squadron led by Harold ("Swede") Larsen of the United States Navy. The story of that great service is well written in the July issue of Skyways by M. LeFevre Smith. By leave granted me, I include in my remarks a part of that narrative for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

It was Tuesday morning, June 2, 1942, a clear, bright morning, which meant the flight would take off as scheduled. The sun was coming up over Pearl Harbor, and the wind that blew across the airfield was electrified by the nervous tension of the men waiting there. Six Grumman Avengers stood by for the take-off—six deadly weapons of war, ready at last for their first try at striking the enemy. The pilots and gunners who were to fly the ships to Midway and to battle were grouped in a tense knot around their commanding officer—tough, hard-hitting Lt. Harold ("Swede") Larsen.

"There's going to be a battle," he told them, "and a lot of it. I wish to blazes I was going with you, but they won't let me this time. It's up to you fellows to do the job for us. So give 'em hell."

Eighteen eager men of Torpedo 8 climbed into their ships, waved a last good-bye to the several dozen officers and men who had come to see them off, and headed their sturdy new ships toward the sea and an island which was a pinpoint on their maps. Their nervousness was gone now. As they droned on toward their unknown destiny Lieutenant Larsen's "Give 'em hell" kept going through their minds. They could do it—they had been trained for it, and their planes had been built for it. They were proud of their TBF's, as the Navy called them, Grumman Avengers, as their manufacturer named them. The Avengers handled so well and so fast they packed such certain death to the enemy in their torpedo tubes that the men who flew them didn't like to think of the rest of Torpedo 8, still aboard the Hornet, having to make an attack on the Japs at Midway with the slower, less powerful Douglas.

Because Larsen's group had arrived at Pearl Harbor too late for them to rejoin their old outfit on the Hornet, these 18 men would operate instead from Midway. They would do it alone without support, but they were glad that Larsen had chosen them from among the many who had volunteered. That night 18 men landed at Midway full of confidence that they would "give 'em hell."

Two days later all that remained of Torpedo 8 were the pilot and gunner of one of six Avengers, a pilot of one of the Hornet's TBD's, and Larsen's group left behind at Pearl Harbor.

The Japs were ready for the six TBF's with heavy antiaircraft fire and from twenty to thirty Zeros. The weather was on their side—a heavy overcast gave the planes of Torpedo 8 a gulley less than a mile wide through which to fly for their attack. They were an easy target as they plunged seaward and they knew it, but they didn't think of their own safety. They were separated from other Navy squadrons and had no dive bombers to help their attack, and no fighter planes to clear away the Zeros from around them. They were doing it alone, their only thought to release their torpedoes and hit the ships below. Down they raced—8,000 yards—4,000 yards—2,000 yards—1,000 yards—right into the Jap guns. Only one came through—a TBF, piloted by Lt. Albert K. Earnest.

Earnest got his plane home to Midway. He had been hit in the face by antiaircraft fire, and all his controls had been shot away. He flew home on his tabs, too tired and too let-down to care whether he made it or not, but fighting hard to get there because his instinct told him to. He had no instruments left to show him the way, but he made it with dead-reckoning navigation that was his specialty, guided the last 25 miles by the fires and columns of smoke the Japs had left at Midway. No one, seeing the plane he brought back, knew how he did it.

The 45 dead of Torpedo 8 had not died in vain. The official tally of Japanese losses, more than 12 times greater than those suffered by the United States, testified to that. And, what was more important, Midway was still in our hands. After one day of trying to capture her, the Japanese Fleet turned tail and ran.

Back at Pearl Harbor Lieutenant Larsen stayed close to the command center, awaiting news of his men. When he heard, he had but one thought, to attack and avenge Midway.

But was he to use the planes, so appropriately named for such a mission, in which he and the rest of Torpedo 8 had placed such faith and trust? Many said he wouldn't, that the TBF's were no good, that torpedo bombing was impractical because the losses would outweigh the gains. It was too dangerous and too difficult, the skeptics claimed, and only a handful of men could be trained to handle the many intricate and complex problems that go into making the fast, high-powered Avenger an effective weapon. Such talk was everywhere, in the newspapers, over the radio, and in the Navy itself. It looked as if torpedo bombing, off to a bad start, was to become a wartime experiment that failed.

With some of the arguments against it, the advocates of torpedo bombing had to agree. They knew that the torpedo, which, when launched from the Avenger's belly (much to the astonishment of the Japs at Midway) was the plane's deadliest piece of fire power, was hard to handle. It will hit its mark only if the pilot has accurately calculated the influence that the wind, the waves, the height, and the distance will have on its course. He must aim not at where the ship is but where it will be when the torpedo hits. And because the torpedo should have as short a solo flight as possible—to give the target less opportunity to maneuver out of its path—the pilot must take his plane in not only low but very close. He does this in a steep glide, almost as steep as the dive of a dive bomber, leveling off to drop his deadly fish at the end of his run. He is, of course, interrupted in his mathematical exercises, as he travels earthward at a terrific rate of speed, by the antiaircraft fire from ships below and the bullets from fighter planes attacking him. His defense is the high speed of his plane, plus his ability to maneuver in a twisting, flipping motion as he comes in for the attack. If he kept on an even keel, he'd be as easy to hit as a sitting duck.

Yes; anyone would agree that the torpedo-bomber pilot is a very busy man in combat, but, as it happened, there were many people who did not agree that only a handful could be trained or that losses would be greater than the gains. The torpedo might be a difficult weapon to handle, but handled properly it could, with its terrific destructive power, break a ship's back. Add to the torpedo the Avenger's alternate bomb load plus its forward guns, its top-turret brace of guns, and its belly-gun position, and you have a formidable menace to both sea and land forces that carries its own protection.

Fortunately for the war in the Pacific, the advocates of torpedo bombing won out. Lieutenant Larsen was given the go-ahead to form a new Torpedo 8 with replacements to fill the gaps left by the dead of Midway. A month later two more torpedo-bomber squadrons were commissioned. Torpedo 8 and the other squadrons set out to sea aboard the U. S. S. Saratoga in search of vengeance. In nearly every battle since Midway the enemy has felt the Avenger's deadly sting. In both the Atlantic and Pacific scores of enemy subs have fallen prey to Grumman's flying dynamite.

Reports taken from their record of combat only tell the story in part of how the Avenger has sought the enemy, found him, and smashed him. It is a record of inspiring achievement beginning on that dismal June day when Lieutenant Larsen read the terse message ending, "One ship returned," and continuing in spite of the initial set-back to the current, almost daily communiques reading, "During the morning a large force of Marine and Navy Avengers, escorted by fighter planes, bombed enemy positions at Rabaul. Hits were made on enemy warships and ground positions. Enemy opposition was encountered, but all United States planes returned."

South Pacific, August 7, 1942: There were no ships to torpedo, so they were carrying bombs that day. Before the pilots had swallowed their coffee they were off into the black morning, headed for Guadalcanal. The offensive war against the Japs had begun.

The new Torpedo 8's objective was the eastern end of Florida Island, across the basin from Guadalcanal. They were nervous because this wasn't practice, but as the morning advanced and they smashed one enemy installation after another their nervousness wore off. They worked all day, returning to the Saratoga only long enough for a sandwich and a cup of coffee at noon. It was a day of victory and one long to be remembered in aircraft carrier history, for the Saratoga that day launched more planes than had ever before been attempted by a single ship.

Guadalcanal, August 23, 1942: Larsen was leading the torpedo bombers' attack. Japan had massed a fleet of 80 ships—a far larger number than she had hurled against Singapore and the whole Malay Peninsula—and was converging with it on Guadalcanal in a desperate attempt to recapture that vital link in her lifeline. The second battle for the Solomons was under way. The Saratoga, learning this, had raced to the scene with her horde of planes. Torpedo 8 took off, on the morning of August 22, and flew through a terrific storm in search of the oncoming enemy force.

Down below and 15 miles away Larsen's flight spotted their target: four heavy cruisers, four light cruisers and six destroyers. They would have preferred a carrier but didn't want to waste time and gas looking for one. Above and to the northwest of the task force hung a tiny purple cloud, just large enough to hide five TBF's as they tensed for their plunge. It was in just the right position and the Avengers headed for it as if it were the lights of home, clung to its protection for a moment, and then let loose in a screaming, piercing dive.

The ships' gunfire lashed up at them, but the aim was poorly calculated. The cloud had given the five planes the advantage and, once gained, they didn't intend to lose it. Down they dove, twisting, flipping, aiming straight at the ships dead ahead. The ack-ack was getting closer now and five Zeros were on their tails, riding in on the anti-aircraft fire with them. Five TBF's were doing it alone again. This was another Midway. .

But the end wasn't like Midway. Each of the Avengers let loose its torpedo and a heavy cruiser was completely destroyed. Another foot lower and they would probably have felt the heat from the muzzles of the guns firing on them. Five Avengers swung up from the ships and back into the quiet of the sky. They landed at Henderson Field, where most of them were to stay during the next three months of operations, thereby using the field for the purpose for which it was intended; as an unsinkable aircraft carrier.

This is the story, in part, of the combat record of the gallant Avenger. It is by no means complete. The whole story is housed in rows and rows of Navy and Marine Corps files, in daily communiques from the war zones, in personal experience stories of the men who fly the TBF's, every one of them a hero, whether he wears a ribbon to show it or not. There will be more stories for every day that the war continues, for the Grumman Avenger will see the war through, improving with age as its manufacturer increases its fighting power. It has justified the faith those 18 brave and eager men placed in it as they flew to the Battle of Midway full of confidence that they would "give 'em hell."

The Coal Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, in view of the possibilities of a very severe coal shortage during the forthcoming winter, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Indiana Farmer's Guide of June 1, 1944, entitled "What About Your Coal?"

In this connection, Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the coal supply of the country is being depleted very rapidly, the stock piles are dwindling, and from all indications, unless there is a scientific educational program sponsored by the industry and by the Government, the Northern States will be in severe plight next winter.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT ABOUT YOUR COAL?—COMMERCE OFFICIAL POINTS OUT THE DANGERS OF A SHORTAGE NEXT WINTER

(By Robert M. Weidenhammer, Metals and Minerals Unit, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce)

It will be the coal consumers, not the coal producers, who will decide this summer whether this country will have enough coal next winter or face a serious shortage.

During the winters of 1941–42 and 1942–43 coal was in such ample supply that not only were many fuel-oil installations converted to coal but railroads, public utilities, industry, and retail dealers were able to increase their stock piles from 60,000,000 tons to 90,000,000 at the beginning of the 1943–44 heating season. But this spring finds us with stock piles reduced to 53,000,000 tons, and now, with the young miners under 26 years being drafted and with export demands greatly increased, the prospects for the winter of 1944–45 naturally bear close study.

The total coal tonnage used up for American consumption and for exports during 1943 was in excess of 680,000,000 tons, or some 30,000,000 tons in excess of production, the difference coming, as we have seen, from stock piles. So far in 1944 we have further reduced stock piles by some 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 tons.

In the first quarter of 1944 the bituminous coal industry produced around 160,000,000 tons of coal. This would be at the rate of 640,000,000 tons annually if production could be maintained at this level throughout the year.

In the week ended March 18, however, production had fallen to 11,920,000 tons, or 1,030,000 tons less than the 12,950,000 produced in the week ended February 12, which was the best week for the first quarter of 1944. Likewise, the anthracite industry is now below last year.

If production had continued at the rate of the first quarter of 1944, output of 640,000,000 tons of bituminous coal and 60,000,000 to 65,000,000 tons of anthracite or a total of 700,000,000 to 705,000,000 tons, would have more than restored the stock piles to their peak figure reached in 1942. The recent downward trend in production, however, unless checked and reversed, might well result in a shortage of some 25,000,000 to 40,000,000 tons. This amount could, it is true, be once more taken out of stock piles, but that would leave us at the end of the winter of 1944–45 with only 30,000,000 to 15,000,000 tons on hand, a figure much too low for the efficient functioning of the national economy.

TWO DANGEROUS FACTORS

The two factors that would bring about a serious coal shortage during the winter of 1944–45 have become clearly visible during the last few weeks. They are: (1) The loss of miners to the armed forces, and (2) the hand-to-mouth buying of many coal consumers during the slack season.

Manpower in the mines is becoming more and more of a problem in this country. Employment in the anthracite industry has declined from 88,000 men to 78,000 since Pearl Harbor, and in the bituminous-coal industry the number of miners has fallen from some 450,000 to 390,000. The average age of miners is now over 40 years, as compared with 32 only 2 years ago. Loss through superannuation this year is estimated by the War Manpower Commission to be as high as 20,000 to 25,000 men.

It may be debatable whether for the war effort a coal miner is more important in the mine than as a buck private, but there can be no debate that coal buyers, by not stocking as much as possible during the slack summer season, are endangering their own interests as well as their country's.

DIFFERENCE IN YEARS

Last year at this time buyers were anxious to store all the coal that could be mined because they were afraid of a possible immediate shortage that would occur if the miners went on strike over the question of the biennial renewal of their union contract, which expired on April 1, 1943. This year, with no strike threat overhanging and now that winter is over, some coal buyers are just covering their immediate needs. They are delaying the replenishment of their stock piles until later in the summer, when they expect that the particular brand of coal they prefer to use may be available. Such a drop in buying, of course, is being reflected in a drop in output.

If coal production in this country had continued throughout 1944 at the level it reached during the first 7 weeks of this year, we could have looked with confidence to the winter of 1944–45. But if the coal buyer continues to hesitate to stock-pile unfamiliar coals—and present indications are that he may—production will fall during the summer and a critical shortage may develop during the winter.

It is highly desirable that coal consumers be persuaded to stock up during the summer even on unfamiliar coals. The extent of this stock piling will decide the success or failure of the national fuel supply for next winter.

Soviet Expansionism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the translation of a signed article entitled "Soviet Expansionism," by the editor of the Journal de Genève, S. Stelling-Michaud, published in the issue of February 2, 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The war aims of the Soviet Union and the foreign policy of the Kremlin constitute, for the majority of Europeans, a mystery rendered more than obscure in consequence of the numerous sudden reversals of Stalinist diplomacy. Does this mean that there is no continuity in this apparently chaotic policy? Does this policy operate under the influence of certain laws of its own, or does it, after a revolutionary detour, come back to the underlying constants which govern the history of Russia? These are problems which deserve a more searching analysis than is possible in a newspaper article.

In the writer's view, it is a mistake to identify Soviet policy with the imperialism of the czars, although there is unquestionably an analogy in certain respects, as for example, in the case of the Kremlin's policy in the Balkans. But the difference between the two Russian policies—that of the czars and that of Stalin—is basic. The novelty in the policy of the Soviet Government, in fact, is to be found less in those characteristics which relate it to the past than in those which distinguish it from the past. Perhaps the mental structure of the Russians has not changed, but the very concept of their foreign policy has changed, and their methods are different.

In order to understand those modifications which have a special bearing upon international relations, one must keep certain facts in mind. First of all, the Soviet Union is not merely Russia, because the old Muscovite state is but one of the republics (although the most important) of a vast federation widespread over Asia, and desirous of being widespread in Europe. If each of the federated states rests upon the principle of the cohesion of a given race, no such preoccupation concerns the union, the expansion of which, consequently, is illimitable, in contrast to Pan Slavic Imperialism in the nineteenth century.

It is thanks to this idea of federation that the Soviet authorities manage to reconcile internationalism with the nationalist principle. The paradox of the foreign policy of the Soviet Union consists in being at one and the same time nationalist and revolutionary. Cleverly playing upon both stages so as to dismay his adversaries, tranquillize his current friends, consolidate his domestic lines and build some support in the outside world, Stalin has been able, in 20 years, to convert a Russia sunk in a quarantine of scorn, into one of the decisive factors of world policy.

In drawing a parallel between the Napoleonic period and our own times people often compare the Russia of Alexander I and the Russia of Stalin. The Soviet authorities disavow any such comparison and denounce the methods of traditional diplomacy as practiced at the Congress of Vienna. The difference between the classical diplomacy, and that of the Soviet Union was already abundantly clear in the negotiations of Brest-Litovsk, December 1917 to March 1918. While the representatives of the central empires were guided by the old objectives of strategic frontiers, territorial transfers, and economic concessions, the Bolshevik ignored the old military-geographic vocabulary, and spoke of social revolution, the freeing of peoples, and the welfare of workers. The diplomacy of the Soviet Union rejects the notion of compromise, and resorts to it only under the pressure of necessity. The reason is simple. The governments of Europe as a rule have come to war over territorial or economic controversies; but the Soviet Union is always focused upon an alteration of the social order. Although it is relatively easy to find a basis for settlement between two territorial claims, no compromise is possible when it is a question of the political or social order. That is why we might have expected the rejection by the Soviet Union of the offer of mediation submitted by the United States in the conflict between the Soviet Union and the Polish Government in London. Had it merely been a question of the route of the Curzon Line, this offer of mediation would probably have been accepted; but it was destined to fail so long as, in the eyes of the Soviet Union, what really was at issue was the substitution of the governing class of Poland by a new element drawn from the people, and, because of political conviction and economic interest alike, friendly to Russia.

It is interesting to note in this connection that the executive committee of the Communist Party has just laid before the Supreme Council of the Soviet Union, a proposal to give the Soviet Republics greater autonomy in military affairs and international policy. This unexpected decision can signify but one thing: The Kremlin is already preparing the grounds for future movements "a la Tito" in Poland and the Baltic States. At the opportune moment, plebiscites, inspired by the right of self-determination of peoples, would back up these measures; and thus the Soviet Union expects to realize its policy of expansion. The formula is new, and what one can learn of this program from the underground press, which gets its inspiration from Moscow, enables us to define the new objective of Soviet policy.

The idea of a proletarian revolution throughout the world, vainly hoped for by Lenin, after 1917, seems to have been definitively abandoned. Stalin's pragmatism goes around obstacles, and tries to turn to its own account the resistance of the populations of occupied territory, by grafting upon this living reality of Europe its own program of a social and political order. By encouraging these national movements, the Soviets expect to create governments which will group all the elements opposed to fascism—which means those opposed to capitalism—the democratic elements in the etymological sense of the word, elements whose unification is hammered together in the struggle against the occupying power, and the collaborationists who work with that power, and who are for the most part the governing class.

These governments would not necessarily be collectivist or communist, but they ought, according to the Soviet ideas, begin their operations by nationalizing public services and industries, and dividing up the land in parcels of 30 hectares, in line with the idea of private property permitted by the new Soviet constitution. However, this program would not be at all definitive inasmuch as, according to Stalin's own view, the Marxist-Leninist thought "should constantly undergo development and improvement." "In the course of its development," as Stalin states in his history of the Communist Party in the U. S. S. R., which appeared in 1938, the "science of revolution is necessarily enriched by new experiences and new information, and some of its principles and conclusions change with the times, and are replaced by new principles and conclusions which fit the requirements of the day." This doctrinal position which may be described as pragmatic, this idea of a constant process of becoming, inspired evidently by the dialectic of Hegel, is one of the keys to the foreign policy of the Soviets, and explains its apparent vagaries, its abrupt changes in direction, and its reversals of alliances.

S. STELLING-MICHAUD.

New Reconstruction Era

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. McKENZIE

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

NEW RECONSTRUCTION ERA

Those citizens of the South who are old enough to recall the reconstruction days that followed the War Between the States, realize with something of a shock that a new reconstruction era is being framed, and that there is every prospect the administration at Washington is presently planning to effect its enforcement as soon as the 1944 Presidential election is out of the way. "If anyone believes there will not be a new army of scalawags in every Southern State to assist the carpetbaggers and give them support," suggests the Southern Weekly, published at Dallas, "let him behold the present antics of certain party politicians in the South who are interested in nothing but their own political careers and who are willing to palliate and excuse all acts of the administration against the South in order to increase their own influence at Washington.

The instrument charged with responsibility for bringing this new reconstruction era into existence is the President's Committee on Fair Employment Practices. Recently there appeared in the Dallas News a half-inch advertisement offering employment to a "colored man to work at night as a paper handler." This brought promptly from the regional office of the C. F. E. P. at Dallas a request that such advertisement be discontinued, as it was "discriminatory as to race, creed, color, or national origin." The need for using all available manpower during wartime was set up as the excuse for the request—or demand—but when the manager of the regional office was asked to answer some questions about the matter, he refused, saying that he was under strict orders from Washington to refrain from giving newspaper interviews.

The Committee on Fair Employment Practice has no authority in law, but is something that originated in the mind of President Roosevelt. Its membership looks to him, and to him alone, for instructions, and these are passed along to all sections of the country, and particularly to the south, where the purpose is to break down all segregation laws. On this point the Dallas News said editorially:

"The Fair Employment Practice Committee, through its local office, presumes to enforce its demands throughout the war industries of Dallas which now constitute employment of about four-fifths of the community's 85,000 industrial workers. In doing so it is guilty of (1) running counter to the whole spirit of our southern State laws establishing segregation and the Supreme Court decisions that have supported them; (2) gross misrepresentation of its opportunity to serve in the role of attaining fair employment practices; and (3) an attempt to enforce a procedure that can result only in inefficiency and loss of effort in the adjustment of labor supply and demand

"If white and colored people can be segregated in schools, on streetcars, and elsewhere on the basis of our State laws, sustained by a United States Supreme Court decision, it is absurd for a Federal agency, having no more authority than Presidential ukase, to transcend the theory held by the Supreme Court, in its directives to employers in their private business. For, certainly, under any theory of law more liberty in the choice of associates is permitted in private than in public service. It would be easily possible for the President's Fair Employment Practice Committee to perform its legitimate function in seeing that Negroes get a fair deal in war-industry employment, yet without attempting to break down the time-honored southern tradition of segregation. With such a policy the News would be in entire sympathy.

"Not only does the President's Fair Employment Practice Committee attempt to abolish segregation, it ignores the fact that, in the long-standing traditions and practices of the South a considerable difference has been established in the actual skills of white and colored people. To the extent that it would abolish precise advertising, it would create confusion and bring about wastage of manpower.

"The President's Fair Employment Practice Committee, in its arbitrary and unwarranted orders, is inadvertently adding to an issue in which there is already enough bitterness. The local office of the Committee is undoubtedly cognizant of this, but it is taking its orders from Washington. The Committee should resurvey its field of constructive opportunity and devote its energies to promotion of fair employment practices within the bounds of the spirit of southern laws and Supreme Court decisions upholding them. Otherwise the inevitable result will be more harm than good. And patently there would be no reason for the continued existence of such an agency."

As a matter of fact there is no excuse for the existence of this presidentially appointed committee in wartime. Let one pursue the Dallas situation to the logical end. There is no more reason for the C. F. E. P. orders in this case than in hundreds of others. Suppose the advertiser wanted to employ a stenographer; would it be necessary to include the words "white" or "colored" in his advertisement? There are certain employments in this part of the country that are reserved for the Negro population—it has been that way from the beginning, and it will remain that way until the end, regardless of the Committee of Fair Employment Practices, Congress, or the President himself. It is one of those things which cannot be changed, and the sooner the Roosevelts recognize this truth, the better for all concerned.

In regard to the political aspects of the matter, there is nothing more certain than this: If a presidentially selected committee, acting under no other authority than that conferred by a White House directive, undertakes to force upon the South the dangerous and foolish doctrines that are being preached by the C. F. E. P., inspired by the President of the United States, the Democratic Party as now constituted will ultimately find itself without support. If Mr. Roosevelt and the other northern leaders cannot see this, they are, indeed, as blind as bats.

(Since the above was put in type we have read the statement of Representative OVERTON BROOKS, of this district, in which he declares that "the C. F. E. P. is doing a terrible job of helping the war effort and a magnificent job of disuniting the American people." We heartily agree with the Representative's appraisal.)

Poor Cotton Farmer—For a Bale of Cotton the Farmer Gets $100, the Consumer Pays $22,560—Who Gets the Difference?—Not the Cotton Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Commissioner of Agriculture Tom Linder, of Georgia:

"Then the Lord said unto Moses, Now shalt thou see what I will do to Pharoah: for with a strong hand shall he let them go, and with a strong hand shall he drive them out of his land." (Exodus 6:1.)

This is the story of cotton to the consuming public.

This is a story just as vital to the sidewalks of New York, to Michigan Avenue of Chicago, to those of the Golden Gate of California, and to those of the great farm belts of the West and Middle West as it is to those who grow cotton in the Southlands.

If you buy cotton clothes of any kind, anywhere, this is your story. This is your problem.

To the people of the South, whether you farm, whether you are a white-collar worker or in a profession, whether you labor at the cotton spindles, in an iron mill, in a coal mine, or wherever you may be, this is the story that concerns you and your children.

"He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

COTTON DRESSES

On the last page of this Bulletin, you will find a table showing the weight and price of cotton dresses of many kinds.

When you have finished reading this article, be sure and turn to the last page and study the lesson which this table of figures carries.

These are prices of ladies' dresses—not children's—in Atlanta department stores, ladies' ready-to-wear stores, and ladies' shops.

The first seven dresses—No. 1 to 7—listed are the cheapest cotton dresses to be found in Atlanta. These seven dresses are priced from $1.69 to $4.98 each.

These seven dresses weigh from 3 ounces to 11 ounces each. The combined weight of the seven dresses is 45½ ounces. The combined price of the seven dresses is $25.58. This is 56 cents for each ounce, or $8.99 for each pound, of cotton dress.

One bale of cotton weighing 500 pounds at $8.99 per pound is $4,495.

The farmer who grew this bale of cotton received somewhere between $60 and $100 for the whole bale.

Assuming that the farmer received $100, or 20 cents a pound, then the farmer would have received only 2½ cents out of each dollar that the consumer paid for these cheap dresses—the cheapest cotton dresses on the market.

The next six dresses (No. 8 to 13) listed on the last page are priced from $5.98 to $7.99 each.

These six dresses are selling at prices that will bring $5,125 for dresses equal in weight to one 500-pound bale of cotton.

Remember, you are still reading about cheap dresses.

LET'S SEE ABOUT SOME HIGHER-PRICED DRESSES

The next six dresses listed in the table on the last page (No. 14 to 19) have a combined weight of 64 ounces. The combined price of these six dresses is $58.85. The average weight is 11 ounces, and the average price is $9.80. This is an average of 89 cents an ounce, or $14.70 a pound. A 500-pound bale of cotton at $14.70 a pound would bring $7,350.

The farmer who produced the bale of cotton received less than $100. The farmer received less than 20 cents per pound.

The consumer who wears these dresses pays $14.70 per pound.

Remember, you are still reading about cheap cotton dresses.

The next six dresses listed in the table on the last page (No. 20 to 25) run in price from $12.98 to $35.

The combined weight of these six dresses is 48 ounces. The combined price of these six dresses is $111.88. The average weight per dress is 8 ounces, and the average price per dress is $16.98. This is $2.89 per ounce, or $45.12 per pound.

One bale of cotton weighing 500 pounds at $45.12 per pound would bring $22,560.

The farmer received 20 cents per pound for the cotton in these six dresses. The consumer is paying $45.12 per pound for these six dresses.

If the farmer had received 2½ cents out of the consumer's dollar on these dresses, he would have received $564 per bale, or $1.12 per pound.

Think of that.

If the farmer had received 2½ cents out of the consumer's dollar, he would have received more than four times as much as he actually received.

Actually the farmer only received five-eighths of 1 cent out of each dollar that the consumer paid.

Turn it around the other way.

If the price the consumer paid had been based on what the farmer received for the cotton, these six dresses (Nos. 20 to 25) instead of costing the consumer $111.88, it would have actually cost $25.45 for the six dresses, or $4.24 each.

We have been talking about cheap cotton dresses and medium-priced cotton dresses. Now let's see about some high-priced cotton dresses.

HIGH-PRICED COTTON DRESSES

The last 13 classes of dresses listed in the table on the last page (Nos. 26 to 38) cover hundreds of dresses of varying prices as shown in the table.

The average price of the dresses of each of these materials is used.

If you bought 1 each of the average dresses listed under Nos. 26 to 38, the 13 dresses would cost $302.98. The total weight of the 13 dresses is 108 ounces. You would pay $2.89 for each ounce, or $45.12 for each pound.

A 500-pound bale of cotton at $45.12 per pound would bring $22,560.

COTTON DRESSES HIGHER THAN WHEN HAND SPUN AND HAND WOVEN

On a basis of weight and price these higher priced dresses cost more today than they did when there wasn't a power spindle or a sewing machine.

When the women of old, spun their thread with a spinning wheel, made cloth on a home-made loom, fashioned them by hand and sewed them with a needle and thread, a cotton dress did not cost money like this.

The farmer and his wife and children today would make more money with a hand loom and spinning wheel than they could possibly make growing cotton on the best cotton land in the world.

THE COTTON BELT THE NATION'S NO. 1 ECONOMIC PROBLEM

President Roosevelt has said, "The South is the Nation's No. 1 economic problem." No wonder the Cotton Belt is the Nation's No. 1 economic problem. How could it be otherwise.

On May 30, 1944, President Roosevelt also said that he objected to the Bankhead amendment to O. P. A. which would tie the ceiling on the farmer's cotton to the ceiling on manufactured cotton.

The President thereby goes on record as being in favor of perpetuating the South as the Nation's economic problem No. 1.

The President has also said he is determined for the Negro to have economic equality. He is asking Congress for $500,000 to support a committee that he created called "Fair Economic Practice Committee." The purpose of this committee is to see that the Negro gets economic equality in the South.

I would like to know how anybody, white or black, can ever get economic equality under conditions now existing in the Cotton Belt.

The President in opposing the Bankhead amendment said that any increase in price of cotton would cause inflation.

Each of these dresses have from 5 to 20 cents worth of cotton in them. If the price of the farmer's cotton was raised from 20 cents a pound to 30 cents a pound then each of these dresses would have from 7½ cents to 30 cents worth of cotton.

The increase in the cost of the raw cotton would amount to an average of 5½ cents on each dress.

Can you imagine anyone saying that 5½ cents more to the farmer would cause inflation? Can you imagine anyone saying that five-eighths of 1 cent out of each of the consumer's dollars is enough for the farmer who produced the raw cotton to receive?

Today I talked to a lady who lives in Atlanta and who is one of the most substantial and reliable ladies in Georgia. She gave me the following facts regarding dresses that she now has. Just prior to the passage of the law creating O. P. A. this lady purchased five dresses in Atlanta at prices ranging from $2.98 to $3.98 each. Today in the same store the identical dresses are priced from $8.98 to $14.98 each.

During the life of O. P. A. the prices of these dresses have increased more than 300 percent. This lady also told me of another dress that had increased in price during the same period from $5.98 to $29.98. This is an increase of 500 percent for the same dress under O. P. A.

WHO IS GETTING ALL THIS MONEY?

It is evident that a terrific amount of money is being garnered by somebody. Who is getting all this increased spread between the farmer and the consumer?

Contrary to the opinion of many people, all this increased cost is not going to the cotton-mill labor.

I have before me United States Government figures which show that the average hourly earnings of all cotton-mill workers in January 1941 was 41.9 cents. In January 1944 this had increased to 59.4 cents per hour.

The increased cost of cotton-mill labor amounts to about 40 percent, while the increased cost of cotton dresses amounts to at least 300 percent.

It is obvious that the cotton-mill workers are not responsible for this terrific increase in the cost of cotton dresses.

It is equally obvious that the farmer who grows the cotton is getting no part of this wild increase.

It is equally obvious that the consumers are paying this increase.

Let's follow this through and find out where the trouble lies.

The Beginning of the End for the Loan Sharks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS C. RABAUT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed that a Federal grand jury at San Antonio, Tex., has returned an indictment against 13 high-rate small-loan chains, charging them with violating the antitrust laws by conspiring to put a floor under interest rates. These companies charge from 60 to 240 percent per year, by agreement, on loans ranging from $5 to $60 per loan.

I have long been pressing for investigation of the nefarious activities of loan sharks, and I urged the Department of Justice to undertake this particular investigation.

At the hearing on appropriations for the Antitrust Division for the fiscal years 1943, 1944, and 1945, before the House subcommittee, of which I am chairman, I expressed a deep interest and a desire that the high-rate small-loan industry be investigated under the antitrust laws. In our recommendation to the full Committee on Appropriations for the fiscal year 1943, we said, with respect to this matter:

Another field of activity which the Antitrust Division may well investigate is the loan-shark business. It was represented to the committee that there is $5,000,000,000 of small-loan credit in the United States on which interest ranging from 20 to 240 percent annually is paid. If any of the activity in this field runs counter to the antitrust laws, the offending parties should be brought to the bar of justice.

Again, in reporting our recommendations to the full committee on the appropriations bill for the fiscal year 1945, we again expressed ourselves as follows:

The committee wishes to reiterate its thoughts, expressed in the report on the report on the 1944 bill, in connection with the work of the Antitrust Division, with particular reference to the investigation and prosecution of the small-loan organizations, commonly known as loan sharks. * * * It is hoped that during the ensuing year the Division will exert every effort to curb the unfair practices of some of these organizations which adversely affect many of our citizens who are in the least position to cope with the effects of a constantly changing economy.

I am glad to see that the Antitrust Division has obtained this indictment, and I am going to continue to urge that the defendants be prosecuted to the fullest extent permitted by law. The persons indicted are not "small fry" in any sense of the word. They are owners of large interstate loan chains, with incomes in the millions of dollars annually. These chains operate in approximately 23 States through over 400 offices, and through a network of holding companies, corporations, and fictitious trade names.

Of almost equal importance to the high rates charged are the methods used to assure continuance of the loan shark's illegal business. To put it bluntly, the Department's investigation has disclosed that huge slush funds are raised for the purpose of influencing State legislators and other public officials against passage of legislation curbing such extortion.

It is my considered opinion that these vermin should be exterminated by every legal means available. I consider that the money spent by the Antitrust Division in ferreting out and finally indicting the leaders of the small-loan business has been well spent. No other activity in the country needs a public airing as much as the high-rate small-loans field. This so-called business is a racket. It preys like a vulture upon those least able to stand its extortion. Injustice to the weak and impoverished cries for vengeance. It is organized and regimented theft, and I, for one, will hail the day when all types of this exploitation of the poor shall be driven from this land. America in its humanity and its progress has crossed the bridge that tolerates the ilk of the loan shark.

Administrator of O. P. A. Delivers Address to Iowa Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on June 2, the Honorable Chester Bowles delivered an address in Des Moines, Iowa, which discusses the role of the farmer in the years to come. Mr. Bowles draws on the age-old principle of Biblical wisdom as evidenced by Joseph and his farsighted policies of many years ago, to show that things that were fundamental then are still highly applicable today.

Because of the earthy wisdom contained in Mr. Bowles' speech, which is particularly addressed to the farmers in respect to their post-war duties and problems, I insert herewith a copy of his entire speech and commend it to all thoughtful persons who are now giving study to this great problem:

AS OUR FARMERS FACE THE CHALLENGE OF PEACE

As the prospects of victory grow brighter, people all over the country are thinking more and more of the conditions and problems which we will face after the war. Whether it be the dairyman in my own State of Connecticut, or the Texas cattleman, the Seattle shipyard worker, or the small businessman of New York City, they all ask the same questions. Wil there be work and prosperity when the guns are silenced, when the soldiers return home? What do we need to do to maintain the same level of prosperity and peace as we have had during these tense years of war?

As Price Administrator I hear as much of this questioning as anyone and possibly from a wider variety of sources. For the simple reason that our economy runs on a system of prices, a man in my job has a unique opportunity to learn at first hand what men and women of every economic group—whether on the farm or in the factory or in the home—are thinking, what they are hoping for, what they fear, and what plans they are making for the future.

What I have to say today about the challenge of peace, has in considerable degree, been shaped by my experience in office. It represents, however, purely my own personal views. I offer them in full realization that they are only gropings toward an answer, not the final answer itself. This is too vast and strange a field for any man or any group accurately to call the turn.

No one asks these questions about the future with greater anxiety than the farmers and the businessmen like yourselves whose prosperity is so directly identified with the prosperity of our farms. This anxiety is easy to understand. In the past, the farmers have taken a beating at the end of every war.

They took a beating after the Revolutionary War, after the War of 1812, after the Civil War, and after the last war. The beating they took after the last war is still so fresh in all of our minds that there is little need to dig up the statistics about the crash of farm prices and farm income which took place in 1920 and 1921, or to retell the story of the terrible toll of foreclosures and country-bank failures which followed the collapse of farm prices. We know only too well that the post-war farm collapse in the early twenties left its mark on our farmers for nearly a generation.

Of course, other groups have suffered during the post-war depressions. But their suffering has never proved quite as prolonged as that inflicted upon our farmers. It was for this reason that farsighted farm leaders and the leaders of public policy have sought from the outset of this war to direct the war program so as to minimize, as far as possible, the dangers our farmers will face when the war is finally won.

If you study the congressional debates in the summer of 1941 prior to the passage of the Emergency Price Control Act, you will see that one of the most important objectives of that legislation was to prevent post-war collapse. To be sure, the immediate purposes of wartime stabilization are to avoid skyrocketing prices and rents which would impose cruel suffering on most of our people, to protect the value of our savings and our insurance, and to secure some semblance of equality of sacrifice for the war effort. But looking beyond the war, the stabilization program was designed to prevent the ruinous deflation or collapse of prices which has in the past inevitably followed every price inflation.

Because the farmer takes such a beating in periods of deflation—since he produces raw materials and since he is never able to control his production as easily as the industrialist—the Congress and the executive agencies of the Government have rightly felt that the steps taken to maintain a stable economy during the war represent an enormous contribution toward meeting the farmer's post-war problems.

In the Economic Stabilization Act of October 1942, our Government took a further step to help insure post-war farm prosperity. It pledged itself to support prices of many crops at 90 percent of parity for 2 years after the end of the war. This, it seems to me, was an act of great wisdom and far-reaching importance. But I think you will agree that these measures by themselves—the wartime control of inflation and the commitment to hold up farm prices after the war—are not enough to solve our post-war farm problems. They have made the solution possible, but the actual solution still remains to be achieved.

If we had allowed farm prices and industrial prices to go through the roof, our economic structure would be headed for catastrophe after the armistice—a catastrophe that would pull down our farmers, our industrial workers, and our businessmen alike into general ruin. If we had allowed prices to go through the roof, our post-war task would have been to pick up the maimed and the mangled parts of our economy and somehow to piece them together again. But having stabilized our economy, we can today lay the plans to maintain the prosperity of both industry and agriculture with real hope of success.

American farmers have, as a group, today attained an unprecedented level of prosperity. I do not mean that every farmer in every part of the country has achieved this prosperity. And I am acutely aware that our farmers during the 1920's and 1930's were indeed a forgotten element in our entire economy.

During the 1920's our industrial workers, for the most part, had fairly regular employment at reasonably good wages. Most of our businessmen were making good profits. But the prosperity that came to our farmers was meager at best, and millions of them still operated under hardship conditions.

During the crash of the early 1930's all groups of our economy suffered greatly. But just consider what happened to the farmer. In 1932, here in Iowa, you still remember how hogs sold at the heartbreaking price of $2.40 and corn dropped to 12 cents. For the country as a whole the farm price of milk was $1.11. Eggs sold at 10 cents a dozen. Cotton brought less than 5 cents a pound.

When the crisis was at its peak, certain moves were finally taken by the Government to rescue the farm from complete disaster. These moves broke the back of the depression and started the farmers on the road to recovery. But the fact remains that in spite of all that was done, farm prices and farm incomes were still pitifully low in 1939. Let us not forget that in spite of everything that had been done, three-fourths of our farms in 1939 still lacked electricity. More than four-fifths still lacked running water. Adequate medical care was still lacking in many farm communities.

It was the war and only the war that brought the farmer real prosperity, the first real prosperity since the last war. Gross farm income today stands at an all-time high of almost $20,000,000,000 a year. This represents an increase of 128 percent over 1939. Net farm income has risen even more sharply. In 1943, it totaled 12.8 billion dollars of 182 percent above 1939.

Now, how has that prosperity been achieved? You will agree that we must know the answer to that question if we are to sustain real farm prosperity when the war is over. Part of the answer lies in the fact that farm prices have been brought back into balance with the prices of things that farmers buy. Part of the answer is that farm prices have been raised in relation to farm costs. But what was it that made these things possible?

The real answer lies in the almost unlimited demands of our Nation at war—demands which are backed by purchasing power which is today at all-time record levels. Today farmers are producing for the immense requirements of the armed forces and of lend-lease. And they are producing for the demand of more than 10,000,000 city breadwinners who were unemployed or worked part time in 1939, but who are working full time and overtime today—and working for good wages. There, it seems to me, lies the heart of our story. It is the prosperity in our cities that is the key to prosperity on the farms.

This simple but solid fact should dispose once and for all the false propaganda which has sought to persuade our farmers that they have a conflict of interest with labor and industry. This propaganda of dividing the Nation into conflicting groups is not only bad patriotism—it is bad economics as well. The American farmer should never forget that he can produce at a profit only if there are customers who can afford to pay prices that yield that profit. When farmers see our city workers make more money, they should rejoice because that means a greater demand for the products of their farms. Don't forget that 40 percent of the average city worker's budget is spent for food alone, and a large additional slice is spent for clothing made from farm products.

The other day I had occasion to glance at a chart tracking the movement of factory wages and the cash income of farmers over the past 30 years. I noticed that the two curves hugged one another very closely. They went up together in periods of boom and they went down together when times were hard. That chart is the best testimonial I have seen to the absolute solidarity of economic interest between the farmer and the city worker.

During the past 20 or 30 years farmers have organized to promote national policies necessary for a prosperious and sound agriculture. This, we will agree, is a healthy and proper development. But it seems to me that it would be self-defeating for our farmers to interpret farm policies and farm programs in a narrow and short-sighted fashion. To concentrate on the raising of farm prices without doing anything to raise the national income of the entire country is, in my opinion, a short-sighted policy which in the long run can never succeed. It is only through a high national income—the income that goes to all of us—that farmers can be sure of the purchasing power—the demand—which is necessary to sustain farm prices and income.

The Government has, to be sure, pledged itself to maintain a floor under many farm prices after the war. But how long could the Government maintain such a floor if industry in the cities collapsed and tens of millions of men were walking the streets in search of nonexistent jobs? In the absence of post-war industrial prosperity, the farm price floor program would be doomed to repeating the inglorious failure of the Farm Board in 1931.

We should also remember that the price floor guaranties on farm products, as written in the law, are expressed in parity terms—that is to say, in ratios of farm prices to industrial prices. If industrial prices and wages drop, parity prices drop with them. If industrial prices drop far enough, parity prices for farm crops could be so low as to break the farmer's back—even though they were at the 100-percent parity level.

The history of the past 10 years, and particularly that of the last 4 years, bears out the folly of relying exclusively on price and parity objectives to secure farm prosperity. In August 1939 before the war broke out, the index of farm-price parity stood only at 72 and farm income was quite depressed. notwithstanding all the Government programs directed to achieving price and income parity.

The explanation, it seems to me, is simple. As long as the national income as a whole was depressed, and as long as there were some ten-odd-millions of unemployed in the cities, there wasn't much money available to buy food or clothing made from farm products. And therefore all our efforts to increase farm prices were unavailing. The demand at the higher prices needed to give our farmers a proper income, just wasn't there.

On the other hand, once wartime demands restored prosperity in the cities, the parity ratio of all farm prices quickly rose and today stands at 14 percent above parity. It has been above parity now for nearly 2½ years. No lesson could be clearer than this. Bustling prosperity in the cities has not only brought farm prices into balance, but has yielded farmers the highest prosperity in our history.

In my judgment it simply isn't possible to overemphasize the community of interest of farmers, workers, and businessmen. Many of our farmers, however, are reluctant to accept it because they fail to understand the economic stresses and strains with which our industrial workers are faced.

Two generations ago most of our workers still had a father or a brother on the farm. High wages had drawn them to the city—often over the protest of their parents. When hard times came and factories closed they simply went home to the farm, and there found work to do, three square meals a day, and a sense of personal security and self-respect.

Today our industrial workers can't go back to the farm. In depression the farmer has a hard enough time of it on his own. He can't be expected to make a place for the unemployed. But the worker in the city, when he loses his job still has to meet the rent and find some means of paying his grocery and doctor bills. He must find some means of caring for his wife and children.

So it's not so hard to understand why the workers in the cities should demand and organize to get jobs and good wages and self-respect and security. Far from being frightened by the efforts of our city workers to find the economic answers to their own dilemma, our farmers should offer them their understanding and support. Wherever we live, wherever we work, we are the same people—we have the same ambitions, the same needs, the same hopes. What is good in ourselves can't be bad in the other fellow. And what is bad in the other fellow can't be good in ourselves.

What I am really saying is that our farmers, in their own interest as well as in the interest of all the rest of us, should take an active part in the development of over-all national policies looking toward the maintenance of a high national income and prosperity for the Nation as a whole. I have strong views myself on what sort of policy is called for.

I believe that depressions can and should be eliminated. I believe that through teamwork of industry, agriculture, labor, and government, the national income can be held up after the war. With over 10,000,000 soldiers and sailors back on the job, I believe it can be increased even above present levels, with markets for everything we can produce and with jobs for all who seek them.

As I see it, the essential role of government in this team is to underwrite the level of the national income and of business activity. It must therefore be prepared at all times—through public works, through adjustment of taxes and public expenditure, through stimulation of exports—to step in at the first sign of recession. And I believe that the more firmly government is committed to such a policy, the more effective the machinery it sets up to make good on its commitment, the less government will actually have to do. For I am convinced that once businessmen and farmers can invest and consumers can spend without fear of periodic waves of bankruptcy, foreclosure, and unemployment, they can and will provide a market for everything we are able to produce.

But this is not the occasion to develop these particular views. All I am trying to say is that farmers should take an active, vigorous interest in the development of such national policies. For without them our economy is doomed to continued turmoil and instability; without them all of us, farmers as well as city workers and businessmen, are doomed to a continuation of the ridiculous situation in which we have lived in the past—economic hardship and widespread unemployment in a land of unlimited resources and high-productive capacity.

There is one other issue, closely affecting our farmers, which I would like to discuss briefly, namely the need for food exports to the liberated countries both during and immediately following the war. I can think of no more important weapon than food to speed the day of victory and to lay the basis for a sound and lasting peace. I am dismayed, literally dismayed, by some of the questions—thoughtless at best—about "why should we take any food out of mouths of our own children to feed starving Europe." Believe me that kind of talk can lose battles even if it doesn't lose us the war.

In producing munitions we have not merely matched the enemy—we have swamped and overwhelmed him. This policy has not only brought us smashing victories—it has saved American soldiers' lives, no one can say how many. What is sound policy for planes and guns is sound policy for food as well.

But the real test will come when the fighting is ended. The children of Europe—and let's always remember that they are the Europeans of the future with whom our own children must live in peace or in war—will need food from us until their own continent is brought back into production. There will be those, then, who will say, "We have done enough. Let Europe fend for itself." I sincerely hope that this counsel will not prevail. I hope America will prove true to her generous traditions.

Having brought liberation through war, let us not refuse the helping hand that will lift Europe to her feet when the guns have ceased firing. This is counsel not of the heart alone but also of the head. It makes moral sense, it makes political sense, and it makes economic sense as well.

I do not want to give you the idea that I regard the maintenance of a high national income as the complete answer to the problems of the farmer. While these problems cannot be solved unless the national income is sustained, there will remain the concrete, specific problems which affect agriculture as such.

Perhaps you will agree with me that most of these specific problems hinge on removing or minimizing the terrific risks which affect agricultural production. I don't have to tell you people here in Des Moines that farming is one of the most hazardous of all economic activities. Although the farmer works harder than most other people, his long hours are no guaranty of reward. Accidents of unfavorable weather, variations of rainfall, can destroy the results of the hardest work and the most careful planning. Moreover, while the farmer frequently suffers from bad weather, he can suffer as much from unusually good weather. Bad weather destroys his crops, but unusually good weather may destroy his income by creating such a glut as to force prices down below the cost of production.

Of course, we can't control the weather. But we can control the economic results of the weather. We can carry over surpluses to time of scarcity, thereby helping both the producer on the farm and the consumer in the city. This is the principle of the ever-normal granary, which was worked out on an experimental basis in the late thirties, and which, I believe, should be extended and improved after the war.

The principle is as old as the Bible. It is the story of Joseph with his 7 fat years and 7 lean years. It is a pity that we had to wait so long before putting this piece of Biblical wisdom into operation for the protection of our farmers, and indeed for the protection of all of us. I rea ize that here in Iowa farmers get good crops practically every year, but other parts of the country are not so fortunate. And you can't have prosperity in Iowa if there is depression in Florida or Texas or California.

The ever-normal granary was designed to remove some of the risks of farmers as a group. But it obviously does not remove the risks as they affect the individual farmer. When crops are destroyed by drought or storm, the individual farmer can get no protection from the ever-normal granary. Protection to the individual farmer can be secured only through the insurance principle.

I deeply believe in crop insurance, just as I believe in insurance for business and for labor and for all of us. There are few things that have contributed more to our economic well-being and to our peace of mind and to the strength of our entire social fabric than the insurance principle. Congress, a year ago, refused an appropriation which called for the application of the insurance principle to agriculture. I sincerely hope that this action will be reversed. It seems to me that the farmer is entitled to be protected through insurance against the risk of weather destroying his income, at least to the same extent that the industrial worker is already protected against accidents which destroy his ability to work or against unemployment which cuts off his wages.

Another risk factor which I believe needs to be removed in the immediate post-war period is that resulting from the seasonal character of farm production and farm marketing. During periods when many crops are harvested and thrown on the market prices are depressed and consumption is abnormally stimulated. During off-season months, on the other hand, prices are high, supplies are scarce, and consumption is abnormally contracted.

It is the old fable of the grasshopper and the ant. The ant is wise enough to realize that the abundance of food in the summer months should not be recklessly consumed, but should be stored away for the bleak winter months. Strange as it may seem, we as a Nation have tended through our marketing habits, to imitate the grasshopper instead of going to the ant for wisdom. Obviously, it is to the advantage both of the farm producer and the city consumer to regularize our marketing of farm products and our consumption of seasonal crops.

The basis of such a policy has already been developed in the price support and purchasing programs instituted by the Department of Agriculture. But these programs, I believe, should be extended after the war and should take as their objective steadier farm prices and more even consumption of all farm products the whole year around. There is no reason why, with the range of crop seasons we have in this country, with rapid development of modern methods of preserving and storing food, and with governmentally supported food marketing arrangements, seasonal fluctuations in farm prices could not be largely ironed out. The farmer could then have the benefit of stable prices, while the consumer would be assured of adequate supplies of all kinds of food the whole year around.

Let me develop for a moment what I have said about the preserving and storing of foods. During the war, vast technological progress has been made which awaits only the release of materials and facilities to blossom into a great new industry. I believe we will see in the near future quick freezing and storage equipment in every community, available to every farmer. This equipment will go a long way toward preventing the heartbreaking gluts that every farmer knows. It will also bring to the consumer, in all seasons of the year, foods almost as fresh as the day they came from the field. And just consider the jobs that will be created in making the equipment, constructing the plants, and maintaining and operating them.

I may say in this connection that, to the extent that we decrease seasonal price fluctuations, I believe we shall remove a considerable source of friction between the farmer and the middleman. It is when prices fluctuate sharply that the farmer feels he is being taken advantage of by the middleman. Actually, it is not the middleman who personally takes advantage of him, but the anarchy of current marketing arrangements.

In addition to insuring against the risks and ironing out the price and supply fluctuations which affect all farmers, we must, after the war, pay special attention to the risks and handicaps which affect the small farmers. The neglect of the small farmers—the sharecroppers, the tenant farmers, and the poorly equipped small owner farmers—is a shocking commentary on our past history. It is shocking because we all know that the family farms are the backbone of our democracy, just as they are of any democracy.

Some thoughtless and cynical people used to say that there was no use fighting for the cause of the family farm—that there is an inevitable trend toward concentration of farm ownership and mass farm production. We know today that this is not so. With the present production trends away from staple crops and toward flexible diversified farming, there are no real obstacles to the survival and the prosperity of family farms. On the contrary, the basic agricultural trends seem to be favorable to their prosperity.

But in order to flourish, the family farm must be given the help of sympathetic public policies. Credit must be extended on terms adapted to farm needs. The family farm must have access to the latest scientific farm knowledge. It must have access to electric power, without which it is not possible to secure the advantages of modern technology. It must be given the protection of well planned marketing arrangements set up through farm group cooperation, assisted where necessary by the Government.

One of the most encouraging trends of the past 10 or 15 years has been the growth of cooperatives and the work they have done for the farmer. Equally encouraging have been the loan and grant programs of the Farm Security Administration and the tenant purchase program of the Bankhead Act. Through these measures we have made a good start in fighting the problem of farm poverty. But we have a great distance to go. How far we have to go is indicated by the fact that even today, in full war prosperity, the lowest third of our farmers have to subsist on a pitifully small income. The gross annual income of this lowest third, including Government payments and the value of their home-used produce, still averages only $300 a year per farm. Even in this era of wartime prosperity, that's all the money they have to pay their farming costs and to meet the living expenses of their families.

Obviously, farm families living on this scale provide a slim market for cars, building materials, refrigerators, vacuum cleaners, or furniture. If their income is raised, as it must be, the added purchasing power would provide more employment in our cities, as well as more business for the country merchants. This increased income would eventually be returned to the farms in the form of a higher and more sustained demand for farm products.

The end of the war is going to present us with both a challenge and an opportunity to take a long stride in strengthening the position of family farming. The challenge will come from those of our veterans who will want to build for themselves on the land. The opportunity will be provided by the huge public holdings of land acquired in connection with Army camps, proving grounds, and for other wartime uses. It would be the best kind of statesmanship to see to it that this public land did not go to large holders but instead was reserved for veterans and offered to them on generous terms. With the loans which the pending G. I. bill would authorize the veterans could purchase farm machinery and equipment and get off to a good start.

You will have noted, I am sure, that most of the points which I have brought forward in my discussion here today are not essentially new. All the specific farm programs I have mentioned have either been tried or are in the process of being tried. I have simply asked that they be prosecuted with more vigor and more faith.

The one additional point that I have attempted to emphasize is the vital need of an aggressive program immediately after the armistice to raise and maintain the overall national income—the income that goes to all of us. Let me repeat that without that high level of national income, there can be no real solution to our farmers' problem.

It seems to me that this has been the one factor missing in our pre-war plans to create increased security and incomes for our farmers. The contrast between our pre-war and wartime experience has shown that. In peacetime, when we used the specific farm remedies that I have described without the general tonic of a high national income, we succeeded only in removing the acute distress that prevailed in 1932. We did not by any means restore American agriculture to vigorous health. In wartime, on the other hand, when the demands of our war economy forced us to put all our manpower to work and to produce a high national income, then and then only did we achieve a high level of farm prosperity.

In a word, the war has shown that our farmers need more than a mere opportunity to share equitably in the national income, however low that income may be. They need an opportunity to get their fair share of the high national income which we can so easily produce when we are all working.

It is in the light of this lesson, I believe, that we must plan for post-war agriculture. We must revise our traditional farm slogans and objectives. We dare not go back to restricting farm production to match the restriction of industrial output. We must go forward to expanded production on farm and in factory alike. And above all we must remember that this job of creating national prosperity belongs to all of us, and that no one group can hope to succeed without the others.

After the war is over our task should be clear. All of us, farmers, city workers, and businessmen, must stop fighting each other for a frugal share of national economic scarcity. Together, side by side, we must work to create and to share the national wealth and prosperity which our farms and our factories are so fully capable of producing.

Regulatory and Tax Problems of Air Transportation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I propose for insertion in the RECORD an address by Mr. Oswald Ryan, member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, given before the Boston Aeronautical Association on May 22, 1944. In this statement Mr. Ryan discusses the extremely difficult problems involved in any attempt to impose State regulation upon air transportation and the dangers to the air transport industry which may result from the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Northwest Airlines, Inc., against the State of Minnesota. Mr. Ryan takes the position that air transportation should be regulated exclusively by the Federal Government and that the matter of burdensome multiple taxation upon air lines should be dealt with by congressional action.

The address follows:

It seems certain that air transportation is destined for great and rapid development in the post-war period. During the decade of the 1930's the volume of civil air transportation doubled every 2 years. America's entry into the war halted this growth temporarily. The air transport industry went to war completely and effectively. Within 6 months after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor the greater part of the air transport facilities, equipment, and personnel was in the armed services. The remainder was called upon to handle a huge flow of wartime traffic which blocked off all ordinary civilian travel.

War temporarily halted all transportation over the air lines excepting that of the most urgent character. But it did not halt the growing civilian demand for such transportation. And it contributed greatly to aircraft design, the art of air navigation, and other developments which will speed the growth of post-war air transportation. So, when victory comes it seems certain that civil air transportation will resume growth at a greatly accelerated pace.

Boston is in a particularly favorable position to participate in this development. With the single exception of the Nation's Capital, Boston was, prior to the war, the leading air transport city of the United States in proportion to its population. During 1941 one air traveler embarked or debarked at Boston for each three and one-half persons in its population. More air passengers normally travel between New York and Boston than between any other two cities in the world.

Air traffic surveys conducted by the Civil Aeronautics Board indicate that immediately prior to the present war the domestic air travel in and out of the Boston airport had reached a level of approximately 270,000 passengers a year. On the basis of the more conservative estimates of air traffic growth, this figure should be trebled during the first decade after the war.

Boston is, of course, the air traffic center for all New England. It is the central terminal for air traffic between New England and all other parts of the United States. Also, it is the logical central terminal for all air traffic which may be interchanged between New England and all transocean areas.

Boston stands squarely astride all the great circle routes between the population centers of the United States and those of the European-Mediterranean areas. Of all the great American cities Boston lies the shortest distance from the entire European and West African coasts. It shares with other Atlantic seaboard points the advantage of equal distance to Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires and other populous centers of South America. And, strange as it may seem, the distance from Boston to the Orient by air is less than it is from most of our other great cities. We have all grown accustomed to having our notions of geography upset by those great circle maps which have been appearing of late. But it may surprise many of you to learn that the great circle distance by air between Boston and Calcutta is only 8,000 miles substantially the same as the great circle distance between San Francisco and Calcutta.

Entirely aside from its strategic geographic location, with respect to international air transportation Boston has a great additional advantage in being the center of one of the most travel-minded regions in the world. New England's land area is only 2.2 percent of the total land area of the United States. Its population is 6.4 percent of the Nation's population and its income as measured by Federal tax collections comprises 8.1 percent of the Nation's income. However, the share of trans-Atlantic travel contributed by New England has been historically 12 percent of the national total.

New England provided the origin or destination for approximately 50,000 first- and cabin-class overseas travelers annually prior to the war. It is estimated that within the next few years overseas air transportation will capture one-half of the historic sea-borne first- and cabin-class passengers and that with the addition of new travel which will be generated overseas air travel within a few years will equal the historic sea travel. On a basis of these estimates Boston should serve as the terminal for some 50,000 air passengers annually traveling to or arriving from overseas areas.

And this calls to mind also the importance of a new factor in our national economy which has not heretofore been rated as a factor of primary importance in the minds of most Americans. I refer to the significance of our foreign trade and the need for its maximum expansion.

I come from a section of the United States where public opinion upon this question of our foreign trade is, I think, more typical of the general American attitude than is the attitude of the people of the Atlantic seaboard. The great majority of our people in the past, particularly those living in the interior, have not been foreign-trade-minded.

We have now reached the time when our foreign trade and the development of foreign markets became a matter of greater concern to our national economy and the well-being of our people than ever before. We shall not be able to depend in the future to the extent that we have in the past upon our domestic market to solve our economic problems. One of the most important economic facts of our time has been the enormous productivity of American industry and agriculture, and that productive capacity is being further multiplied by the extraordinary technical improvements and additional plant capacity born of the present war.

Now, if we are to keep our great industrial machine operating, we must either find foreign markets or we must dismantle a large part of that capacity. Thus, the expansion of our foreign trade and commerce will become more essential than ever before to the absorption of a substantial part of the products of our factories, mills, and farms and to the useful employment of millions of Americans for whom places must be found in our national economy.

I should like to call your attention now to another question which vitally concerns the future development of air transportation in the domestic field. That is the question whether air transportation in the United States shall develop under the regulatory control of the National Government or whether it shall be subjected to the divided control of the Federal Government and the 48 States. As a lawyer engaged for more than two decades in the field of public utility and transportation law, I was witness to the epoch-making conflict between the Federal Government and the States in the regulation of public utilities and rail transportation. I saw two systems of regulation—one Federal and one State—grow up side by side, and I saw the great public-service industries that were regulated by them many times burdened by wasteful duplication of regulatory activity and by interminable conflict and litigation over jurisdictional conflicts. I do not want to see such a fate befall air transportation in this country.

What is the sound approach to this question of Federal or State control of air transportation? The approach quite generally has been a legal approach. It has been involved in a controversy over the question whether the Federal Government has the right under the Constitution to exercise the regulatory power or whether the Constitution reserves to the State power over the subject. But this question of air transportation is one of deep concern to the people of this Nation, and I would rather see the question settled not upon the basis of legalism and controversy over a constitutional doctrine, but upon the simple basis of what is best for the people of the State and Nation. If the facts show that air transportation is local in character and can best be regulated by both the State and the Federal Government, then by all means let us have it that way. If, on the other hand, air transportation is found to be inherently national and not local in character, then both common sense and sound policy call for a uniform regulation by national action.

I do not know of any sounder approach to this question of Federal or State jurisdiction than that which was expressed by one of the great Justices of this Nation in handing down the opinion of the high Court in a celebrated case. It was the so-called migratory bird case in which the State of Missouri challenged an act of Congress in the Supreme Court of the United States as an unconstitutional interference with the rights of the States as they are reserved by the tenth amendment. The tenth amendment, you will recall, declares that those powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the respective States. Missouri contended that that amendment reserved the regulatory power to the State, and Justice Holmes in his opinion said: "We must consider what this country has become in deciding what that amendment has reserved."

Now, if we consider what this country has become in the field of aviation in deciding the question of State regulation of air transportation, we shall be able to reach a sound conclusion as to the best governmental policy. We shall find that air transportation has been national rather than local in character. By reason of its great speed and mobility and the fact that it was not limited by mountain barriers or the barriers of oceans air transportation has not been local in operation. There are probably not more than five States in the Union today which cannot be traversed in a couple of hours' flying time. The average passenger trip by air is nearly 400 miles in length, while the average passenger trip by rail is less than 50 miles. Thus air transportation is a long-distance transportation. That is one reason why there is not today a single air line operating whose operations are confined to a single State.

So you see air transportation by its very nature is national in character and it will be more so in the post-war period which is ahead of us.

I submit that air transportation is a national problem and requires a single unified national regulation. And I predict that if this new transportation is to be subjected to the varying regulations of 49 different governments, we shall not be able to achieve that air transport development in the future which this war has proved to be so essential to our national security. For the economic burdens which might be expected from such multiple regulation could be so great as to effectively prevent the essential progress of this important public-service industry.

The economic burden of multiple regulation is not the only potential barrier to air-transport development in the post-war future. There are also those economic barriers that flow from the unwise exercise of the State taxing power. We have had one example of that recently in a case which has within the past week been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. The State of Minnesota imposed a tangible personal property tax on the entire fleet of plans operated by Northwest Airlines in its service from the Pacific Northwest to the city of Chicago. This tax was laid notwithstanding the fact that Northwest Airlines' planes were constantly moving from one State to another, notwithstanding the fact that only a part of the company's air fleet was ever in the State of Minnesota at one time and notwithstanding the fact that Northwest Airlines had paid a proportionate tax on the same planes in all the other States through which the company operates. In spite of these facts the Supreme Court of Minnesota upheld the power of the State to impose the tax in question, and the Supreme Court of the United States has now, by a five to four decision also upheld the right of the State to impose the tax.

Now there can be no question of the right of Minnesota to lay an equitable tax upon Northwest Airlines. But Minnesota in this instance laid a full tax upon the entire airline fleet, a part of which had likewise been taxed in the six other States through which the planes were flown in interstate commerce.

The majority in the Supreme Court upheld the power of Minnesota to assess the tax upon the entire fleet of the airline, but refused to decide the question whether the other States through which the airline operated these planes had the right to tax any part of the fleet, saying that this question was not before the court. Justice Jackson concurred in the majority decision but thought the court should have gone further and held that Minnesota's right to tax the fleet was exclusive. The Chief Justice dissented from the majority decision on the ground that the taxing of Northwest Airlines' fleet for their full value by Minnesota constituted an unconstitutional burden upon interstate commerce.

The Minnesota decision leaves unsettled the question of burdensome multiple taxation. It is, nevertheless, as significant decision. The majority decision makes reference to the power of Congress to control the taxation of interstate airlines. Justice Jackson, in a concurring opinion, points to the power of Congress to control this field of taxation, adding that Congress has not exercised its power to do so. Justice Black in a separate opinion says that "these problems call for congressional consideration and action." Thus, the various opinions strongly suggest that Congress can supply the answer to a problem which, unless it is taken under control, may create a situation which many feel will make it impossible for our airlines to survive economically.

May God Bless Them

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. McKENZIE

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

MAY GOD BLESS THEM

The time for speculation is over now. The waiting, the anxious suspense, the taut expectancy of the armed young men who for so long have been poised to strike—all that is at an end. For though they constitute but the opening phase, the landings of our British, Canadian, and American forces in France herald with thunder and flame the invasion of western Europe, the great, the terrible, the awe-inspiring event which for the past 4 years—ever since the surrender of Pétain—has been anticipated by the free world as the indispensable precondition of liberation from one of the blackest tyrannies in history.

The days ahead—to be marked perhaps by other landings elsewhere—will be critical ones. The task given our Allied forces—men fighting at sea, men winging through the air, men parachuting through the skies, men storming ashore and reducing fixed fortifications—call for far more than the courage it takes to establish beachheads. It calls for the resolution, the fortitude, the sacrifice, and the skilled leadership required to beat back the violent counterattacks of our desperate enemy. And as we know from Salerno and Anzio, these may not come for the next 2 or 3 weeks, and not until they do come, and are surmounted, will it be safe to say that success has been achieved.

Here on the home front, moreover, we must steel ourselves to the possibility that the casualties will be heavier than those of any battle heretofore fought by Americans. For as President Roosevelt declared last night, "victory still lies some distance ahead," and the winning of it "will be tough and it will be costly." But as he also made clear, it will be surely won. We can be confident of that. Four years of painstaking planning, begun almost at the time of Dunkerque, are in back of this project. Thousands of ships, scores of thousands of planes, millions of superbly trained men are in back of it. We outnumber and excel the enemy in virtually every human and matériel category, and our invading forces enter the battle fresh, whereas Hitler's legions are half numb with the battering they have received in the East and the South, and half mesmerized with the prospect of what the Red Army is now likely to do in synchronization with our tremendous assault in the West.

Over and above all this, there are the oppressed millions of Europe. This is their day as much as it is ours; and in some respects even more so, for upon the success of our Allied troops depends the end of the night that has been upon them for four long years. Now they can look forward to being freed and of having their chance, as President Roosevelt has just said of Italy, to work with us toward a new happiness and a new era in which "no one city and no one race will be able to control the whole of the world."

There is not much that any of us here can say or do now to change the course of events that have been set in motion in France under the supreme command of our own General Eisenhower and his brilliant British deputy, General Montgomery. The die has been cast. With confidence in the outcome, it remains for us at home merely to do our jobs better than ever before, to maintain a sense of calm and perspective, and to say with President Roosevelt of those engaged in this fateful struggle, "May God bless them and watch over them and over all our gallant fighting men."

The President's Prayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 7 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a poem entitled "Our President's Prayer Dismantles Despair," written by Mr. Horace C. Carlisle.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR PRESIDENT'S PRAYER DISMANTLES DESPAIR

O dear God, we pray Thee, guide
Our brave sons, the Nation's pride—
This day, they have set upon
Daring tasks that must be done,
'Neath the Stars and Stripes unfurled,
To preserve our Father's world.

Lead them straight and lead them true,
In the tasks they're sent to do—
Thine own blessing will they need,
For their road is rough indeed—
And the enemy is strong—
And the battle's fierce and long.

Not for conquest is our prayer,
But for Freedom, everywhere,
Have we sent our sons afar,
To end this world-wrecking war,
Whose despotic tyrants hate
All that's right and truly great.

Our brave sons, for whom we yearn,
Some of them will not return—
Father, bear them in Thine arms
Past the deadline of alarms—
To the end, peace may be won,
Hear our prayer, "Thy will be done."

In these times of near-despair,
We set no one day for prayer,
But for those that sacrifice
All, for us, our prayers arise
Every hour of every day—
O God, hear us when we pray.

O dear God, the strength renew
Of our sons, while passing through These baptisms, yea, of blood
For the sake of humanhood—
Let our hearts be stout and brave
Till they win the peace we crave.

Give us faith, O God, in Thee,
That our sons, across the sea,
May have faith, for this crusade,
As they, in Thy strength, invade
These lands dominated by Those whose mandates we defy.

With Thy blessings, we can't fail—
In Thy strength, we shall prevail—
We are trusting Thee to lead,
In this war 'gainst crushing greed—
Grant, Lord, that we may not cease
Fighting, till we've won the peace.

General Mihailovich's Statement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN LESINSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement of General Mihailovich, to the Allied public:

I deny with indignation all news of the German and Quisling propaganda affirming the collaboration of some units under my command with the occupator and Quisling troops fighting against the Partisans. I energetically protest against these lies.

Whoever knows at all the circumstances in which the Yugoslav Army was created will easily understand that this collaboration is a repugnant and stupid fiction. This army, formed in the spirit of resistance to the occupator and which has been engaged in fighting against his forces for 3 full years, suffering and inflicting great losses, whose friends, sympathizers, and collaborators have been and are being persecuted, arrested, tortured, and killed—this army would fall apart upon the slightest attempt of collaboration with the occupator and his servants. Anyone having a different opinion does not know the spirit of our Yugoslav Army.

If this truth is understood with difficulty by some of our friends in the Allied countries, it is very well known to the Germans and Quislings in Belgrade as well as in Zagreb and Ljubljana. It is because they know that the tactics of collaboration would disrupt the Yugoslav Army, that enemy propaganda does not cease repeating that collaboration exists, now of National Chetniks, now of Serbian Chetniks, with the German and Quisling troops.

German and Quisling propaganda are very anxious to draw advantage both from the confusion caused in our people by Allied propaganda in favor of the partisans, and from the strong animadversion, especially of the Serbian people for this movement which undoubtedly represents a small minority of the Nation and which undoubtedly is preparing a dictatorship of this minority, which our people will not have at any cost. Both the Germans and Quislings hope that in case of disruption of the Yugoslav Army the greater part of its units would join the Quisling Nedich, who wishes to be considered by the Serbian people as their leader against the partisans and against the London radio propaganda in favor of this movement. We therefore find with amazement that both the Allied and enemy propaganda, each in its own way and for its own particular reasons and aims, are working on the disruptance of our military organization and the breaking up of its spirit and the fundamental conceptions on which it is based, and all this to the advantage of our mutual enemy, the Germans.

Enemy and Allied propaganda has not succeeded nor will succeed to disrupt the unity of our heroic army. But this propaganda has induced many unorganized and disappointed men to join the Quisling ranks, because they had lived through and survived partisan methods. These men are joined by partisans who are surrendering either to the Quislings or to the Germans. With such units which are being formed here and there, and which often give themselves the name of Chetniks, the Yugoslav Army under my command has no relations whatsoever nor has ever had.

We are fully conscious of our duty both to our people and to their future as well as to our great allies. That is why we are fighting against the German and Bulgarian troops of occupation. We are fighting against the Quislings from Belgrade and against the Quislings from Zagreb and Ljubljana. But we are also fighting in self-defense against the Partisans who are attacking us on the entire territory of our country, whenever and wherever they can seize the opportunity to do so. The civil war, raging in our country under the enemy occupation, causing terrific devastation beside that caused and still being caused by the occupators and their collaborators, especially the Croatian Ustashis, has been provoked by the Partisans movement. After a short collaboration in the autumn of 1941-42, they abandoned the common front of resistance and attacked our units from the rear with the intention of liquidating us once and for all. And what the Partisans began then, they have never ceased doing, in this year more than ever. There is no propaganda that can do away with this truth and force the democratic elements of our people, namely at least nine-tenths, to accept and endure the dictatorship of a movement of violence, because it is directed against their conception of life.

If the allied public wishes to have precise information of the actual state of affairs in our country, it would be advisable for a certain number of American correspondents to come to my general headquarters where they would be cordially received and enabled to see everything, to go everywhere and to send reports as they wish.

Invasion Day Prayer for Victory and Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS F. BURCHILL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. BURCHILL of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following invasion day prayer for victory and peace by the Most Reverend Francis Spellman, Catholic bishop of the city of New York:

O God, Father of America:
Thou hast formed this union of States, sealing it with high destiny,
That our Nation be light to all peoples in their dark despair,
Life to all peoples in their fear of death,
Love to all peoples under their yoke of hate.
For this destiny Thou dost teach us to fly as the eagle,
Girding us with lightning and thunder,
Enriching us with treasures in field and fold.

O God, bless America with Thy shielding graces,
Lest we become a Nation without light, our eyes turned from Thee,
A Nation without life, our souls sundered from Thee,
A Nation without love, our hearts forgetting Thee.

O God, give us victory that is just, merciful and wise,
For Thou hast chosen America to be the soul of Thy justice,
The medium of Thy mercy,
The instrument of Thy wisdom.
Let all nations know that our justice comes from Thy spirit,
Our mercy from Thy heart,
Our wisdom from Thy mind,
Our victory from Thy strength.

Bless us, O God, with manifold graces,
To give freely of what we have,
To give fully of what we are,
In victory to give ourselves alone to Thee.

O God, the Father of all nations:
Hear our prayer for our united peoples,
Grant guidance to our leaders, protection to our sons,
And teach all of us Thy way of life in good will and peace.

Liberate the Jewish Victims of Hitler Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include herewith a copy of a letter I addressed President Roosevelt yesterday urging the establishment of a war-refugee camp in the United States where refugees of the war might find sanctuary, at least for the duration of the present struggle. I call the attention of the House to this problem with the confidence that many of my colleagues will join with me in urging this humanitarian action by President Roosevelt. My letter is as follows:

JUNE 6, 1944.

President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT: In this hour of the liberation of the Continent of Europe from the ravaging hand of Hitler and Hitlerism, I join with all Americans in the expression of the deepest appreciation for your leadership in this most critical period in the life of our Nation.

It seems fitting to me that on this significant day I should address you about the problem of the Jewish people now prisoners in Hitler Europe. For on this day the signal for the struggle for their liberation was given. Now at last it is possible for America to offer the long-oppressed Jewish people the aid and succor we have long been prevented from giving them because of the conquest of Europe by Hitler.

As you know there is the prospect that in the wake of the successful invasion of Europe by the gallant men of the United Nations armed forces, there will be tens of thousands of Jewish war refugees from every section of Europe, who have hitherto been ruthlessly uprooted from their homes. The long period of famine and oppression experienced by these people under Hitler makes it imperative that America extend to them a helping hand. They were the first to feel the heel of Hitler tyranny and should be the first to be freed from Nazi oppression.

Because I know full well that you share my sentiments in this regard, I am writing to urge that you direct the War Refugee Board to establish in the United States a refugee rescue camp or "free port" where these refugees may find sanctuary from the horrors of war at least for its duration. By this practical step we may save the lives of thousands of refugees, who might otherwise perish. May I further urge that this problem be presented to others of the United Nations to the end that such refugee rescue camps may be established elsewhere and to the end that aid in the transit of the refugees to America be afforded.

It is my fervent prayer that our first act of mercy in liberated Europe may be extended to the Jewish people; first victims of Hitlerite slavery.

Sincerely,

VITO MARCANTONIO.

Report of Extension Work in Gasconade County, Mo.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 1, 1944

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a report of the agricultural extension work in Gasconade County, Mo., for 1943, as follows:

REPORT OF EXTENSION WORK IN GASCONADE COUNTY

Ganconade County farm families responded to the Nation's need for more beef, pork, poultry and eggs, dairy and other food products in 1943, despite handicaps such as less labor, less machinery, floods, and other production problems. One thousand four hundred and twenty, or nearly 90 percent of the farm families in the county received assistance from the Agricultural Extension Program in solving these wartime problems.

Five hundred and four volunteer local leaders devoted 1,816 days of their time in helping their neighbors in producing and conserving more food, making their own clothing, keeping better informed, using more efficient farm and home practices, and contributed to other war activities such as bond sales, scrap drives, etc.

One hundred and sixty-eight homemakers and 4-H girls acting as canning aides assisted with a county-wide food preservation and conservation program.

Three hundred women and 4-H girls received assistance from 60 clothing and home management leaders trained in converting old garments and new materials into useful clothing and furnishings for their homes.

Seventy-five farmers were provided with 90 farm workers through the farm-labor program. In addition, 100 townspeople assisted with the havesting of crops.

Three hundred and seventy-four 4-H boys and girls were mobilized for service with the assistance of 75 men and women leaders. Eighty and six-tenths percent completed production and other projects.

Farmers continued to conserve their soil with 997 farmers using 12,000 tons of lime, 34 farmers terracing 225 acres of cropland and 406 farmers planting 5,000 acres of crops on the contour. Five thousand trees were planted for erosion control.

The County Soil Improvement Association, composed of over 200 members, contributed to the war-food program by providing the limestone, lime spreaders, terracing, and contour equipment.

More than 600 farmers used supplemental pastures to increase their livestock production. Henry W. Meyer of Owensville reports that 33 acres of small-grain lespedeza pasture produced 12,000 pounds of beef on his farm.

All 16 home economics clubs in Gasconade County planned Victory programs for the entire year. Emphasis was placed on better wartime nutrition, clothing extension, home improvement, and family health problems. Four new clubs were organized during the year.

Two hundred and twenty 4-H members, leaders, parents, and friends attended two county round-ups at Hermann and Owensville. Twenty-two county awards were received when 40 persons attended the district 4-H round-up at Jefferson City. Five hundred and fifty attended county-wide programs during National 4-H Achievement and Reorganization Week, in Gasconade County.

Seventy farmers improved their quality of livestock through the use of pure-bred breeding stock. Nearly 2,000 pounds of wool were added to the wool clip by dipping 1,000 sheep.

Ninety share-the-meat leaders trained and assisted 2,700 families who cooperated with this program. Ninety-one leaders assisted their neighbors with planning, preparing, and serving wartime meals.

Thirty-two child development and health leaders aided 624 families in using wartime measures to protect family health and build up morale.

Fifty-eight county women received the benefifts of home study through enrollment in the State extension course, Helps for Mother.

Lumber dealers cooperated by providing labor-saving equipment, such as hog houses, hog feeders, range shelters, and poultry feeders. The machinery dealers also cooperated with the program to encourage machinery repairing during the winter months.

One hundred and sixty-nine club members, parents, and leaders observed 4-H mobilization week by attending a county-wide rally in Owensville, February 9. Food production and conservation projects were emphasized.

Over 600 farmers used outlook information as a basis for planning their livestock and crop production.

Four hundred farmers were assisted with their income-tax reports by the county extension agent and leaders trained by the agent.

One hundred and sixty-two farm homes were checked for fire hazards during fire-prevention week. Sixteen community meetings were held to discuss fire hazards, through the cooperation of the Extension Service and farm forester.

Nearly 200 farmers attended meetings designed to assist them in the preserving of their metal roofs. Material for the demonstrations was provided by the American Zinc Institute.

Over 500 persons attended the mobilization-day program held in January, and 240 farm men and women representing each school district in the county attended the annual soils and crops conferences held in Owensville and Hermann.

Mr. Speaker, this exceptional record was made under Mr. C. E. Klingner and Miss Myrtle G. Gohike, extension agent and home demonstration agent, respectively, of Gasconade County. It is a record of accomplishment equaled in few counties in the Nation and necessarily reflects in its bare statistical summaries only a small part of the great advantages accruing to the farmers of the county and through them to the businessmen of the county and adjoining communities.

The report is submitted through the cooperation of Mr. Benjamin Held, of Morrison, Mo., a member of the extension board of Gasconade County. The results secured in Gasconade County are typical of the work of the Extension Service throughout the State.

Graduation Exercises at West Point

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Lt. Gen. Brehon Somervell at West Point, N. Y., on June 6, 1944:

When you came to West Point, when you entered the Military Academy, this Nation was still at peace. But it was a restless peace. We had begun earnestly and seriously our preparations against war. Yet, you and all thinking men knew that war could not indefinitely be averted. We did not want war. We strove with long patience to escape it. We went to great limits to avoid it. When war did come, striking treacherously out of the morning sky, you cadets must have chafed at having to remain behind while other men marched off to fight. I know from my own experience the impatience and the despair at having to remain here, with which you have watched the march of events.

But we must all remember that all can't go at once, that prior to actual combat there must be this long period of intensive training to fit us for the fray. Remember that training is essential to victory, and it is victory that counts.

This is an historic hour. Today these walls, these hills, the very shadows of battle monument take on a new meaning and a deeper significance. Only a few hours ago the mightiest undertaking ever attempted by our Army was launched against enemy entrenched along the shores of France. Today our forces began that grim, tough, and bloody march from the shores of the Atlantic to Berlin. Many of you will join in that march. Many of you will become a part of the sweep in the Pacific which will lead eventually to the destruction of Japan.

How much it will take to achieve victory no one can predict. Of one fact and one only may we be sure. We are going to win. Some of us have been impatient over the slowness of our start but every minute of delay was a minute devoted to preparation. We wisely chose to sacrifice speed to thoroughness.

I can tell you now that our armies in Europe have enough of everything and everything is the best obtainable.

The mass of power of American genius and American production is in the hands of our troops. They have more guns and better guns, more ammunition and better ammunition, more tanks and better tanks, more planes and better planes, more bombs and better bombs than our enemies. The overwhelming weight of firepower is in our hands. To that add leadership and the result will be victory. We do have that leadership. We cannot fail.

On all fronts you will need all of the stamina, moral and physical, with which you are endowed and all of the knowledge which you have acquired here. Paramount among the qualities which you must display in the role which falls to your lot is what we call leadership. It has long been the tradition of West Point that the men who came from here are leaders of men. I want to talk to you about leadership, not because it is new, for you have studied it in manuals, in histories, and in the biographies of the great. This place is steeped in the tradition of leadership. West Point has furnished leaders in every business and profession. But now, as you are leaving to take your places in the field, it is appropriate that you should be reminded of the many responsibilities that go with you in your new duties.

You are soldiers by profession and you will be officers in a citizen Army. Your fellow officers and the men who serve under you will expect that you have been well trained in military subjects. You must prove to them that you possess the art of leadership. For the two things are not the same. The first is knowledge and the other is character.

Among the men with whom you are going to live there will be both leaders and followers. You may be sure, wherever you are, that you are in what General Marshall has called "fast company." Some have developed leadership in this war, others led in civilian life before they were called to arms. They have been tested either in actual operations or at least in the field. When you join your organization, you will have to demonstrate to leaders and followers alike those qualities which inspire confidence in superiors and loyalty in subordinates. It won't be long before they will say "he has it" or "he hasn't it."

As graduates of this great institution you will be marked men from whom your fellows will expect great achievements. Among them you will find not only those younger than you and less prepared than you, but also those of more mature years, at least your peers in wisdom and experience and already tested and marked by successful achievement. Every minute will carry the ringing challenge to you to measure up to expectations. Human nature is the most fascinating, the most promising, the most powerful, but the most unpredictable element or force in the world. The extent to which you can understand it will be the measure of your success, as a military career above all others requires constant intimate handling of the human element under all conceivable conditions of stress and emotion.

To what extent leadership is inborn or acquired we do not know. In considering the quality of leadership, Marshal Foch said: "These are natural gifts in a man of genius, in a born general; in an average man such advantages may be secured by work and reflection." The mere fact that we see our fellow officers acquire leadership in operations as you have done in your cadet years is, in itself, proof that it is worth the work and reflection to which Foch referred.

Don't make the usual error of thinking that leadership depends merely upon courage, though ccurage is a first essential. Don't believe that leadership will come with a parade-ground voice and a soldierly carriage. These are only the trappings, the outer aspects, of leadership. True leadership which comes from within may be displayed at the desk as well as under fire, in civil as well as military life.

We can discern successful leadership not so much by the study of the leader as by examining the spirit of the organization he heads and the results it obtains. The spirit of a unit is a true measure of effective leadership. Given good leadership there need be no morale problems. Without it, all the training, all the equipment, all the planning of the higher command is wasted. The faith of men in their leader inspires mutual confidence which sustains the collective effort of the group. It is an indispensable attribute of command. It takes more than knowledge, more even than success, to build up that feeling of confidence. The loyalty of the Confederate soldiers to General Lee, or of the grand army to Napoleon, were not lessened by defeat. When a unit begins to identify itself by the name of its commander it has become something more than a random number in the order of battle, and in these days when the proud regiments of the Regular Army are few besides those which must make their history as they go, group pride must be built by present-day leadership. To achieve this identification of the unit with the leader, the leader must identify himself with his unit, and both with the cause. Cromwell said, "Give me men who know for what they fight and love what they know." We can add the paraphrase, "Give me men who know for whom they fight and love whom they know." The sense of mission, of purpose, of a country worth working, fighting, dying for, this is the first great element of leadership. The leader must first be inspired himself; then he can inspire others. His job is to develop this habit of thought in himself and in his men.

Second to this sense of personal mission he must put a feeling of confidence in self, a confidence that should arise in the belief of having done everything possible to prepare for any possible demand. You men have worked and worked hard to win our commissions. Don't forget that this is only the beginning of your labors. From the flood of publications from the War Department and the major commands, you must pick and master those that bear on your mission. You must continually study the course of the war and not only the operations in which your own unit is concerned, but the larger picture as well. For your men want to know about those things as well as the immediate task ahead and if you are to maintain your leadership you must be yourself informed. You must study your own leaders and your brother officers. What have they that you must develop, and always, always, you must study your men. For what is leadership without a well-trained smoothly running team of confident followers?

In a sense the leader must know his men as they are required to know their weapons. And by knowledge, I mean personal knowledge. I would not have a platoon leader in my command if he did not know the name of every man in his platoon, could not give me a thumbnail sketch of his character as well as his military skill, and had not decided how to use him in certain probable contingencies. This is no easy task in these days when personnel is changing so rapidly, but it is one that must be mastered to achieve leadership.

In the third place, I should put a feeling of personal responsibility for the unit and the individuals of which it is composed. In the manual for company officers of the German Army it is explicitly stated that the company commander must be "the father of the company". This may appear a strange assignment to a young lieutenant commanding men his own age or older, but the principle is correct and recognized by the men themselves. In a study made of soldier opinion, it was learned that second only to confidence in the competence of their officers, soldiers esteem an interest in their personal welfare. You should have this interest naturally. If not, you must force yourself to develop and to demonstrate that interest. No officer worthy of his commission can feel that his responsibilities end with the training schedule and company administration and that the rest of the day is his. Leadership cannot be turned on and turned off like that.

These then, are three ideals I ask you to set before yourselves, a sense of mission; a feeling of self-confidence based on exhaustive study and activity, and an interest in the personal welfare of your men. There are ways in which you may assist yourself to achieve them. Let us turn back to the study of soldier attitudes of which I have just spoken. What attributes does the American soldier prize most highly in their officers?

The one mentioned by most of them is ability. This is an all-embracing term. The soldier must have faith in the competence of the leader. Certainly the success of the operation depends upon the know-how back of the leader's decision, and in battle men know that life or death, victory or defeat, may hinge on the leader's commands. No bungler will have achieved leadership.

Then comes interest in the welfare of the men. They say they want an officer whom they can trust in time of need, to whom they can go when they need advice about their personal affairs. It is a good outfit when men say, "My lieutenant told me what to do about it," or "You had better ask the lieutenant, he'll know."

Another thing they want is promptness in making decisions. You can't tell a soldier "I will have to sleep on that." The leader has to think and think fast. That does not mean bluff. If you don't know, say so, but set a definite time for your decision and meet it.

Ability to give instruction comes next in the soldier's list. A soldier values the officer who explains things clearly, simply, and briefly. His own training depends upon his ability to learn, and he respects the man who can teach him easily. Of course, that goes back to knowing the subject and knowing the kind of men to whom you are talking. Patience and understanding are required for the successful army instructor.

Judgment is another quality that is highly valued by the men. We are inclined to associate this quality with maturity and experience, but it can be developed early. The conscious effort to weigh both sides of a problem promptly and fairly before making a decision, and then acting promptly and decisively, should be cultivated until the habit becomes second nature.

Remember Field Marshal Lord Wavell's statement, "At the same time there is no doubt that a good young general will usually beat a good old one."

Common sense is put high on the scale of things that count by the soldier. Some leaders have consciously or unconsciously developed eccentricities. While these may attract attention, and even imitation, it is in spite of them, rather than because of them, that these men have won the confidence of their troops. Shun them as you would the plague.

The ability to get things done is another mark of the leader in the eyes of his men. Once you have started something, you can't afford not to finish it, if not by one way, then by another. Results are what count, not only in the eyes of your superior but also of your own outfit. They need to brag a little about the outfit and "the old man."

Soldiers—American soldiers—or any soldiers for that matter—don't like to be bossed around needlessly. Once they mark an officer as "rank heavy," he has two strikes against him. They intuitively feel that he is not sure of himself and has to fall back on the authority of rank. The fussy, bossy lieutenant who is always telling his men off about little things isn't apt to get them to do the big things right. They like to be noticed and commended when they think they deserve it. Citations and medals are the rewards of outstanding achievement, but a few words of appreciation from the immediate commander at the appropriate time do wonders to build up self-esteem in the soldier and loyalty to the commander. On the other hand, commendation must be judicious and based on real merit, for the soldier is quick to discover and resent insincere or supercilious words.

Soldiers have an innate respect for soldierly carriage and physical strength. Like everyone else, they admire a fine-looking soldier, but, curiously enough, these qualities are rated by them only slightly more highly than good education, sense of humor, and courage, in the order named.

The position of courage in their list is a curious one. By all odds, it is the first attribute of a soldier. It is not as common as we would like to believe it to be. The possessor of moral courage is a rare individual. Perhaps, though they have no right to do so, they have assumed courage as a matter of course. Soldiers want their leaders to be fair, to play no favorites, to harbor no grudges.

Without this confidence in their commander, there can be no real loyalty or teamwork.

Another trait which men mention as desirable is industry. They admire a hard-working officer and even if they do a little gold bricking themselves they soon lose respect for the officers who do as little work as they can get away with.

There are more characteristics listed by enlisted men as desirable in the officers they would like to serve under, but those I have mentioned appear most frequently. The young officer who strives to earn the confidence of his men by developing the traits which they admire in their leaders will have come a long way in developing qualities of leadership. The test of leadership comes in the performance of duty by the organization. Your efficiency as a leader will be rated by your superiors on your unit's success in whatever task may be assigned to it. That efficiency depends upon training, administration, and spirit. None of these factors may be neglected, and this is true whether your command is a combat platoon, a bomber crew, or clerks in an office.

In this graduating class before me there are men who as the years pass by will develop and who, tried in the acid test of war, will attain positions of prominence in this country. Some will achieve international fame as leaders of men. There are others whose accomplishments will be few and whose names will be concealed in the War Department files. Yet you all have had the same course of instruction. You have lived under identical conditions, you have been imbued with the same ideas and ideals. Why should not the products of this uniform system rise to the same level 20 or 30 years hence? The answer lies in the fact that the estimate that your superiors will make periodically of your efficiency will be based primarily on the impression that they form of your ability as a leader. This impression will be based on their observations and analysis of that quality in a man we know as character. It is the inner force which develops within a man and grows with the years. It is the governor of his actions, the pattern of his life. It is the result of years of contemplation and of action. We judge a man's character by his reactions. Is he brave or cowardly, firm or vacillating, considerate or arbitrary, open-minded or narrow-minded, wise or foolish, honest or dishonest? Does he profit by his errors or is he licked by them? Can he make a decision for the common good that is adverse to his own interest? Above all, can he be depended upon, under the severest of temptation, to hold his honor above all possible rewards? Does he hold himself above the hypocrisies and little affectations which serve to mark a man, even though honest, as small rather than a man of real character? The answers to these questions are the tests by which a man's character is appraised. The questions are those which every man should ask of himself.

Self-criticism is an aid to character development. Criticism by others is a test of character. Great leaders are men who can stand criticism, who can bear up under heavy losses. They have learned to accept responsibility early in life and to accept the consequences of their decisions with fortitude. You will find that no matter how high your principles, how unselfish your decisions, what advantages result from your actions, there will be those who will criticize them. Your subordinates may resent them, your superiors may disapprove. The great voice of public opinion may be lifted against you.

Theodore Roosevelt was a man of strong convictions, high character, and endowed with outstanding qualities of leadership. Listen to his words: "It is not the critic who counts, nor the man who points out how the strong man stumbled, or where the doer of deeds could have done them better. The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena; whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood; who strives valiantly; who errs and comes short again and again; who knows the great enthusiasms, the great devotions, and spends himself in a worthy cause; who, at the best, knows in the end the triumph of high achievement; and who, at the worst, if he fails, at least fails while daring greatly, so that his place shall never be with those cold and timid souls who know neither victory nor defeat."

This is not to say that criticism is not often deserved. No man is wise enough to avoid errors and none of our great leaders has failed to make them. But their greatness is shown in the way they have made use of their errors and profited by their experiences. They were not defeated in the long run by their mistakes. Theirs was the ability to improve by restudy of the problems, by arriving at new and correct solutions for use in future emergencies.

When you are confronted by your errors, face them. There is no use in attempting to cover them up, nor in taking refuge in apologies. The best course of action and one which is essential to your dignity and self-respect is to admit the error and profit by it. You are expected to make decisions and take action. The man who has made no mistake has neither decided nor acted. The Army needs men who have ideas and believe in them, even if some are wrong, more than it does men who either have no ideas or are too timid to act upon them for fear of making mistakes.

Honest criticism by others, if met intelligently, is not to be feared. But I must caution you against your indulging in criticism of others. There will be times when you are expected to criticize, may even be ordered to do so, but remember when you do criticize others' decisions, you must be prepared to recommend corrective action, and, if required, to take corrective action. It might not be amiss to quote Abraham Lincoln's letter to General Hooker on his appointment to command the Army of the Potomac. It brings out on the one hand the qualities which made Lincoln a great leader and on the other, the weaknesses which led to Hooker's failure. Lincoln wrote:

"I have placed you at the head of the Army of the Potomac. Of course I have done this upon what appears to me sufficient reason, and yet I think it best for you to know that there are some things in regard to which I am not quite satisfied with you. I believe you to be a brave and skillful soldier, which, of course, I like. I also believe you do not mix politics with your profession, in which you are right. You have confidence in yourself, which is a valuable, if not an indispensable quality. You are ambitious, which within reasonable bounds, does good rather than harm; I think that during General Burnside's command of the Army you have taken counsel of your ambition and thwarted him as much as you could, in which you did a great wrong to the country and to a most meritorious and honorable brother officer. I have heard, in such a way as to believe it, of your recently saying that both the Army and the Government needed a dictator. Of course it was not for this, but in spite of it, that I have given you the command. Only those generals who gain successes can set up as dictators. What I now ask of you is military success, and I will risk the dictatorship. The Government will support you to the utmost of its ability, which is neither more nor less than it has done and will do for all commanders. I much fear that the spirit which you have decided to infuse into the Army of criticizing their commander and withholding confidence from him will now turn upon you. I shall assist you as far as I can to put it down. Neither you nor Napoleon, if he were alive again, could get any good out of any army while such a spirit prevails in it; and now beware of rashness. Beware of rashness, but with energy and sleepless vigilance go forward and give us victories."

It has been an exceptional privilege to be with you today. No graduate of West Point can return for even a fleeting moment and not obtain fresh inspiration from the spirit of service so evident here. No one may stand before the corps of cadets, particularly on graduation day, and not respond to its high resolve.

The record of the graduates of West Point in past wars has been engraved in the history of our country. The record of its graduates in this war is now being written in that same history. A part of it is in your hands. Those who will examine that record now in the making will find once more that West Point has fulfilled its task. Its graduates will have strived to achieve the high traditions of service inculcated at West Point; duty, honor, and country. Serving alongside their comrades from the Regular Army and from civilian life, they have worked together, learning from each other to weld into a fighting unit a great citizen army. That army has confidence in its leadership and determination to achieve full and early victory. It has proven itself on every field of battle. It will prove itself in the battles to come.

Gentlemen of the graduating class, you leave the Academy as officers in the United States Army during the very hours when that Army is making the greatest effort in all its history.

And now in Lincoln's words, "Beware of rashness, but with energy and sleepless vigilance go forward and give us victories." But victories or no victories, be men of character and high purpose—be true sons of West Point.

Crippling U. N. R. R. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I wish to include an editorial from the Washington Post of June 6, 1944. This editorial is entitled "Crippling U. N. R. R. A.," and I hope that it will be read thoughtfully by the Members of this Congress:

CRIPPLING U. N. R. R. A.

The Republican members of the House on Saturday showed an alarming spirit of partisanship in respect to the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. By what Representative WOODRUM referred to as "a strict party vote," they lopped $350,000,000 from the $800,000,000 appropriation sought for that agency by the President. The curtailment can in no sense be considered an economy. The three hundred and fifty million had already been appropriated to lend-lease and would merely have been transferred for U. N. R. R. A.'s use as needed. Besides, Congress is already on record as having authorized an American contribution of $1,350,000,000 to U. N. R. R. A. The effect of the action, therefore, can only be, as Mr. WOODRUM put it, "to cripple U. N. R. R. A."—and to do so as it stands on the very threshold of its tremendous undertaking. The liberation of Rome indicates how near at hand may be the need for its healing efforts. The American people, as the President declared last night, had approved "the salvage of these human beings, who are only now learning to walk in a new atmosphere of freedom."

U. N. R. R. A. cannot do its job with promises—or with promised but unappropriated funds. It must have money with which to purchase the great quantities of food, clothing, farm equipment, and repair materials which will be needed to succor the homeless and the hungry and to set the wheels of devastated Europe's economy back in motion. It cannot wait to order these things until liberation is actually achieved. Recognizing this, the British have already appropriated the whole amount of their pledged contribution. So has the little Republic of Iceland. But the United States, the wealthiest and most powerful of the member nations, holds back—and for reasons of partisan politics. To the anguished peoples of Europe whose hopes have been kindled by our promises, this parsimony can bring only dismay and a dangerous disillusionment.

U. N. R. R. A. is the first concrete mechanism for interallied cooperation in the solution of post-war problems. Our adherence to it ought to be wholly divorced from domestic political divisions. The action of the House Republicans is a sorry commentary indeed upon the meaning of the Mackinac declaration to which their party subscribed: "We must aid in restoring order and decent living in a distressed world." It cannot fail to suggest that this declaration was mere lip service to the principle of international collaboration. Clearly the House Republicans have defaulted before the first practical test of their intentions. We hope that the members of their party in the Senate will set aside this sort of partisanship. They must do so if they are to sustain the faith of the world in America's post-war leadership.

Lafayette, We Are Here—Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include a copy of a publication in the New Orleans Times-Picayune, on D-day sponsored by Holmes, of New Orleans, La., as follows:

LAFAYETTE, WE ARE HERE—AGAIN

"Lafayette, we are here." Remember these immortal words spoken in 1917? Remember the high resolve they bespoke, the eagerness to repay the old debt America always remembered?

Had you thought, Lafayette, that this time America would forget—this time America would fail one of the most beloved of her sister nations, her benefactress, her friend?

That America would forget the cause of freedom, as sacred to herself as it is to you?

You should have known, Lafayette, we could not stand idly by. That sooner or later our wrath would rise, that one day we would come roaring to your beaches, with flaming guns and freedom's banners flying. Come, as we have come today, determined that the oppressor shall pay dearly for every insult, every theft, every murder perpetrated against the beloved folk and upon the beloved soil of France.

Come determined to restore the laughter and the lights, the gayety and glamour, the wit and zest for life that are our vision of eternal France.

It has been harder this time. We have had to fight our way. This time we know, too, what difficulties still lie ahead. But this time, with your help, we will finish the job.

Lafayette, we are here—again.

Commencement Day Address by Secretary of the Navy Forrestal at United States Naval Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 8 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the very interesting and impressive address delivered by the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. James Forrestal, to the one hundred and fourth graduating class of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., on June 7, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I have subjected my speech which I had originally proposed to deliver this morning to substantial abridgment because of my feeling that the events which began yesterday on the coast of France transcend any commencement rhetoric of which I am capable.

I do, however, want to make one reference to military operations which have been launched against the fortress of Europe. As Admiral Royal Ingersoll, Commander in Chief of the Atlantic Fleet, said yesterday, the tremendous massed power which is now launched by sea, by air, and by land against Hitler's armies is a vivid and convincing demonstration of what he called the silent power of the Navy. Without subtracting one iota from the initial success of General Eisenhower's armies and the vast air and sea fleets which provided the covering forces for his soldiers, it is obvious that this accumulation of force could not have occurred without the control of the Atlantic sea lanes. This control was achieved by the American and British Navies over a period of 2½ years. It was accomplished through constant and unremitting study of enemy tactics and through the most extraordinary coordination of surface vessels, land-based air, and the baby flat tops.

The success it attained is stated more strikingly by these statistics than by any superlative of language. Since January 1, 1942, a total of 7,400 vessels have been convoyed across the Atlantic by the American Navy, with a loss of 10. And in this list of casualties there is not a single troop transport.

In the last analysis the defeat of Germany, as well as of Japan, will be effected by the Army on land, and the main part of that burden will be borne, as it always has been, by the queen of battle, by the infantry, by the men on foot, in trenches, with rifle fire and bayonet expelling the enemy from his positions. But these men and the supplies which sustain them can only get to the point of attack if we have command of the sea. Let us write that fact in unforgettable language in our memories.

You begin your careers today in a service whose infinite variety challenges the most active imagination.

A hundred years ago when George Bancroft, Secretary of the Navy and historian, conceived the idea of a school to provide academic training for naval officers our Navy consisted of 76 vessels with a total displacement of about 79,000 tons. Today it consists of over a thousand combatant ships of three and a third million tons, with millions of tons more of auxiliaries, landing craft, and small vessels, and with additional ships still building which would constitute in themselves a formidable Navy.

In the development of its new power the American Navy has produced a balanced fleet. The thinking which preceded the construction of the vast forces which we have at sea today rested on the concept that no one weapon or class or kind of vessel alone can win a war. We did not discard the battleship but we built faster, heavier battleships, ships capable of aggressive defense against air attacks, although still needing the protection of air to meet such attacks in volume.

Unlike the Germans, we did not count on any single weapon, such as the submarine. The Germans made mighty boasts that the U-boat alone would be able to deny us the Atlantic lanes for the carrying of troops and supplies to Europe. They have had their answer. It is an answer which has been forged by ourselves and our British associates in harsh and destructive reality.

The American Navy long before the start of this war recognized the tremendous impact that the airplane would have on sea power. The Navy kept its naval service for the Navy, and it meshed air power into the fighting power of the fleet. The dive bomber, the torpedo plane, the coordinated use of the dive bomber with the torpedo plane—these were conceptions and developments of American naval tactics.

I should like to touch briefly upon the course of the war and upon the problems that will come with its conclusion. As for the first, I want to speak to you in terms of your experience in competitive games. In every such struggle, whether it is on the football field, in the prize ring, or in a foot race there comes a moment when the tide of victory swings sharply to one of the participants. That is the moment of danger for the competitor who leads at the moment. If having got the upper hand he continues hard and concentrated pressure upon his opponent, he sweeps to victory, but if he thinks the match is won, that he can relax, he may find an apparently beaten foe, suddenly revitalized, returning to the fight with vigor and confidence. In sports that let-down has proved fatal to many an apparent winner, and it can be equally fatal in war.

We have come a long way on the road to victory and we are on the eve of great and historic events. But the rhythm and tempo of victory which is ours now must not be lost, against neither the Japs nor the Germans. We cannot afford for a moment to relax the iron pressure which we are applying with steady and inexorable power.

As for the problems of peace, many and wiser men have talked to better effect on these. I would only venture to express agreement with the general statement that we shall emerge from the war with great problems, with a national debt that will be staggering by any orthodox criteria of Government finance, with sensitive international relationships to be ajusted, and with a tremendous responsibility on the part of both government and industry to provide as nearly as may be an economy of full employment for the men who return from the war. But these problems are not insoluble. They can and must be dealt with just as we have dealt with the great problems of the war. Even our enemies have discovered that we were able to make war on a scale and at a pace which they never considered possible. We shall face the troubles of peace with no less courage.

I have denied myself that usual indulgence of the commencement orator: Gratuitous and extended advice to the young. I shall allow myself only one fragment, and that is this: The very character of your profession makes for insulation from the outside world. Changing tours of duty in different parts of the country and cruises in remote parts of the world will separate you from the roots of your original homes, but by the same token, if you take your opportunities, they will give you broader contacts and wider interests than it is given to the average man to obtain.

You will need to take full advantage of such opportunities because the military services as a whole, and the Navy in particular, will need to have a wider knowledge of political and social problems than ever before in the past. The traditions of the service proscribes political activity but it does proscribe knowledge of political and economic questions, nor of social questions. We have learned in this war that there is no such thing as international isolation, and I believe it will be equally apparent that there is no such thing as isolation for any class of individuals in our national life. The pace of modern life runs at too high a tempo and it is too interrelated for any of us to indulge the luxury of separation. The Navy must not be permitted to relapse into one of its periods of neglect. That means the people must realize that it is an instrument of national policy, an instrument usable and to be used for the purpose of peace rather than war. If that point of view is to obtain and retain currency, you will have to do your part in the creation and retention of public confidence in the Navy.

You have come from every State in the Union, from every kind of social and economic background. One hundred and sixty of you have come from the enlisted personnel of the Navy to achieve commissioned rank. You have been measured here on your own attributes of mind and character. It did not matter where you came from, how much money you had, or what country clubs you belonged to. There is no caste so far as naval officers are concerned, except that high caste of competence, efficiency, and devotion to one's country. You are the custodians of honor—the honor of the Navy and the honor of your country.

Will Farm Depression Come After This War as After the Last War?

REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the Ninth Congressional District of Minnesota, which I have the honor and privilege to represent in the United States Congress, is largely agricultural. I have met and talked with hundreds of hard working, patriotic farmers in the past several years, and almost invariably the conversation gets around to what is uppermost in their minds, and it is summed up in these words: "Will farm depression and low crop prices return after World War No. 2 as it did after World War No. 1?" These farmers have suffered through 20 years of ruinous depression prior to this war, and their concern lest those conditions return is certainly worthy of consideration and action by the United States Congress at an early date.

We in Congress will share in the responsibility of seeing that farm prosperity is not sabotaged at the conclusion of this conflict. In order to bear this responsibility well, we should be able to analyze what happened to farm prosperity in the past, and have a constructive solution for the present and future.

With all the talk about post-war planning for this and for that, I have yet to hear a voice raised for a comprehensive and workable post-war plan for agriculture.

Historians now record that the deflationary policy instituted by the Federal Reserve Board in 1920 coincided with the beginning of the farm depression in the United States.

The passage of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act in 1922 and the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act in 1930 deprived our farmers of about a billion dollars a year in export trade, according to statistics compiled by the Department of Commerce.

Nations which depended upon foreign exchange secured by selling manufactured goods to us with which to secure our farm products, could no longer sell to us because of these high tariffs. Therefore as a result they did not have the wherewithal with which to buy agricultural products from us in return. As a result, most of these nations transferred their business to the farmers of South America and elsewhere—and our farm surpluses grew to mountainous proportions.

The tariff on farm products was entirely ineffective due to our peacetime crop surpluses. Farm prices dropped so low that corn was burned in furnaces instead of coal, and this at a time when dictators were preparing to grab in Europe and Asia what we were destroying in America.

PLANS THAT HAVE FAILED

The handling and disposal of surpluses comprise the basic peacetime farm problem. Attempts have been made to solve this problem, as we all know, but for one reason or another, they have generally failed.

First. The vetoed McNary-Haugen bill in 1928 was a good plan, but it didn't go far enough.

Second. The next attempt at solution was tried in the late twenties when the Government instituted the Federal Farm Board plan and bought grain and stored it in granaries. This stored grain was a drug on the market and a constant menace and depressant to domestic farm prices.

Third. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration plan has been a necessary and homewhat effective stop-gap but it had cost our taxpayers over $5,000,000,000 up to 1941 and did not solve the surplus problem of the farmer's full production efforts. Farm produce cannot be plowed under nor can production be curtailed without entailing a financial loss to both the producer and the taxpayer. Farmers want parity, not charity! However, a drowning man accepts any kind of help and because our farmers were going under, financially speaking, through no fault of their own, they felt compelled to accept Government assistance, and would have to do so again under similar circumstances.

Fourth. Reciprocal trade agreements have failed to help the farmer primarily because virtually all of the countries with whom we traded on this basis were agricultural countries, which sent to the United States their own agricultural products in exchange for United States industrial commodities, thus in practice often actually injuring the American farmer. At the same time, the highly industrialized and heavily populated countries needing our foodstuffs were ignored.

So much for the various attempts at solving the problem.

What, then, is the solution?

It is obvious that we cannot store our surpluses, nor can we destroy or curtail our production without financial loss to someone. Reciprocal trade agreements in the main have further impoverished the American farmer.

That leaves but one alternative—that of getting our surpluses out of the country in peacetime as well as in wartime. In wartime, our surpluses are purchased by lend-lease funds. We must find the equivalent of lend-lease for the purchases of surpluses in peacetime, but it must not come out of the taxpayers' pockets. Foreign nations must use the wealth they create themselves with which to buy surplus American food. Prior to World War No. 1, American crop surpluses were annually exchanged abroad for foreign products. Though some new factors have entered the picture, economically sound international trade—such as the reciprocal trade treaties never achieved—can be built up again.

The McNary-Haugen bill introduced in 1928 proposed that we dump our surpluses on the world market for whatever price they would bring. This no doubt would have invited retaliatory tariffs from other countries, and the bill was vetoed by the President.

In 1941, a similar bill (S. 1442) was introduced by Senators SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota, and CAPPER, of Kansas, which would have eliminated the bad feature. I quote from a speech made by Senator CAPPER on May 5, 1941, which graphically outlines the purposes of this meritorious measure:

PURPOSE OF BILL

The agricultural surplus exchange bill, introduced today by Senator SHIPSTEAD and myself, and which will be introduced in the House, I understand, by Representative AUGUST H. ANDRESEN, of Minnesota, is based on the principle of the McNary-Haugen bills of the 1920's plus an added provision for the importation of an equivalent amount of foreign-produced goods in exchange for farm surpluses exported.

Based on the belief that the old McNary-Haugen export bill was "warmer" to the real solution of the farm problem than anything which has been tried since, this new bill meets two drawbacks of the old McNary-Haugen bill by the addition of a new principle.

The first of these draw-backs was the necessity of setting up a complicated two-price system, whereby the share of every farmer's crop that was sold abroad brought him one price and the share that was consumed in America brought another price. The second drawback was the fact that the foreign nation who wanted our surpluses could not buy them at any price unless we took manufactured goods from them in payment, since they had no gold. Could a way of taking in manufactured goods from abroad in sufficient quantity to balance up the value of crop surpluses have been found, the farm problem would have been solved long ago.

This new bill attempts to do that. By a workable trade principle, it renders the relatively small amount of foreign goods needed to effect surplus export literally noncompetitive with American manufactured goods.

This principle can best be explained by an illustration: Exportable crop surpluses in a year may equal $1,000,000,000 in value. One billion dollars of foreign manufactured goods will therefore have to be imported in return. Compared to the $40,00,000,000 value of American factory output, the $1,000,000,000 of foreign manufactured goods will be only 2½ percent. Since the American crop surpluses cannot be converted into dollar buying power in America—but rather depress rural cash buying power—there is no cash loss to American manufacturers in allowing the import of foreign manufactured goods up to the extent to which they can be paid for by crop surpluses. The 2½ percent really represents increased buying power for the American public over and above a 100 percent cash buying power which is left undisturbed.

But if the 2½ percent—$1,000,000,000—were spent wholly for foreign textiles, for instance, it would be hard on the American textile market. It is necessary that this extra buying power be spent proportionately for all manufactured products. Hence, by a principle known as prorated import quotas, only 2½ percent of each kind of manufactured goods is allowed to be imported into America that year in exchange for farm surpluses. Thus every American manufacturer's American market represented by the 100 percent is practically undisturbed and the 2½ percent of imports are extra in every case and represent pure gain for the farmer and no loss to the American manufacturer.

But the American manufacturer gains, too. When the crop surpluses are out of America, crop prices will go up to parity. American farmers will be able to buy $4,000,000,000 more of American automobiles, American textiles, American paint, etc.

Although the tariff is lowered slightly on the incoming goods involved in this special stratum of trade, most of the present duties are collected. These duties are segregated into a special fund known as the Agricultural Export Compensation Fund. The American crop exporters, who will have to sell the surplus abroad at low world prices, will be allowed to take enough additional out of this fund to be able to pay the American farmers the full American crop prices on the crops bought from them for export.

Thus the American farmer gets the full parity price on both that part of his crop which is consumed at home and that part which is exported. It is therefore a one-price system—on the full parity price level—with no red tape involved as in a two-price system. Our surpluses are continuously eliminated by export with no cost to Uncle Sam and with benefit instead of loss to our manufacturers.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, let me say that the abolition of all tariffs would reduce the farmer and the laborer to the status of peasants because of low wages and prices prevailing in European and oriental countries.

However, without repeating our high tariff mistakes of the past, the plan introduced by Senators SHIPSTEAD and CAPPER would have preserved the tariff protection that is necessary because of wage differentials in different countries, and at the same time would have put a gate in the tariff wall through which our farm surpluses could flow and not remain here to depress the domestic farm price levels as they did during most of the period between World War No. 1 and World War No. 2.

I have made these remarks for the purpose of encouraging discussion and study of the provisions in a bill, H. R. 4979, which I introduced in the House today. It is my hope and strong desire that this Congress will adopt post-war farm legislation which will encourage the exportation of peacetime farm surpluses and at the same time improve the American market for both American manufactured products and American farm products.

When the Ninth District farmer of Minnesota prospers and the American farmer has money to buy goods, America prospers and our citizens will reach that goal of security and Christian happiness for which we all strive:

Our Minnesota farmers and others interested in the welfare of agriculture have some excellent ideas and suggestions. I invite them to give me their reactions to this post-war farm program. I'll need their help in the fight for a stable adequate price program for the American farmer. I invite those who read this to write me and say you will join me in my efforts to bring agriculture to its rightful place in American economy and life.

Sale of Army Shoes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON, made a speech in reference to army shoes being ground up for fertilizer. Of course, that attracted attention.

I have been interested in the disposition of surplus property and when Mr. JOHNSON made his speech I immediately took the matter up with General Somervell, and I also addressed a communication to Mr. Clayton, Surplus War Property Administrator. I have received a letter from each in reply to my inquiry.

I was informed at the outset that the Army had a contract with the International Shoe Co., of Hannibal, Mo., to rebuild army shoes. It seems that the shoes Mr. JOHNSON referred to were used by the armed forces in the Aleutians. They were sent home to the International Shoe Co., where some of them were rebuilt. After they were rebuilt they failed to pass inspection, and under the policy were sold to a dealer in Chicago to be resold to the trade. However, they stated that when the shoes reached Chicago the board of health of that city insisted that they be condemned, because there was a terrible odor to the shoes, and I assume that the board of health took the position that anyone who wore them might be subject to infection. I was further informed that the dealer in Chicago did not destroy the shoes as instructed, but, on the contrary, sold them to a company in Granite City, Ill., which is in Mr. JOHNSON's district to be destroyed. Of course, no one wants either members of the armed forces or our citizens to be wearing shoes that might cause infection. I am sure Mr. JOHNSON himself would not want that.

It is my opinion that under the set-up provided by the President's Executive order we will not experience, in the disposition of surplus property that accrues during the present war, what we did as a result of the sale of surplus property during World War No. 1. It is a gigantic task to dispose of surplus property.

As I have previously stated, the House in the first session of this Congress passed a surplus-property bill. It has been in the Senate since that time. I have urged that the Senate take action. If it so desires, let the Senate strike out all language after the enacting clause and substitute whatever language it desires and pass the bill. If that is done, we can then take the bill to conference and write a real law with plenty of teeth in it. I feel that this is a responsibility of the Congress, and I know positively that the President delayed the issuing of the Executive order with the hope that the Congress would take some action. I again appeal to the Senate to consider this most important subject without any further delay.

Under the leave granted me I include as part of my remarks the two letters I have received to which I referred. They follow:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ARMY SERVICE FORCES,
Washington, D. C., June 7, 1944.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COCHRAN: This is in reply to your request for information regarding a reported sale of army shoes for processing into fertilizer.

The procedure has been to ship to shoe reconstruction factories operated for the Army all shoes which could not be repaired for return to the original user. It is normal practice to sell to fertilizer manufacturers old scrap leather removed from shoes being torn down for rebuilding, and also pieces of new scrap leather which cannot be sold for such purposes as lifts for heels on women's shoes.

Complete shoes which are determined to be not suitable for rebuilding when sorting is accomplished at the factories are sold to used shoe dealers as shoes unserviceable for Army use. These dealers retrieve any which they believe can be reconditioned and sold as used shoes and sell the culls which cannot be so marketed to fertilizer manufacturers. It would appear most unlikely that these dealers would have disposed of any shoes to fertilizer factories which appeared to offer any reasonable return for sale as shoes.

The possibility of utilizing used army shoes for relief purposes has been under consideration for some time, and, during the past several months, experimental quantities have been shipped to approximately 20 State prisons and shoe factories who had been conducting experiments for U. N. R. R. A. The Buford Shoe Reconstruction Factory at Buford, Ga., was taken over for this program by Procurement Division, Treasury Department, as of May 1, 1944, and on May 22, 1944, arrangements were made to ship to that factory two cars per week of army shoes for rebuilding for relief purposes.

The preliminary investigation which has been made indicates that no complete shoes have been sold by the Army to fertilizer manufacturers. It is possible that some resoled shoes may have been included in the shoes rejected by dealers purchasing shoes not suitable for rebuilding. A complete and detailed investigation is being made to determine if any action is necessary. Please be assured that you will be informed promptly of the full results of this investigation.

Sincerely yours,

BREHON SOMERVELL,
Lieutenant General, Commanding.

OFFICE OF WAR MOBILIZATION,
SURPLUS WAR PROPERTY ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1944.

Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COCHRAN: Immediately on receipt of your letter of the third instant on yesterday, I referred to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read the statement by Congressman CALVIN D. JOHNSON to which you made reference.

I then called up Colonel Hauseman of the War Department and he told me that a careful investigation was being made of the report that army shoes were being sold as scrap to be ground up as fertilizer and that he would make me a full report on the matter just as soon as possible.

I have very strongly impressed on both the Army and Navy, not once but several times, that we must all be extremely careful in disposing of this property and must particularly avoid letting any stuff go as scrap which has a useful value. To this end, committees are being set up in various areas to review decisions to scrap any article or articles which represent a substantial cost to the Government.

Mr. Mack is correct. All surplus property must now be reported for disposal to the disposal agency named in Executive Order 9425—the Procurement Division of the Treasury for consumer's goods and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for capital goods.

Contract termination property is not surplus property within the meaning of the Executive order and is dealt with in a special manner which is described briefly in the enclosed copy of our release of April 29.

While there have been some extremely unfortunate actions in the past, such as the incident of the dry batteries, etc., nevertheless, I have made sufficient investigation to enable me to assure you that, in my opinion, the Army has, on the whole, done a good job of disposal up to the time that the problem came under my jurisdiction. I am informed that on the average they have recovered 90 percent of the cost of the goods disposed of which is, everything considered, I think, a good job.

The whole matter is now under the jurisdiction of the Surplus War Property Administration and, I am convinced, is being handled strictly in accordance with the regulations.

Sincerely yours,

W. L. CLAYTON,
Administrator.

Lest We Forget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York World-Telegram of June 2, 1944:

GERMAN ATROCITIES

To get at the truth regarding the latest German atrocity stories probably will be impossible until after the war. It is unusually difficult in these cases because there is suspicion of reverse propaganda by Goebbels—that is, official statements about crimes, which may or may not have occurred, for the dual purpose of intimidating the Allies and of provoking German civilians. So far nothing is clear as to the reported mass shooting of Allied aviators trying to escape from a Nazi prison camp, or as to the alleged lynching by civilians of Allied flyers who bailed out over Germany.

The best evidence in the first case comes from an R. A. F. officer who was at the prison camp and who has now been repatriated to London. He says that 76 prisoners originally escaped by tunnel, and that 14 were never captured. Among those caught and returned, 47 later were manacled and taken from jail by the Gestapo. What happened to them is not known. The Germans say they were shot while trying to resist or to organize another escape—the familiar Nazi excuse. They may have been executed deliberately by Gestapo orders, or they may have been shot by crazed guards, or they may be imprisoned elsewhere.

Significantly, however, the Berlin government wanted and got large publicity on the shooting story. Presumably it hopes to frighten other Allied fliers and to undermine morale in the Allied countries. The diseased minds of Berlin are so warped they do not understand that Allied reaction to Nazi crime is not fright, but deeper determination to wipe out Nazis and nazi-ism.

In the alleged lynching case, the signs of official German provocation and propaganda are more numerous. First, Goebbels told the German people that Allied fliers were deliberately killing innocent German women and children and that they deserved to be treated as "murderers" rather than as soldiers. Then he added it was too much to expect German troops and police to restrain the enraged populace. The next day American fliers coming down in parachutes were reported lynched—according to one story eight fliers, according to another five and still another stated only one.

Whether any Allied flier has been lynched, or is lynched in the future, Goebbels has deliberately inspired such acts. His story that Allied fliers fly low to butcher women and children is the kind of lie which might be expected of the Germans, who did that very thing on the roads of Poland, Russia, the Low Countries, France, and the Balkans.

When Nazi airpower ruled the skies—bombing Warsaw, Rotterdam, Belgrade, and London—the world wondered whether the Germans could take it when their time came. Well, they are beginning to whine. It is not the nonexistent Allied terror bombing that is getting them, but the actual destruction of their military fortifications, communications, and factories.

Statement of Jan Stanczyk, Polish Minister of Labor and Social Welfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the statement of Jan Stanczyk, Polish Minister of Labor and Social Welfare, head of the Polish delegation to the International Labor Office conference in Philadelphia, given to press conference in Philadelphia on Thursday, May 11, 1944:

As a member of Polish Cabinet I would like to take this opportunity of giving the American public the Polish viewpoint on a number of vital current issues.

First of all, as this is my second visit to the United States, I desire to pay tribute to the American war effort, particularly to American production, which is fulfilling the hard task of your country's and other United Nations' war needs. I would like to pay tribute, as well, to the tremendous contribution of American labor to the success of your war program. I was last here in October 1941, at a previous I. L. O. conference, just before the Japanese, acting in line with a long-prepared Axis conspiracy, made their attack on Pearl Harbor. Coming here now from Great Britain—the fortress of the impending invasion—I have been able to observe changes during the few weeks I have been here, which are truly remarkable, and convince me still more profoundly about the greatness of America's contribution toward the triumph of democracy and freedom. The suffering people of Nazi-occupied Europe will be everlastingly grateful to the United States.

Poland has always looked upon the United States as an examplar of democracy. The Polish Nation has great admiration for the American people led by one of the major figures of world history—your President, Mr. Roosevelt. The Polish Nation is deeply grateful to Mr. Roosevelt for his inspiring encouragement to Poland in its struggle for liberation.

I want to emphasize that the Polish Nation today is continuing its struggle against the invader as indomitably and with the same spirit of sacrifice as at the beginning of the war. There is no power which is able to divert our people from the objective of driving the Germans from Polish soil. Neither the German nor any other anti-Russian propaganda, nor German threats, and mass terror will have any effect. The Polish people cannot beturned from the task of defeating the common enemy of all the United Nations.

The most recent proof of this is the order of the Polish Government to its underground army to collaborate with the Soviet forces. I believe not only in Russian-Polish collaboration in the military field but in a permanent understanding between Russia and Poland in the interest of both nations. The Russian-Polish problem is an intricate one, requiring understanding and good will on both sides, and an application of principles which will guarantee the security of both nations and enable them to enjoy the friendliest collaboration. This is my own, my Government's, and Polish Nation's deep conviction.

The Polish Government and people are united on what kind of Poland we will build after the war. We will have a genuine democratic system of government. The war has made us even more conscious of the real meaning of democracy in a nation's life.

As a member of the Polish Government, I unreservedly condemn anti-Semitism. I consider anti-Semitism a crime against humanity. During the horrible years of Nazi occupation, all Poles—Jews and gentiles—have become brothers in suffering and in the common fight for liberation. These ties are stronger than any old prejudices, which may still be latent among a few fanatics. The Polish masses have never been, and under no circumstances will ever be, anti-Semitic. We are united on the principle of full equality of all men, regardless of race or creed.

Today we are already preparing a comprehensive program for the economic reconstruction of our devastated country.

The Polish people will be deeply interested in the work of the present I. L. O. conference. Poland was one of the few countries which adopted the social and economic measures, recommended by the first I. L. O. conference held in Washington, D. C., in 1919. We also adopted measures recommended by succeeding I. L. O. conventions. Today we are ready to apply the I. L. O. Philadelphia charter and all accompanying recommendations worked out here.

We have submitted a resolution for the betterment of agricultural countries, as it is impossible in our time to guarantee the well-being of the community of nations while some are impoverished.

We have also submitted a resolution calling upon the conference to condemn the mass murder of Jews and Poles. These annihilations are unprecedented in modern history.

I look forward to the new post-war world that will be born after this war as a world established on the principles of the Atlantic Charter and on the practice of the "four freedoms"—and which will guarantee all nations, great and small, poor and rich, full rights to enjoy freedom and well-being.

Prohibition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD F. HARLESS

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include a copy of a petition protesting against the enactment of prohibition legislation, signed by various and sundry citizens in the State of Arizona and submitted to me by Mr. J. F. Lanser, president of the Arizona Brewing Co., Inc.:

PETITION PROTESTING AGAINST THE ENACTMENT OF ANY AND ALL PROHIBITION LEGISLATION

Whereas professional prohibition organizations are attempting to force passage of the Bryson bill and other legislation which would bring back prohibition through one pretext or another; and

Whereas the object of such legislative bills is to establish national prohibition in the United States during the absence from their homes of more than 10,000,000 citizens in the military service of their country; and

Whereas national prohibition during its 13-year test brought upon the people the disgusting evils of the speakeasy and bootlegger, an increase in crime and official corruption, and poisonous liquor:

Therefore we the undersigned citizens, protest against the consideration of all prohibition measures by Congress for the duration of the war, and request our Senators and Representatives to vote against all such proposed legislation. We request that this petition be referred to the proper congressional committees and listed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

This is an example of the petitions of many companies and individuals in Arizona, which petitions were signed by 4,568 persons.

Following is the letter of Mr. J. F. Lanser, who requested that these petitions be filed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

ARIZONA BREWING CO., INC.,
Phoenix, Ariz., May 24, 1944.

Hon. RICHARD F. HARLESS,
Representative, State of Arizona,
Old Congressional Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We are sending to you today by express under separate cover, a file containing 4,568 names which come from every corner of the State. By and large these petitions are made up of the Elk's Club, American Legion, various union affiliations and individual citizens. These names are all signed in protest against the enactment of any and all prohibition legislation.

I respectfully request as per conversations with you by Sid Moeur and Irving Diamond, that these be offered for registry, on the floor, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The reason for wanting these registered is that many Congressmen are so busy with their various duties and committee assignments that they cannot always stay aware of public opinion on various issues. The drys have succeeded in getting a certain number of petitions for enactment of legislation registered, and we respectfully request that you register these. If any help is needed I request that you see the United States Brewers' Association, to whom we are writing today, advising that we are sending this list of names.

I am also advising our two honorable Senators and honorable Congressman MURDOCK that this petition has been sent to you and I will appreciate advices from you when this has been done, and if you care for national publicity in connection with your request that these be registered, please advise and we will arrange the same.

We anticipate we will have an additional six to ten thousand names on petitions such as these, which will be tendered later for registration.

In the meantime, with my best personal good wishes and regards, I remain,

Respectfully,

J. F. LANSER,
President.

The Republican Party of Prosperity Has Been Very Good for Big Business But Very Bad for Small Business as Facts Prove

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party has been shouting from the housetops that it is the party of prosperity, yet authentic figures show the reverse is true since there have been over 50 percent more failures in business during the administrations of Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover in their 12 years of occupancy of the White House than in the 11 years since President Roosevelt has directed the destinies of this country, with financial losses over 62 percent more.

This is not based upon any idle statement of a Democrat, but is proven by no less than the generally accepted authority of Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., recognized throughout this country as an authority on statistics of business failures. This agency is not political in any sense of the word. It caters to businessmen generally of all political faiths and has no interest in politics. It is engaged solely in gathering statistical facts for the guidance of business. It cannot, therefore, be accused of political bias.

Nevertheless, its figures on business failures and losses through liabilities are mute evidence that there have been far more failures and financial losses during Republican administrations—though not intended for that purpose—than under Democratic rule. But let the cold figures tell their own story of the truth that small businesses have suffered to a far greater extent while Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover were in control of the National Government from 1921 through 1932 than from 1933 to 1943 inclusive, when President Roosevelt has directed Federal Government affairs.

Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., cannot be charged with collecting these figures by way of deadly comparison for any political reasons as between Republican and Democratic rule. Nevertheless, they tell a convincing story how varied businesses have suffered under Republican rule. These data demonstrate that it is the smaller companies engaged in manufacturing, wholesaling, retailing, construction and servicing types of activities that have been forced into bankruptcy.

COMPARATIVE FAILURES UNDER REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC RULE

The following figures represent the number of failures between 1921 and 1932, inclusive, or during the 12 years of the administrations of Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, and from 1933 to 1943, or 11 years during which period Mr. Roosevelt has been President:

Number of failures

	Harding, Coolidge, Hoover		President Roosevelt
1921	19,652	1933	20,307
1922	23,676	1934	12,091
1923	18,718	1935	12,244
1924	20,615	1936	9,607
1925	21,214	1937	9,490
1926	21,773	1938	12,836
1927	23,146	1939	11,408
1928	23,842	1940	13,619
1929	22,909	1941	11,848
1930	26,355	1942	9,445
1931	28,285	1943	3,221
1932	31,822
Total	282,007	Total	126,116
Average	23,500	Average	11,427
	11,427
Difference	12,073

It will be observed from these figures that there were 51 percent more failures during the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover regimes than under the administration of President Roosevelt. There is the further fact, too, that under Harding-Coolidge-Hoover control of Government policies the number of failures increased progressively year after year from 1921 to 1932, inclusive, excepting for a few slight variations, climaxing with the greatest number in 1932, when there were 31,822 failures through bankruptcies.

On the contrary, during the three terms of 11 years of President Roosevelt just the opposite is true. The greatest number was in 1933 when the President took over the reins of Government when business was in chaos, banks were closed, and heroic efforts of the Roosevelt administration decreased the number of failures to 20,307, or 11,515 less than 1932. These failures declined in his 11 years as they increased under the three administrations of President Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. In a few years there were increases but the minimum of failures occurred in 1943 with but 3,221. This is a most interesting comparison as showing the complete reversal brought about by President Roosevelt.

REPUBLICAN LOSSES 62.7 PERCENT GREATER

The story is no different when liabilities of industrial and commercial concerns are considered. In the same comparison of years for Republican and Democratic rule, the losses shown by Dun & Bradstreet statistics show the following deadly parallel:

Total liabilities

	Harding, Coolidge, Hoover		President Roosevelt
1921	$627,401,000	1933	$502,830,000
1922	623,895,000	1934	333,959,000
1923	539,387,000	1935	310,580,000
1924	543,226,000	1936	203,173,000
1925	443,744,000	1937	183,253,000
1926	409,233,000	1938	246,505,000
1927	520,105,000	1939	168,204,000
1928	489,559,000	1940	166,684,000
1929	483,252,000	1941	136,104,000
1930	668,282,000	1942	100,763,000
1931	736,310,000	1943	45,339,000
1932	928,313,000
Total	7,012,707,000	Total	2,397,394,000
Average	584,392,000	Average	217,945,000
	217,945,000
Difference	366,447,000

Here is further concrete proof from a disinterested and unbiased source that under 12 years of Republican control of the Federal Government the average yearly losses were 62.7 percent greater than under the present 11 years of President Roosevelt. Again the losses by business, most of them generally small enterprises, increased almost yearly from 1921 to 1932 when the tremendous peak of $928,313,000 was reached, whereas just the counterpart is true with respect to the 11 years that President Roosevelt has been in power. And the peak of decrease was reached in 1943, with but $45,399,000 losses throughout the entire year.

FOUR BILLION MORE LOSSES BY REPUBLICANS

The deduction to be made from these figures of failures and liability losses is that it has been small businesses which have been penalized under Republican domination, whereas big business has prospered under that control. This is shown by the fact that of the 262,007 failures during Republican rule the average loss was $26,765. Moreover, aside from the injury to small business through these failures, the creditors have lost $7,012,707,000 as compared with only $2,397,394,000, or $4,615,313,000 more than during Mr. Roosevelt's regime.

The fact that small business has prospered more under Democratic than Republican rule with less failures and smaller losses proves conclusively that the prosperity under Republicans has been beneficial to the big interests and harmful to small business. Little business, we have been told for years, is the backbone of the Nation, but its back has been systematically bent if not broken by the Republican policy as evidenced from these undeniable facts.

It is the encroachment of big business that is responsible for the heavier number of failures and money losses. It cannot be said that the decline in these losses is due entirely to the war. The failures from 1933—before the war started—to 1940, inclusive, averaged 12,700 while the liabilities were $264,398,000. During the previous Republican administrations, however, the failures averaged 123,500 and the liabilities $584,392,000. It cannot be said, therefore, that the war had helped the Roosevelt administration during these 8 years since it was nonexistent in this period insofar as this country is concerned. Under these administrations failures were a trifle under 50 percent more and liabilities 55 percent more.

Many people and especially businessmen have been bamboozled by the Republican speech makers that the Republican Party has been the party of prosperity. Yes; it has been the party of prosperity for big business, but it has also been the party of depression for small business.

Let's Get Together and Finish the Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 5, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Donald M. Nelson, Chairman, War Production Board, before the Economic Club of Detroit at the Book-Cadillac Hotel on June 5, 1944:

Making a speech these days, even to such good friends as I know I have in this room, is a risky undertaking. The air is charged with suspense—with a feeling of tremendous military events about to burst forth in headlines, writing a new chapter in world history. When those events occur, when the great liberation of Europe actually gets under way, everything else will seem petty by comparison. What we have to say here can be of interest only as it relates to the tremendous climax of the war that looms ahead.

Ever since Pearl Harbor, American management and labor have for the most part given wholehearted support to the war effort. They have for the most part worked hard and long under conditions of strain and fatigue to make possible America's tremendous outpouring of armed power. Their splendid contribution to the war effort can be read in the figures of war production and in the superb quality of our weapons and equipment.

But in spite of the excellent over-all achievement of management and labor, all of us are aware that here and there shortsighted elements in both groups have defaulted on their obligations to the all-out war effort. Too frequently, narrow group interests have been allowed to overshadow the war needs of the Nation. Although these defaults are not representative of labor and management as a whole, nevertheless they are serious and deplorable. And unless they are stopped, they will do a grave injury, not only to the Nation's production and morale during the war, but also to our chances of a prosperous post-war future.

ISSUES MAGNIFIED

I want to say to you frankly that too many of these defaults by labor and management on wartime obligations have come from this very region, the Detroit area, the heart of industrial America. The very name Detroit in a headline today has begun to suggest labor disputes and strikes, which injure war production and spread confusion and irritation among the people and among our armed forces.

Now, I know only too well that the economic issues underlying the troubles between management and labor in this region are real and serious. But those issues are being magnified and aggravated out of all proportion by hot emotion on both sides.

The experience of the country as a whole shows that economic disagreements between labor and management can be solved by reasonable methods, without strikes and prolonged friction, if tackled in the right spirit. The major labor problems have all been solved, in one place or another, by reasonable methods, and to the long-range benefit of both parties. I think it is fair to say that the reason why such methods have not worked better in the Detroit area is that they have been too often blocked by an unhealthy attitude of mind.

This attitude is found both among workers and among managers. Powerful elements in both groups have taken a grim, die-hard position. They have forgotten that they are on the same team. Instead, they regard themselves as being in a fight against each other. Psychologically they have dug themselves in for that fight. Now they want to stay in the trenches and slug it out, instead of working for a practical adjustment of their differences, like reasonable men of affairs, and like good Americans.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT NEGLECTED

In recent weeks there has been dramatic evidence of this bad attitude of mind. I refer to the foremen's strike which caused so much concern here, and, for that matter, throughout the Nation. Traditionally, the foremen and supervisors of American industry have always been on the side of management. They have always identified themselves with management. When they go on strike, they have lost that sense of identification with the managers. The reasons they give for their strike are economic but those reasons could never have loomed so large had it not been for lack of mutual understanding.

Another symptom of the same bad psychological condition can be seen in the relatively small number of labor-management committees in the Detroit area. Throughout the United States there are nearly 5,000 such committees, developed under the sponsorship of the War Production Board. In most industrial centers these committees play an extremely important part in stimulating war production, and in creating a better basis for understanding between management and labor. In the Detroit area, too, a few such committees have been established by some concerns, and they are doing excellent work. But the great bulk of managements in Detroit have consistently drawn back from the labor-management committee plan. They are unwilling to give the committee plan a fair trial, or even careful study. This fact plainly reveals the extent to which Detroit management and labor have lost touch.

I am shocked by some of the reckless and irresponsible ideas that I have heard voiced by men on both sides from this area—men who seem more intent on teaching the other fellow a lesson than in getting the war job done. There is too much dangerous talk and too much dangerous thinking in this city. Business has everything to lose, and labor has everything to lose, by assuming responsibility before the people either for an injury to war production now, or for a post-war condition that would imperil the welfare of the country. The people of the Nation as a whole and their Government have no desire to intervene in any local problem. Matters must not be allowed to reach the point where the welfare of the people demands Government intervention.

ASKS STATESMANSHIP

The need now in Detroit, as in every other industrial city where there have been prolonged labor disputes, is for industrial statesmanship that is big enough to bridge the gap that now exists between labor and management. And I would point out that when you start to build a bridge you make best progress if you begin at the same time on both sides and meet in the middle. You cannot establish orderly labor relations if labor insists that management first make concessions, or if management insists that labor first make concessions. There is no use waiting for one-sided action. You will not get it. Labor and management must be prepared to move simultaneously, and to work patiently, in order to arrive at a reasonable settlement of economic issues.

The people of the United States expect management and labor in Detroit to set an example of patriotism and good judgment to the country. Neither side has any right to demand that its own problems be considered while it refuses to give genuine consideration to the problems of the other side.

The industries in Detroit are noted for doing a great job once that job is clearly defined. Detroit's war production record alone is proof of the ability to achieve technical wonders almost overnight. This is because Detroit's engineers know how to bring their ingenuity to bear constructively on their technical problems, without emotional bias or preconceived ideas. Today your main problem is a problem in human engineering. And like any technical problem, it needs to be approached with a sound grasp of the facts, and without fear or animosity or preconceived ideas.

One fundamental fact which is sometimes overlooked is that the workers you are dealing with are human beings, with all the virtues and failings of the species. Men and women of the Detroit war factories are as patriotic as anyone. But they are also as human as anyone. Under conditions of wartime pressure it is natural to become temperamental and irritable and suspicious. When people are worried about the future, they want reassurance. They want the knowledge that their leaders, both in labor and management, are planning in cooperation, doing everything possible to assure their jobs and their livelihood. Lacking reassurance, it is easy to develop a profound attack of "cut-back jitters." All this has to be recognized and understood, even sympathetically understood. With such an understanding, it is posisble to approach the problem of establishing orderly relations between management and labor in a way that will satisfy the needs of both groups.

CALM APPRAISAL

Let me say it again: You cannot hope to adjust your problems in an atmosphere of resentment, suspicion, and animosity. Human dignity and pride being what they are, conferences which begin in such an atmosphere are generally doomed beforehand to break up in an even worse state of mind. All our experience shows that the men who sit at such conferences, and who are empowered to speak for their groups, need to be selected for their calm good sense and reasonableness, rather than for their ability to pound a table. A favorable psychological atmosphere can be of the greatest value in the effort to resolve the economic issues which confront you. If Government participation can help provide such an atmosphere then Government participation should be invoked. Conferences called under the right auspices, and in an atmosphere of calm factual appraisal, could, in my judgment, rapidly reach working agreements on the most serious of the problems now outstanding between Detroit labor and management.

OUTPUT MUST RISE

Sound working agreements between management and labor are as essential to the war effort now as they were a year ago. A big war-production job still remains ahead. There is so much post-war talk going around that many people seem to have got the impression that war-production schedules are being reduced. I want to correct that impression. I want to make it clear that at the present time the rate of munitions production is nearly 14 percent higher than the average 1943 monthly rate. The April 1 schedules call for nearly $69,000,000,000 worth of munitions production in 1944. This represents an average monthly rate of nearly five and three-fourths billion, 20 percent above the average monthly rate for 1943. The magnitude of the 1944 production job is made plain by the fact that output must rise still further over the high current rate to meet the production peak planned for next November.

This year has already seen new peaks of achievement in many war programs. True, some programs have been cut back substantially. Others will be cut back in the future. But the over-all war-production schedules for 1944 call for the full energies of management and labor, working together. The Nation cannot now afford any diversion of energy to group agitation or to peacetime activities at the expense of war output.

One Hundredth Anniversary of the Y. M. C. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, Tuesday, June 6, 1944, was D-day on the continent of Europe.

As the world's greatest battle for the greatest stake in the world's history was in progress, the Paterson and Passaic, N. J., Y. M. C. A.'s were joining their brother institutions in 68 countries in commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of this organization in a small London room by George Williams and a group of friends.

George Williams' room has been destroyed by Nazi bombs in this war and speakers at these birthday parties in my district emphasized that while war may do away with human shrines it cannot obliterate the values for which they stand. This is an inspiring thought as the Y. M. C. A. begins its second century of service for the mind, body, and spirit of our young manhood while aiding them as they take part in a major war for the fourth time.

Vincent Vandervoort, president of the Paterson Y, called upon Walter Lindell, general executive secretary, to make presentations to three of his assistants who had served the organization a combined total of 80 years. They were Alfred M. Chilson, membership and public relations secretary, 28 years; Martha Hausaman, dormitory matron, 27 years; and William H. Stanley, service department, 25 years.

In Passaic, where Amos H. Morrison is general executive secretary, Carl Helfrich, vice president, had John Baker, Metropolitan Opera Co. baritone, sing in the gymnasium in which he played basketball and volley ball as a boy.

I have always been a believer in and a supporter of the Y. M. C. A. I have lived in the dormitories of the New Haven, Conn., Brooklyn, N. Y., and Passaic Y buildings. It was the first dormitory occupant of the Passaic Y, moving into the building some few weeks before it was formally opened.

When I was a lad I fulfilled my ambition to join the Y as soon as my age permitted. I want my boys to do likewise.

Congratulations and best wishes go out to the Y. M. C. A.'s in my district for their contributions to the good and welfare of community, State, Nation, and all mankind.

Address by Hon. Richard B. Russell, of Georgia, to West Virginia Bankers' Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 8 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech I delivered at the anniversary meeting of the West Virginia Bankers' Association held in Charleston, W. Va., on the evening of June 2, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, I am fully conscious of the high honor paid me by your invitation to address you this evening. It is pleasant to get away from the arduous life of Washington occasionally, and most helpful to meet with such organizations as yours, composed of people who carry on the business of this country and help support our Government.

In this greatest of all World Wars our National Capital has become the nerve center of the war effort of all the United Nations. It is true that there is confusion and bewilderment aplenty in Washington, but history is being made there daily. I shall not, however, talk to you tonight about what is transpiring in Washington. I shall eschew politics or mention of pending legislation. If I were capable of doing so, I would not talk shop by attempting to discuss banking problems with you.

Nearly every American citizen has some loved one or close friend who tonight is far from home taking part in this gigantic contest. Our hopes, our hearts, and our minds are with them in their daily tasks on the far-flung fronts of this global struggle for our existence as a free people. I have had unusual opportunities to observe how the men and women who are fighting this war for us are living, thinking, and serving. It was my privilege to act as chairman of the only congressional committee which has visited our fighting men of every branch of the service in every section of the world where the Stars and Stripes fly. The trip entailed 45,000 miles of airplane travel. We circled the globe and twice crossed the Equator.

Ever flying eastward, we traveled from Washington to the remote forested fastnesses of Newfoundland, across the towering peaks and icecap of Greenland to Iceland, over the North Sea to England, and, skirting the Iberian Peninsula and Gibraltar, on down to north Africa. After visiting with the men of the Army who have recently broken the Hitler line in Italy and the men of the Navy who transport and supply them across the Mediterranean, we flew from that theater across the Pyramids of Egypt and the Bible lands of the middle east down to Basra and Abadan on the Persian Gulf.

We are really fighting two wars—one European and the other Asiatic. When we left Abadan we moved from the European theater, where all of the effort is directed against the Germans, into the Asiatic theater, where our enemy is the hated Jap. We flew entirely across India to the Province of Assam, where tea plantations have given way to airdromes and warehouses. Flying at 22,000 feet over the Himalayas, we negotiated the famed Burma Hump into ancient China. Returning from China in another flight over the hump, we went by Calcutta to Ceylon.

From Ceylon we flew 3,300 miles over the Jap infested waters of the Indian Ocean to Australia. This flight was a great adventure, for it was the first time that a land-based plane had ever traversed this route. We flew over much of the vast continent of Australia and to New Guinea and the other jungle-covered islands of the Pacific to Hawaii, and then home.

Time will not permit me to give you my impressions of the leaders of our allies with whom I was privileged to talk. Among others we were received by the King and Queen of England, visited with Mr. Churchill at 10 Downing Street, and had dinner with the Generalissimo and Mme. Chiang Kai-shek in their home at Chungking.

Our first interest was in the life and welfare of G. I. Joe and the men commanding him. It was the experience of a lifetime to see these American boys and girls, the product of our democratic institutions, waging war in every clime and under every conceivable condition. We talked to men of every rank and every branch of the service. We ate with them at their mess, and observed them in the field. We visited the hospitals and the Red Cross canteens. We undertook to make a thorough investigation of the provisions made for the health and well-being of our men and the suitability of the weapons provided them.

I do not pose as any expert in military strategy, but no one could have seen and heard the things which came to our attention on this trip without having come comprehension of the tremendous job still to be done before our men can return home. The single problem of transportation involved in this war would tax our resources even if we did not have the additional task of destroying a well-armed, well-equipped, and well-trained enemy. Thousands of tons of food, clothing, ammunition, and motorized equipment must be at the point it is needed at the moment of need if our men are not to suffer. It has not only involved the construction of millions of tons of ocean shipping and the use of thousands of transport planes, but the building of airfields, railroads, highways, and jungle trails.

We often hear that this is a mechanized war. That this is true is attested by the tens of thousands of trucks, tanks, planes, and ships involved. But there are fronts where our men are still dependent upon supplies and ammunition transported by mules, camels, and, indeed, by human carriers. The difficulty of supplying General Chennault and General Stilwell in China is perhaps the greatest of those involved anywhere. Every gallon of gasoline, every bomb, every pound of supplies going to our forces stationed in China must not only be carried by steamship for many thousands of miles to Calcutta, but after reaching there must be loaded and unloaded nine different times and flown by our heroic transport pilots over the towering peaks of the Burma hump before they can be used against the enemy.

There are remote and lonely outposts, far removed from civilization or from threat of enemy action, which must be maintained to assure the successful prosecution of the war. Most men would prefer actual battle duty to long months of drudgery at the isolated bases in Newfoundland, Labrador, Iceland, and many of the stepping stones of the Pacific. There will be many real heroes of this war who have never heard a gun fired by an enemy. Down on the scorching rim of the Persian Gulf at Basra in Persia, thousands of Americans are engaged in handling and assembling the planes, tanks, trucks, and other war equipment which is being transferred under lend-lease to our Russian allies. The day that we arrived there the temperature was 152 at the airport. It is so unbelievably hot that a wrench left out in the midday sun for a short while cannot be picked up without heavy gloves. The living conditions of the inhabitants of that section are incredibly primitive, and our men have practically no recreation except an occasional moving picture show. They are doing so well that instead of the Russians urging us to supply them the tools, we are compelled to insist that they get the guns and tanks and planes out of the way.

Veritable factories and foundries have been established in other out-of-the-way places where unsung heroes toil day and night to keep the tools of war functioning for those who are to handle them in battle. In the South Pacific an airfield that was essential to the attack on Bougainville Island was constructed by Navy Seabees in 4 days by working 20 hours a day. Those men, however, had plenty of excitement, because the Japs bombed them two or three times during the progress of the work.

The resourcefulness and unfailing good humor of our boys—whether in the ice and snow of the Arctic Circle or the indescribable heat of the tropics or in the constant rains of the monsoon season in Burma and Assam—are most inspiring. No one could see it without being proud that he too is an American. Almost every unit has the counterpart of the corner drug store wit known to every small town, and the wisecracks of these company jesters will become a part of the history of this war.

The performance of our men in battle is all that could be asked. They are living up to the best traditions of our armed forces. We spent some time in England with the bombardment and fighter groups that are over Germany and the Continent almost daily. This is a grim business, and it does not take many sorties to make men out of boys. It is noteworthy that not since we began bombing the military installations of Europe has a single one of our air bombardment groups ever turned back on account of enemy action until after the bombs had been dropped on the target. I shall never forget the emotion I experienced on seeing bombers briefed out for attack, both from England and the South Pacific. It tears the heartstrings to see the tragedy in the eyes of boys who return to lift the body of a comrade who has lived with them for months out of a plane filled with flak or rocket holes.

Every branch of the service has its full share of heroes. I talked to dozens of them, and [illegible] word of braggadocio. It was difficult to believe that these mere boys, as soft-spoken and modest as a country maid, could have performed the feats of daring attributed to them.

Here would be one who had had his PT boat shot to pieces under him in the Solomons, but who had landed on a Jap-held island where he waged a one-man war for days until rescued. Another, a marine, had arisen from his fox hole as a Jap tank passed over and placed a grenade in the tread, immobilizing that instrument of destruction within a few feet of him. In a hospital we talked to a cheerful lad still in his teens who, with his comrades all killed or wounded and himself shot through both legs, had continued to operate a machine gun against three German counterattacks on an important strong point until relief came. These are but samples of hundreds that I could recite to you to demonstrate beyond peradventure the high courage of our fighting men.

It will be reassuring to those whose sons are overseas to know that our armed forces are the best equipped, the best clothed, and the best fed fighting organization that the world has ever seen. American production and ingenuity have justified our proudest boasts by turning out tools of war of the highest quality. Except in some of the more remote areas and during actual fighting operations, where there is not much variety of food, the mess served to G. I. Joe contains plenty of substantial food that is usually well prepared.

The medical service which is available to our sick and wounded is infinitely superior to that which can be had by the average citizen at home. I never cease to marvel at the miracles performed by our doctors and nurses, not only in the base hospitals but in the medical units that accompany the troops during operations. The nurses are entitled to especial credit, and many of the wounded were loud in their praise of the so-called flying angels who accompany the transport planes and take care of the men as they are flown back from the front to medical centers. The use of blood plasma, penicillin, sulfa drugs, and other new methods are saving the lives of thousands who would have perished in any other war.

On the whole, we have been very fortunate in our selection of the men who command. General Chennault in China is a great military genius. MacArthur in the Pacific has done more than he was asked to do. He was expected only to hold the Japanese, but he successfully took the offensive with very limited resources. Eisenhower is an able leader, and Halsey and Nimitz are true fighting men of the sea.

Mistakes have been made, but they have not been repeated. If the civilian population at home will support our armed forces with the same zeal and determination displayed by the men in the field, they will win this war for us quicker than we really have any right to expect.

The greatest American Army ever assembled is poised tonight in the British Isles awaiting orders for the invasion of the Continent. The hopes and prayers of all our people are with them as they prepare to embark upon the greatest military operation of all time. Our air blows are increasing in intensity and in numbers of planes and bombs. On some days the number of men in the air over Germany is equal to a full division.

There is some difference of opinion as to the value of aerial bombardment. We know that however severe it may be, a strongly fortified position cannot be wrested from the enemy by bombing alone. However, it has a profound effect on the course of war. From what I saw of the reconnaissance photographs taken of such cities as Hamburg and Frankfurt after devastating raids, I can but feel that these attacks have done much to soften up the enemy for the invasion, in addition to the great destruction of his factories and transportation. The fact that the Germans now have from eight to ten million people who have been driven from their homes to the fields and roads and into unbelievably crowded quarters cannot inspire any love of nazi-ism or increase their confidence and faith in the promises of Hitler and Goering.

Absolute command of the skies will be of tremendous importance on D-day. I do not know the day and hour of invasion, and I am glad that I do not. From what I saw of the men who are to make this great attack, I am convinced that they do not have the "invasion jitters" nearly so badly as do we who are here at home. These men have spent long hours in arduous training for the task before them. They are ready for the test. In fact, they are impatient for the order to move. They have confidence in themselves, in their weapons, and in their leaders. They want to go in and get the job over. Europe may be one strong fortress, just as Hitler claims, but I have faith that General Eisenhower and his staff will not strike until they are ready, even to the last button on the last man's shirt, and are fully confident that they will break through.

Despite all of the innovations of this war, with its 60-ton tanks and fleets of bombing planes, our experience in Italy and against the Japanese has shown us that in the last analysis victory will depend upon the man with the gun in his hands. The infantry is still the queen of battles. Without detracting one iota from the heroic accomplishments of our airmen or the thrilling exploits of PT boat and submarine crews and those who handle the tanks and half tracks, the final decision depends on the foot soldier, just as has been the case in all other wars. There is not much glamor attached to freezing in a foxhole or fighting insects in the incredible jungles of the Pacific islands, but we should never lose sight of the load that is being carried by the men who take their weapons along with them as they slog through dust and mud.

This war has brought out more new and spectacular weapons and rumors of others even more deadly than has any other war of history. Large bodies of air-borne troops are now an essential part of any attack. Complete divisions with all equipment except the heaviest artillery can now be transported far beyond the enemy's lines. Tanks of new and unusual size, speed, and fire power have been developed. Early in the war when the Germans smashed the French armies and forced the British evacuation at Dunkerque, it seemed that the tanks were almost unstoppable. However, something has always developed to offset any new innovation. The rocket gun and new artillery now turn tanks into blazing funeral pyres for the occupants. The Stuka dive bomber that was so much feared in the early days of the war is now almost obsolete. Our fast fighter planes shoot them down like clay pigeons. It seemed for a time that mine fields would be a better defense than the strongest fortifications. The invention of the mine detector enables engineers to remove those instruments of death without loss. I repeat that the infantry is still the backbone of any offensive army, and while all of the other branches are essential, the roads into Berlin and Tokyo will be carved by the bayonets of the foot soldiers.

Hitler and Hirohito have made many mistakes in this war, but the one that proved their undoing was the illusion that the American people had grown too soft and luxury loving to wage war successfully. It was inconceivable to them that a people with our high standard of living—people who enjoyed peace and who did not love war for the sake of war's brutality and destruction—could become so transformed by attack that we would produce the toughest and most efficient fighting machine that the world has ever seen. It must be difficult even with the evidence before their very eyes for them to realize that the youth of this land, the product of the hated institutions of democracy, are proving themselves more than a match for soldiers who, as wards of the State, have been taught to goose-step since infancy, and have been trained all their lives in the art of war.

Indeed, there were many patriotic Americans who had serious misgivings as to the ability of this generation to meet the test of war's crucible. The magnificent performance of our armed forces under every conceivable condition has satisfied the most skeptical. The dictators see their empires falling in ruins under the sledgehammer blows of men who were born free—men who hate war, but fight with reckless fury to destroy the forces that threaten their way of life.

There are now those who say that military training has so instilled the desire to kill and the instincts of brutality in our millions of fighting men that they will pose an almost insoluble problem on their return after the victory is won. I have read a number of articles which stressed the difficulties foreseen by the authors to reintegrate these men into our civilian life.

In my opinion, all of these fears are sheer tommyrot. I have talked to any number of the heroes of this war—men who have shot down numbers of enemy planes, boys who have killed 25 or 30 Japs, those who have been severely wounded, and men who have seen their closest friends fall by their sides. Their hatred of the enemy and their determination to destroy them is in some cases almost terrifying, but I have yet to see any man in our armed forces who is not anxious to get this thing over as soon as possible and return to the normal pursuits of civilian life. Fighting and killing are distasteful to all of them. It is but a means to an end. Even as they fight they dream of returning to work on the farm or in the shop or the bank in the old home town as soon as the danger which threatened a free life there has been completely destroyed. We all love the things for which we sacrifice. These men who have done so much for this Nation will be better citizens for their experiences. They will protect our institutions of Government and our individual rights as American citizens as well in the peaceful days to come as they have done upon the fields of battle.

The men who are actually fighting this war do not believe that it is nearly over. They cannot understand the queer feeling on the part of so many American people that the victory is almost in our grasp. These men know that although there are now 50,000 gold stars in the windows of American homes, all that has taken place heretofore in this war is in the nature of a skirmish preparatory to the real battle. The idea that any considerable number of our people are complacent or overoptimistic is infuriating to the G. I. Joe who has been pinned down by machine gun and mortar fire for 3 or 4 days and has had nothing to eat but K rations during that period. We are unworthy of the sacrifices that are being made by the flower of our youth if we relax for 1 second in our support of our armed forces. We at home have merely suffered petty inconveniences as a result of this war. No civilian population of any nation has made fewer sacrifices. The men at the front should certainly have the right to expect that so long as they are risking their lives daily we should, for the emergency at least, be willing to forego any idea of business as usual, politics as usual, and strikes as usual.

Even when Germany finally crumbles and the European war is done, we cannot afford to relax our efforts for one moment. Indeed, the Japs lay great store in the hope that the war in Europe will be so exhausting that the American people will not be willing to make the sacrifices that will be necessary to beat the Japanese finally to their knees. We must bear in mind that within the area which they have conquered the Japs have every resource that is necessary for making war. They are a nation of fanatical brutes who do not recognize any of the rules of war, and who generally die rather than surrender. I doubt that we can knock them out of the war by bombing any more than we can force Germany to surrender through the same process. We are a long way from bases which will permit the operation of heavy bombers against them.

The situation in China is very critical. The people are war-weary, and but for the firm hand of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek would have doubtless abandoned the struggle. I must say in all frankness that the Chinese troops that I saw, with the exception of the divisions trained and equipped in India by American officers, do not constitute armies in the sense that we generally use that word. They are poorly equipped and more poorly fed. We need not deceive ourselves with any idea that we will be able to supply and equip the millions of potential soldiers in China, even if the Burma Road be opened or the Ledo Road be completed. It is going to be necessary for us to establish ourselves firmly on the coast of China and drive the Japanese out before this can be accomplished. Our military leaders have recently admitted this.

However long and hard may be the road to final and complete victory, we have no option but to travel it. We cannot hope to have an enduring peace if we are unwilling to make any sacrifice which complete victory may require. The men in uniform are willing to make the sacrifices necessary to bring this victory to our country if the American people will support them.

Make no mistake about it. These men are thinking about the post-war world. Men who face death think of the future. The desire to live is strong. They have invested their sweat and blood in preserving America, and they have definite convictions about the world of tomorrow. They will have seen the prodigal expenditure of human life and suffering which has been poured out all over the world. In the grim struggle to survive they have learned to think straight. If they make mistakes they cease to live. They are determined that as a nation we shall not repeat the mistakes which brought about this holocaust. They are just as determined to win the peace after the war is over as they are to secure victory by arms in the field. They are fighting for the way of life they know, and when the war is over they will demand that all of the rights and powers which the American people have willingly surrendered in time of war be restored to them.

They have seen the natural resources of America poured out with prodigal hand all over the world, and they realize the necessity for a long period of peace. We may not have the natural resources left to fight another war in the next generation. They realize that there is a limit somewhere in the amount of the national debt that the American people can assume for purposes of destruction. They are willing to assume their part of the responsibility for the repayment of the $300,000,000,000 or more dollars that we will owe when this war is over, but they do not intend either in their lifetime or in the next generation that a similar or greater debt shall be saddled upon the American people to pay for war.

The men that I talked to all over the world believe that America must assume her full share of international responsibility to keep the peace, and that our Nation must cooperate with the other peoples of the earth to see that madmen are not again permitted to set the world in flames. These men will demand a strong America, and I do not believe that they will permit us to sink the great Navy that we have assembled at such great cost when this war is over. They will insist that we maintain a navy and air establishment sufficient to defend us against any foe and to discharge our obligations to keep the peace.

They know from first-hand experience all about the real horrors of war. They have seen their comrades bleed and die. In the Pacific area particularly there is unspeakable bitterness in their minds and hearts at the ruthless brutality which has been shown by the Japanese in their treatment of those so unfortunate as to fall into their hands. They have heard the story of the "march of death," and they have seen the forms of those who, despite the fact they were wounded and helpless, had been horribly mangled by the Japanese. They will not tolerate a peace that does not assure that the criminals who started this war and those who have waged it in an inhuman manner shall receive full punishment for their crimes. The cry for vengeance for the beheading of the Tokyo fliers and those who fell in the "march of death" or as helpless prisoners were disemboweled in the islands of the Pacific will not still until this be done.

For my part, I agree with them that one of the surest ways to prevent war and such acts of brutality in the future is to make an example of these unspeakable criminals that will serve to deter any potential Hitlers and Hirohitos for the next thousand years.

Pay-as-We-Go Amendment to the Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 8 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an exceedingly able article contained in the latest issue of the Saturday Evening Post, and written by Senator MILLARD E. TYDINGS, of Maryland, respecting a pay-as-we-go amendment to the Constitution.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY I PROPOSED A PAY-AS-WE-GO AMENDMENT

(By MILLARD E. TYDINGS, United States Senator from Maryland)

How the United States Government can pay its bills and maintain its credit is certain to be at the forefront of our post-war problems. Although there are some people described as economists who think we can get along without ever paying our expenses or decreasing our debt, the average citizen has not gone along with this extraordinary notion. The Saturday Evening Post has asked me, as the author of a proposed amendment to the Constitution requiring a pay-as-we-go policy in time of peace, to enlarge upon my reasons for believing that such a change in fiscal policy is imperative. With this request I am glad to comply.

For 96 of its 155 years of existence, our National Government has lived within its income. Only for 59 years has it gone into debt by spending more than it took in. For 17 out of these 59 years, the United States was engaged in a major war and, understandably, could not balance its Budget.

So, when we look back over the record, we find that, in time of peace, our National Government lived within its income for 96 years, and beyond it for only 42 years of our life as a nation.

From the time that Washington became our first President and until the commencement of World War No. 1—except for the 4 years of our own Civil War—there was never an annual deficit greater than $90,000,000. Even during World War No. 1, we went into debt only $853,000,000 in 1917, $9,000,000,000 in 1918, and $13,000,000,000 in 1919. A part of this debt was incurred through the huge war loan we then made to our allies. From 1920 to 1930, because the National Government spent less than it took in, the national debt created by World War No. 1 was substantially reduced. But beginning with the year 1930, the Government has been spending much more each year than it has received. Little effort, if any, has been made to balance the National Budget. In the 10-year period from 1930 to 1940, the Government's debt was increased approximately $27,000,000,000, an average deficit of $2,700,000,000 a year.

Superimposed on this peacetime debt are the unprecedented borrowings by our Government during the present war. It is estimated that when peace comes the Government of the United States will owe $300,000,000,000—an average of $8,500 against every family in this Nation, rich and poor, high and low, black and white. Never before have we been confronted with a national debt of such stupendous proportions. The interest alone on that debt in the post-war period, figured at 2½ percent, will consume revenues of $7,500,000,000 a year. Up to 1940, our Government never had revenues in any year of more than $7,000,000,000, so we see that in the post-war period the interest charge alone will require more money than our national Government took in in any one year before 1940.

When we consider that, by next July, two-thirds of the total deposits of all the banks of every kind in the United States will have been lent to our Government and $15,000,000,000 of the cash reserves and assets of the life-insurance companies will likewise have been lent to our Government, it seems apparent that a sound program for governmental finance in the post-war period is imperative. If we continue, as a Nation, to live upon the future, to spend more than we take in, we are likely to undermine the confidence of everyone in the financial stability of our Government. Plainly, that would bring on a tremendous depression, with extremely widespread distress. Not only would it threaten the safety of every bank deposit and life-insurance policy but business stagnation, great unemployment and the loss of farms and homes would be highly probable.

This condition should and can be avoided. It can be done only if, as a general policy, the national Government is compelled to live within its means in peacetime. If such a policy is adopted, there will be no loss of confidence in the conduct of our national Government. No one need worry about the safety of his bank deposit or life-insurance policy. In those circumstances, the debt need not cause depression, distress, or unemployment.

At present, few realize there is no restriction on the President or the Congress requiring them to live within the Government's income. With the privilege to appropriate money, the Constitution provides no accompanying restraint or even responsibility on Congress or the President to raise the money which is appropriated. The Government is not required in peacetime to cut its coat according to its cloth. If Congress appropriates and the President approves an appropriation in excess of the Government's revenues, under the present system the Secretary of the Treasury simply goes out and borrows the needed money. This policy worked well enough most of the time, for the Government has generally lived within its means—at any rate, in time of peace. Our national debt never soared above $26,000,000,000 before 1933 even in time of war.

But now we cannot take for granted the future fiscal policy of our National Government. There is too much danger in such a course. There is too much potential disaster and distress inherent in a policy of chance. Henceforth, in peacetime, such contingencies as a mounting debt must be avoided if the general welfare of the Nation is to be promoted and preserved.

To accomplish this result, I have introduced in the United States Senate, and Congressman DISNEY, of Oklahoma, has introduced in the House, an amendment to our National Constitution. It reads as follows:

"On the first day of each regular session, the President shall transmit to the Congress his estimates of the receipts of the Government during the ensuing fiscal year under the laws existing on such date, together with his recommendations as to the purposes for which such receipts shall be expended, and, except in time of war or during the period ending on the date of the expiration of 1 full fiscal year after the termination thereof, the Congress shall not appropriate money for expenditure during such fiscal year in excess of such estimated receipts, as transmitted or as modified or revised by the President, except by a vote of three-fifths of each House taken by yeas and nays, unless prior to the making of such appropriation the Congress shall have imposed such taxes, duties, imports, or excises as will raise additional revenues equal to the amount by which such appropriation exceeds such estimated receipts, or unles such appropriation be for the purpose of paying the expenses and contingencies of the Congress or the courts, or for the payment of claims against the United States, the justice of which shall have been judicially declared by such tribunal as may be established by the Congress for the investigation of claims against the Government."

The amendment speaks for itself. In time of war the Government can borrow. In any other national emergency so severe that Congress believes it wiser for it to borrow rather than to levy additional taxes, it can do so, provided three-fifths of the Members of each of the two Houses formally vote so to do.

Otherwise, Congress must live within its means. The country must be run on a pay-as-you-go basis in peacetime. If this amendment is adopted, every businessman, banker, labor leader, planner, Utopian, realist, theorist, and State and local official who comes before the appropriations committees to ask for billions for pet projects, for which the United States Government does not have the money, can be asked by Congress: "Where do you suggest that we raise this money in new taxes?" Congress and the President can point out that the Government cannot appropriate money in peacetime unless it raises the money through new taxes in such amounts as will keep its budget balanced.

Thus, all who ask for money will have to state where the money is to be obtained.

And any new tax plan suggested will put every taxpayer, from millionaire to wage earner, on notice. Appropriations, therefore, will be more carefully scrutinized. Only those apparently necessary are likely to be made. Congress is not a happy body when it is forced to levy new taxes.

The constitutional amendment will prohibit any President or Congress in the future from doing what has been done in the past: taking the easy road of borrowing instead of taxing to raise needed funds in peacetime. The war debt and the peacetime debt should by now have taught each wage earner that governmental borrowings mean higher taxes for him. Henceforth, in peacetime, under the Tydings-Disney amendment, Congress will have to put up the cash before it appropriates. The amendment forbids Congress to continue its live-easy, give-away-what-you-have-not-got policy into the post-war period. It prevents one Congress from passing the buck of paying for its appropriations on to the next Congress.

The amendment also has the virtue of compelling the President and the Congress to consider the relative merits of propositions for which appropriations are to be made. In his annual message to Congress the President would be required to estimate the receipts of the Government and to make recommendations as to how these receipts shall be allocated to meet the Nation's needs. Congress likewise would have to weigh carefully how the money it raises in taxes can best be spent in the interest of the Nation. Heretofore, appropriations have been made with little effort to weigh their relative merits. Under our our amendment, the President and Congress would have to decide, for example, what part of the expected revenues should be allocated to each department and agency of the Government. If the President and the Congress wanted to appropriate more than the estimated receipts, then they would have to raise the additional money and have it available for such purpose.

THE SAFETY VALVE

Furthermore, this constitutional amendment provides a good safety valve for dealing with unorthodox and highly critical emergencies. If the crisis is unforeseen, Congress could borrow and spend instead of raising new taxes, but only if three-fifths of the Members of each House of Congress, on formal roll call, deemed it wise to adopt such a policy for 1 year at a time. In all other cases, a pay-as-you-go policy would be mandatory in time of peace.

If Congress can be required to live on a pay-as-you-go basis in peacetime, the small owners of savings-bank accounts and life-insurance policies can breathe easily. More than that, every person in America will pay less taxes. Industry and business, large and small, will have unquestioned confidence in the financial integrity of the Government. Such confidence means for business a green light to go ahead, and for the people the best prospects for more jobs and good pay. All these things will be needed to meet the impact of the post-war period.

There is no way that Congress can be forced to adopt a pay-as-you-go basis except by constitutional amendment. A mere act of Congress requiring the Government to live within its means will not accomplish this result. In any appropriation bill Congress can circumvent the purpose of such a congressional law simply by using the words: "Notwithstanding the provisions of any law, the Congress hereby appropriates blank dollars."

THE NEED FOR AN AMENDMENT

Nor will a new congressionally created Budget law or Bureau keep Congress on a pay-as-you-go basis. We have a Budget law now, but Congress has been living beyond its means ever since 1930. A congressional Budget law, too, can be evaded whenever Congress wants to do so by the use of the magic words, "Notwithstanding the provisions of any law," at the beginning of an appropriation bill. The constitutional amendment outlined above is the only certain way to keep Congress on a pay-as-you-go basis in peacetime. Congress could not pass a valid law making an appropriation, no matter what words it used, if the appropriation violated a constitutional amendment.

When one considers the probable size of our national debt at the war's end, the sick world in which we shall then be living, the hard readjustment from war to peace in our governmental, industrial, and business life, and all the other dark clouds looming on the horizon, does not the Nation's welfare and safety depend upon a discontinuance in peacetime of a policy of borrow and spend? Does not the welfare of every working man and woman in America require a post-war policy of pay-as-you-go? I believe it does, and I believe the constitutional amendment set forth above is the only certain means to achieve such a policy.

The alternatives to pay as you go after the war are not pleasant to contemplate. Among them certainly are continued higher taxes; a constant threat to the value of our currency and to the savings of the people in savings accounts and life insurance; the repeated postponement of any effort to put our house in order; and, finally and only too probably, economic and political disaster and ruin. If there are any valid arguments against setting up now an adequate protection against such catastrophes, I do not know what they are.

As Voluntary as Slavery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, from time to time I have discussed the rules and regulations of the War Manpower Commission. Now that "controlled hiring" is to be made effective throughout the United States, Members of the House may be interested in knowing how newspaper editorial writers, in cities where the "controlled hiring" has been in use for months, feel about the War Manpower Commission plan.

As a part of my remarks I include an editorial from the Hartford Courant and one from the Hartford Times. The Courant is a Republican paper while the Times represents the Democratic school of thought.

These papers seem to be trying to outdo each other in expressing their disapproval of the War Manpower Commission's rules and regulations:

[From the Hartford Times]

FORCED LABOR IN DISGUISE

One important purpose of the War Manpower Commission in taking control of the full-time employment of all males under 17 in the Nation and establishing labor ceilings for all employers, is to facilitate the speedy transfer of idle manpower in labor surplus areas to areas where shortages have become critical.

That is a glib way of describing a plan of regimentation, whereby men will work where they are ordered to, even, conceivably, being shifted from one part of the country to another whether they are willing to go or not.

That could not be done directly, of course. We have not quite reached the point where forced labor is acceptable. It will be done by indirection. The idea is that men will be forced into labor shortage areas by the simple process of not letting them obtain employment elsewhere, a sort of work-where-we-tell-you-or-starve arrangement.

Even if any such plan is legal—Congressman MILLER contends it isn't—it is sure to cause a furor.

Chairman McNutt of the Manpower Commission apparently recognizes that for he embroiders the plant with modifications, designed to make it palatable. He intimates plans to use other approved arrangements, besides simply channeling all employment through the United States Employment Service.

This apparently includes a program which appears to have approval already in this area where the system now proposed for the Nation has been in effect. Some union men who apply to the U. S. E. S. instead of being referred to jobs, have been referred back to their unions, which have placed them in situations of which they were cognizant. Industrial leaders have contended that if labor unions are thus to have the privileges of finding employment for their own members, employers should not be held rigidly to use of the U. S. E. S. The Mayor's Manpower Committee has suggested that employers, operating under their ceilings, be permitted to hire applicants directly, subject to the approval by the U. S. E. S. of their procedure.

Mr. McNutt apparently contemplates something of that sort in connection with the national plan, for he concedes that U. S. E. S. may "delegate employment to local placement committees under suitable safeguards, to employers with good records, or to unions," etc.

Obviously it is desirable that some such modification should be adopted if the plan is to go through.

The whole idea seems ill-advised, at a time when flexibility rather than rigidity employment-wise appears to be the need. In many lines the problem may soon be one of finding employment rather than of finding workers. Communities may have to deal with unemployment rather than labor shortage. There should be a better way of meeting immediate needs than the arbitrary one Mr. McNutt proposes.

[From the Hartford Courant]

M'NUTT'S LABOR DRAFT

When Manpower Commissioner Paul V. McNutt was asked if his order extending to the whole Nation the hiring controls with which Hartford is now familiar was made necessary by the lack of national service legislation, he replied that it had "no relation to any legislation." Where, then, does he or the War Manpower Commission derive its authority to require that all labor, except farm labor and persons in establishments employing 8 or fewer, apply for jobs through, and be assigned to them by, the United States Employment Service? To state that the plan, effective July 1, is voluntary on the part of management and labor is grossly to misrepresent it. The rules are presented by the W. M. C. and so are the penalties for violating those rules. It is no more "voluntary" than is slavery.

The most charitable description that can be applied to Mr. McNutt's order is that it is a labor draft, irrespectively of the honeyed phraseology employed to defend it. "The successful conduct of the war," says Mr. McNutt, "now requires the channeling of all available male labor in the Nation to jobs of greatest war production urgency and the retention of such labor in those jobs." If that is a fair presentation of the situation, why the pampering policy toward the sit-in strikers at the Brewster Aeronautical Co.?

To emphasize how indefensible is this plan of the Federal Government to provide work for the Brewster employees because the Navy Department had unexpectedly canceled contracts for planes, observe what Mr. McNutt offers in extenuation of his manpower draft order: "Workers who may be released in such conditions (referring to cut-backs and contract cancelations) are sorely needed in other plants or other areas where war production schedules are being increased. Experience in the past has shown that this easing of manpower does not result in the filling of all labor demands in critical war industries."

If another sit-in occurs, will the U. S. E. S. "channel" the laborers into other industries at some distant point from the laborers affected by a cut-back or contract termination? Such a course cannot be followed until the employees themselves apply to U. S. E. S. for work. Mr. McNutt's order may be wholly ineffectual in meeting situations similar to that at the Brewster plant early this week.

This compulsory labor policy promulgated by Mr. McNutt marks, within less than 2 years, at least the sixth shift in his position on that issue. As recently as 8 weeks ago he opposed the proposal to enact a compromise National Service Act because, in his judgment, it would be "little less than tragic" to displace "voluntary cooperation with military or bureaucratic processes." The blunt truth is that Mr. McNutt's order is an excellent example of bureaucratic processes in government. He admits that it has "no relation to any legislation." It is bureaucracy characteristically attempting to do what the legislative power has refused to approve.

Domestic Issues in Aviation Planning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Rotary Club of New York City at a meeting held at the Commodore Hotel on June 1, 1944:

Much of the recent public discussion of civil aviation has centered around the problems of international air transport and the place the United States is to have in that field. One of the most important subjects discussed is the extent to which nations will permit aircraft of other countries to fly through the air space above their territories.

The effect of present international law requires any international commercial operator or his government to secure the approval of every country through which a proposed new route lies even for the flight of aircraft through its air space and the landing of the aircraft for purely technical purposes. This has always resulted in time-consuming and difficult negotiations and often has prevented the establishment of needed services. Even more protracted international bargaining must precede the granting of authority by one country for the aircraft of another country to engage in commercial operations within its borders.

Many of us interested in the development of international aviation have been greatly concerned lest the continuation of this system result in impairing substantially the great strides of international air transportation anticipated after the war. Proposals have been made that new international arrangements be established by which the aircraft of any country would be permitted to fly through the air space of any other and stop at its airports for technical purposes, such as refueling, repairs, and so forth. Others have involved even more radical departures from the present law. It is indeed important that this tremendous international problem be given adequate consideration and that obstacles to the development of this new means of communication, with all the nations of the world, be eliminated to the extent consistent with the protection of our national interests.

But equally important and equally serious in its implications is the similar problem affecting operations solely within the United States. If precedents in a surface-carrier field are followed, conflicting State regulation imposed upon aircraft flying within their borders will obstruct the development of aviation within our borders just as seriously as the adoption of highly nationalistic policies will impede the conquest of international aviation.

The conflicts in State legislation with respect to the operations of trucks is a familiar story now, but specific examples will indicate how far these conflicts have gone. Most States have passed laws or regulations dealing with the maximum length and the maximum weights of trucks and the type of night lights they must display. In Illinois a truck may be 50 feet long and carry a maximum weight of 72,000 pounds. In Indiana, the adjoining State, a truck may be only 40 feet long and carry 40,000 pounds. In Kentucky the length is reduced still further to 30 feet and the gross weight to 18,000 pounds. In Tennessee a truck can be 35 feet long and carry 30,000 pounds. Georgia is nearly as liberal as Illinois and permits the truck to be 45 feet long and carry a gross weight of 56,000 pounds. As to lights, Illinois requires three green lights on the front and three red ones on the rear. Indiana requires three amber lights on the front and two red lights on the rear. Kentucky requires one white or green light in front and one red light on the rear. Tennessee requires one white and one red or yellow light. Georgia merely requires that two lights be placed on front and rear. As can be readily recognized from that short statement of the laws of these five States a truck driver operating between Chicago and Atlanta has many difficult problems to face.

Aviation cannot progress under this type of conflicting regulations. Indeed, it would be surprising if the industry could even survive under such conditions. Aviation's greatest contribution to the public good has been the ability it has given us to move from place to place at high speeds and without hindrance from surface obstacles. Its major attribute would be lost if the flier would have to proceed haltingly across the country, being met at each State line with a new and different set of regulations. I have often been impressed with that fact as I have flown. Only last week I flew from Morgantown, W. Va., to Washington in 55 minutes. During that time we crossed portions of four States and the District of Columbia. Flying from Washington to New York, a trip of approximately 1½ hours, carries you over 6 States and the District of Columbia. Rules and practices which have grown up in governing surface means of transport cannot be adapted unthinkingly to the air.

Aviation, until now, has been permitted to develop for the most part under completely uniform regulations prescribed by the Federal Government. The States have done little in the regulatory field, although State agencies have done a really magnificent job in promoting aviation through the establishment of airports, air marking, promotion of flying schools, flying clubs, and the like. However, in anticipation of a large increase in flying, both private and commercial, many States are giving consideration to the exercise of regulatory powers over this form of transportation. Several State legislatures have recently passed new regulatory laws, and I understand that many others anticipate doing so within the next 2 years. The enactment of such laws by the States can have extremely serious consequences if they are not prepared after due consideration for the vital need for the establishment of and maintenance of a uniform national policy for aviation. They can result in striking down the freedom of the air space over the United States and turning it into a patchwork of small sovereignties, each one with its regulatory code which must be complied with by the air line, the charter operator, and the private flier.

In thinking about this problem I was greatly impressed by reading a recent report of the British Labor Party. That party made a study of European air transportation prior to the war, and the findings contain an excellent analysis of European operations during that time. The report is quite critical of the European system and emphasizes particularly the high subsidies required to keep even that inadequate system in operation. On the other hand, the report praises our national air-transport system highly and attributes its success to the fact that we are a United States in which aviation has been permitted to grow under a uniform national policy. I take the liberty of reading one short quotation from that report because it represents the objective views of an extremely important part of British public opinion. The quotation follows:

"Turn now for comparison to the United States. There, the mileage flown was far higher than anywhere else in the world; standards of efficiency, comfort for passengers were much higher than elsewhere; an air-mail service began as early as 1918; and a network of air lines lighted for flying by night covered the whole vast area. A passenger could board an airplane one evening in New York and alight next morning in San Francisco, 3,000 miles away.

"Why was America ahead of Europe in this respect? One reason was the geography and climate of the country; another was the high ability of American designers and technicians and the vast industrial resources available to them. But the chief reason was that the United States is the United States. A single Federal authority could organize and finance the ground organization on a uniform basis, right across the continent; which meant that no part of a chain of airports, beacons, etc., would be left out because of a local lack of resources. Controlling the ground organization, the Federal authority was in a key position, enabling it to secure a measure of unity in the system and a measure of protection for the public interest. In Europe no such authority existed."

This passage expresses my thought exactly. In planning for the future of our national system we must be extremely careful that through independent and uncoordinated action of the States we do not lose the tremendous advantage pointed out by the British. I am not conjuring up ghosts. This is not an idle fear.

There came to my desk only recently certain regulations proposed to be issued by the Colorado Public Utilities Commission for application to air carriers operating in that State. These regulations are over 100 pages long and cover the operations of both interstate and intrastate air carriers in the greatest of detail even down to the ash containers in the passenger cabins. The Colorado Public Utilities Commission proposes to designate the routes to be followed by interstate air carriers operating across that State. The Federal Government now designates such routes and the possibilities of conflicts between the two agencies are obvious. The regulations also provide that the Public Utilities Commission of Colorado will determine that the air carriers' aircraft are safe. This is also done by the Federal Government at the present time.

The most elaborate precautions are taken by the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Civil Aeronautics Administration to see to it that aircraft are fully airworthy before the public is permitted to ride in them. Federal aeronautical engineers observe every step in the design and construction of new aircraft and elaborate tests are made to make sure that it is strucutrally sound and its performance characteristics are satisfactory. Colorado, under its proposed regulations, would do this also and it is impossible to determine what effect such stringent State regulations would have upon the development of interstate flying. Numerous similar possibilities of conflict could be drawn from this lengthy and detailed set of regulations, but these are sufficient to illustrate the seriousness of the problem which faces aviation today.

Many people have spoken to me despairingly of the possibility of doing anything to anticipate and avoid the creation of these barriers to interstate flying. This is a completely defeatist position because there should be no conflict in objectives between the Federal Government and the State governments in the development of this important means of communication. If its progress is impaired we will all be adversely affected.

It behooves the Congress and the officials of Federal and State Governments to cooperate among themselves to see to it that a really workable solution to the problem is worked out. Many feel that it can only be solved by vesting exclusive regulatory power in the Federal Government. Others take the position that such a proposal would unduly impair the rights of the States. My position is that both can and must cooperate for the final answer to this problem. Steps must be taken immediately to bring it to a conclusion.

Address of Hon. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, Delivered to Graduating Class of Southwestern College, May 23, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD DAVIS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, Southwestern College is located at Memphis, Tenn.

On May 23, 1944, this outstanding institution celebrated its ninety-fifth commencement. There was a popular demand that our colleague, the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, deliver the commencement address.

Walter Armstrong, former president of the American Bar Association, a resident of my city, and Walter Chandler, now mayor of Memphis, who served on the Judiciary Committee while a Member of Congress, joined with me and others in persuading Judge SUMNERS to take time out of his busy life to make this contribution to this university, with a long history of accomplishments.

His address was so well received and so like Judge SUMNERS that I have asked leave to extend my remarks and to include this address in order that the membership of the House may be privileged to read it:

Especially because I am a native Tennessean and deeply concerned in everything which is of interest to the people of the State of my birth, I am deeply grateful for this privilege and this opportunity.

I am not going to try to deliver an orthodox commencement address of big words used to unsimplify practical things.

You are going out into a world of great confusion. You will confront the greatest difficulties which in centuries have come to challenge the genius and the fitness of any generation to survive. You are going to have tough going. There is one consolation in that you are going to have the opportunity and the necessity to do great things. Only great difficulties ever make a great man or a great woman. The greatest ages in the world are those in which a people with courage and a purpose which would not yield fought their way through great difficulties. Perhaps your greatest difficulty is going to be in the field of government, economic and political. I am quite sure of that.

Notwithstanding the physical scars which this war will leave on the surface of the earth and upon the bodies of people, the earth will still be here. But the question will be whether or not the problems of government which will follow this war will be greater than the capacity of democratic government to deal with. A great many people are insisting that they will be greater than the capacity of democratic government. As a matter of fact, there are many people in this country who have lost faith in democratic governments. Some do not want it. There is tremendous confusion about the whole matter. I am one of those who feel absolutely certain that we in America at least can continue to operate and successfully deal with our problems through the machinery of democratic government. But I am certain that, in order for that to be possible, we must understand the nature of democratic government and must recognize that government is not the one hiatus in all nature where natural laws do not limit human discretion and determine sound policy. We must discover those natural laws and bring governmental policy into harmony with them.

When I was a country boy living on my father's farm over here in Lincoln County I heard him say one day that "there is no result without corresponding antecedent, adequate cause." I had him explain what he meant. As soon as I got the explanation I began to make an examination in the fields and the woods. I found his statement to be true. That discovery opened a great big door into a great big world. On our farm I discovered convincing evidence of design and system and execution; a great intelligence, a great power; a system of laws of nature, laws of God, permeating the universe governing everywhere, from the smallest particle of the atom up through all creation, up through the great systems of worlds that light up the skies on a clear night.

I looked at the trees, really looked at them. I knew they were not making themselves. They were being built. The rosebush in our yard was not making the rose blossom. It could not do it. It could not get exactly the right amount of sunshine, soil, air, and water, and build them into the living flower. I knew the stars did not know where they were going, nor when to turn over.

As I went away from the farm and broadened my contacts and began to examine other things, I discovered that as we had gone from the log house to the skyscraper, from the wagon road to the road of steel, from the oxcart to the airplane, as we had moved into this highly developed scientific age of ours, it had been accomplished by discovering the natural laws which govern in these various fields of endeavor and bringing human skill into harmony with them. By that method we had made great progress in developing formulas and in devising instrumentalities such as machinery, which makes it possible for human beings to work in harmony with these discovered laws.

The initial step and every succeeding step in what we designate as the progress of this age has been achieved by familiarizing ourselves with natural law and doing things according to that law which inheres in the nature of things, which indicates the plans of nature and compels its execution, that law which human beings may not question and may not disregard.

Nowhere in all the fields of human endeavor, human responsibility and human necessity, except one, is there now in this age an attempt among intelligent human beings to go forward except as directed and guided by natural law, and that is the field of human government. There we are governed by the theories of man.

In our constitutional conventions they talked about the plan of nature, the laws of nature, operating in the field of government. Their discussions clearly show they recognized that free governments are not accidents, that they are provided for in the big economy, that they originate, develop, and operate under natural laws, and that it is fixed in human nature, in the difficulties of social life the absolute necessity that there shall be government.

It is not an accident that there is in the human heart an aspiration to be free. It is God-implanted, just as it is fixed in the human system that there shall be hunger for food. Nature could have created human beings so there would have been no necessity for government and no necessity for food; no necessity for anything. Everything would already have been provided. But that is not the plan of nature. People long to be free that they may struggle to gain liberty and be vigilant, thoughtful, patriotic, and brave, to preserve their liberty; that they may do their thinking and gain development by the effort, and then that they shall render in civic service that which is required to preserve their capacity to govern.

A democracy is a government by the people. It is a group of private citizens got together for the purpose of engaging in common enterprise of governing themselves. When they shall have taken that initial step nature begins to operate upon that which they have initiated, just as it begins to operate upon that which the farmer has initiated when he puts the seed in the seed bed. That which human beings do in the copartnership between them and nature is relatively small, but it is important.

The surgeon does not heal the broken bone. Nature does that. The surgeon does an important part in the common undertaking, but he does that important part well only when he has first discovered the natural laws which determine how he ought to do his part of the job. His skill and his success depend upon how well he conforms to those laws.

That is equally true with regard to operating systems of democratic government. The point I want to make now is that democratic government in a highly developed scientific age, where men are making great progress and doing great things because they discover and are obedient to natural law, creates a complexity and difficulties which makes it impossible for democratic government to survive unless it too is made to conform to the laws of nature provided for the guidance and assistance of people engaged in the common enterprise of governing themselves.

The natural laws which govern the body governmental, the governmental entity, are strikingly similar to the natural laws which govern the bodies of the individuals who make up the governmental organization. The difficulties which the operation of a system of free government provide, like all other difficulties which people confront, make up a part of the gymnastic paraphernalia designed by nature for the development of human beings. If we will bear this in mind it will guide us in the search for an understanding of the natural laws which govern democratic government. The central objective of nature is the development of people. That is what this struggle is for down here on this earth. It is not an easy thing for people to remain free. It is a difficult thing, which is just another way of saying that it is a developing thing. Progress is uphill, not downhill. It is slow, not fast. It is difficult, not easy. It is the road of struggle, but it is the road of life. Along that road lies the thrill of victory.

We have been under the spell of a false philosophy teaching that the right way is the easy way and the quick way. There was never a thing more false than that. The road of progress is not quick, not fast. It is not easy. It is uphill. There is climbing and effort and struggle, but it is the road of strength. The road downhill may be alluring, but it is the lure of death insofar as our democracy is concerned. The road of democratic progress, therefore, is in that direction which puts the opportunity to govern and the necessity to govern, the necessity to think and work and sacrifice, closer and closer to the people. Nature does not give something for nothing. It has a double-entry system of bookkeeping.

In these facts we find the philosophy of what used to be known as States' rights. But the right of the States to govern was never important. The necessity of the States to govern in matters within their governmental capacity was always of fundamental natural importance, because it is in their governmental organizations made up in the main of small units of governments like cities, counties, etc., that the individual has the most to do, and a chance to do it; a machinery which he can operate.

Many people who seem honestly to feel themselves to be progressive and have claimed for themselves the designation of Progressives, as a matter of fact have been great reactionaries. They have favored moving governmental power away from the people, out of the units of government susceptible of popular control, into the central Government at Washington where these powers can be exercised only through bureaucratic organizations impossible of popular control.

Local government is the foundation of organized democratic government. The individual is the unit of democratic government. No local government can be any stronger or more efficient than the individual citizens who constitute it. The State government can be no stronger nor better than the local units of government, the aggregate of which make up the government of the States. The Federal Government can be no better nor stronger as a democracy than the States, which constitute the foundation upon which the Federal organization rests.

These things are not controlled by the theories of men. They are controlled by natural laws which determine the structure, the character, and the source of strength and power of a democratic government.

History shows conclusively that no people except by conquest ever lost their opportunity to be free until they had first lost their capacity to govern themselves, and that no people who had lost the capacity and the will to govern themselves were ever able to remain free. The explanation is a very simple one. There has to be government. It is fixed in human necessity there shall be government, and whenever the people are no longer able to tender themselves as instrumentalities to do the business of government, government of necessity lays its hand on a Hitler or a Mussolini, or shifts its power and responsibility to a bureaucracy or some other nondemocratic form of government.

If you will examine the history of the experiences of people in the field of government you will find no exceptions. The important question, therefore, that confronts all peoples who aspire to be free is what policy of government is most calculated to preserve and develop governmental capacity of the citizen and hold the powers of government in the units of government which they can best operate.

If the States in our system, which constitute our organized democracies, shift the powers of government which they possess to the Federal Government, the power to do the things which they have surrendered departs from those States and they are left with less and less total power to discharge their remaining responsibilities.

The same sort of thing is true of the counties, and cities, and towns, and the individual citizen. These things are determined by natural law. The people are punished for disregarding nature's plan. That plan is effectuated as much by the limitations imposed upon individual human capacity as by the capacity given to human beings. It is perfectly clear that nature, God, the Big Boss, has provided in His plan for a democracy in opportunity of people to develop by exercising their capacity to govern so that they may be free, instead of having an arrangement under which a few individuals hunger for power and place may dominate and dwarf the great mass of people because that great mass of people are denied the necessity to do the things for themselves, to discharged the difficulties which nature has designed for their development. The evidence is conclusive that democratic government is in harmony with the workaday plan of the Big Boss. There is no irreverence in that.

I recognize that the individual is not in a position to have an independent dependable judgment with reference to many separate matters of legislation or governmental policy. Often they are interrelated with many other matters.

But nature has so arranged that the average citizen may be guided to sound judgment with reference to basic governmental policies by what is taught by his own observation and experience. If Uncle Sam could do everything for everybody, life would not be worth living.

You know what makes a football team the champion? It is not playing against weak opposition, nor having somebody else carry the ball. It is difficulties. Even from the standpoint of fun and interest there would be mighty few thrills in the game either for the players or the spectators if the rules of the game were such that each team could have a pleasant march across the field to each other's goal. If you want to know why we have to have an independent judiciary, you can see it right there. There is a man out on the field; I believe he is called a referee. As a matter of fact he is a judge, as much a judge as any judge on the bench. If you watch you can see the operation of a natural law that governs the business of judging. It operates everywhere. The referee must know the rules of the game. That requirement runs all the way up the line, to the highest court in the world. He has got to be able to see the plays as they are played. He must call them as he sees them. These make up judicial qualification and judicial integrity for all judges just the same. It is a law which inheres in the nature of things. If this referee has in his mind that he would like for either of the teams to win, he is not fit to referee the game. That same thing runs all the way up the line to the highest judge in the world. If that referee shades his decisions or attempts to modify the rules of the game while the game is being played, in order to throw the decision where he wants it to go, that is judicial dishonesty, all the way up the line.

I realize this is a rather heavy talk for a commencement exercise. But you have heavy going ahead of you. The mightiest issues of the ages are pending now. The philosophers of government are coming under reexamination. Only a level-headed, clear-thinking, patriotic people who understand the nature of democratic government and what policies tend toward its preservation and what policies tend toward its destruction have a chance to survive as a free people. If you will make an independent examination of these things which I have brought to your attention, you will have no difficulty in determining that democratic government is the sort of government designed by Nature for human beings. You will discover that the difficulties for the individual connected with the operation of democratic government does not indicate that it ought to be abandoned, but quite to the contrary. They constitute, as I have stated, the gymnastic paraphernalia provided by God for the development of His creatures. Human beings are not given the aspiration to be free and then denied the opportunity and capacity to attain to this Nature-implanted aspiration.

You will find that those who in the name of progress favor relieving the States, the small units of Government, and the individual of the necessity to do the things—difficult things—which are within their capacity, instead of being progressives are reactionaries of the rankest type. They presume to be wiser than God.

The whole history of democratic progress has been away from the central government back toward the people. Every great document, every great monument, along the road of democratic progress marks the occasion where decentralization of governmental power took place. This going to Washington in the name of progress, this bartering away the reserve rights of the States in order to get money, this accepting of Federal money loaded down with Federal power borrowed by the Federal Government and secured by mortgaging the taxpaying power of unborn generations, has weakened our States, weakened the self-respect of our people—the most deadly things that can be done in a democracy.

In conclusion, may I suggest that examination will disclose there are two things indispensable to the operation of democratic government. First, a people capable of operating such a system of government. Second, the location of general governmental power in a governmental machinery which the people can operate. Let us not forget that. Fortunately for us, our States, made up of the smaller units of government, are peculiarly adapted to the governmental necessity of a people operating democratic government.

The people of the States created the Federal organization to do for them as their common agent, specified things which the States felt they could not so well do acting separately. They reserved all other powers, which include the powers of general government, to themselves and to the people.

We have got to get over this attack of federalitis from which we have been suffering for a long time, and get the States and the Federal Government back on their respective jobs. The States will regain their vigor through exercising their governmental muscles and the Federal organization stripped down to Federal duties can then properly attend to its Federal business under laws enacted by the Federal Congress.

The most fascinating thing which I have discovered from an examination of the nature of democratic government is public opinion. Nature makes it the supreme law. It is the only safe guide for a democracy. As nearly as I can find a figure to illustrate it, it is like the gold which comes from low-grade ore. In the heat of discussion, earnestness of purpose among a people patriotic and free enough to operate a democracy, that which is truth is melted away from the dross of ignorance and selfishness. There is no substitute for it in a democracy. I do not minimize the great duty and responsibility of public officials, but it is from the people, as it is planned by nature, that free government may draw its strength, capable of protesting against the betrayal of public trust. The strength that renews a democracy never comes from the top down. It always comes up, as the strength that renews a tree comes up from its roots. That strength is coming up now. Our democracy is being revitalized. It is a great thing to see a great people rising to meet the challenge of a great hour.

I congratulate you members of this graduating class that you are to have the chance to be a part of a generation which must be the greatest which has been on this earth since history began to be written, because its difficulties will be the greatest.

There are two things we must do. Win this war as soon as possible, that we may bring back as quickly as possible as many men as possible from the battlefields of the world and our women who serve—bring them back to a government, to a free democracy, worthy of their sacrifice.

Invasion Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. MALONEY

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my own remarks, I include therein the radio addresses delivered by Senators OVERTON and ELLENDER, and Congressman HÉBERT, and myself on June 6 from radio station WOL, Washington, D. C., through radio station WNOE, New Orleans, La.:

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN F. EDWARD HÉBERT

Good evening ladies and gentlemen. This is your Congressman, F. EDWARD HÉBERT, from the First Congressional District of Louisiana, speaking to you directly from Washington, D. C.

As you know, for the past several weeks I have made a report directly to you from Washington on Tuesday evenings at 9:15 o'clock, and had planned to make the usual weekly report at the same time tonight.

However, in the past 24 hours things have happened fast. The day that not only America but the world has waited for has arrived. While I am speaking to you some of your own boys, your own flesh and blood, are now landing on the shores of France in the fight for the liberation of the world. It's invasion day, the most momentous day, perhaps, in the history of the world. This day will only be surpassed by the day of total victory when the arms of America and her allies will triumph over the forces of Hitler and evil.

Instead of making my regular weekly report at 9:15 I am coming to you at this hour a few minutes before you will hear the President of the United States on this same station. WNOE in New Orleans has, as a public service and in an endeavor to bring to you people of New Orleans and Louisiana first-hand reports from your Congressman and Senators here in Washington, made available this time directly from Station WOL in Washington to Station WNOE in New Orleans.

Tonight I am privileged and honored to have with me at the microphone Louisiana's distinguished United States Senators, JOHN H. OVERTON and ALLEN J. ELLENDER, as well as the Congressman from the Second Congressional District, PAUL H. MALONEY. In a few minutes it will be my pleasure to present them to you in order that you may hear from them directly their reaction to this historical event.

I want to take this opportunity to thank WNOE in New Orleans for this opportunity of your representatives here in Washington to bring you a first-hand report direct from the Nation's Capital.

It has been a day of excitement and tenseness here in Washington. The air bristled with uncertainty and in the minds of a sober Congress there was a feeling of humility and apprehension such as I have never witnessed before in a body of men.

On that black day in American history when the news was flashed over the wires that Pearl Harbor had been bombed and our fleet almost destroyed, I felt depressed and angered like all other Americans. I yearned for the day when America would accept the challenge of retaliation and strike with full force against the common enemy. For over 2 years America has waited for the realization of what has happened today.

Now that it has happened I await the outcome with confidence in ultimate victory, but await that outcome fully apprehensive and cognizant of the sacrifices which must and will be made before victory is achieved.

I must tell you of the reaction of Congress today. I am sure it is indicative of the reaction of every American. This morning when I arrived on Capitol Hill I had the feeling that the Stars and Stripes flying from the Capitol, and the House, and the Senate buildings waved with a greater defiance than they had waved in many days. There was something about those flags flying in the breeze which made me proud that today I am an American, that today I am a Member of the Congress of the United States, the symbol of a Government of the people, by the people and for the people. The symbol of democracy, the symbol of the right of a people to govern themselves.

It is most significant that Congress, instead of presenting a scene of jubilation and celebration, presented a scene of humility and trust in God. Congress as a body stood in silent prayer today that God may smile on those who at this moment are advancing in the face of the enemy, willing to die in order that we might live. I shall never forget my experience in the House today as it rose and stood silently in prayer and heard Member after Member, from the well of the House ask God's blessing on those valiant boys who have left their homes and their native shores to fight in order that an ideal might live.

Here with me tonight are men who represent you in Washington. Because the ideals for which these men fight today has been handed to us by those who fought for the same ideals on yesterday. We are your elected representatives here in Washington, because you are a free people, able to send to Washington those whom you think represent you best in Louisiana.

Louisiana's senior Senator has served you in Washington both in the House of Representatives and the United States Senate. JOHN OVERTON has served Louisiana well and has brought honor and dignity and glory to the State he loves so well. His influence in Washington is widespread, his respect among his colleagues is unanimous. He is a representative that Louisiana can well be proud of. Senator OVERTON, will you please say a few words to the people of your State, your beloved Louisiana?

ADDRESS OF SENATOR JOHN H. OVERTON

Fellow Louisianians, all of us appearing upon this program are indebted to the Honorable F. EDWARD HÉBERT for the opportunity to speak direct to you on the most engrossing event in perhaps all the martial history of our Nation. I thank the Congressman for his courtesy.

The long-expected and long-awaited invasion of western Europe is now under way. The news reaching us shows that the assault upon the French frontier is proceeding according to plan—and, in the language of Winston Churchill, "What a plan." The tottering despotism of Adolf Hitler now finds itself besieged on the east by the Russians, on the south by the Allies in Italy, and along the western coast of Europe. Americans, Russians, Britons are gathering for the kill. Hitler and Hitlerism are doomed; and I pray to God that, with the fall of the German tyranny all tyrannies will be wiped from the face of the earth.

We must pay the sacrifice, and no small sacrifice will it be. Germany still fights on foreign and conquered soil. Except over the air, the forces of the Allies have not invaded Germany proper. The Russians have driven the Huns from most of the territory conquered by them on their eastern frontier. The Germans have been ousted from Africa, Sicily, Sardinia, the southern part of Italy, and Rome is in the hands of the Allies. But the enemy is yet to be cast out of Norway, the Netherlands, France, the Balkans, and the Baltics. All of us here in Washington, however, look forward with confidence to the ultimate outcome. America has never lost a war. It's not going to lose this fight. Aided by the courage, determination, and mighty prowess of Russia, Great Britain and her dominions, and by the fervor and gallantry of the patriots of the nations which have come under the ruthless domination of Hitler, and, above all, strengthened by our reliance upon divine guidance, we shall again carry the American flag to a decisive and lasting victory.

And promptly after that we shall be able quickly to dispose of the dirty, sneaking, treacherous little Japs.

Mr. HÉBERT. Thank you very much, Senator OVERTON.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, may I present to you another of your elected officials another man who has done so much in the United States Senate to distinguish himself and the State he represents. ALLEN J. ELLENDER is in the second year of his second term of his service in the United States Senate. During his 7½ years his devotion to duty has made him an alert, attentive, and responsible representative of the people from Louisiana. Senator ELLENDER, I am sure many are waiting to hear your voice at this time.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR ALLEN J. ELLENDER

Ladies and gentlemen, D-day has come, and it has brought with it, many heartaches and much anxiety to millions of our people. Here in Washington, we have been expecting the momentous event for many weeks, and the announcement of its actual occurrence has been received with deep emotion. I pray to God that success and a speedy victory will be ours.

Never in all history has there been a more impressive and effective aggregation of ships, planes, tanks, and other implements of war as is now engaged in battle on the beaches of France. The men and women involved in that struggle have been well trained. They are operating in accordance with superbly laid plans prepared under the direction of peerless military strategists. The Congress has enacted all of the necessary measures that were advocated by our Commander in Chief, so as to properly and adequately round out these operations.

It should therefore be comforting to the parents of those who are actually engaged in battle that their Government has done all in its power to protect and prepare them for this gigantic encounter. It should be comforting to them that their sons and daughters are engaged in a noble struggle. Upon its outcome will depend whether the people of the world will be bound in chains or be able to hold up a brighter torch of freedom.

I have no fear of the result. I am confident that we will win and those who will make the supreme sacrifice will not have died in vain. I hope and pray to God that the blow that is now in progress will be accelerated to such a momentum that Berlin will be reached and captured within a few weeks.

As one of your lawmakers in Congress, I, along with others, have cooperated and done all in my power to help prepare our Nation for war. When one considers that less than 90 days before Pearl Harbor our powder-making facilities could hardly supply an army of a hundred thousand men, that we had fewer planes in the Army and Navy than we are now able to manufacture in 1 month, that our merchant tonnage has increased manyfold, so that we now almost bridge the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans with our cargo ships, that our Navy today is more powerful that the combined navies of the whole world, and that we have been able to provide airplanes, tanks, and other implements of war in amounts that stagger the imagination, he is forced to the conclusion that a good job has been well done. We have been able to accomplish in months, in preparing for war, what it has taken our enemies years to perform. Full credit for this performance is due to you, the men and women of Louisiana, and to those of the rest of our country. I urge you with all the force at my command to keep your shoulders to the wheel, and not to slacken your efforts until Berlin and Tokio are captured and until all of the depraved and cruel men who have been responsible for this global catastrophe are put to death.

We are on the road to victory. Rome, the Eternal City, is now in our hands, and its fall has brought new hope to millions of people all over the world. Its capture has spread consternation in the camps of our enemies and will no doubt spur our victorious troops to new and decisive victories.

Let me again remind you to keep on doing your part and not to relax in your efforts until our enemies surrender unconditionally. We now need implements of war in greater quantities than ever before, and upon our continued efforts of more and more production will depend the safety and early return of our fighting forces.

Mr. HÉBERT. And now, ladies and gentlemen, it is certainly a privilege for me to present to you still another of your elected officials. As you know, the city of New Orleans has two Members of the House of Representatives here in Washington. It has been a source of pleasure to have the privilege to serve with PAUL MALONEY in the Congress.

For many years he has had the enviable confidence of the leaders of that great body, and the many times he has been returned to office bespeaks the confidence which the people of his district have in him. This is his sixth term in the House of Representatives. He is the dean of the Louisiana delegation. Congressman MALONEY, your people in New Orleans are waiting to hear from you.

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN PAUL H. MALONEY

Thank you, Congressman HÉBERT; we are indeed indebted to you for this opportunity to speak to our home folks from Washington on a subject that reaches the very heart of all of our citizens.

My fellow citizens, today is D-day, and it will be long remembered in our Nation's history, not only as one of the greatest military achievements of all time, but as one that will symbolize the spirit of a free people, whose resourcefulness and ingenuity to keep themselves free will not ever perish from this earth.

Since the sneak and cowardly attack on this country at Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, the people of this Nation have pledged their lives and fortunes toward liberating the oppressed people, and avenge the dastardly attack, that justice and freedom may prevail, and the people of this world may enjoy the rights bestowed upon them by their Creator, to live in peace and happiness.

I wish to pay tribute to the splendid young men who make up the combatant forces, who, with their allies, have so valiantly made the first major step on the road to Berlin by invading France this day, which marks the beginning of the end of this global war.

I want to pay tribute to the mothers and fathers, wives, sisters, and brothers of this Christian Nation, who are making the supreme contribution by giving their sons, brothers, and husbands to this gigantic struggle for justice and freedom, and to insure to their children's children a proper and safe place within which to live.

I also wish to pay tribute to every man, woman, and child who has contributed in so many ways for the support and the equipping of these splendid young men and women with every need to carry forward the battle to subdue these Axis leaders that have brought so much misery to their followers and have upset the peace of the world.

While there are classifications of essential employment for the war effort, in my humble opinion, I believe that all who are living an industrious life, whether he milks a cow, or plants a seed, or runs a lathe, or drives a truck, or directs a train, or gives medical aid, or teaches a child, or cooks a meal, or makes a bed, all these and many thousand other little things that we do are equally important so that the home front can move in keeping with the battle front, is all necessary and part of the war effort, and all are essential.

We all are in this war together, each with a part to play, and we cannot fail.

We must plan and prepare for a long war, but pray for a short war.

While today is so-called D-day, and we look upon it as a great day, there is still another day that will be a much greater day, and that one we all pray so fervently for, and that day is V-day—Victory Day—the day that bloodshed will cease, and the day we earnestly hope that everlasting peace may begin, and our loved ones will come home safe and sound, where peace and human happiness reigns—a job well done—this, ladies and gentlemen, is my prayer.

Mr. HÉBERT. Thank you, Congressman MALONEY, and thank you again, Senator OVERTON and Senator ELLENDER, for appearing with me tonight in this special broadcast which radio station WNOE in New Orleans has made available as a public service through a direct wire from Washington to New Orleans on this all-important day in order that the people we represent may hear from us directly.

Dimples and Glamour Evidently Have Devastating Effect Even on Generals of A. A. F.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Idaho Statesman, May 12, 1944:

PRIORITY ON WOMEN

Several times we have heard servicemen, usually back on furlough, complain about women in the service. Sometimes we felt that they were merely prejudiced, but sometimes it seemed to us that they had a valid gripe. A recent happening supports the latter position.

Some weeks ago thousands of experienced male pilots were grounded, presumably because we had trained more pilots than we shall need. Nevertheless, Jacqueline Cochran's WASPS are getting a priority of a very special kind. There is a bill before Congress to commission women pilots, and some have already completed their first weeks of schooling. General Arnold told Congressmen the women pilots will be needed for ferrying because all male pilots will be needed for combat. That's a strange statement to make when thousands of men pilots are now out of jobs, or soon will be.

The men are angry about it, and they seem to have additional reasons. For instance, WASPS qualify for transport training after 35 hours of flying time, whereas men must have 1,000, including 200 in heavy craft. We don't know what the explanation is. Probably it is the sentimental softness of American men in regard to their women. In colleges the smooth, good-looking gals can get A's without a lick of work; and in the armed services it may be that dimples have a devastating effect even on the generals.

Bank Suspensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department has furnished me a list of the bank suspensions since 1920. In view of the fact that so many uninformed people are claiming that this administration has been an enemy of the banks, when it really saved the banks, it is certainly of interest to note that there have been so few bank failures during this administration.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt came into power March 4, 1933. I believe it can safely be said that all failures for that year should be charged to the preceding administration. That being true, there have been very, very few failures of banks during this administration. In fact, I doubt that there is any other period in the history of our country when banking has been so secure.

The statement is as follows:

Number of bank suspensions by years ended Dec. 31, 1920 to 1944

Year ended Dec. 31—	All banks	National banks	State banks	Private banks
1920	14	14	(1)	(1)
1921	490	37	409	44
1922	350	32	295	23

[1] Data unavailable.

[2] Includes 4 banks other than national in the District of Columbia, receivers for which were appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency.

[3] Includes 2 national banks for which receivers were appointed between Mar. 6 and Mar. 12, inclusive the banking holiday.

[4] Figures for State and private banks comprise (a) banks not licensed following the banking holiday and later placed in liquidation or receivership, and (b) unlicensed banks granted licenses after June 30, 1933. In the case of national banks the figures shown represent only 290 (288 national banks and 2 banks other than national in the District of Columbia) of the 1,417 unlicensed banks (1,407 national and 10 other than national in the District of Columbia) at the close of the banking holiday, which were placed in receivership because plans submitted for reorganization had been disapproved. The remaining 1,127 unlicensed banks (1,119 national and 8 other than national in the District of Columbia) which are not included with bank suspensions, were disposed of through having been licensed to reopen, reorganized through waiver, rehabilitation or sales of assets and through having been placed in voluntary liquidation.

NOTE.—Figures for State and private banks compiled by Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and represent associations closed to the public, either temporarily or permanently, by supervisory authorities or directors of the banks on account of financial difficulties. In the case of national bank suspensions, these represent actual failures for which receivers were appointed.

The Cloakroom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, you are thinking mostly of the invasion and so are we all.

Finally, at long last, after 3 months or more of taunting we have the extension of the O. P. A. before us.

Barbed-wire entanglement would best describe the 2,500-word instructions from O. P. A. on how to bake a fruit cake.

We just cannot think of the invasion as a Gettysburg or Belleau Wood, but certainly history will record it as even more.

The most thrilling event of the Spanish-American War to me was our naval battle with the Spanish Fleet off Santiago Harbor, Cuba.

Major Johnson, our No. 1 hero from Europe hated himself today as he lunched in the House dining room because he was missing the big show.

It took two Yankees, our two floor leaders, to escort General Howell, 98, Confederate commander, to the Speaker's chair. He stood for it.

My father talked most of the battles of Lookout Mountain and before Atlanta of the Civil War—part of the former battle was above the clouds.

When one of our major generals was "broken" for talking too much about the invasion at a London cocktail party and was sent home, it furnished prohibition a point.

The last general supply bill, the Army bill, came from the whole Appropriations Committee yesterday—will be in Committee of the Whole next week—it is for billions but no Member will blink an eye.

Yesterday, exactly 2½ years after Pearl Harbor and in the midst of the invasion, we took final possible action to get the facts about Kimmel and Short. "Truth, the imperial virtue" at times is a difficult fort to conquer.

Outstanding Work of the House Committee on Small Business—Its Unity of Purpose and Nonpartisan Character of Its Work on Behalf of All Types of Small Business Enterprises Known Nation-Wide

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to have served for the past year and a half as a member of a select committee of this House whose record of performance and devotion to its assignment is praiseworthy. I refer to the Select Committee on Small Business.

This committee of nine members, assisted by a relatively small staff, has performed a prodigious amount of constructive work on behalf of the small business interests of this Nation; has gone about its work with a minimum of fanfare and publicity. It has exhibited a unity of purpose and a single-minded, nonpartisan approach to its assignment, and constitutes a body of men in the Congress today well informed on the subject of small business and its present and postwar problems.

Because I feel that the public should know of the volume of work and the diversity of subjects which have been covered by the Small Business Committee since its creation 2½ years ago, I want to submit for the record a recapitulation of the studies, reports, and hearings, and other achievements of the committee, which I feel go to make up a very worth-while and impressive record.

In 1942 the committee held 40 public hearings, during which a total of 663 witnesses were heard. The following subjects were investigated in 1942: Problems of the automobile dealers, problems of the tire dealers, the scrap metals shortage, problems of the retail druggists, the fire-insurance industry, the sugar shortage, the refrigerated locker industry, the distribution of war contracts to small business.

In 1943 the committee held 30 public hearings and 1 hearing in executive session, at which 445 witnesses were heard. The following subjects were investigated in 1943: problems of the small meat packers, problems of the small oil-well drillers and operators, effect of O. P. A. rulings on various retail groups, problems of the lumber industry, disposal of surplus Government-owned property and its relation to the problems of small businesses, operations of the Smaller War Plants Corporation, problems of the trailer-coach industry, problems of the smaller freight forwarders.

In 1944, to date, the committee has held seven public hearings, at which 129 witnesses have been heard. The following subjects have thus far been investigated in 1944: Disposal of Government-Owned Surplus Property (continued), Operations of the Smaller War Plants Corporation (continued), Problems of Small Manufacturers on the Pacific Coast.

To date, the committee has issued five interim reports to the House, as follows:

I. Operations of the Smaller War Plants Corporation.

II. Petroleum Supply Situation in the United States.

III. The Control, Disposition and Sale of Government-Owned Surplus Property.

IV. Current Lumber Industry Problems: Part 1. The National Lumber Situation as of January 1, 1944; Part 2. Problems of the Southern Pine Industry.

V. The Surplus Property Problem from the Viewpoint of Small Business.

The individual members of the committee have introduced 92 bills, the majority of which were designed to aid small business. A number of these bills were adopted by the Congress. Among those which became law were: The Federal Reports Act, Smaller War Plants Corporation Act, act authorizing loans on frozen goods.

Among those now pending are H. R. 4420—the Patman-Halleck bill—to provide for the orderly disposal of surplus Government-owned property in such a manner as to protect small business, and a bill designed to protect the independent tire dealers from the competition of manufacturer-owned stores.

The committee is now proceeding with its study of the need and type of legislation designed to assist small business in such matters as tax relief, amortization of cost-of-plant facilities acquired for war or peacetime purposes, and other kindred matters. In lieu of holding public hearings, our committee is now endeavoring to secure the views of small businessmen on these and other vital problems by mail, so that a cross-section of national small-businessman opinion on these subjects may be made available to the committee during the summer months.

The committee has a record for economy and efficiency for which I feel the Congress should well give praise.

It maintains a staff of only five regular employees, including stenographic help. In my opinion, the volume and value of the work turned out by this committee and its staff compares very favorably with the total of that produced by the similarly designated committee of the Senate with its staff of 27 paid employees and its much larger appropriation.

An examination of the committee's records shows that a total of 537 individual firms were referred to the committee and its staff for assistance by other Members of the Congress, or through direct petition. Assistance was given to all of these firms in the following manner:

Priorities assistance, 326 firms; contract explanation assistance, 11 firms; financial direction assistance, 67 firms; O. P. A. regulations assistance, 122 firms; miscellaneous assistance, 11 firms; total number firms aided, 537.

It was felt by the committee that such work was in line with its instructions from the Congress, and also provided the most practical way of studying firsthand the various and sundry problems which came the way of small business firms, especially those firms who were unable to employ Washington representatives for their own use.

In these days of partisan politics, the cooperative working relationship which has existed between the various members of this particular committee, when engaged in the work specifically assigned to the committee, has been of such a nonpartisan and inspiring nature that I have felt it appropriate to call this to the attention of the House at this time.

Small business is not the exclusive charge of either the Republican or the Democratic Parties. It is the charge of the entire Congress whichever party shall be in power politically. The work of this committee has served as an inspiration to me personally, and I am hopeful that the next Congress will see fit to continue the committee in existence in view of the splendid record already made by the committee.

The Evening Star, One of the Leading Washington Papers, Says WASP Program Is Wasted Money and Wasted Energy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., of June 7, 1944:

THE WASP REPORT

The restrained temper of its reports and the thoroughness of its investigations have given the House Civil Service Committee, under Chairman RAMSPECK, a deserved prestige which adds strength to its findings. That is one reason why its report on the program of the Women's Air Service Pilots (WASP) becomes so devastating an indictment of wasted money and wasted effort involved in the experiment

That program has failed to win public confidence because it is filled with contradictions. It undertakes, at extravagant expense, the training of young women as pilots while ignoring the availability of thousands of experienced men. It proposes to do things that the Navy has shunned, and it bases its claim of necessity on a condition which, in the words of the report, would mean, if true, that "this Nation, insofar as manpower is concerned, is in worse position than any of its allies and apparently any of our enemies." The report finds evidence that "the implied condition is neither actual nor probable," and recommends that recruiting and training be terminated. Evidently as a compromise, the report suggests continued use of those already trained, but the findings closely question the value even of that.

O. P. A. Regulations Affecting the Dairy Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following communications from the Wisconsin State Department of Agriculture, Milton H. Button, director:

WISCONSIN STATE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Madison, Wis., June 7, 1944.

Hon. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STEVENSON: The dairy industry of Wisconsin is daily becoming more confused because of lack of clarity of O. P. A. regulations. Penalties totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars have been assessed against dairymen and dairy plants of Wisconsin that have been making every effort to abide by O. P. A. regulations.

In an effort to correct this situation, the Wisconsin State board of agriculture has called a conference of the representatives of the various branches of the dairy industry on Wednesday, June 14.

We wired Chester Bowles, Administrator, Office of Price Administration, requesting him to have representatives of the O. P. A. present at this conference authorized to make decisions. Copy of our wire to Mr. Bowles is attached. I am also attaching a supplementary wire sent to Mr. Bowles today.

Inasmuch as War Food Administration duties frequently overlap with those of O. P. A., we asked Marvin Jones, Administrator, War Food Administration, to have an able representative of that bureau in attendance. Copy of our wire to Marvin Jones is attached.

At the suggestion of the Wisconsin State board of agriculture I am requesting the Senators and Congressmen of Wisconsin to urge upon Chester Bowles the necessity of sending responsible and qualified representatives who are authorized to make decisions.

Sincerely yours,

MILTON H. BUTTON,
Director.

MADISON, WIS., June 6, 1944.

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator,
Office of Price Administration,
Washington, D. C.:

The dairy industry of Wisconsin finds itself in a state of confusion as the result of the orders of the Office of Price Administration relating to the various branches of this industry. The confusion is also evident in the local and regional offices of your administration in as much as it is difficult to obtain definite and accurate information from them.

The lack of clarity of the provisions of your orders leads to prosecutions and penalties which are imposing a heavy burden on our agriculture. The industry is particularly disturbed about what it feels are arbitrary methods of assessing and collecting penalties. We feel that this could be avoided if your orders were made clear and understandable to the industry.

The State board of agriculture has therefor decided to call a conference of the representatives of the various branches of the dairy industry for the purpose of conferring with your representatives and discussing in a frank and open manner the provisions of your orders and to determine what should be done to render them sufficiently clear to eliminate prosecutions, which we feel are unwarranted because of the apparently confusing nature of your orders.

We request you to send responsible and qualified representatives, who are authorized to make decisions, to this conference which will take place in the offices of the Wisconsin State Department of Agriculture at the State Capitol in Madison on Wednesday, June 14, at 10 a. m.

WISCONSIN BOARD OF AGRICULTURE,
MILTON H. BUTTON, Director.

MADISON, WIS., June 7, 1944.

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator,
Office of Price Administration,
Washington, D. C.:

Supplementing our wire of June 6 it is probable representatives of dairy industry will make definite recommendations concerning revisions of O. P. A. orders. It is our request that your representatives be prepared to give consideration to the revision of orders now in effect.

WISCONSIN DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
MILTON H. BUTTON, Director.

MADISON, WIS., June 6, 1944.

MARVIN JONES,
Administrator,
War Food Administration,
Washington, D. C.:

The State board of agriculture has called a conference of representatives of the dairy industry and of the Office of Price Administration for the purpose of discussing problems resulting from orders of O. P. A. Lack of clarity of provisions of orders and methods employed in assessing and collecting penalties are included in these problems. Because the duties of your Administration sometimes overlap we request you to send responsible and qualified representatives, who are authorized to make decisions, to this conference which will take place in the offices of the Wisconsin State Department of Agriculture at the State Capitol in Madison on Wednesday June 14 at 10 a. m.

WISCONSIN BOARD OF AGRICULTURE,
MILTON H. BUTTON, Director.

Keynote Address of Hon. Charles A. Halleck, of Indiana, Chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, as Temporary Chairman, Republican State Convention of Indiana Before the Convention at Indianapolis, Friday, June 2, 1944

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address:

I am proud to be a Congressman, particularly a Congressman from the great State of Indiana. I am proud of the awakening that has aroused my State in the years that have passed since 1935 when I was elected as your sole Republican Representative in Washington. I look with pride upon the record of Indiana, its intelligence, wisdom, hard common sense, and patriotism which have turned its feet away from the New Deal road which was leading to chaos, and set them firmly upon the Republican road that leads to sane and honest government, and thus to a prosperous, happy, and secure future.

I am happy that I no longer am the sole Republican Representative as I was in 1935, but that I am now joined by eight Republican Congressmen, working side by side with a Republican Senator, a Republican State legislature, and Republican State officers. I am glad to know that the sturdy people of this State are not content even with this progress, but intent, in the elections of 1944, to make a clean sweep—to give us a Republican Governor, another Republican Senator, and two more Republican Congressmen, and to join with the rest of the outraged United States in abolishing the New Deal and placing in the White House a Republican President.

The people of Indiana owe a debt of gratitude to the Republican State officers and legislators who have served them well. They have established high records of efficiency, economy, and statesmanship. Along with Republican administrations in 26 of our sovereign States, they have given proof of what we can do when entrusted with government. These accomplishments have been Republican accomplishments, inspired by Republican ideals, made facts by Republican efficiency. Of course, we shall do a better job, a completely good job, when there shall be in the Governor's chair a man of the same Republican ideals, efficiency, and statesmanship. And we all know when that will be and who it will be. It will be after this November when Ralph Gates is elected our Governor.

Nothing would please me more than to speak at length of the Republican record in Indiana. I defer to my very good friend, our estimable speaker of the house, Hobart Creighton, who will follow me on the convention program.

May I also humbly suggest that the citizens of Indiana may well be grateful to your own Republican Senator and Congressmen, and to the Republican Members of Congress from our sister States. They have not failed you in these perilous days. They have not failed to understand the vital problems that confront us, and to act with informed courage. They have allowed no mere political considerations to warp their judgment, nor partisan ambitions to sway them. When it has been for the good of our country, they have granted what the administration asked. When they saw that what the administration asked was to the detriment of this country, they have withheld their consent. The Congress of the United States, with Republicans taking the lead, has interposed itself as an impregnable wall against administration raids upon our civil liberties and rights. It has been the shield of the people. It has stood between them and those who would change our form of government, undermine our economy, sap the strength from our Constitution and Bill of Rights, and make an all-powerful State the master of the people instead of the people the master of a republican State.

We have labored to bring order out of administrative chaos. We have fought valiantly to bring sanity and efficiency back to our Government; but never, not for one instant, not in one minute particular, have we hampered our Government in its Herculean efforts to win this war in which we find ourselves engaged.

We in Congress have realized that the one great demand of the American people is to crush our enemies, to shorten this war by giving all they have to give to insure speedy victory and a just and lasting peace. What every mother, every father, every wife, every child desires is a quick, an overwhelming victory over our enemies, and to get our boys back home as quickly as possible. It shall and will be the foremost purpose of the Republican Party to give them their heart's desire.

For the accomplishment of this high purpose, Republicans have been determined in one thing, and that is that this war, in every department of it, shall be fought as a military and not as a political campaign.

We are upon the eve of the most important election in the history of this Nation. We are about to choose, as the Constitution requires of us, the men who are to conduct the affairs of our country for the next 4 crucial years. There are men of small understanding who will say that it is a bad thing to hold an election in time of war, and to carry on those political activities which are a necessary part of elections in a republic.

Of such men can be said two things: Either they are woefully ignorant, or they are deliberately and maliciously seeking to mislead.

Politics is the machinery through which the common man may see to it that he is properly governed. Politics is the voice by which he may express his will. Politics is the shield and buckler of free men. It is our weapon for the defense of human liberties, and for offense against any encroachment upon human liberties. Without politics this country of ours could not exist, and without politics all that mankind has striven and fought and suffered and bled for down through the centuries would cease to be.

Politics is good in time of peace; in time of war politics is indispensable.

The only check upon any administration is a strong, decent, patriotic opposition party. An opposition party, a party striving to win an election, has imposed upon it an important duty. That duty is to watch and to police the party in power. That duty is to instruct and to educate the voters of the land, to tell them the truths which would be concealed by the party in power. It has a duty to bring out into the light of day the errors and misdoings of the party in power in order that the people may know whether they have been served well or ill. It is the duty of the opposition party to argue principles in the hearing of the people so the voters will be equipped to decide between what is right and what is wrong. No political party can perform a higher service than this.

If this is true in safe and happy times of peace, it is trebly so in times of war, when hysteria is so apt to undermine reason. It is the duty of the opposition party to present the facts so the voters may make up their minds if they party in power is doing a good job or a bad job, and if it would not be wise to turn that job over to other people who would do it more honestly and efficiently and speedily. And the more crucial the issues the more imperative it is that they shall be discussed. The more important the work to be done the more imperative that it be placed in different hands if it is being done badly.

They have no elections in Germany or Japan, the countries of our enemies. That is one reason why they are our enemies. Because they have no elections, they have within their borders, no liberty, no freedom, no happiness for the individual, and no hope for the future.

Our hope for the future is always bright because, always, by an election, we can bring good out of evil, change from what perils our liberties to what will protect and preserve them.

May God help America, if, in any emergency, it shall deprive its citizens of the right to impose their will.

You will hear much in this campaign of another thing, of a catch phrase. It is the one point upon which the New Deal relies, the one argument it hopes will return it to power in spite of their knowledge that the people of this land are weary of its inefficiency and blundering. And that is the catch phrase that you mustn't change horses in the middle of a stream.

Let us answer that with a question: Which would you rather do, change to a fresh horse that will get you across safely or stick to a foundered horse and drown in the middle of the river?

The New Deal party in its national convention is going to ratify the action of the Communist Party and nominate Mr. Roosevelt for a fourth term in the White House. This can mean only that the Communist Party agrees with Mr. Roosevelt and the New Deal, and is willing to accept his program as their program. It can mean only that they expect Mr. Roosevelt and the New Deal party to ratify in the future the program and the philosophy of the Communist Party. Mr. Browder is a skillful politician and his followers are skillful politicians. They know what they want and they believe the best way to get it is by alliance with the New Deal.

All the evidence at hand points to the correctness of their judgment.

But before we discuss the domestic achievements of the New Deal which have endeared it to Mr. Browder, let us turn for a moment to look at the question of the indispensable man in foreign affairs and statesmanship. Let us ask a few pertinent questions about our foreign policy during the incumbency of the coalition fourth-term candidate.

What is the object of decent statesmanship and foreign policy? It is first the preservation of peace, and secondly the building up of friendship with the other independent nations of the earth. Has Mr. Roosevelt's foreign policy achieved either of these objectives?

Mr. Roosevelt and the New Deal administration came into complete power in 1933 with complete control over the Federal Government and its sources of information. It had exclusive information from sure sources as to what was brewing in the world. It had the facts, which it declined to impart either to Congress or the people. It was completely informed of the growth of sinister forces in Germany, Italy, and Japan. From this information, administration experts, if really expert, were well able to figure to what tragic purpose these sinister forces were traveling.

In the light of this condition, let us ask a few pertinent questions which the American people can answer for themselves, and so determine if the fourth term candidate and his advisers are indispensable statesmen who should be permitted to dictate and to carry out the foreign policy of America in the post-war world.

If the knowledge of Mr. Roosevelt and his alleged statesmen of world movements and conditions from 1933 to the date of Pearl Harbor were such as to force them to the conclusion that war was inevitable, why did they keep it a secret from the American people?

If they knew war was inevitable, why did they devote their time to raking leaves, and to other useless things, instead of informing an intelligent, patriotic people of the facts, and educating our citizens to the necessity of preparing to defend ourselves, whatever might occur?

Why did they boondoggle and foment class antagonism instead of facing the facts and building with the enthusiastic approval of an informed people, our national defenses to a point where no enemy would dare to attack us?

Why did they devote themselves to the creating of a staggering bureaucracy costing billions of dollars instead of devoting those billions to the erection of air and naval bases, the building of battleships and bombers, and the creation of an army of defense?

Why, being fully aware of the facts and of the character of Japan did they continue to appease Japan, supply her with oil and scrap iron to be used against our friend China, and eventually against ourselves?

Why, being repeatedly warned by our Ambassador to Japan, did they persist in this suicidal course, blindfold their eyes and our eyes to the certainty of treacherous attack, and let Pearl Harbor drowse instead of being on the alert to repel and defeat attack? Why were elementary precautions neglected, thus subjecting America to the disgrace of the most tragic naval disaster in our history?

Why dare they not bring to trial the Army and Navy officers charged with the guilty responsibility for that disaster?

Why, knowing the certainties as they claim they knew them, did they fail to strengthen and to reinforce the Philippine Islands? Why, when something could have been done, did they sit by with idle hands and so permit the martyrdom of thousands of our sons on Corregidor and Bataan? Why did they not take the "stitch in time" that would have averted the humiliation of the invasion of our territories by a foreign enemy?

Why did they permit the congregation in a single spot of our naval forces in the Pacific instead of ordering them to battle stations which they should have occupied with war coming at dawn?

Why did the President help to lull our people into a sense of false security by assuring us that not one of our sons would be sent to fight on foreign soil?

Finally, let me pose this question: If, after Pearl Harbor our western coast was open to invasion, our unprotected merchant vessels with their crews were being sunk within sight of our eastern coast, whose far-seeing statesmanship must assume the responsibility? If our splendid industrial system had to prepare itself after war came to produce the necessities of war, whose is the responsibility for the delay? Would it have been possible to avert the war if the United States had been prepared for war? If so, whose responsibility is that? It may be that war was inevitable, but a strong, informed, resolute, armed, and equipped United States would have been a powerful deterrent against war. Whose responsibility was it that no such deterrent existed?

It certainly was not the responsibility of the tiny handful of Republican Representatives and Senators then in Congress. The guilt must be placed upon the shoulders of those who wielded complete and absolute authority—Franklin D. Roosevelt and his New Deal.

Is this indispensable statesmanship?

Is this indispensable handling of foreign affairs?

These are questions which our intelligent voters will be well able to answer, and I have no doubt how they will answer them.

They will answer them by turning the conduct of our foreign affairs over to an able, far-sighted President belonging to that party which alone has announced a foreign policy and a post-war plan. To that party whose leaders have pointed the way into the future. To that party which will not appease, which will act upon known facts, which will look with practical sympathy upon a stricken world, which will push this war to a speedy victory, and which will see to it that in winning the war we do not lose the peace. It will entrust its foreign affairs to a party eager to collaborate, willing to impose its will for peace, but unwilling to purchase uncertain peace by making itself the almshouse for the world. And that party is the party under whose emblem we have met here today. The Republican Party.

I say again, in this war America has made, is making, and will continue to make the greatest investment in all history. It is investing millions of its sons and billions of its dollars. It is investing everything, tangible and intangible, that it possesses.

It is only right that the American people should realize on their investment. The Republican Party proposes to assure this realization.

The American people do not want a profit in lands to be conquered; they do not want a profit in spheres of influence, or in peoples to be exploited. They do want and will insist upon having a profit paid in the coin of lasting peace. They will insist that the things that forced America into this war shall not arise again.

We have already made known our position in that regard. We spoke at Mackinac. We there adopted a set of principles of which these were the three outstanding declarations:

1. We must preserve and protect all our national interests.

2. We must aid in restoring order and decent living in a distressed world.

3. We must do our full share in a program for permanent peace among nations.

It is essential that we consider what effect a change in administration would have upon the successful prosecution of the war. And first, it seems wise that we should dispel the Commander in Chief myth.

Let us recall that the first President of the United States was George Washington. Prior to taking that office he had been in fact commander in chief of the forces of the Thirteen Colonies. His was a splendid record of victory. He was one of the first military geniuses of the age. When he assumed the wider duties of President of the United States, what could have been more natural than that the framers of our Constitution, in their veneration for the Father of his Country, should have ordained that he should, ex officio, become commander of its armies?

In that day, war was a far different business than it is today. It was fought by small armies who went out to hunt for each other until they blundered together in some farmyard and turned it into a field of battle. War was not a matter of entire nations in arms, of armies that numbered millions of soldiers in their ranks, of uncounted mobile cannon and tanks, of skies darkened by the flight of airplanes. At best, war in Washington's day was a more or less amateur business, and any competent civilian might find himself the equal in military skill of any general opposing him.

Today, war is a far different and vastly most complicated and specialized business than this. The making of war is a profession, requiring years of special training as rigorous as the training of a lawyer or a doctor. No civilian, lacking such training, can succeed in the command of armies. Today, war can be waged only by trained warriors. And Mr. Roosevelt is no trained warrior, no military genius.

The actual commander in chief of the armies of this Republic must make a full-time job of it. He must make an overtime job of it. His mind must never be absent from his task. The regular duties of a President are so numerous, so far-reaching that at best he could hope to devote but a fraction of his time to actual military affairs. In times of peace the labors of a President are arduous. The burdens of civil affairs do not diminish in wartime. They multiply. No human being, no matter how vast his powers, could administer the civil affairs of this country, and devise and carry out its military plans as well. To state the contrary is an absurdity. Mr. Roosevelt, the commander in chief, is a myth.

Our war is being fought by specialists—splendid, able, efficient specialists who have been trained for years in the profession of arms. These men have been trained by the United States—not by one political party in the United States. Our generals, our admirals, our officers are not Republican officers or Democratic officers or New Deal officers. They belong to the Nation. They are not transient incumbents of civil office, but permanent military employees who have no right nor place in the world of politics, as politics has no right nor place in the conduct of war. The changing of one mythical commander in chief for another would not change the identities of the men who are winning this war. So long as they continue to be efficient or victorious they would remain in command, unhampered. They would command. They would carry out their task untouched by political or civil change. The Republican Party pledges itself that it will leave the conduct of this war to the trained men who can lead us to victory.

One thing the Republican Party can do and will do. It will give such civilian support to our armies as they never before have received. We know how to bring to bear the full genius of the American people to produce and to deliver. We will not hamper American production with the meddling of a busy-body bureaucracy nor by revolutionary devices whose object is to destroy our system of free enterprise. We will foster decent industry to the end that it may produce to the utmost gun and ship and airplane, and not harry, nor punish, nor hamstring that industry in the malignant hope of bringing about a social revolution. We can and will shorten the war.

Our brief occupation today is to win the war, but only second to that purpose is to see to it that we do not lose our republic at home.

We are trustees with a solemn responsibility. The youth of America have gone away from home leaving the house in our care. We must see to it that this home they love is not permitted to fall into disrepair, and that its precious contents are preserved intact. That home is America, broad, rich, incredibly beautiful and comfortable to live in. It is furnished as no other home in the world is furnished with all that is essential to the happiness of mankind. In this home of ours we find splendid material things, available to all according to his industry and his ability. We find vast, fertile farm lands, unbelievably rich mines. We find broad rivers and spacious lakes to carry our commerce. We find miraculous factories which transform our natural products into articles of utility. We find illimitable forests and grazing lands. We find every material element necessary to the happiness and prosperity of a people.

But most important we find our home to be furnished with those intangible things which enable us to derive from our material possessions the most that human beings can hope to derive. It is these intangible furnishings that we must be vigilant to preserve and which we must turn over to our returning sons and daughters undiminished, unspoiled, intact for them to use and to enjoy.

These intangible furnishings are the freedom of the individual within the framework of just laws. They are the right to work, the right to earn, the right to save, and the right to invest. They include the right to receive a resonable and honest return upon investment. The most valuable of all these furnishings is the right of opportunity—the right of every man to choose his calling or his profession, and to improve his position in the world by individual industry, integrity, intelligence. They include the right to work for and to achieve financial independence and security in old age. There are other precious privileges to which we have become so accustomed through long enjoyment that we have become unconscious of their existence, but which we would find more precious than life itself if they were stolen away from us.

These things have been entrusted to us and we must preserve them. In this time of war, for the common good, it has been necessary to curtail our privileges and restrict our rights and remove some of our freedom. As we view the future, we have justified fears that the New Deal administration under which we have lived for 12 years does not mean to return these things to us.

We are not misled. Regimentation did not begin with the war. The New Dealers have always liked it. They traveled far along the road with it under the N. R. A. until it was outlawed both by public opinion and the Supreme Court. Many recent programs on the home front are merely an extension and development of what was already in progress before the war under the New Deal. The Constitution and the Bill of Rights have always irked them.

The Republican Party says that the American system of individual liberty and free enterprise must and shall be retained. The Republican Party promises that every right, every privilege necessary to the life of a free man shall be returned to free men the instant it becomes possible. The restrictions that have been imposed upon you shall be removed; the regimentation to which you have been subjected shall be abolished.

The Republican Party makes to you the solemn promise that it will not permit this war to be made an excuse for the distorting of the American way of life. It will not tolerate New Deal intentions to make permanent the temporary tyrannies under which we cheerfully suffer because war demands it of us. On the instant that any restriction becomes unnecessary, it shall be removed; on the instant that meddling with our lives and businesses shall not be a military necessity, that meddling shall cease.

The Republican Party solemnly pledges itself that you shall again be free, as your freedom was conceived by the authors of the Declaration of Independence, the authors of the Constitution, and the framers of the Bill of Rights.

On the calendar of the future, the Republican Party marks a day that shall be R-day. It shall be no vague, distant day. That day shall come, with the help of God, immediately upon the crushing of our enemies.

On Independence Day in 1776, our independence was declared; on R-day, under a Republican administration, we shall begin the process of restoring your freedoms.

This task stands first in the post-war program of the party whose first President was Abraham Lincoln, whose name is synonymous with human freedom.

The party of which we have the honor to be members, has definite intentions and a definite program. It will not be content merely to undo the tragic blunders of the New Deal, or to heal the wounds to our country inflicted by malignant New Deal revolutionists. It will not merely be content to halt the New Deal march toward state socialism or communism, or fascism. It will take concrete, definite, positive steps to build and to insure a happier, more prosperous, more serene future.

Numbered among the rungs of the Republican ladder by which we shall climb to a better day will be these:

First, an eradication of bureaucracy, or snoopers and meddlers and little men strutting their petty authority. It will prune from the public pay roll hundreds of thousands of unnecessary officials who today make our life burdensome and vexatious, whose unearned salaries multiply our taxes, and whose officious interference hampers us on our farms, in our shops, in our factories, and in our homes.

Second, the Republican Party will reform the taxation of this Nation so that it shall foster initiative, industry, production, invention, instead of throttling them. It will tax for necessary revenue, never to destroy, never for revolution. It will abolish punitive taxes. It will impose only such taxes as will foster industry, large and small, as will make it possible for the farmer to till the soil with profit to himself, and the working man, the laborer, the professional man, to prosper in his calling.

Third, it will so reorganize the administration of this Government that it shall be economical, eliminating waste, extravagance, foolhardy social experiments, and, perhaps most important of all, the lavishing of our money for partisan political purposes and the purchasing of votes. It will spend less in order that it may save more and apply the saving to the payment of the bonds which you have patriotically purchased to finance the war.

Fourth, it will see to it that private industry and agriculture shall be able, through expansion of its plants and prosperity of its business, to provide jobs with futures. Vast unemployment must and shall be averted. Our returning soldiers and sailors must and shall be assured employment in private business as speedily as they shall be discharged from service. They must be gainfully employed, not pauperized. Our farms, our mines, our forests, our transportation facilities, our industrial plants can supply good jobs for all who are able and willing to work. This can be brought about only under the constructive principles of the Republican Party. It never can be brought about under the destructive principles of artificial scarcity which are the backbone of the New Deal. The Republican Party must and will plan for wider production, for more customers to consume that production, and for the natural consequence of more jobs at generous pay for each honest day of toil.

Fifth, the Republican Party will institute and maintain honorable and scientific fiscal policies. It will take the road that faces away from national bankruptcy through continued deficit spending. We hold that an American dollar must always be worth 100 American cents, not a fraction of that sum, and shall be able to purchase for you 100 cents worth of merchandise. The Republican Party will tolerate no destruction of savings by repudiation or inflation.

These are five necessary things which the Republican Party promises you it will labor to do. These are not all, but if we can succeed in these we will have laid a foundation for a happier home for every man, woman, and child in America.

The foregoing, I think you will agree, constitute a fine outstanding set of principles. But more than principles are required to meet and solve the present situation. Men and women of high character, ability, and purpose are vitally needed to put into effect such a program as I have outlined.

The Republican Party is going to put this program into effect under the guidance of the most capable persons to be found in the Nation. Its candidate for President will be outstanding. Its candidate for Vice President will be fully qualified to take over the presidential duties in case of an emergency. Its Cabinet will be selected from men and women of high character and capacity. Its departmental heads will be selected on a basis of ability and that alone. Its candidates for the Senate and the House of Representatives now being chosen are persons of high type. The 26 splendid Republican Governors are typical of the men Republicans are naming for Governors everywhere.

In contrast with the New Dealers, these Republican officeholders will be men and women with a genuine zeal for public service under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

The filling of offices with capable persons, however, will not be the end of the Republican program. The party will call to the aid of the Nation patriotic citizens of every race and creed, and of all stations in life. The great task before us can only be accomplished by a united people. That is why a call to service will go out to all under a Republican administration. Ours shall not be a one-man government nor a government by cliques.

Today I feel it is wiser to tell you what the Republican Party can do and will strive to do, rather than to criticize the failures, blunders, poltical chicanery, intellectual dishonesty, wastefulness, and administrative inefficiency of the New Deal. To me it seems better to achieve than merely to erase. We will clear away the rubbish; we will carry out and burn the refuse, we will make the house livable again. But we will not exhaust our strength merely in abating the nuisances caused by our New Deal predecessors.

We mean to build, to build anew, not merely to repair the house. We mean to erect a new and splendid structure upon the foundation of our Constitution and within the framework of our republican laws that shall insure to all of us citizens who dwell under its roof a new era of peace, prosperity, happiness, and security. And over the door of the new edifice we shall set a creed—the historic Republican creed—a word of promise to the young and of solace to the old. That creed, printed indelibly as a guarantee to our children and to their children and grandchildren until time shall be no more, that message of assurance shall be:

Americans, make of yourselves what you will, for within these boundaries fair opportunity is guaranteed to all!

Music for the Boys in the Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to place therein an article by Elizabeth Henney from Liberty Magazine, about one of the most gifted and talented women in the United States, namely, Mrs. Stuart Godfrey, wife of Brigadier General Godfrey, of the United States Army Engineer Corps. General Godfrey is on active foreign duty and while he is away Mrs. Godfrey carries on here, doing everything she can to further music for members of the armed forces. She is a remarkable woman and deserves a world of praise for her unselfish work.

The following is the article:

PATRIOTS WITHOUT UNIFORM—MUSIC FOR THE SERVICES

(By Elizabeth Henney)

He was whistling gaily as he took her parking-lot ticket. As she turned to get into the car, she suddenly realized that he was giving out with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

"You must be mighty fond of good music," she said, and the boy in blue dungarees smiled back and said, "Yes, ma'am. I'm going in the Army next week, and I'm going to save every cent of my pay during the war, and when it's over I'm going to get me the finest grand piano there is."

A few evenings later she herself was giving out with good music at the piano in the Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines Club in Washington. She had started with Grieg's Concerto and gone on from there to request numbers.

Suddenly a young sailor stepped up and said, "Please, ma'am, can you play the tenor aria from Manon?" She said yes, of course—then discovered she didn't have the score of it with her and couldn't play it from memory.

Her embarrassment was heightened by the realization that this was one of the favorite songs of all tenors, and that she had failed a serviceman in so slight a request.

Out of those two incidents came the determination of Mrs. Stuart Godfrey to provide, as her contribution to the war effort, music for the services whenever and wherever required.

Mrs. Godfrey, wife of Brigadier General Godfrey of the United States Army Engineer Corps, is a concert player and a composer; she has recently written the music for That's the Infantry, the stirring words of which were written by Maj. Gen. Edwin F. Harding, who was her husband's classmate and roommate at West Point. She has always had a soft spot in her heart for anyone who was fond of music—so, once the idea of Music for the Services had taken hold, she did not let it rest.

First she went over to Bolling Field and spoke to the women's club there, on the invitation of Mrs. Henry H. Arnold, wife of General Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Forces. The members of the club, wives of air officers, listened with interest, and at the end of her talk one of them stepped up and said, "I haven't any musical talent, but I'd like to help, and maybe this dollar will get you started."

It did. Knowing there was a need for a piano in a nearby Army camp, Mrs. Godfrey put a whole dollar's worth of classified ad in the papers, asking for the donation of a piano. She got four pianos for that dollar.

Next she got in touch with Clara Herbert, the District of Columbia librarian, who put space in the public libraries at her disposal and made them all collection centers for donations. And the donations flowed in. To date, Music for the Services has placed more than 75 pianos in Army camps; has collected, mended, and distributed more than 20,000 pieces of sheet music; has distributed more than 75 phonographs with records, and innumerable other instruments.

A surprising request for "a string quartet" came from the naval station at Patuxent, Md. The four instruments were promptly sent, with an assortment of music for quartet or trio. They were acknowledged with fervent thanks; a whole cluster of the sailors at Patuxent were genuine musicians who had been eating their hearts out. A piano has been sent to Greenland and a phonograph, by airplane, to Nome, Alaska. The Stitch Club, a group of wives of engineer officers at Fort Belvoir, Va., had heard of the need of a phonograph in Nome, taken up a collection, and gotten in touch with Mrs. Godfrey. The piano for Greenland was donated by the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, and the Juillard School of Music in New York has donated 7 phonographs with 25 records for each, to be sent where needed.

There is no formality about music for the services, though because of its rapid growth there has had to be some assistance. Quinta Frey is in charge of a group of volunteers who mend, bundle, and catalogue the sheet-music donations. Mrs. Eugene Byrnes, president of the Friday Morning Music Club, is the honorary chairman, Mrs. Godfrey the acting one. Mildred Frame, whose husband (now in the service) was a member of the National Symphony, is the secretary, and Adela Paine, who has worked with the National Symphony for years, is the treasurer in charge of such financial donations as come in. Publicity is handled by Marian McGregor of the United States Air Forces.

Recently the crew of the Kennabeet, a Coast Guard cutter that operates off the coast of Avon, N. C., sent a plaintive note. They couldn't have any radio aboard their cutter, and life was too rocky for a piano or a phonograph, but they sure would like a little tunefulness of some kind now and then.

They got it. Mrs. Godfrey sent them four harmonicas, four ocarinas, and a ukulele, with instruction booklets and a variety of selections.

The Propaganda Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 8 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial comment appearing under the heading "The propaganda problem," published in the Catholic World for June 1944.

There being no objection, the editorial comment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PROPAGANDA PROBLEM

EVERY MAN A LIAR?

William L. Shirer, in his column Propaganda Front on May 7, expressed the fear that when we have defeated Hitler and his Nazi gang the German people may still rely upon our political naïveté, ignorance, tremendous conservatism, and our outlandish fear of chaos and socialism in Europe to "spare them the awful consequences of the lost war they so blithely started." He complains that while we read his books (and those of other experts on international affairs) we do not believe what we read. He knows of a class at New York University which "reacts to domestic propaganda with apathy and utter cynicism." They are "so convinced of the amount of lying that appears in newspapers, advertising, and radio that most of them do not believe in anything." He refers also to recent private polls which tend to show the incredulity not only of callow youth but of the Nation at large in regard to news and news comment. He mentions the inquiring reporter of the Detroit Free Press who discovered that the man in the street doesn't for a moment believe the stories of Nazi atrocities. He quotes Fortune magazine which reports that 44 percent of those it interviewed in 1942 still believe that the German people are "essentially peace-loving and kindly." The percentage of those who cherish that dangerous myth is, however, declining, and in that decline Mr. Shirer sees a glimmer of hope. Still there remain apathy and cynicism, the inclination to discount tales of atrocity, and skepticism about anything found in the newspapers or heard on the radio.

With Mr. Shirer's desire that we should think harshly of the Germans as a people I am not now concerned, except to say that I find it difficult to reconcile with the Gospel. On the presumption that we are fighting this war for Christian civilization, I suppose we should still make some slight obeisance toward the Founder of that civilization. Christ our Savior commands us to love our enemies; Mr. Shirer asks us to treat them harshly even after we have defeated them. Oddly enough, Mr. Shirer's view seems to contradict not only that of Christ but that of Stalin. The Soviet dictator, for reasons best known to himself, has repeatedly insisted that he wants a strong Germany when hostilities have ceased. He wants Germany not dismembered but rehabilitated. Mr. Shirer, on the other hand, argues against a "soft peace." I wonder if he would include among softies the man of steel who murdered millions in the Ukraine.

IS THERE A TOUCHSTONE?

But we were speaking of propaganda. I have read with some regularity Mr. Shirer's column Propaganda Front, and I do not recall that he has laid down rules as to how to distinguish what is propaganda from what is written bona fide. There is indeed an old familiar formula that would make our task easy; "orthodoxy is my doxy, heterodoxy is your doxy." Similarly, what I say is true; what the other fellow says is propaganda. Simple enough and helpful, but hardly to be recommended as a norm and criterion. Still we must have some touchstone to enable us to determine the gold of truth from the base metal of propaganda. Is there any?

QUEER SHAPE, BUT WHY?

Speaking for myself, I confess that I have become so discouraged in the attempt to find truth in the news and in comment upon the news that I have all but given up the attempt. Some of my friends complain that I am too skeptical. But on the other hand, Mr. Shirer accuses my kind of "political naïveté." Can a man be at the same time skeptical and naive? I do not say that he cannot. I remember G. K. C.'s observation that a man may be too fat and too thin, too fat in one place and too thin in another. But, says Chesterton, he would be a "queer shape." Aren't we all, mentally if not physically? The question is, What has made us intellectually lopsided? The answer is—dear Mr. Shirer—propaganda. Take those students at N. Y. U. those who voted in the Gallup poll, those who answered the Fortune questionnaire, and those who were buttonholed by the reporter in Detroit. Why do they believe so little? Why are they tempted to believe nothing at all? Why do they shrug their shoulders when they read atrocity stories or see atrocity pictures in the papers or at the movies? When the long withheld story of the Corregidor horror was suddenly sprung upon the people, why did they exclaim "It's for the War-bond drive"? When the announcement is made that meat may now be obtained without a ration card why do they say "It is election year"? Why have adolescents normally so credulous become hard-boiled? Why have the American people who in Barnum's day liked to be humbugged, fallen into the habit of saying "Oh yeah?" to almost everything? Again the answer is propaganda.

Let us have a few examples to illustrate the difficulty of determining what is propaganda and what is not.

Rev. Stanislaus Orlemanski, of Springfield, Mass., goes A. W. O. L. from his diocese to—of all places—Moscow, to have a chat with—of all people—Stalin. He comes back with the information that Stalin is friendly to Roman Catholics. Monsignor Ready, general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, declares the incident to be "political burlesque" and "phoniest propaganda." What say, Mr. Shirer? Is it propaganda? Yes? No? How do you know? In a spirited comeback, Father Orlemanski rebukes Monsignor Ready for using "such vulgar words" and for "trying to undermine [his] priestly and Christly life by innuendos." Skipping the question as to how a vulgar word can be an innuendo, will Mr. Shirer give us some rule of thumb by which we may determine which of the two clergymen is the propagandist? As far as we ourselves are concerned, we feel that we know, but is there some infallible standard of determination? Something that would convince others as we are convinced?

Father Orlemanski reports Stalin as calling himself "an advocate of freedom of conscience and of worship." Was the wily Georgian merely ribbing Father Orlemanski, or was he handing out propaganda which he expected Americans to swallow? And will they swallow it? They will unless we can prove it to be propaganda. How would you go about it, Mr. Shirer? Or would you go about it?

THOSE GRANDIOSE COMMUNIQUES

Hanson W. Baldwin of the New York Times, says, "The small operations of Marshal Tito and of Gen. Draja Mihailovitch have been exaggerated into great campaigns. To read some of the grandiose communiques issued in Marshal Tito's name one would think—quite inaccurately—that the Nazis were being driven from Yugoslavia." What say, Mr. Shirer? Is Baldwin right? Is this Tito stuff propaganda? How shall we know? How do you know? By way of good measure, while you are on the subject, could you tell us why we Americans switched from Mihailovitch to Tito? Was it because Tito is Stalin's man? Or is that propaganda?

Speaking of "grandiose communiques," how about those astronomical computations of German dead in the Russian reports? If all those Germans are really dead there can remain precious few to meet our attack on the western front. But, of course, those staggering figures of German casualties are only propaganda.

ATROCITIES A LA WORLD WAR NO. 1

The Australian Department of Information announced on May 11 that Sikhs liberated by the American advance at Hollandia reported seeing "a number of Chinese who had been nailed to palm trees with iron spikes driven through their foreheads." True or false, Mr. Shirer? Propaganda or fact? In the other war Sir Philip Gibbs ran down the story of the Canadian soldier crucified on a barn door in Belgium. He labeled it "propaganda." Is this the same story? Sikh for Canadian, spike through the head in place of nails through the hands and feet, palm tree instead of barn door? Same story, Mr. Shirer? Same propaganda?

Only one more atrocity story out of thousands. Edward Morgan in a special radio message to the Louisville Times says: "Allied and Italian authorities today are trying to obtain further information on the so-called Rome massacre during which the Nazi allegedly slaughtered between 300 and 500 civilians. But verification of that sort of news is always difficult to get. * * * Reports printed here * * * generally quoted Swiss border sources to the effect that the Germans staged a massacre in the Coliseum in reprisal for an incident in which bombs were thrown into a column of Gestapo and Fascist officers during the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Fascism."

It sounds like 1914–1915. But things are different now? Newspaper correspondents are more conscientious and newspaper editors more exacting? Oh, yeah? In the other war investigating committees looked into these things. They were fooled. How do we know we are not being fooled again? The truth is that the confidence of us old fellows who remember details of the other war has been undermined. If someone could give us that infallible test of propaganda for which we are clamoring, he might reestablish our confidence even in atrocity stories. As things are we believe or disbelieve according to temperament. If we are "easy marks" for rumors, we believe; if we are what our critics call "skeptical," that is to say judicious, we withhold assent.

On April 3 Raymond Daniell cabled the New York Times from London: "Mr. Molotov's statement that the social structure of Rumania will be retained as it is at present has gone a long way toward reassuring doubters that the Atlantic Charter is still the guiding star of all the major Allies." Propaganda or fact, Mr. Shirer? Honest Injun now, do you believe that the Atlantic Charter remains the guilding star of Britain, the U. S. A., and the U. S. S. R.?

In that same dispatch to the New York Times Mr. Daniell went on to say that it was agreed at Teheran that Russia would soon reassure Poland as she has reassured Rumania. In support of that prophecy, Mr. Daniell quotes certain "quarters" and "informants." Do you believe them, Mr. Shirer? Or is all this prophecy about Poland and Rumania just more propaganda?

THE BRITISH ALSO DOUBT

By the way, would you like to know one of the lesser reasons why newspaper readers become skeptical? It is because of that trick of correspondents who quote vague anonymous "quarters" and "informants." Large daily doses of that particular sort of propaganda have paralyzed our power to believe.

Over those dispatches of Mr. Daniell's there is a subheading, "British doubts largely dispelled." Were they indeed? I had not noticed it in reading the English papers. As far as I can see the British are as cynical as Americans about the Atlantic Charter.

To give but one sample of British opinion, the Catholic Herald, of London, says: "In the early stages when Hitler was rampaging about Europe and enjoying the benefits of a pact with bolshevism, there was no reluctance to exploit the moral situation for all it was worth. We were told the war was a crusade. We were constantly informed of the enormities of the enemy and of the pledges for a new and better world for which we were standing fast. Days of national prayer succeeded one another. * * *

"And now in the fifty-fifth month of the war (as the Prime Minister has reminded us), with victory at length in sight, the people of Britain can be spoken to for three-quarters of an hour without a single reference to what may be called the vision of the war, the vision of a new social deal at home, a new set of values, as it were, and the vision once expressed in the Atlantic Charter."

TRAGIC DISILLUSION

Over there apparently they are as much disillusioned as we here at home. In fact, I rather think more so. As far as the moral character of the war is concerned, the Herald goes on to say: "Abroad the picture is increasingly dismal for all but the minority, which sees salvation in the emergence of a new power whose outlook is totally alien to the Christian tradition. At home there is but the prospect of the enforcement of a handful of elementary social needs by an army of religiously, morally, and culturally blind state planners."

The fate of the Atlantic Charter is one of the chief reasons why we who would dearly love to be optimistic about international affairs have been driven reluctantly into skepticism if not pessimism. It was a splendid document, and our reaction to it was one of great delight. After the first gust of enthusiasm, more deliberate scrutiny gave rise to the question "Do they really mean it?" For example, that fourth clause: "They (the signatories) will endeavor, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment of all States, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity."

THE CHARTER WAS A CHEAT

There you have a principle that might have revolutionized the dealings of the nations with one another, abolished the grievances of the "have nots" against the "haves," and thus have prevented wars in the future. But staring at us out of the midst of the idealism and altruism of clause 4 were the weasel words "with due respect for their existing obligations." We said to one another "So there it is; same old dodge, same old duplicity." The world was to be made over anew, but it was to be the same as of old. Disabilities were to be removed but they were to remain. The causes of war were wiped clean off the slate, but by some infernal magic there they were again after the sponge had been applied.

Such were our doubts and fears in August 1941, when the Charter was published. In April 1944 Winston Churchill explained in the House of Commons that the weasel words "with due respect for their existing obligations" were inserted because of his insistence.

Then, too, there was in the Charter that clause about no territorial aggrandizement. We didn't exactly like the wording "They (the signatories) do not seek." We would have preferred "They will not accept." Sure enough it was another dodge. Stalin went serenely ahead annexing three whole countries and declaring that he would annex 40 percent of a fourth.

The Atlantic Charter, therefore, was a piece of propaganda. It was devised to produce a certain effect. The effect was produced. The Charter, having served its purpose, was torn up and thrown back into the sea whence it had emerged. Yet William L. Shirer wonders why we common folk have grown suspicious and skeptical. "Once bitten twice shy." We have been a hundred times bitten; shall we never grow shy?

On the editorial page of the New York Times is a daily column which I, for one (I know of many others) find particularly pleasing. It is called Topics of the Times. On April 2 it contained this paragraph: "Half the time we puzzle about the foreign policy of our own Government, American or British, as the case may be. The other half of the time we puzzle over Soviet foreign policy. How soon people will be fully enlightened about their own policy-makers at home we will not pretend to say. But upon Soviet foreign policy the last few days have brought a flood of light. This comes in the form of startling news about the wholesale revision of economic theory in the Soviet Union. Marxian thinking in Soviet Russia is out. The capitalist system, better described as the competitive system, is back."

STARTLING NEWS? NOT NEWS, BUT PROPAGANDA

In Moscow articles and editorials to the same purport were quoted in a bulletin published by Ambassador Averell Harriman. But by the 14th of the month, back from Moscow came this sockdolager signed by Maurice Hindus: "When American correspondents at Moscow first read these articles they rubbed their eyes and wondered if they had slept through one of the most epochal news stories about Russia. * * * Russian authorities on economics were as surprised as we were to hear that there is capitalism in Russia, or that capitalism—old or new—is being contemplated. One authority snapped out, perhaps in amusement or perhaps in anger: 'Our ideological enemies seem still determined to defeat us with their pens. Early in the war they annihilated our armies with their pens as often as Goebbels did. Now that our armies are still fighting and our fatherland has been saved, they are out to beat us again—this time they are annihilating our socialism with their pens.' " So once again, propaganda. On which side? Probably on both sides. Who can tell?

FRANCE TOO

One Martin Wilson writes a letter to the New York Sun in which he complains that on the day that Washington correspondents were told "there is no news," newspapers carried the item of the removal of General Giraud, whom we had backed, and the advancement of General de Gaulle, "whose position we had tried for months to weaken." Why was Giraud set up and then thrust down, while De Gaulle was first thrust down and then set up? We didn't know. We don't know yet. All the news we got and still get about Giraud and De Gaulle is pure propaganda.

EIRE ALSO

Mr. Robert Brennan, Minister from Eire to Washington, declares that the American Government is grossly misinformed about Axis espionage in Ireland. "The German legation," he said, "has no means of transmitting to Germany any information they may obtain. No diplomatic couriers travel between Germany and Ireland; no telephonic communication exists; no German wireless transmitter is operating and all cables must pass through British censorship * * * The operation of German submarines from Irish coastal points is impossible in view of the vigilance of our coast-watching service. The suspicion of espionage presupposes an efficient, widespread organization, which we know does not exist."

Mr. Brennan's explanation sounds reasonable. Nevertheless Britain seems to have persuaded our State Department that Eire's neutrality is dangerous. How shall we judge between Eire and Britain? How can we judge if we don't get the facts? How can we get the facts when we have no means of distinguishing propaganda from truth?

Let's drop international affairs and take up something domestic. On May 2 the executive committee of the American Legion labeled as "unjustifiable" the criticism heaped upon Representative HAMILTON FISH, the America First Committee, and congressional isolationists at the Legion convention last year. The committee said: "We have no right, directly or by inference or innuendo, to impugn the good faith or ascribe any subversive or un-American tendencies to such persons, their point of view, or their program. It is unfortunate that we should not have kept our escutcheon untarnished."

"Open confession is good for the soul." But a year is a long time to wait before going to confession, when one has committed the mortal sin of calumny. Personally I didn't need any exoneration of HAMILTON FISH; I know him. Or of the America First Committee; I was a member of it. But if I had not known the Congressman and the committee, how would I have been aware that what seemed to be a resolution was really propaganda? Particularly vicious propaganda.

CHOKED, DROWNED, IN PROPAGANDA

Propaganda is flooding over us every day like the Mississippi on a rampage. We are choked, steeped, saturated with it, engulfed in it. Even if we manage to escape the swirling flood, we still breathe in propaganda with the air. I have—as a kind of sorry jest—asked Mr. Shirer to communicate to us his method of discerning propaganda from truth. Of course he has no such method. Nor has any man.

WE KNOW OUR WEAKNESS

It is therefore only common sense that makes us Americans suspicious of what is being fed to us as news. Neither Mr. Shirer nor anyone else should affect to be surprised, still less scandalized, if even our young people "react to domestic propaganda with apathy and utter cynicism," and are "so convinced of the amount of lying * * * that most of them don't believe in anything." They say to the propagandists, "You made me what I am today; you seem not to be satisfied."

Amendments to the Emergency Price Control and Stabilization Acts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Mr. Chester Bowles with reference to H. R. 4941, together with comments by Mr. Bowles accompanying the same:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., June 8, 1944.

The Honorable JOHN W. McCORMACK,
Majority Leader, House of Representatives,

DEAR MR. McCORMACK: You have asked me to make a statement as to my opinion of the bill reported by the House Banking and Currency Committee. I am glad to comply with that request.

Of course, my responsibility is to administer the act, not to set broad price control policy, which is the responsibility of Congress. I do believe, however, that, while the Congress is considering changes, I should do my best to inform its Members what I think would be the consequences of the changes under consideration. In so doing I shall try to draw on the practical experience which I have had in administering O. P. A. price and rationing regulations ever since, soon after Pearl Harbor, I set up the first local boards in my State.

Some of the amendments suggested for the bill are constructive. For example, I think no step could be taken which would do more to aid effective enforcement than enacting the provision permitting the Administrator to sue for damages in cases of overcharges to consumers who fail to take action themselves within 30 days. This would let us enforce our regulations against careless retailers without having to indict them for violating the criminal law, the penalty which thus far we have been obliged to use. I think it also would be advantageous—and I know that the Economic Stabilization Director agrees—to provide for the publication of policy directives in the Federal Register. These are documents of public interest and importance; they clearly merit official publication.

A number of the other amendments do not change what we have considered to be the meaning of the law but they do make clear what that meaning is. Thus, we have always believed that it was O. P. A.'s duty, as well as its policy, to give consideration to the recommendations of industry representatives and advisory committees, even though the necessities of price control might make it impossible on occasion to follow specific proposals. It should be advantageous to have that obligation stated clearly in the statute. Again, it should be helpful to make clear that, when the Administrator makes an area adjustment in maximum rents under Section 2 (b), he must take into consideration general increases in costs and taxes for the particular area involved rather than for the Nation as a whole.

Unfortunately, there are some amendments which are confusing rather than clarifying in effect. Thus, a little change in a basic provision, such as the substitution of "shall" for "may" in the second sentence of the Stabilization Act which now gives the President authority to adjust prices and wages, would open up a succession of major questions as to the effect of the change on outstanding regulations. The result would be to stimulate demands for higher prices and wages and to create uncertainty both for O. P. A. and for industry.

Finally, there are certain amendments which, if enacted, would be disastrous to effective price control. Because I think that at this stage my criticisms of amendments can be more helpful to the Congress than my commendations, I have dealt with these dangerous amendments in greater detail than I have considered those which are helpful or at least not hurtful. I have brought all my comments together in an appendix to this letter, but here I wish to comment briefly on the proposed procedural provisions. These provisions are technical in character, on their face they do not reveal that their enactment would cause the following consequences:

1. By flooding O. P. A. with protests intended, not to raise genuine issues, but to delay enforcement proceedings, they would prevent industry from getting prompt and full consideration of important cases by the board of review which is proposed to be created.

2. By swamping the staffs of our operating departments these protests designed for delay purposes would undo the progress we have made in meeting industry's demand that we speed up our regular work.

3. Complaints designed for delay purposes would make it impossible for the Emergency Court of Appeals to keep abreast of its docket.

4. The freedom to attack regulations at any time would make for continuing instability in price and rent ceilings and uncertainty as to industry's rights and duties.

5. The proposed provisions would give most defendants an easy way to delay trial from 8 months to a year or more, thus assuring widespread acquittals because evidence had become stale or witnesses were missing.

6. The ability of law violators to secure stays, avoid trial for many months, and thus secure acquittals would undermine, if not destroy, voluntary compliance.

What these add up to is widespread industry confusion, a great stimulus to the black market, and inflationary prices to the consumer. I am sure that neither the committee nor the House wants to cause the collapse of price control in an effort to relax existing procedural safeguards. I am confident that a full consideration of the problem will result in agreement that justice to defendants in O. P. A. criminal cases will be fully assured if they are afforded an opportunity to complain after judgment to the Emergency Court of Appeals.

It is heartening to see that the House committee has beaten off the frontal attacks on stabilization by resisting the pressures of special interests to secure favored treatment for particular industries. I know well the force of these pressures because we in O. P. A. are subjected to them every day. I cannot believe that the committee would now sacrifice, by unwise procedural change, what it has gained for price control by its steadfast opposition to demands for special privilege.

Still more dangerous to price control than the procedural amendments proposed by the House committee are those which the Select Committee to Investigate Executive Agencies is sponsoring. Moreover, the changes in the fundamental principles governing the determination of maximum prices and rents which the latter committee advocates amount to a directive to O. P. A. to scrap all the work which it has done and to start issuing a new set of rules calling for higher prices.

While I am sure that if we were able to begin afresh on this job of price control we could do it better because of the experience we have gained, I know that we cannot begin our work anew. Even if it were possible, it would be unfair to American industry to demand that it start to master a new and different set of regulations. Moreover, most of the select committee's proposals do not reflect what we have learned; in fact, quite the reverse is true.

We have succeeded for a year in keeping back inflationary pressures which, if uncontrolled, would have shot the cost of living and wages up the inflationary spiral. We have saved the people of the United States $85,000,000,000 in the cost of the war alone. We have done this without serious injury to any group in the Nation and without impeding the greatest expansion in production in the Nation's history. We think this record should be an adequate answer to those who want us now to turn aside to experiment with a new set of rules.

Sincerely,

CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator.

COMMENTS BY CHESTER BOWLES, PRICE ADMINISTRATOR, ON THE AMENDMENTS TO THE EMERGENCY PRICE CONTROL AND STABILIZATION ACTS RECOMMENDED BY THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

EXTENDING THE ACT

Although, as I have said elsewhere, I believe the need for price control will continue after June 30, 1945, the question whether the acts should be renewed beyond that date is a matter for the consideration of Congress on which I think it inappropriate to comment.

PRICE, RENTS, AND MARKER AND RENTING PRACTICES

1. The accounting methods proviso

This proviso amending section 2 (a) forbids any regulation from requiring costs to be determined "otherwise than by established accounting methods." Actually, we do our best to adhere to such methods, and no instance to the contrary has been disclosed. However, in giving directions for calculating maximum prices, especially for new articles, we often specify the use of certain cost factors without including all those which an accountant might use for the quite different purpose of calculating operating income. If, for that reason, this amendment should be stretched by construction to invalidate those pricing formulas, a total of 169 maximum price regulations would have to be rewritten, and, while few price increases would, I hope, result, the new provisions would call for constant revision. It seems unfair to place upon war-burdened industries the job of recalculating myriads of ceiling prices according to the substitute formulas we should have to devise—all for no perceptible gain either to industry or to price control.

2. The profit control proviso

This proviso amending section 2 (a) forbids any construction of the act which would give the Administrator the right to do what I for one have no intention of ever doing, that is, of fixing profits "where such action has no relation to price control."

3. Consideration of industry recommendations

Two amendments to section 2 (a) require the Administrator in consulting with industry representatives and with industry advisory committees, to give consideration to their respective recommendations. These amendments wisely would make explicit a duty which I have considered as implicit in the existing law and which it is the declared policy of the office to observe.

4. Adjustments of maximum rents for factors within defense rental areas

Here again an amendment would clarify the law by making explicit what heretofore has been implicit. This amendment makes it plain that, when the Administrator considers general factors such as "increases or decreases in property taxes or other costs," he must consider those factors for the particular area whose rent ceilings he is adjusting.

5. Individual adjustments in certain cases of abnormally high or low maximum rents

The committee has resolutely opposed efforts to require the individual adjustment of rents wherever hardship might be shown since it has recognized that, in a nation of 14,000,000 landlords, such a provision would simply mean the collapse of rent control under a crushing administrative burden. In requiring instead that provision be made for the adjustment of individual rent ceilings where on the maximum rent date, due to peculiar circumstances, rents were abnormally high or low, the committee's proposed amendment to section 2 (c) would impose about as heavy a load as we can hope to carry. Our existing regulations have already gone far in this direction; even if this amendment were not adopted, we should revise them further to carry out the principle it declares as fully as possible.

6. Decontrol of rental areas

This amendment to require the removal of rent control whenever the Administrator finds the need for it to have gone (and to permit its restoration if needed) would make clear the fact that under the present law the Administrator is subject to such a duty. I have already ordered the decontrol of certain areas, and I look forward to decontrolling others just as soon as—and whenever—the governing standards are satisfied.

7. Limitation on subsidies

The committee's proposal to amend section 2 (e) by forbidding future definitions of food commodities as strategic or critical materials and thus to exclude R. F. C. financing of new subsidy programs in the future has the outstanding merit of permitting the continuation of the existing R. F. C. programs which I consider basic to stabilization at present levels. Frankly, I should much prefer to see the R. F. C.'s power untrammeled in the future, but, if the amendment is adopted and if the need requiring the exercise of that power should arise, I hope that the Congress will meet that need by prompt and adequate legislation.

8. The "business-practices" amendment

One of the most troublesome of the proposed amendments is that revising of section 2 (h) which forbids O. P. A. to compel changes in business practices. This revision would strike out the exception which has permitted such changes where they were necessary to prevent circumvention or evasion. It would place the stamp of congressional approval on circumvention and evasion of the law, provided only the method used involved a business practice or the remedy required would compel a change in one.

We have often been accused of changing business practices when all that we had changed was, not a business practice protected by section 2 (h), but a pricing practice falling clearly within the Administrator's authority to establish maximum prices under section 2 (a). However, the business of setting up a comprehensive system of price control has required the change of a good many business practices which, though innocent in themselves, would lead readily to circumvention or evasion. To give a homely illustration, we have set one ceiling for hamburger and a higher ceiling for ground steak. Since, once it is ground, the housewife can no longer tell ground steak from hamburger, it is obvious that a great deal of hamburger would be sold at the higher ground-steak ceiling if O. P. A. allowed steak to be ground in advance of sale. Consequently, to protect the housewife (and also the honest butcher), O. P. A. has had to require that, except for telephone orders, ground steak, if sold at the higher ceiling, must be ground in her presence. Since in peacetime that had not been the business practice of certain types of stores, doubtless, if the committee proposal were adopted, some of these stores would soon deny O. P. A.'s authority to compel them to grind steak in the presence of their customers..

This typifies the sort of problem which I, as Administrator, would be up against in literally hundreds of industries if the proposed amendment were enacted. Surely the American businessman does not want to see O. P. A. powerless to close the loopholes which less scrupulous competitors may find in the law.

9. Protection of fresh fruits and vegetables from unusual hazards

This proposed amendment adds a new subsection (g) to section 3, requiring the Administrator to adjust maximum prices of fresh fruits or vegetables to make appropriate allowances for major unexpected losses occurring in connection with the production and marketing of such commodities. This proposal is open to an objection which my experience convinces me is both valid and important; it makes mandatory a policy of the sort which can be wisely administered only on a discretionary basis. We have recognized the propriety of some adjustments in cases of the sort contemplated by the proposed amendment, but we are also aware of the practical difficulties arising out of the industry's production and marketing problems which often stand in the way of a satisfactory solution. Without wishing to oppose the objective of the amendment, I do wish to suggest to the House the desirability of a further amendment which would expressly recognize that the exercise of good administrative judgment is required in the handling of situations of the kind here involved.

10. Publication of policy directives

The committee's proposal to require that action exercising supervisory policy-making powers over O. P. A., W. F. A., and W. P. B. be taken by formal order published in the Federal Register, embodies a sound principle and will, I am sure, meet no objection on the part of any of the agencies affected by it. The present proposal eliminates certain technical difficulties which I had criticized in an earlier version.

PROCEDURE

1. Removing the time limit on filing protests

By amending section 203 (a) the committee would permit a protest to be filed against a regulation at any time instead of within 60 days from the date of its issuance or after new grounds of protest, such as increases in costs, had arisen. This would compel the abandonment of an objective of the existing law, the wisdom of which has been demonstrated in experience, namely, that legal questions which go to the basic validity of a regulation should be raised and settled as quickly as possible. The alternative is continuing instability both in our regulations and in the price and trade relationships which are dependent upon them.

There is another and still more serious difficulty in doing away with the 60-day limitation. Once it were removed, O. P. A. would be exposed to an uninterrupted stream of protests: Under a pending Senate amendment, providing a special 60-day period, beginning July 1, 1944, in which all regulations would be open to protest, O. P. A. would have to handle what might prove for a time to be a heavy volume of protests. But most of these protests would be protests based on genuine dissatisfaction with the operation of some regulation or some provision in a regulation. They would not be filed simply as part of a lawyer's maneuver to keep his client from going to trial. The full seriousness of the proposed removal of the present 60-day limitation cannot be appreciated until it is considered in connection with the provisions for the stay of enforcement proceedings, discussed under point 5, below.

2. Creating an administrative board of review

By a proviso to section 203 (c) the committee would provide for the creation within O. P. A. of a board or boards of review to consider protests to regulations filed after September 1. I do not object to this provision; indeed, I can see some very real advantages which should accrue from it once we can get the machinery properly set up and in operation. However, I think it must be recognized that this machinery will slow down the handling of protests. We have acted on protests much more rapidly than has been generally realized. The importance of this factor of added delay will become all the more evident in connection with the next three proposals.

3. Requiring action on protests within a reasonable time

The committee proposes to amend paragraph (a) of section 203 to cut the time for preliminary action on protests by denying the special 90-day period previously allowed for such action after the issuance of regulations. This will often compel piecemeal action on related protests which are filed one by one over the course of the 60 days after issuance.

Another change proposed by the committee would allow a protestant who thinks the Administrator has failed to grant or deny his protest promptly enough, to move in the Emergency Court of Appeals for an order requiring the action to be taken within a reasonable time. This amendment which provides a flexible procedure for handling a knotty problem is, I am told, substantially the same as the existing law. I think its enactment well worth while, however, for it will clearly inform protestants of their rights.

4. Permitting defendants to seek leave to file complaints against regulations with the Emergency Court of Appeals

What I am compelled to say about this and the succeeding provision may seem extreme, but it represents my sober, considered judgment. I do not believe effective price control is possible under these provisions, especially when coupled with the provision, discussed under point 1 above, allowing protests to be filed at all times.

The first of these provisions represents a revision of the provision which was carefully worked out after discussions with members of both the Senate and House committees. The original provision, which was adopted by the Senate committee, was designed to meet what the hearings indicated to be the one major defect in the existing procedure; the chance that a man might be convicted criminally of violating a regulation which he was barred from attacking, because he had failed to do so earlier, even though he had a reasonable excuse for that failure.

What the provision did was to allow, in criminal cases, a defendant to apply after conviction, for leave to file a complaint with the Emergency Court of Appeals that the regulation under which he had been convicted was invalid. In effect, the complaint to the Emergency Court would amount to an appeal from conviction. It would be granted only to defendants acting in good faith who had a reasonable excuse for having failed to protest within the regular 60-day period.

What the House committee has done is to make the complaint procedure apply in all cases, civil as well as criminal, despite the fact that an amendment allowing the courts to reduce damages from three times to one and one-half times the overcharge, effectively removed the danger that the damage suit might be oppressive to a nonwillful violator. The House committee then will allow the application for leave to be made at any stage of the proceeding. How dangerous this can be becomes evident when the next provision is considered.

5. Authorizing stays of all enforcement proceedings when protests or complaints against regulations are pending

Unlike the Senate provisions which entirely removes the protest and complaint as a means of delaying trial, the House committee amendment invites the collapse of our enforcement activities by requiring a court to stay any enforcement proceeding if it finds that a protest filed in good faith is pending or if it grants leave to a defendant to file a complaint with the Emergency Court of Appeals attacking the validity of a regulation.

The only protection which O. P. A. would have against the manipulation of the protest and complaint procedures would be the courts' ability to detect bad faith on the part of protestants and the courts' willingness to deny to such protestants the stays which they request. We know too well how plausible are the tales of misfortune and inadvertence, which any resourceful protestant can tell, to have confidence in the protection which the "good faith" finding would actually accord us.

It is impossible to overestimate the incentive which these House committee provisions would give for protests and complaints against regulations. Given a protestant who has every reason to wish for delay, it would be difficult—especially with the new board of review procedure—to close protest proceedings in less than from 4 to 6 months. Then would come an appeal to the Emergency Court of Appeals. Although, for an appellate court, its procedure is unusually expeditious, the case would require at least 4 months and, again, delay-minded counsel could readily stretch this period a month or two longer. Then could come a petition for certiorari to the Supreme Court. In other words, the House committee amendments place at the disposal of defendants a ready means of delaying trial from 8 months to a year, or even longer.

Consider what that means to this office which has been doing one of the biggest enforcement jobs that any governmental agency has ever been called upon to handle. From five to seven hundred rent and price proceedings are started every month. It is a herculean task to carry them through to a successful conclusion—and we have been successful in 94 percent of our cases. With evidence growing stale, with business records being lost, with witnesses leaving the district, and with the usual turn-over in enforcement staff, 8 to 12 months delay would be tantamount to an acquittal in a great many cases, and, of course, defense lawyers would be well aware of this fact.

They would also know that the Emergency Price Control Act is, after al, emergency legislation, and that, if cases were delayed sufficiently long and conditions changed, repeal of the act might allow their clients to escape.

As the flood of protests in the O. P. A. began to mount, the capacity of the O. P. A. operating staffs to handle the problems presented to the review board would steadily deteriorate. Moreover, delay in the regular operation of the Price and Rent Departments would be the inevitable consequence of absorption in protest and review proceedings. This would hurt the effectiveness of price control almost as much as the break-down in compliance and enforcement, which would inevitably come when people began to notice how notorious violators were escaping trial and how readily defense counsel could tie up O. P. A. cases.

Not only would this undo much of the progress which has been made toward getting O. P. A. running on a businesslike basis, the Emergency Court's docket would soon be clogged with cases filed only for purposes of delay. The court's opportunity to give due attention to the important cases justifiably before it would be correspondingly impaired.

There are many ways to destroy price control. The method I have just described is one of the most painful and the most certain.

6. Authorization of damages at one and one-half times the overcharge

The committee proposes to amend section 205 (e) to permit the damages recoverable against a defendant found to have made an overcharge to be fixed by the court at less than the treble damages required by the existing law. The minimum amount recoverable would be one and one-half times the overcharge or $50, whichever is higher. This relaxation would, of course, reduce the deterrent effect of the present law and discourage the settlement of cases.

7. Protection against the cumulation of $50 damages

In a few cases we have learned that advantage has been taken of the $50 minimum damages provision to recover that amount for every day a daily maximum rent was exceeded or for every transaction in a series of small related sales. I approve the proposed amendment to section 205 (e) to prevent the recurrence of this abuse.

AMENDMENTS TO THE STABILIZATION ACT

1. Change of "may" to "shall" in section 1

The committee proposes to amend the second sentence in the Stabilization Act by substituting the word "shall" for "may" so that the sentence would read:

"The President shall, except as otherwise provided in this act, thereafter provide for making adjustments with respect to prices, wages, and salaries, to the extent that he finds necessary to aid in the effective prosecution of the war or to correct gross inequities."

This amendment appears to make price adjustments mandatory where before they were discretionary. It does not apply to rents. If adopted, it would be taken as a finding by the Congress that there have not been enough price and wage increases. In effect, the Congress would be understood as saying to the Price Administrator and the Economic Stabilization Director: You have abused your discretion by denying too many price increases, where you had authority to grant them, so that now your discretion to deny must be taken away.

Any such announcement by the Congress could not fail to do damage to the stabilization program. Nor would it be saved from doing damage by the fact that, on close reading, the amendment turns out not to create any clear obligation to authorize a price increase in any specific type of situation. The vagueness of the language would not prevent it from being made the basis for new demands for price increases. The apparent expression of Congress of disapproval of present policies would inevitably weaken O. P. A.'s ability to resist these demands in situations in which they plainly ought to be resisted.

In the Stabilization Act the Congress made stabilization the rule and price and wage increases the exception. In this crucial stage of the effort to keep prices and wages stable it ought to avoid even the appearance of reversing this policy and turning the exceptions into rules.

2. Change of "may" to "shall" in section 3

The committee proposes a similar amendment to the first proviso in section 3, which applies to agricultural commodities, so that the proviso would read: "Provided, That the President shall, without regard to the limitation contained in clause (2), adjust any such maximum price to the extent that he finds necessary to correct gross inequities."

The comments made under point 1 above would be pertinent here but for the fact that this proviso has been utilized as a justification for reducing maximum prices of agricultural commodities which otherwise would be raised to grossly inequitable levels by clause (2) of section 3. Increases in maximum prices of such commodities to correct gross inequities can, of course, be made under section 1 without recourse to this proviso in section 3. I doubt that the committee feels that the Price Administrator and Economic Stabilization Director have reduced too few agricultural prices for gross inequities, yet so the committee's change would imply.

3. Authorization to investigations of stabilization activities

The committee has proposed the addition of a new section 12 which would authorize investigations by both House and Senate Committees on Banking and Currency into the effectiveness of stabilization activities and their effect upon industry, production, renting and housing, and distribution. If, as I hope, this provision is adopted, I shall be glad to cooperate fully with either committee in any investigation it may undertake. I believe the thorough consideration given by both committees to our experience to date should greatly facilitate any future inquiry.

Summary of Postal Legislation Enacted by the Seventy-eighth Congress Up to This Date

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, few departments of the Federal Government have felt the impact of the war more than the postal service and its several branches. The war has created new problems both for those who administer the postal service from the Postmaster General down to the postmaster in a crossroads or inland town, and also for the postal employees ranging from supervisory employees and clerks down to custodians and watchmen.

The duties of all postal employees have increased. War has created serious shortages of manpower in a great many offices. Many postal employees were drafted before the seriousness of the situation was realized and a deferment policy established. Other employees were attracted by the fine wages paid in defense plants and they abandoned the postal jobs with their comparatively low wage for better jobs in industry.

Yet essentially the postal workers are defense workers. Without their faithful and efficient service there really would be a bottleneck in the war effort. These experienced and capable postal employees keep speeding on their way highly important mail relative to defense work, priorities, plans, blueprints, and hundreds of other items. Influx of workers in defense or war plant areas have complicated the problems of the city carriers. Priorities have harassed the rural and star route carriers as they have had difficulty in keeping their mail service vehicles in operation.

The House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, a major committee, on which it has been my privilege to serve since coming to Congress, has had referred to it during the two sessions of this Congress, considerable legislation affecting the Postal Service.

Many persons serving the Nation in wartime under the Post Office Department have written me relative to some of the laws concerning post offices, postal employees, and postal service. That those interested in the subject may have a report of legislation on these important subjects, I have prepared the following summary of measures which have been enacted into law during this Congress up to June 7, 1944:

PUBLIC LAW 271 (H. R. 324) BY MR. BURCH OF VIRGINIA

To place postmasters at fourth-class post offices on an annual salary basis, and fix their rate of pay; and provide allowances for rent, fuel, light, and equipment, and fix the rates thereof. The purpose of this proposed legislation is to change the method of determining the amount of making payment of compensation to postmasters of the fourth class. Under the old system postmasters of the fourth class are compensated upon the stamp cancelations of their respective offices. They are their own accountants, count the cancelations on mail dispatched from their offices, and calculate their commissions on such cancelations. The system is quite complicated and subject to many errors. The increase in cost will be eliminated because of the efficiency of the system over the one now in use.

PUBLIC LAW 124 (H. R. 1004) BY MR. HAGEN OF MINNESOTA

To relieve newspapers and periodical publications which have voluntarily suspended publication for the duration of the war from payment of second-class mailing fees upon resumption of publication.

PUBLIC LAW 25 (H. R. 1366) BY MR. O'BRIEN OF MICHIGAN

To provide temporary additional compensation for employees in the postal service. The purpose of this proposed legislation is to make appropriate provision for a temporary increase in compensation of postal employees, in recognition of the fact that the cost of living has increased so that under present conditions the compensation received by postal employees is inadequate. The increase in compensation provided for will apply to all employees in the field service of the Post Office Department.

PUBLIC LAW 306 (H. R. 1565) BY MR. ALLEN OF LOUISIANA

Relating to the appointment of postmasters.

The purpose of this proposed legislation is to obviate the requirement that postmasters in offices of the fourth class shall take an examination when such office is advanced to third class, or shall take an examination when a third-class office is relegated to the fourth class. Since the discontinuance of such examinations would result in a saving of time to the Civil Service Commission and expense to the Government, the enactment of this bill will be advantageous both to the Postal Service and to the public, as well as to the morale of the postmasters affected.

PUBLIC LAW 205 (H. R. 2080) BY MR. COLE OF MISSOURI

To provide additional pay for equipment maintenance for each carrier in Rural Mail Delivery Service.

The purpose of this legislation is to assist the rural carriers toward meeting the rapidly increasing cost of maintaining their equipment which, in keeping with all other necessities during the war emergency, has constantly advanced in price. It provides that each rural carrier shall be paid 1 cent per mile per day for equipment maintenance in addition to the 5 cents per mile per day for each mile or major fraction of a mile scheduled as now provided by law. According to a recent survey by the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association through their membership in 44 States, the maintenance rate for 1942 averaged 0.08269 cents per mile. It was stated that this survey showed that in some cases the maintenance cost was in excess of 10 cents per mile. Attention was called also to the fact that prices of new automobiles have risen more than 30 percent since 1941, when available, and trade-in values have become lower; also that repair costs have increased not less than 50 percent since the beginning of 1942. Attention is called to statement in the report of the Postmaster General on this bill, as follows: "* * * from inquiries made and data examined, we are satisfied that it is costing the rural carriers well above 6 cents per mile per day for equipment maintenance."

PUBLIC LAW 161 (H. R. 2250) BY MR. MURRAY, OF TENNESSEE

To extend the provisions of the Reclassification Act of February 28, 1925, to include custodial employees into the Postal Service.

The purpose of this legislation is to bring the custodial employees of the Post Office Department under the Reclassification Act of February 28, 1925, and thus secure for them a permanent and more equitable status. As the situation now exists, custodial employees are paid under the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 763), whereas regular Postal Service employees are paid in accordance with the act of March 4, 1911 (ch. 241, sec. 4, 36 Stat. 1339), which makes it necessary for the Department to pay employees under two different laws and to compute salaries from two different sets of salary tables.

PUBLIC LAW NO. 259 (H. R. 2419) BY MR. HOLIFIELD, OF CALIFORNIA

To change the name of "laborer" in the Postal Service to that of "assistant clerk."

The purpose of this legislation is to change the designation of "laborer" in the Postal Service to that of "mail handler," without change of duties or compensation. This bill is endorsed by the National Association of Post Office and Railway Mail Laborers and the New York City branch of American Post-Office Employees. These groups feel that the term "mail handler" more accurately and properly designates their duties. It is also approved by the president of the National Association of Post Office Mechanics.

PUBLIC LAW 181 (S. 970) (H. R. 2437), BY MR. PRICE, OF FLORIDA

Authorizing the Postmaster General to use post-office clerks and city letter carriers interchangeably. The purpose of this legislation is to provide more efficient use of manpower during the war emergency by authorizing the assignment of post-office employees interchangeably.

PUBLIC LAW 266 (H. R. 2836), BY MR. WHELCHEL, OF GEORGIA

To grant increases in compensation to substitute employees in the Postal Service, and for other purposes. The purpose of this legislation is to improve the condition of substitute employees in the Postal Service. It is felt by the Post Office Department that the substitute employee is entitled to successive increases as provided for other Government employees, based upon length of service, which would not only improve the morale of the postal worker, but would result in better service to the Department.

PUBLIC LAW —— (H. R. 2928), BY MR. FAY, OF NEW YORK

To amend the act entitled "An act to fix the hours of duty of postal employees, and for other purposes," approved August 14, 1935, as amended.

The purpose of this proposed legislation is to correct inequalities in the case of certain employees in the Postal Service not included in existing law by providing for the payment of overtime. It includes postmasters and supervisory employees, who may not, under the law, receive payment for overtime. Considerable dissatisfaction exists among postmasters and supervisory employees because of the fact that in many instances clerks, who may receive daily overtime, now receive as much, or more, pay than such officials.

PUBLIC LAW 128 (S. 1316) (H. R. 3129), BY MR. BURCH, OF VIRGINIA

To provide for clerical assistance at post offices, branches, or stations serving military and naval personnel, and for other purposes.

The action of Congress in enacting these important pieces of legislation is very much appreciated by the public and various postal employees involved as indicated by communications received by members of our Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

I have received a number of such letters.

One is from the president of the National Association of Postmasters and it states as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF POSTMASTERS,
Woburn, Mass., May 11, 1944.

Hon. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
Congressman, Ninth District of Minnesota, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAGEN: In behalf of the National Association of Postmasters of the United States, I extend you and the committee our sincere thanks for your cooperation and assistance in the matter of H. R. 324, fourth-class postmasters' bill—H. R. 1565, bill to eliminate the necessity of fourth class postmasters taking examinations when their offices advance from the fourth to the third class; also your recent most helpful support of H. R. 2928, affecting postmasters of the first, second, and third classes.

In fact we have always found you to be a stanch friend of all the postmasters and favorably disposed to legislation seeking to improve the postal service.

We want you to know that we are appreciative of your continued interest in the cause of the postal service and the postmasters.

With kind personal regards, I am

Very truly yours,

PHILIP J. GALLAGHER, National President.

The National League of District Postmasters has similarly expressed its appreciation of the action of this Congress on a measure in which it was particularly interested. They have written as follows:

NATIONAL LEAGUE OF DISTRICT POSTMASTERS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1944.

Hon. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAGEN: I am taking this opportunity to express to you on behalf of the district postmasters our sincere thanks and appreciation for your support and sympathetic cooperation in obtaining the passage of legislation in the present Congress, benefiting the postmasters and postal workers.

Our success in securing the passage of the pay-increase measure and the recent fourth-class salary act was due largely to the manner in which these bills were handled by the House Post Office and Post Roads Committee, of which you are a member, and we are deeply appreciative of the assistance given.

With every good wish for your continued success, I am,

Very truly yours,

E. A. MEEKS,
National Secretary.

The National Association of Letter Carriers, with headquarters in the American Federation of Labor Building here, viewed our accomplishments in the following manner:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS,
Washington, D. C., May 3, 1944.

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Allow me to congratulate you as a member of the House Post Office Committee, on the splendid accomplishment of your committee on May 2, when the House of Representatives unanimously passed five bills which had previously been reported out by your committee and placed on the consent calendar. The action of the House indicates the respect which the average Member has for the work by your group, for they know that when a bill has been reported out by your committee that it not alone has merit but it also has been thoroughly considered.

While congratulating you on the work of the committee, we desire to take advantage of this opportunity to express our personal appreciation for the splendid work that you have done for the postal employees ever since you assumed membership on the committee. The committee has given consideration to a large number of bills affecting the welfare of the postal employees and all of these bills have received your wholehearted support and approval.

We especially wish to thank you for the support and assistance which you rendered in having the $300 temporary salary increase and the measure increasing the salary of substitutes enacted into law, and we want you to know that your interest is appreciated by every letter carrier in the country and particularly by those in your own district who should be and are proud of having such a splendid Representative in Congress.

Again thanking you for your interest in behalf of the men I have the honor to represent and wishing you success in all of your undertakings, I am

Very truly yours,

CLARENCE F. STIMSON.
Assistant Secretary.

A letter, dated May 3, 1944, which I have received from Mr. Frank Russell, president of the National Star Route Mail Carriers Association, says, in part, as follows:

It has been most gratifying to have had your cooperation in every way in our star-route carrier problems. You have given all the help possible and I am sure from my contacts here in our legislative program that if reelected you will continue to aid us and the general public.

I call attention that you have an already established standing on the House Post Office Committee. The taxpayers have an investment in every conscientious and hard working Congressman and their committees.

Yes, the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has done a grand job and it has been a pleasure for me to attend its numerous committee meetings and participate in its deliberations.

Persons desiring copies of any of the laws referred to in the summary may secure them by writing to their own United States Representative in Congress or one of their two United States Senators.

In Memory of Hon. Ulysses Samuel Guyer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD H. REES

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the splendid tribute to the memory of the late Ulysses Samuel Guyer, of Kansas, by Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas:

The memory of the late Ulysses Samuel Guyer, of Kansas City, Kans., Representative in Congress from the Second District of Kansas, will remain a pleasant, sustaining and inspiring memory to all who knew him. Judge Guyer, as he was respectfully and affectionately known to his colleagues in Congress, and to the people of Kansas, was one of those who serve without ostentation, without trumpeting, with honor and with integrity.

My own memory of Judge Guyer goes back nearly a half-century, when he was a young lawyer, getting his start in Kansas City, Kans.; where he was soon in demand as an orator at civic and political meetings; when he was judge of the municipal court in that city; when he became mayor of this largest city in Kansas. Later he came to Washington representing the Second District of Kansas, which he represented ably and with distinction continuously since 1926, after previously filling the unexpired term of the Honorable Ed C. Little.

Before taking his law course in law, Judge Guyer taught school for 4 years at St. John, Kans., where he was superintendent of schools and principal of the city high school. We who knew him well, and had heard him talk of St. John, in western Kansas, and his associations there in the days of his early youth, were not surprised at his request that he be buried in the St. John cemetery.

Throughout his long and useful life, and in the public offices he held, I believe Judge Guyer remained the educator, though he served with honor and distinction in the municipal offices he held, and in the Congress. He was a student of history, a reader of biographies; a devout believer in the American form of government; jealous of any infringement of the constitutional rights of the States and the citizen; a zealous and able defender of the Constitution against encroachment from any source.

Judge Guyer was a true and trusted friend of the ordinary man. During all his life he worked and fought for the rights of the Negro. He was a strong believer in prohibition, and held to his course without ever yielding an inch in his beliefs and ideals. He was a kindly man, an able man, a learned man, a just man, but with him justice was tempered with kindness and mercy; a man who did his duty as he saw it, but with never a trace of intolerance for those who did not agree with his own views or follow his own practices.

I think I speak for Kansas when I say to his colleagues in the House that Kansas mourns his passing, and at the same time rejoices that he lived and served his State and Nation through a long and illustrious career. May those of us, his friends and colleagues, who are left to carry on with the same high courage and high ideals that characterized Ulysses Samuel Guyer of Kansas.

The world is the better for his having lived in it, and contributed to its progress. We know that he faced the end—he knew it was coming months before the Grim Reaper cut the final tie—with the same cheerful and quiet fortitude he evinced through all his life. Eight years ago Judge Guyer delivered what I believe to have been one of the notable memorial addresses delivered in the Hall of Representatives. He closed that address with these lines from a great dramatic critic, William Winter, written while he was facing eternity:

"One other bitter drop to drink,
And then—no more!
One little pause upon the brink,
And then—go o'er!
One sigh—and then the lib'rant morn
Of perfect day,
When my free spirit, newly born,
Shall soar away.

"One pang—and I shall rend the thrall
Where grief abides,
And generous Death shall show me all
That now he hides;
And lucid in that second birth,
I shall discern
What all the ages of the earth
Have died to learn.

"One motion and the stream is crost,
So dark, so deep!
And I shall triumph, or be lost,
In endless sleep.
Then onward whatso'er my fate,
I shall not care!
Nor sin nor sorrow, love nor hate
Can touch me there."

Henry Bascom Steagall

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. A. SIDNEY CAMP

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. HENRY BASCOM STEAGALL, late a Representative from the State of Alabama

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, during the year that has passed since our last memorial exercises the Grim Reaper has taken a heavy toll of the membership of the Congress of the United States—3 Senators and 10 Representatives having been called by the Great Master of the Universe from their labor among us to their eternal home in that country—

"From whose bourne
No traveler e'er returns."

The loss of these colaborers is being keenly realized each passing day as we feel the need of their wise counsel and words of encouragement, but especially do we mourn the loss of our leaders, tried and true.

Outstanding among the leaders of the Congress when I first took my seat here was HENRY BASCOM STEAGALL, of Alabama, chairman of the great Committee on Banking and Currency. He was as strong as an oak, a stalwart member of the Old Guard, fully informed on the great questions confronting this country, and unwavering in his devotion to duty. No man here had more dignity and power, and no man had a greater part in shaping and molding the beneficial legislation of the past decade of his life. He was the ideal committee chairman, studied the legislation before him, and gave to it the imprint of his keen and practical mind. The economy of this country, the banking and financial interests of our people, and the established position of America in world affairs all are stronger and richer by reason of the labor of HENRY STEAGALL.

No son of Alabama has shed more luster on her honored banner. No son of America was more of a patriot.

Although busy with important affairs at all times, he took time to encourage and advise younger Members and no one misses him more than I do.

He loved us all; he loved everybody. Scion of one of the oldest and best families of the Old South, he fraternized with men of high and low estate, saw their best qualities, shared their joys and sorrows. He enjoyed wholesome recreation. He was a true nobleman, noble in thought, in purpose and action, and appreciated that quality in others as few men can do.

His conception of nobility has been exactly expressed by these words:

"Howe'er it be, it seems to me
'Tis only noble to be good,
Kind hearts are more than coronets
And simple faith than Norman blood."

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. A. SIDNEY CAMP

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1944

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. THOMAS HENRY CULLEN, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, the sorrow we experience in the passing of a friend is the sorrow from which the heart fails to find real surcease. It is a sorrow measured by our love for them, and when we learned, on March 1, 1944, that the Great Father had called our kind hearted, generous, distinguished and beloved colleague, THOMAS H. CULLEN, home to rest, we were so overcome in grief that Time, though a great healer, refuses to palliate.

Although I had known Mr. CULLEN since I became a Member of Congress in 1939, it was not until my election to the Ways and Means Committee, of which he was our ranking member, that I became closely asociated with him and learned to love him.

He was an elder statesman whose example and advice we cherished. I have never seen anyone who possessed more dignity, and patriotism. He was tolerant and sympathetic, and always conscious of his duties and responsibilities as a legislator.

His long service as a Member of this House is proof of his abundant ability and popularity among his fellow Members and constituents as well.

His death was a personal loss to me, and I extend to his bereaved family my heartfelt sympathy.

OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Bay City (Mich.) Times of June 6, 1944:

C. I. O. POLITICS
(By Mark Foote)

WASHINGTON.—Some idea of the huge campaign kitty which will be made available by the C. I. O. political action committee for the reelection of President Roosevelt was revealed in a hearing before the War Labor Board. Thomas E. Patton, counsel for the Republic Steel Corporation, asserted that companies representing four-fifths of the industry had turned over to the steel workers union $3,709,975 in dues checked off from wages of 301,417 workers.

"A substantial portion," he asserted, "is to be poured into the funds of the political action committee which will use its political influence in the coming national elections. The result will be to place potent financial backing behind some political party, based on forced contributions, to a previously unheard of extent. No citizen should be forced against his will to contribute, directly or indirectly, to any political party or movement."

The C. I. O. group, committed to the reelection of President Roosevelt, as of today has a kitty of nearly $700,000, of which $189,000 already has been spent in electioneering. This fund would not be possible except for the check-off system. That system was established by order of the President soon after the New Deal came into existence in 1933.

The first huge contribution out of the check-off union funds to a political campaign was made in 1936 for the election of Roosevelt. The check-off came about in this way: The old N. R. A. made a deal with the mine owners under which they were allowed to fix prices without regard to the antitrust laws with the understanding that they would also withhold union dues from the workers' pay envelopes. The pay-off came when John L. Lewis contributed $500,000 out of union funds to the campaign.

Iniquity of the use of check-off funds for campaign purposes arises from two facts: First, it is illegal for labor unions as such to make contributions to political campaign funds the Corrupt Practices Act for years has forbidden under severe penalties. When the Smith-Connally Antistrike Act was passed more than a year ago it extended this prohibition to labor unions. Yet, Attorney General Biddle has ruled that the contributors of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee do not violate the law.

Senator GREEN, Democrat, of Rhode Island, chairman of the committee which is supposed to keep a current check on campaign contributions and practices, defended the action of the Attorney General. He said that the C. I. O. group was working to educate the voters and concentrated on "issues rather than candidates."

The second objection to contributions from funds obtained by labor unions through the check-off system is that they may be and frequently are a forced contribution from workers. Many workers, if they knew their dues were to be used partly for political purposes, would refuse to pay dues. But under the check-off system they have no alternative. Their dues payment is automatic and goes with their job.

More recently a modification of the check-off system has been instituted by the Roosevelt administration. It is quite as effective in forcing workers to pay union dues which may be used for political purposes. This is the maintenance-of-membership system. Under this practice union members must pay their union dues or lose their jobs.

It will be interesting as the campaign develops to see whether the Senate committee headed by Senator GREEN will do a real job of exposing illegal practices. The effectiveness of this committee has varied from campaign to campaign.

In 1938, under the chairmanship of the late Senator Sheppard, Democrat, of Texas, it was a powerful influence in disclosing campaign irregularities in Kentucky, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, and other States. Its findings contributed to the passage of the Hatch clean-politics law. Among other things, it revealed that W. P. B. employees were being forced, on penalty of loss of their jobs, to vote for Senator BARKLEY, of Kentucky.

Resolution Providing for an Hour of Prayer on D-Day

REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER H. GROSS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, on May 8 I presented House Resolution 536 dealing with certain activities for D-day. I feel it was a mistake that the Committee on Rules did not consider this resolution, because I am sure it would have met with the unanimous approval of the House.

On May 8 I addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, ever since the world began, men have turned to God for guidance when they realize their greatest needs. Never have they been disappointed. He has been pointed to as a mighty fortress by the great spiritual leaders of all time. He gives us strength for our bodies, rest for our weary spirits, and peace to our troubled minds. He can and will give us strength, grace, and courage to carry on now. His Son said the earnest prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Holy Writ records many incidents of mighty things accomplished by the united prayers and efforts of the people.

Apparently D-day is drawing nigh, and the hour of invasion may be any hour. Many communities have set aside the invasion hour to assemble in their churches to implore divine guidance and strength of arms to accomplish an early victory and bring about a lasting peace. Inasmuch as the Nation rightfully looks to this House for leadership, I am today introducing a resolution for the House to take appropriate action when the news of the invasion comes.

House Resolution 536, which I introduced is as follows:

Whereas we are engaged in a global war; and

Whereas the freedom of mankind throughout the world is at stake; and

Whereas nearly every home in America has loved ones in places of great danger; and

Whereas we believe in God and recognize His mighty power as well as believing in the justice of our cause; and

Whereas D-day or the hour of invasion draws near, and realizing the great sacrifice it will take; and since the Nation rightfully looks to the House of Representatives for leadership: Therefore be it

Resolved, That when the news comes that the invasion has begun if the House of Representatives be in session that an immediate recess be declared; the roll called to assemble the membership; and a period of 15 minutes be spent in prayer under the direction of the House Chaplain in order to have grace, courage, and strength to carry on in that trying and solemn hour for ourselves and our armed forces everywhere, as well as for an early victory and a lasting peace; and be it further

Resolved, That if the House of Representatives be not in session, then the House of Representatives shall convene on that day at the accustomed hour for the purpose of carrying out this resolution.

Jackson Hole National Monument

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, a very controversial issue has developed in reference to a bill, H. R. 2241, that has been introduced which would set aside the President's Executive order creating the Jackson Hole National Monument in Wyoming.

As a member of the Committee on Wildlife Conservation of the House naturally I am interested in this legislation. Recently our committee met to discuss the effect of the bill if it ever came up. It, of course, sets a precedent. Congress heretofore never passed legislation to abrogate any Executive order issued under the Antiquities Act of 1906 or the Historical Site Act.

In order to properly be advised so that I could meet the issue intelligently if the bill is presented to the House for consideration, I called upon the Department of the Interior for information, asking numerous questions. I have received an answer to my query, and under the permission granted me I include it as a part of my remarks. The statement follows:

JACKSON HOLE NATIONAL MONUMENT, WYO.

1. What is Jackson Hole National Monument?

Jackson Hole National Monument is a Federal reservation comprising 173,065 acres of Federal land in the northern portion of Jackson Hole, a spectacular valley on the headwaters of the Snake River in northwestern Wyoming. The national monument adjoins Grand Teton National Park. In addition to the Federal lands, the boundaries established for the monument contain 33,560 acres purchased by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., for donation to the Federal Government, and 16,304 acres of other private or State lands. The total acreage within the boundaries is 222,929.

2. Under what authority was this national monument created?

On March 15, 1943, the President issued a proclamation reserving these lands under the authority of section 2 of the act of June 8, 1906 (34 Stat. 225), which is as follows:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to declare by public proclamation historic landmarks, historic and prehistoric structures, and other objects of historic or scientific interest that are situated upon the lands owned or controlled by the Government of the United States to be national monuments, and may reserve as a part thereof parcels of land, the limits of which in all cases shall be confined to the smallest area compatible with the proper care and management of the objects to be protected: Provided, That when such objects are situated upon a tract covered by a bona fide unperfected claim or held in private ownership, the tract, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the proper care and management of the object, may be relinquished to the Government, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept the relinquishment of such tracts in behalf of the Government of the United States."

3. Why was Jackson Hole National Monument established?

"To conserve the scenery and the natural and historic objects and the wildlife therein and to provide for the enjoyment of the same in such manner and by such means as will leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations." (The purpose of national monuments as defined by Congress in the act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535).)

Jackson Hole is well known as one of the most beautiful valleys in America. Its abundant plant and animal life, as well as its geological formations, give it great scientific interest. It is an important part of the wintering grounds of the largest elk herd in the United States. It has been an historic landmark since the era of the fur trappers a century ago.

The monument includes the minimum necessary for the proper care and management of the northern portion of Jackson Hole, which is to be preserved in its natural and unspoiled condition. The southern portion, where the best ranch lands are situated, is not included in the monument.

4. Was the creation of Jackson Hole National Monument in accordance with established precedent?

Every President since the passage of the act of June 8, 1906, known as the Antiquities Act, has established national monuments under the authority of that act, a total of 82 having been thus created.

President Theodore Roosevelt in 8 years created 18 national monuments totaling 1,534,329 acres.

President Taft in 4 years created 10 national monuments totaling 2,300 acres.

President Wilson in 8 years created 13 national monuments totaling 1,121,996 acres.

President Harding in 2 years created 8 national monuments totaling 8,937 acres.

President Coolidge in 6 years created 13 national monuments totaling 1,243,063 acres.

President Hoover in 4 years created 9 national monuments totaling 2,147,640 acres.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 11 years has created 11 national monuments totaling 1,494,767 acres.

Seven of the 82 national monuments thus established were larger than Jackson Hole National Monument. These were:

(1) Grand Canyon National Monument in Arizona, established in 1908 by President Theodore Roosevelt, 806,400 acres.

(2) Mount Olympus National Monument in Washington established in 1909 by President Theodore Roosevelt, 633,600 acres.

(3) Katmai National Monument in Alaska established in 1918 by President Wilson, 1,087,990 acres.

(4) Glacier Bay National Monument in Alaska established in 1925 by President Coolidge, 1,164,000 acres.

(5) Death Valley National Monument in California established in 1933 by President Hoover, 1,601,800 acres.

(6) Joshua Tree National Monument in California established in 1936 by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, 838,258 acres.

(7) Oregon Pipe Cactus National Monument in Arizona established in 1937 by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, 330,690 acres.

5. Has the Supreme Court ever rendered an opinion concerning the establishment of a national monument under the authority of the act of June 8, 1906?

Yes. After President Theodore Roosevelt created the first Grand Canyon National Monument in Arizona, containing 806,400 acres, the legality of the monument was contested on the grounds that the area did not qualify for monument status under the Antiquities Act, and that the President had acted without authority in setting it apart as a national monument. In 1920, the Court rendered its opinion (252 U. S. 450):

"The defendants insist that the monument reserve should be disregarded on the ground that there was no authority for its creation. To this we cannot assent. The act under which the President proceeded empowered him to establish reserves embracing 'objects of historic or scientific interest.' The Grand Canyon, as stated in his proclamation 'is an object of unusual scientific interest'."

6. Was the creation of this national monument an infringement upon the rights of the State, the county, or any individual?

The proclamation establishing the monument reserved only the Federal lands within the described boundaries and it was issued subject to all valid existing rights. Certain private and State lands are also within the described boundaries, but these lands are still in private and State ownership, and the rights of the owners are the same as they were before the proclamation was issued. The private lands can be acquired only by donation or by purchase with funds appropriated by the Congress. They cannot be acquired by condemnation unless Congress appropriates the funds therefor. The State lands may be exchanged for Federal lands of equal value outside the monument, if the State so wishes. No lands have been confiscated, no citizens have been dispossessed, and private property and income within the monument is subject to taxation as it was before the monument was established.

7. Who owns the lands within the described boundaries?

Federal land and water, 173,064.62 acres, 77.6 percent; land purchased by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., to donate to the Federal Government, 33,559.89 acres, 15.1 percent; remaining private lands, 14,937.16 acres, 6.7 percent; State school lands, 1,367.32 acres, 0.6 percent; total lands, 222,928.99 acres, 100 percent.

The Federal land and the land purchased by Mr. Rockefeller to donate to the Federal Government comprise more than 92 percent of the total area within the described boundaries.

8. For what have these lands been used?

About 8,000 acres within the monument boundaries are under cultivation, of which 2,500 acres are irrigated. About 54,000 acres are subject to grazing by about 6,300 head of cattle during varying portions of the year, of which 4,000 head of cattle require summer range on the adjoining national forest. The timber within the monument has certain local uses but is not considered to be of commercial significance. The area has been used principally for recreation and wildlife conservation. There are 241 people living in the monument.

9. How does the creation of the monument affect livestock grazing?

On April 8, 1943, the Secretary of the Interior, who is charged with the administration of the monument, issued an administrative policy statement from which the following is quoted:

"All permits issued by the Forest Service or other Federal agencies for use of lands now within the national monument will be honored by the National Park Service during the lifetime of the present holders, and the members of their immediate family."

When the Secretary of the Interior testified before the House Public Lands Committee, he amplified his position concerning grazing within the monument, as follows:

"In order to show how completely we desire to protect the interests of those few individuals who have some 6,300 head of cattle and horses grazing in this area, I am willing * * * to support a measure which has been suggested to me whereby those who own lands within the monument, appurtenant to which are grazing rights on public lands within the monument, can be assured that they and their heirs and assigns will be protected in those rights so long as they own lands within the monument. * * *

"The rights of those cattlemen who have ranches outside of the monument but who have crossed the area for years to reach their present summer range in the national forest will be continued."

10. How does the creation of the monument affect the county tax structure?

The Teton County treasurer reports that the county's average annual income for the years 1940, 1941, and 1942 was $132,052. The average annual county tax revenue from Mr. Rockefeller's land is a little less than $10,000, which he has paid ever since he bought these lands 15 years ago to donate to the public and is still paying, pending the enactment of legislation by Congress to authorize some suitable compensation to Teton County when these lands are transferred to the Federal Government and are removed from the local tax rolls. The President and the Secretary of the Interior have both indicated that they would favor such a solution of the county tax problem.

Congress has already authorized annual payments to counties from the income from national forests, grazing districts, wildlife refuges, and other Federal conservation lands. The proposed legislation would authorize the counties to share similarly from the national parks and monuments.

11. What is the origin of the Jackson Hole National Monument project?

Mr. Rockefeller, Jr., was encouraged by the Federal Government, beginning in the Coolidge administration, to acquire private lands in the northern part of Jackson Hole so that they might be donated to the American public for recreation purposes, together with the public domain and other Federal lands in the area. This was in response to the pleas of Jackson Hole residents that a portion of that great scenic valley be preserved for public enjoyment. The boundaries of the monument are essentially those presented to a special wildlife committee of the Senate by a group of Jackson Hole citizens in 1930, except that the monument comprises less land than the plan presented in 1930. Since the time of President Coolidge, each succeeding President has approved the project, and Mr. Rockefeller has continued to hold them and pay taxes upon them. His investment in these lands is approximately $1,500,000.

12. What action has Congress previously taken regarding the Jackson Hole project?

Prior to the consideration of the Barrett bill (H. R. 2241), this project has been investigated on the ground by numerous congressional committees and none of those committees had rendered adverse reports. In 1934, a bill to add the Jackson Hole area to Grand Teton National Park passed the Senate, and was reported favorably from the House Public Lands Committee on the last day of that session. The House committee report contained a provision requested by the Bureau of the Budget that precluded the possibility of compensating Teton County for the loss of taxes which would result from the removal of private lands in the monument from the local tax rolls.

JACKSON HOLE NATIONAL MONUMENT A CHRONOLOGY

1923: Jackson Hole citizens invited the Superintendent of Yellowstone to confer with them in Jackson Hole and they proposed that the essential private lands in the northern part of Jackson Hole be purchased and that that part of the Hole and the Grand Teton range, which consisted largely of federally owned lands, be added to Yellowstone National Park.

1926: Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., visited Jackson Hole and became interested in the plan to preserve a part of it in its natural condition. He was encouraged to invest $1,500,000 in the purchase of private lands necessary to round out Federal holdings.

1927: President Coolidge withdrew from entry the public lands in Jackson Hole.

1927-28: Mr. Rockefeller conferred with the elected officials of Wyoming, Members of Congress, Secretary of the Interior Work, and President Calvin Coolidge, concerning his intention of purchasing the essential private lands in Jackson Hole.

1928: Mr. Rockefeller's land-purchase program got under way.

1929: Grand Teton National Park was established, and it comprised practically a solid block of Federal lands. Meanwhile, Mr. Rockefeller's land-purchasing program to effect an adequate unit of public lands in Jackson Hole continued.

1929: Secretary of the Interior Ray Lyman Wilbur visited Jackson Hole, approved of the plan to preserve a representative portion of the Hole, and reported to President Hoover, who also expressed his approval.

1930: The Special Wildlife Committee of the Senate visited Jackson Hole. A group of Jackson Hole citizens presented their proposal for the boundaries of the project, which was favorably received by the committee. Those recommended boundaries included a larger area than is contained in the Jackson Hole National Monument.

1933: The Senate Public Lands Committee investigated the Jackson Hole project. Senator Carey, of Wyoming, took a principal part in this investigation.

1934: The Senate passed the Carey bill to add the area to Grand Teton National Park and the House Public Lands Committee reported the bill favorably on the last day of that session of Congress.

1938: The Senate Public Lands Committee held a hearing on Jackson Hole project. The committee made no recommendations.

1943: Jackson Hole National Monument was established.

Gannett-Pettengill-Rumely-McClure's Millionaires' Amendment to Oppress the Poor and Benefit the Rich

---

REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 8, 1944

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, during the past 3 weeks, I have made several speeches calling attention to the vicious and un-American activities of the Gannett-Pettengill political action committee—alias the Committee for Constitutional Government, Inc.

Because our liberties would be almost immediately placed in jeopardy by the passage of the proposed twenty-second amendment which is sponsored by this Fascist group, I have had printed a 16-page booklet containing my speeches to date on this subject. The booklet is entitled "Most Sinister Lobby Ever Organized." I shall be glad to furnish copies upon request to interested persons.

In those speeches, I endeavored to show the following facts:

First. This proposed twenty-second amendment is a millionaires' amendment, designed to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

Second. It is sponsored by a Fascist group, headed by a convicted German agent, Edward A. Rumely; a millionaire publisher, Frank E. Gannett; a former chairman of the Republican National Finance Committee, Samuel B. Pettengill; and a Fascist instructor by the name of McClure.

Third. It is designed to impoverish the Federal Government and to make impossible the payment of the national debt, the veterans' benefits, and social security benefits to the unemployed, the aged and other dependents.

Fourth. It will wreck small business.

Fifth. It is being vigorously and openly advocated through a national publicity campaign, but when placed before the respective State legislatures is handled in an under cover manner without benefit of public hearings before the proper committees of the various State legislatures.

Sixth. It is being offered by means of a hitherto unused clause in the Federal Constitution and has already been adopted by the legislatures of 16 States. In 1 State, Pennsylvania, the resolution was vetoed by the Governor.

Seventh. When 32 States have passed such a resolution, Congress will have no recourse but to call a constitutional convention upon this proposed amendment.

Eighth. This Fascist group is now forming its own local political committees in all congressional districts and has ample finances to carry on its campaign of misrepresentation and intimidation.

Ninth. Attempts were made in 10 other States, including my own State of Texas, to pass one of these resolutions in the last session of the State legislature. Texas is also among the States where local political committees are being formed by this vicious group.

Tenth. Despite the opposition of responsible small business and labor interests, the campaign to put this amendment across is making steady progress. We can assume that the effort will continue.

The time has come for us to wake up. We must, as Mr. Whitney, president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, says, "Smoke out the reactionaries that are trying to put over this stupid proposal," and, as he also so excellently puts it, "In this war against world fascism battles must be won on the home front as well as on the battle front."

TEXARKANA MEETING

Recently this group, following the same procedure as in other congressional districts, went to my own congressional district at Texarkana to organize a unit of the so-called Committee for Constitutional Government. On April 19, 1944, a letter was sent out from Texarkana in which it was stated:

> A limited number of business and professional leaders whom we know to be interested in the American way of life, as we have known it heretofore, are being invited to hear an address by the Honorable Samuel B. Pettengill, head of the National Committee for Constitutional Government, at an informal dinner meeting, Hotel Grim, in Texarkana, at 6:30 p. m., next Wednesday, April 26.
> Mr. Pettengill is an authority on constitutional government, and is well informed upon what is now being done through Government bureaus. He is a forceful speaker, and we are confident that you will find his message to be filled with worth-while information.
>
> At the conclusion of Mr. Pettengill's address, consideration will be given to an organized effort to promote and maintain constitutional government in these United States. Methods of financing an educational campaign will be discussed. An opportunity will be given to our guests to participate in financing this work if they should wish to do so, but no high pressure methods of raising money will be used. The primary object of the meeting will be to organize the First Congressional District of Texas as a unit of the Texas division of the Committee for Constitutional Government.
> For your convenience we have enclosed a postal card on which you may indicate your acceptance or nonacceptance so that the hotel may prepare for the number of guests expected.

It will be noticed that only a select group was being invited and confined principally to those who they hope have been misled by such statements that the American way of life is being jeopardized.

It will also be noticed that money was to be raised at the meeting and that the primary object of the meeting was to organize the First Congressional District of Texas as a unit of the Texas division of the Committee for Constitutional Government.

It occurs to me that the intentions of this group are very plain. They desire to destroy anyone whom they cannot control.

Mr. Pettengill's speech at that meeting was worthy of his tutor, Dr. Rumely. It was in the best German propaganda tradition. Following the precept of that other master propagandist, Herr Goebbels, Pettengill uttered several prophetic statements designed to throw fear into the hearts of his listeners. Pettengill said:

> Complete control of all important business in America, the goal sought, would make the condition in this country not much different from that now existing in Nazi Germany.

Of course, in saying that, Pettengill was not talking about the goal sought by the Committee for Constitutional Government. Or, was he inadvertently pulling back the smoke screen his type so expertly uses? Was he letting a small group see behind the scenes the road which he and Dr. Rumely want them to follow?

Quoting from the newspaper which reported Pettengill's speech, it says:

Speaking about the possibilities of a financial crash, Pettengill recalled that, after the First World War, United States bonds went down to $83, or 17 points. After this war, he said, if Government bonds go off 10 points it would ruin every bank in the country.

That state of affairs which Mr. Pettengill spoke of in alarmist fashion is just exactly what would happen if the proposed twenty-second amendment to the Constitution should become law. I quote no less an authority than the Division of Tax Research of the United States Treasury Department which has been making some study of the amendment in question and its possible effects upon the Nation and its economy. I quote from the Treasury Department analysis of this amendment, dated June 6, 1944:

The credit of the Federal Government rests on its power to levy taxes to discharge debts—and on the fact that several times in the Nation's history this power has been used to bring about a rapid reduction of the National debt. Under the proposed 25 percent limitation * * * the Federal tax powers would not permit getting revenues much at all above the level of expenditures in a year of prosperity. In fact, the limitation would have very much the effect of a constitutional prohibition on reducing the national debt. For emergencies, unless they involved active participation in war (so that the limitation would be suspended), there would be no tax powers in reserve. In such a situation as that of 1940, for example—when rearmament became necessary but we were not actively at war—it would be necessary to increase borrowings without taking steps to increase revenue.

In other words, we would have a perpetual debt if Pettengill's and Gannett's amendment were adopted.

Now let us see what would happen to the market value of Government bonds under Pettengill's amendment. The Treasury Department report has this additional comment to offer in that connection as follows:

It is well known that when municipal governments operate under tax limitations and have no further tax powers in reserve, their bonds commonly are regarded as second grade or lower, and in such cases emergencies may bring a sudden and sharp decline in their credit standing. To put hobbles on Federal taxing power would likewise weaken Federal credit and expose it to shocks. Since we have been through two great wars and a great depression without Federal credit being called in question, it is easy to forget that such a thing is possible. But there have been times in the past when Federal credit deteriorated and if we sacrificed the Federal Government's reserve of taxing power it might happen again (as in the instance of the "run" on the Treasury during the silver difficulties of the 1890's).

If Federal credit suffers, State and local credit will suffer with it. Any real shock to public faith in Federal securities would undoubtedly involve State and local securities sympathetically. Furthermore, any such shock would weaken the banks and other credit institutions and hinder them in assisting State and local governments. It must not be forgotten, either, that the support of the Federal Government was very valuable to State and local governments in the depths of the depression of the thirties and that Federal credit stood back of State and local credit in this emergency. Could a Federal Government with impaired credit have rescued mortgage debtors through H. O. L. C. and F. C. A. in 1933–34, and enabled them to pay up their back taxes? Could it have rescued the shaky bank system through R. F. C., the mortgage agencies, and F. D. I. C.? Could it have financed needed local public works through R. F. C. and P. W. A.? The confidence of investors in State and local securities rests partly on the knowledge that in a major depression emergency Federal credit would always be in reserve.

Note carefully that the Treasury report says that it is not what Mr. Pettengill and his cohorts allege to fear which will bring about a decline in War bond values and market but, on the contrary, the very plan which these people advocate which would do the very thing which they are so piously and hypocritically raising as a possible event.

WAR INTENSIFIES THEIR CAMPAIGN

You may choose to say that I am possessed of an unusual imagination and am seeing ghosts instead of real enemies of this Nation, but I say to you that it is a very strange circumstance indeed which prompted this propaganda syndicate to allow its scheme to lie relatively dormant during peacetime and to only commence its aggressive campaigning about the time that the war commenced in Europe.

No one has ever accused those who hold to the German viewpoint of not being farsighted. The planning and the preparation which went into the German scheme for the conquest of Europe in this war admittedly was bulletproof except for one thing—the failure to believe that this Nation would ever enter another European war. Hitler and his minions never thought that we would go so far. They never foresaw June 6, 1944.

When they did finally realize that this Nation meant business again in this war, they immediately brought up their Quisling reserves and issued the instructions which culminated in the greater activation of their plans to sap the power and strength of this Government at its tenderest spot, its purse strings.

POLL PARROT PETTENGILL

When Poll Parrott Pettengill tells us that his amendment will raise more, not less, funds for the Government, he is once again dealing in misinformation and is relying on making his argument effective through repetition rather than through fact. The cold facts on this point are also contained in the Treasury Department analysis, above referred to. On that point, the report says as follows:

Even with a high level of employment, income payments after the war will be less than under wartime conditions. With lower income payments all the tax bases and so the revenue will be lower. The income payments will necessarily decline as overtime work paid at time and a half ceases and the highly paid war industries are demobilized. Inflation would offset the factors making for a reduction in income payments, but inflation would also push up expenditures.

With present prices and assumed income payments of $125,000,000,000 to $130,000,000,000, the present tax system (with the excess profits tax eliminated and with automatic post-war excise tax rate reductions), the $40,000,000,000 wartime revenue figure points to post-war revenue somewhere in the neighborhood of $25,000,000,000, not including social security taxes.

On the expenditure side, many items will greatly exceed their pre-war levels. The cost of interest on the public debt, the military establishment, the veterans and other war-caused items will be enormously enlarged. When allowance is made for the inevitable increase in other expenditures of Government, it is clear that the leeway for tax reduction from wartime rates is insufficient to permit a 25-percent maximum rate on incomes and estates without serious danger of continuing deficits.

If the proposed limitation were adopted, it would mean reducing to a 25-percent level the bracket rates that now exceed 25 percent. It would mean lowering the 40-percent corporate normal and surtax, sharply reducing the estate tax, and reducing all individual income tax rates to about the present first-bracket level of 23 percent. If no other adjustments were made, such cuts would involve revenue losses in the neighborhood of $6,000,000,000 a year. This would eliminate the prospect of a budget surplus and make a deficit probable even in a prosperous year.

Of course, it can be said that this loss of revenue might be made up in other ways. Let us examine that idea a moment. On that point, the Treasury report has this to offer:

Part of the revenue loss from rate reductions brought about by the (proposed) limitation could conceivably be made up by measures designed to increase the tax base. In the corporation field, the carry-forward and carry-back of losses could be abandoned, percentage depletion could be eliminated, and deductions for contributions denied, along with pension trust and perhaps other deductions.

In the individual income field, deductions (for State and local taxes, contributions, interest, and similar items) could be disallowed; forms of income not now included as taxable (for example, interest on State and local bonds and some forms of annuities) could be included in taxable income; personal exemptions could be lowered; and the especially favorable treatment of capital gains could be abandoned.

I cannot imagine that many of us would wax enthusiastic over all these proposed substitute measures. Nor can I visualize the average businessman or consumer waxing enthusiastic over the only other available substitute measure, the commodity tax. Here is what the Treasury report has to say briefly on that last resort:

It would be possible also to make some tax increases outside the restricted field. But since the (proposed) restriction covers estates and all kinds of incomes and the Constitution already stands in the way of Federal property taxes, the only major unrestricted field is that of commodity taxes—i. e., sales taxes and excises. If one disregards considerations of equity, the repressive effects of commodity taxes on business activity and employment and competition with State taxes, substantial revenues can be raised from these sources. Under war conditions, a 5-percent Federal retail sales tax would have yielded about $3,000,000,000; under post-war conditions, with shortages of goods relieved, the figure would be somewhat higher. But in view of the necessity to avoid seriously repressive effects of commodity taxes and of the many other considerations that point toward reducing war excises below the levels provided in the Revenue Act of 1943, a net gain of more than $1,000,000,000 or so in the commodity tax field would imply drastic use of commodity taxes. Congress might prefer instead to make adjustments involving a reduction of revenue in this field.

I confess that the precise and technical language employed by the analysts of the Treasury Department does not necessarily highlight in one or two sentences the dangers inherent in this proposed amendment. However, just because their language is precise and technical and just because it is the considered opinion of experts, made only after careful computations leading to these conclusions, for those reasons, I place a higher value upon their statements and their conclusions than I otherwise would.

DR. EDWARD A. RUMELY, A CONVICTED CRIMINAL, OFFICIAL OF COMMITTEE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT, INC.

I have been accused of having said some unkind and unwarranted things about this political-action committee, the Gannett-Rumely-Pettengill-McClure gang—alias the Committee for Constitutional Government. I have been accused of being a little too harsh in my criticisms of certain of the individuals who founded and who still run this highly efficient and Fascist-inspired propaganda machine.

Today I should like to place in the RECORD certain factual information taken from the official court records and the final decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, wherein the conviction of one Edward A. Rumely in the lower court was upheld and the judgment of the lower court was affirmed which sentenced this man to a year and a day in the Federal penitentiary for concealing his connections with the Imperial German Government at a time when this Nation was at war with Germany.

In summarizing the testimony the court paid attention to Dr. Rumely's splendid educational background which included study at Notre Dame University in this country, Oxford University in England, and, later, four and a half years at the German universities of Heidelberg and Freiburg. The court says:

During his sojourn in Germany he appears to have lived on terms of intimacy with some of its leading men. He has been a man of affairs. In 1915 he began negotiations for the purchase of the Evening Mail, an old and well-established newspaper in New York.

At the time he purchased the Mail there was a feeling on the part of many German-Americans that the news from Europe was put over in a one-sided way. As he (Rumely) expressed it:

"There was a great deal of resentment against biased reports that were coming and that bias I had recognized was due to the absence of a news flow from the Central Powers."

And—

the court goes on to say:

He says that he saw in that "a very great public opportunity." He thought he could get strong financial support for his proposed purchase of the Mail, as he "intended in that paper to fight the British blockade" which he regarded as unwarranted and illegal.

The court record says:

It appears that on March 18, 1915, defendant Rumely and Samuel S. McClure obtained an option to purchase the New York Evening Mail.

For this record, it should be noted that Samuel S. McClure is still associated with Dr. Rumely in his present work and is still listed as a member of the board of advisers of the Committee for Constitutional Government, Inc.

The court testimony shows that Rumely, in his defense, maintained that the funds he had used for the purchase of the Evening Mail came from two wealthy German-Americans who were residents in Germany at the time of the last war. The prosecution proved, to the obvious satisfaction of the court and the jury, that this allegation of Rumely's was untrue. One of the parties from whom Rumely said that he secured this vast sum of $1,200,000 made deposition that she, at no time, furnished to anyone any money, by subscription, loan, or otherwise, for the purchase of the New York Evening Mail, or any interest in it.

The other party from whom Rumely alleged he secured these funds for use in buying the newspaper died in Germany while we were still at war with that country. His widow, who was with him during that time, and his partners, who resided in the United States, all testified that he, Herman Siecklen, had never supplied Rumely with any funds for any purpose, either directly or indirectly.

To make the prosecution's case complete, the Government established through deposition of one Dr. Heinrich Albert, agent for the Imperial German Government in this country prior to World War No. 1, that Rumely had received his funds from Albert from funds which were the property of the Imperial German Government. Albert also testified that he paid an additional $200,000 to Rumely for an advertisement which appeared in the foreign-language press of the United States, which was entitled, "An Appeal to the American People." From the testimony of Dr. Albert which is quite lengthy, it was obvious that the entire deal through which Rumely acquired the Evening Mail was cooked up during many long conferences which Rumely and Albert had in that connection. Furthermore, it was his admitted intention and purpose in acquiring said paper to use it for the avowed purpose of propagandizing the American people and "selling" to us the cause of Germany and the Central Powers.

Now, this admitted Goebbels of a generation ago, is here with us again in the midst of this great international conflict, brazenly grinding out the insidious propaganda and pulling the strings of one of the most efficient and diabolical un-American organizations which has ever been permitted to remain in existence in this country, either in peace or in war time.

With the greedy Gannett in the background, supplying cash and introductions to other men of wealth in the country who may be enticed into supporting this foul scheme on the grounds that their own pocketbooks will grow fatter if this millionaires' amendment to the Constitution is permitted to pass; with "Poll Parrot" Pettengill preaching the little hypocritical sermons that Rumely grinds out for him and later prints in book and pamphlet form for him on the press, America's Future, Inc., located in the same building from which the committee itself operates; with the venerable-appearing Mr. McClure to front for him on other occasions when "Poll Parrot" and his other henchmen are far afield at their Quislinglike work, Rumely sits at the center of the web, playing on the weaknesses of the rich and the would-be rich and works toward the day when, through the passage of his amendment, he will have finished paving the road which can only lead to poverty, disaster, and revolution in this country.

That, gentlemen, is Dr. Edward A. Rumely, convicted criminal, German-trained, admitted German sympathizer, the great brain and master mind behind the most insidious and pro-Nazi scheme yet to be offered to the American people.

I have faith in the average American citizen and his sound and sane outlook on life which will reject any scheme offered to him personally which would make the lot of his family and his fellow workers a harder one in years to come, as would this nefarious millionaires' amendment. That average American citizen, however, is being given no voice and no choice in this particular matter. He is not being consulted.

Instead, only a few of his fellow citizens are given any voice in deciding as to the wisdom of this revolutionary and feudalistic plan. These are his duly-elected representatives in the various State legislatures of the country, men who were not selected so much for their knowledge of constitutional law and national financial problems as they were to do the bidding of their constituents at home who entrusted their local problems to them for disposition.

These legislators are approached quietly and through the medium of the wealthier citizens in their respective districts who have been convinced, in all good faith, by Dr. Rumely's minions that this proposed amendment is a stepping-stone to more freedom of enterprise and more prosperity for themselves as individuals, at least. If these local legislators could only see the dangers truly inherent in this wicked scheme and could see the pitfall they are automatically digging for themselves and their own fellow citizens, the average white-collar worker or laboring man, I know that they would never cast their votes for this Fascist plan. In the absence of information to the contrary, they do not see this future danger and they cheerfully accede to the request or the suggestion of their local rich men who have received the guidance to that end which Dr. Rumely has so cleverly provided for them.

We must wake up and put an end to this unholy crusade which has already prevailed upon two-thirds of all of the State legislatures it has yet invaded to do its will. It is not too late yet, but next year it may be too late, and then will come the hour of triumph for which Rumely and his hidden backers are pointing.

Legal language is dry. People prefer the Pollyanna language of change and like to read the attractive brochures issued by the sonorous pamphleteers and look at their pretty pictures of national heroes, patriotic shrines and other Americana they have been taught to love and respect—the kind of attractive booklets put out by this Committee for Constitutional Government, Incorporated (alias Fascism in America).

Just once, however, I commend for our reading the cold, dry language of the Circuit Court of Appeals in its final judgment in the case of Rumely et al. versus the United States. In that plain, factual story of justice wending its slow, but steady way, lies the history of one stage in the career of this evil character. It portrays one relatively small setback received by him before he had perfected the use of the Goebbels technique for wartime use in this country. In our failure to ignore its implications, we may well be preparing for a debacle to come.

Appended herewith are several excerpts taken from the official decision of the court in that case which temporarily removed from public circulation the Dr. Rumely of 25 years ago. Has he changed his beliefs? Has he joined our side? I, for one, do not believe so.

NO. 135—RUMELY ET AL. V. UNITED STATES (CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SECOND CIRCUIT. JULY 27, 1923.)

(Certiorari denied, 44 Sup. Ct. 38, 68 L. ed. —)

Rogers, circuit judge. The plaintiffs in error have been convicted under an indictment which charged them with having conspired to defraud the United States by obstructing and preventing the United States from seizing and administering a certain indebtedness of the defendant Rumely to the Imperial German government. It was alleged as part of the conspiracy that the defendants should conceal the fact of such indebtedness to the German Government, and should make false and misleading reports to the Alien Property Custodian of the United States, and so obstruct and prevent the transfer and payment of that indebtedness to such Custodian. The defendants were acquitted on the first three counts, but convicted on the fourth and fifth. The jury accompanied their verdict with a strong recommendation for mercy.

* * * * *

The trial began on November 3, 1920, and occupied 30 court days. During the trial 166 witnesses were examined, 670 exhibits were received in evidence, and the record fills 4 volumes, of 2,139 printed pages. There are 249 assignments of error, which occupy 116 printed pages. Of these assignments of error, 206 relate to the admission or exclusion of evidence, 24 to the charge to the jury, 7 to the denial of motions to set aside the verdict, 8 to the denial of motions to dismiss the indictment, and 3 to the denial of motions requiring the Government to elect on which counts it would go to trial. We have on several occasions condemned the practice of taking so numerous assignments of error. The practice is not conducive to the administration of justice in appellate courts. Many such assignments of error are inconsequential, and of so little importance that the court should not be asked to review them.

* * * * *

It appears that on March 18, 1915, defendant Rumely and Samuel S. McClure obtained an option to purchase the New York Evening Mail, a paper published in the city of New York.

* * * * *

The fourth count of the indictment, after reciting various matters not necessary now to refer to, and that Edward A. Rumely, at the times specified, then and there being within the United States, was indebted in the sum of $1,301,700 to an enemy of the United States, the Imperial German Government, and that the three defendants, each well knowing all the matters and things alleged, "unlawfully, willfully, knowingly, feloniously, and corruptly did conspire and agree with each other, and with divers other persons whose names are to the grand jurors unknown, to defraud the United States, by obstructing, impeding, hindering, and delaying the United States in, and preventing the United States from seizing, capturing, receiving, holding, administering, assuming the control of and title to said indebtedness of the said Edward A. Rumely in the sum of $1,301,700 as aforesaid, to the said Imperial German Government, an enemy of the United States as aforesaid."

"That it was a part of said conspiracy and agreement that the defendants should conceal from the Alien Property Custodian the fact that the said Edward A. Rumely was indebted as aforesaid to said Imperial German Government; that it was part of said conspiracy and agreement that the defendant, S. Walter Kaufmann, on behalf of the firm of Hays, Kaufmann & Lindheim, should make and render to said Alien Property Custodian a misleading, false, and fraudulent report and statement with respect to said indebtedness; that it was a part of said conspiracy and agreement that the defendants, Norvin R. Lindheim and Edward A. Rumely, should make a misleading, false, and fraudulent report and statement to said Alien Property Custodian with respect to said indebtedness; that it was a part of said conspiracy that the defendants should withhold and conceal from the United States and from the Alien Property Custodian the true facts with respect to said indebtedness; and that it was further a part of said conspiracy and agreement that the defendants should obstruct, impede, hinder, delay, and prevent the transfer, assignment, and payment of said indebtedness to the said Alien Property Custodian."

The fifth count of the indictment, after reciting various matters not necessary now to consider, and that by virtue of the Trading with the Enemy Act, passed by Congress and approved on October 6, 1917, it became and was the duty of every person in the United States who was indebted in any way to an enemy of the United States to report the fact to the official of the Government of the United States known as the Alien Property Custodian, and setting forth the time within which such report had to be filed, and after stating that at the times specified the defendant, Rumely, then and there being within the United States, was indebted in the sum of $1,451,700 to an enemy of the United States, to wit, the Imperial German Government, continued as follows:

"That on October 6, 1917, and continuously thereafter to and including December 20, 1917, the said Edward A. Rumely, S. Walter Kaufmann, and Norvin P. Lindheim, herein indicted and hereinafter called the defendants; and the said S. S. McClure Newspaper Corporation, which is not herein indicted, each well knowing all the matters and things hereinabove alleged, at the southern district of New York and within the jurisdiction of this court, unlawfully, knowingly, willfully, feloniously, and corruptly did conspire and agree with each other, and with divers other persons whose names are to the grand jurors unknown, to commit an offense against the United States; that is to say, the said persons did conspire and agree that the said Edward A. Rumely, being indebted as aforesaid to the said enemy, should fail, neglect, and omit to report to said Alien Property Custodian within the period prescribed by law as aforesaid, and the extension thereof by the President as hereinbefore set forth, the fact that he was indebted as aforesaid to said enemy."

It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider whether the omission to charge that the defendants conspired that defendant Rumely should willfully fail, neglect, and omit to report to the Alien Property Custodian made the indictments invalid.

* * * * *

4. It is objected that the fifth count is insufficient, because it failed to allege that the debt due to the enemy of the United States, and which it was necessary to report to the Alien Property Custodian, had become due. It is said that section 7 (a) of the Trading With the Enemy Act did not require the report as to a debt until 30 days after such debt shall become due. That portion of the act herein involved may be found in the margin. The allegation in the count is that Rumely was indebted in the sum of $1,451,700 to an enemy of the United States. And the contention is that the word "due" means "matured," and that under the statute it was not necessary that fixed obligations payable in futuro should be reported. We are not able to concur in this view. The word "due" signifies a simple indebtedness, without reference to the time of payment. This is the primary meaning of the word, and we think that it was used in this sense in the section of the act under consideration. It appears to us that Congress intended that the Alien Property Custodian should be given information as to all debts to alien enemies whether they had or had not matured. Such a construction of the act promotes efficiency in the collection of the debts owing to enemies, and the statute must be construed with reference to the object which it was intended to accomplish, and given that construction which is best calculated to advance its object. We see no sufficient reason for supposing, as the plaintiffs in error contend, that it was the intention of Congress that an indebtedness need not be reported until 30 days after its maturity.

* * * * *

It is evident "due" and "owed" have been used as equivalents.

* * * * *

The omission of comment upon all the errors assigned must not be construed as due to the failure of the court to consider them. We have examined this case carefully, the indictment, the admission and exclusion of evidence, the charge of the court, and whatever errors have been assigned. We have found no sufficient reason, in any of the errors assigned, which would justify this court in setting the judgment aside. The defendants had a fair trial under a valid indictment. The jury has found them guilty, and we cannot say that there was no evidence which could justify the verdict which has been rendered.

Judgment affirmed.

QUIETLY AND WITHOUT PUBLICITY

I should also like to insert in the RECORD the following editorials and a letter taken from the press of recent weeks. The first is a letter from a Delaware taxpayer to the editor of the Wilmington, Del., Sunday Star, of May 28. It is obvious that the first news that this taxpayer had of this vicious amendment was at the time that I first called it to the attention of the Congress a few weeks ago. You will note that this correspondent is even now still unaware that the legislature of his own State, Delaware, has already adopted one of these resolutions and that his own Governor approved the resolution as long ago as April 22, 1943. That is how these alleged defenders of the Constitution work—quietly and without publicity.

The other two inserts are editorials from the New Republic of May 1, and the Nation of April 8. I commend them to your consideration:

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Star of May 28, 1944]

BRAND NEW TAX SAVING SCHEME

EDITOR, SUNDAY STAR: The new tax bill which Congress sent to the President, said to be simplified for the taxpayer, may be an improvement over the old tax measure but we may well be suspicious of tax measures that are offered under a promise to make taxes easier.

If they take the load off in one place they are most sure to put it on in another, and we may find it harder to meet, as in the final analysis the average taxable will pay more tax. There must be something slick about this one as it slipped through Congress in almost no time at all; consequently it must surely need watching.

Now it seems there is another taxation scheme in the making, supported by a powful lobby in Congress, with oodles of money backing it. It seems to be of the Gannett and Pettengill type. It is a foregone conclusion that anything sponsored by Frank Gannett and Samuel Pettengill has nothing to appeal to the average American. This scheme is a plan to change the Constitution, so as to limit the tax that may be placed against large incomes with the limit on those upper brackets at 35 percent. What this would do to the lower income class need not be left to anyone's imagination. This scheme, as I understand it, has been aired before the Congress but the public pays little attention to what Congress does until it is sometimes too late.

Sixteen States, it is said by Congressmen PATMAN, of Texas, and SABATH, of Illinois, have passed resolutions to have Congress submit this proposed amendment to a constitutional convention. The campaign has been waged on the quiet but with considerable success as far as funds are concerned, as the very wealthy readily come across with a few thousands to speculate with some ready cash on a prospect of saving many thousands for themselves in income taxes, if this plan is successful which, as a matter of course, they expect it to be.

This time it is the Government that is being attacked through the Constitution of the United States and the people's interest is at stake, to be sacrificed for the benefit of a privileged class. It is possible that more than one powerful chain of newspapers as well as other powerful influences ready to be lined up with this sinister movement as they scheme in every possible way to fasten their treacherous tentacles on the United States Congress, and then on the lives and fortunes of the American people.

[From the New Republic of May 1, 1944]

A NEW TAX DODGE

Would you believe that during a great war a modern democracy would sanction a strong movement to end income taxes?

There is now an organization bent on this purpose called the American Taxpayers Association, supported by the Hearst press. Under its influence, 14 State legislatures have passed a resolution to repeal the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution (which grants the Congress the power to levy income taxes) and to restrict the taxing power of the Federal Government to a maximum of 25 percent not only on incomes but on gifts and inheritances as well. So has the New Jersey Senate and the proponents are hard at work in many other States.

The association in its official bulletin deplores the fact that in the view of States that have turned the plan down "practical and realistic methods" were not employed to obtain a favorable vote and believes the results would have been different "if the program had been carried on as in the past in a quiet and effective way."

Enactment of the proposed measure would mean the virtual end of the progressive taxation of incomes or estates which adjusts the burden to the capacity to bear it. A man with a net income of $5,000, paying a 25 percent tax, would have $4,000 left while a man with an income of $1,000,000, who could not be taxed at a higher rate, would have $750,000.

Still worse, the measure would prevent any substantial curb on the accumulation of great wealth passed on from generation to generation. In view of the cost of war and the size of the national debt after it, the gentlemen who are trying to dodge their obligations in this way should be made to assume public responsibility by a congressional investigation of the financing and methods of the American Taxpayers Association.

[From the Nation of April 8, 1944]

A millionaire's lobby is quietly but successfully peddling to State legislatures a constitutional amendment designed to give upper-bracket taxpayers permanent relief from bearing their due share of national taxes. Already some 15 States have adopted a resolution asking Congress to summon a convention for the purpose of repealing the sixteenth amendment, which gave the Federal Government power to levy progressive income taxes. In its place, the resolution calls for a constitutional provision limiting income and inheritance-tax rates to a maximum of 25 percent, save in a national emergency.

This resolution was introduced in the New York Assembly in February and was narrowly defeated. Now it is before the New Jersey Legislature. Among its advocates one finds the New York Daily Mirror—the limitation would be a godsend to the Hearst family—which declares: "There is no conceivable crisis in time of peace which would require taxing more than 25 percent of the people's income."

This is the choice example of the misleading propaganda being used to foster the new amendment which is concerned with limiting not the proportion of the national income taken in taxes but the amount taken from any one person's income. If the amendment were passed, a Henry Ford, who, on an income of $1,000,000 must now pay upwards of $800,000, would be charged at most $250,000. And, with the contribution of the Henry Fords limited, it would be necessary to jack up that of the John Does who would hardly be consoled by a constitutional limitation of the tax on $1,000 per year to $250.

It is not surprising to find that the Committee for Constitutional Government, headed by Frank Gannett, the millionaire publisher, is the organization trying to slip over this measure while public attention is fixed on the fighting fronts.

THE RICH WOULD GROW RICHER—NO REDUCTION POSSIBLE IN LOWER CLASS TAX BRACKET

The Division of Tax Research of the Treasury Department has supplied me with an analysis of the effect that this proposed amendment would have on persons in the various income brackets.

Under the Gannett tax-limitation amendment, the 49,200,000 persons whose net annual incomes are now $5,000 or less—persons who now pay nearly 25 percent under the Individual Income Tax Act of 1944—would receive no benefits whatsoever. They would be obliged to pay at least their present tax bill, and probably more. Even if they did so, the over-all revenue from individual income-tax returns, not considering corporate returns, would be approximately $3,000,000,000 less than it is at present.

The greatest benefit, however, would accrue to the 38,000 persons whose annual net incomes are in excess of $50,000 a year, the millionaire class. This class of fortunate persons would find themselves only paying an average tax under this proposed amendment of approximately one-third of their present individual tax bill. Under present laws, these 38,000 persons will pay $2,618,000,000 this year in income taxes, whereas, if the 25-percent limitation is adopted, they will only pay $921,000,000, which would save them an average of almost $50,000.

According to the Treasury Department's experts, the 49,200,000 low-income taxpayers who now pay 54.15 percent of the present individual income levy would have to assume liability for 65.8 percent of that levy under the Gannett plan.

Mr. Gannett and his fellow millionaires, however, who are even today only held liable for 23 percent of that levy, could only be held liable for 9 percent of the total individual income levy under their plan. Small wonder that this scheme is characterized by some as the "millionaires' amendment."

What Position Will Best Promote Peace?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 9 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "What Foreign Policy Will Best Promote Peace?" delivered by me over the Blue Network on June 8, 1944.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends of the radio audience, this week American armies have carried through the greatest military landing operation in history. American boys are fighting bravely, bitterly, and victoriously on the beaches and on the fields of France. The prayers and the sympathy and the deep concern of our entire people go with these men thousands of miles from their homes. We are so concerned above all with their safety and with their success that little else has much significance for the moment. We all believe that this mighty effort will bring the war to an overwhelmingly successful conclusion.

For the very reason, however, that our interest is so great and victory seems so sure, it it an appropriate time to think through clearly the reasons why for the second time in 27 years we invade the continent of Europe. It is right that we should be completely convinced of the reasons for the tremendous sacrifice we are asking our boys to make.

Obviously, the invasion is undertaken because the military authorities believe it is the best way to inflict an overwhelming defeat on Hitler and Nazi Germany. That defeat it now essential to our own future safety. As I see it, our purpose in this war is to assure the future freedom of the people of the United States and bring about a condition in which they may work out, without invasion or threats of invasion by foreign nations, the destiny of the American Republic here at home. We are not fighting to spread the Four Freedoms through the world, although we hope that national and individual freedom may be promoted by our victory. We are not fighting to establish democracy throughout the world, though we hope that a victory over Germany may show the strength of democratic government and establish nations less likely to disturb the peace of the world. We cannot undertake a crusade to spread the ideals which we approve without admitting the right of others to crusade for their ideals. A world of crusaders would be a world perpetually at war. We fight this war for the same reason we fought the Revolutionary War: "To secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

To accomplish that purpose the first step is to inflict overwhelming defeat on the aggressor nations which set out to conquer the world. Nothing will discourage aggression in the future so much as the complete punishment inflicted by modern war on a defeated nation. After the present bombing campaign and the occupation of Germany it will be many years before any nation can again convince itself that it is worth while to defy the world. We invade Europe to inflict a crushing defeat on Germany because that is the best way to prevent the recurrence of German aggression. I believe, myself, that it is two-thirds of the job. Even if we should fail temporarily in our plans for a future peace organization, it will be long before anyone again would dare to challenge the United States of America.

The second step, however, is just as essential for complete success. I believe that military victory over Germany is a necessary prerequisite to any hope of setting up an association of nations with any chance of succeeding. We can only hope to assure permanent peace and liberty in this country by the formation of some kind of association of nations to maintain the peace of the world. There has been tremendous debate on this issue but there is also substantial agreement. The Republican Post-war Advisory Council at Mackinac pledged our party to "responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to attain permanent peace with organized justice in a free world." The Moscow Declaration approved by Secretary Hull and the Connally resolution adopted by the votes of an overwhelming majority of Republican and Democratic Senators both "recognize the necessity of a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security."

Governor Bricker of Ohio and Governor Dewey of New York, the two leading candidates for the Presidency, have endorsed the Mackinac resolution and have stated their belief in the general principles of such a cooperative organization; that it shall not be a world state, that it shall not be based on exclusive alliances, but that it shall be based on the sovereign equality of all states with definite commitments to check aggressors.

There is not much use in debating this question further until we can discuss the details. There is too much tendency on the part of our newspapers and commentators to belabor the issue, test every public man by his method of expressing his approval of the general idea, and so concentrating the spotlight on this one issue, that we can't see what is going on in the dark field of foreign negotiation. The danger to the accomplishment of an association of nations to preserve the peace does not come today from so-called isolationists or any unwillingness on the part of our people to go ahead. It comes from the current policy of Mr. Churchill, from the current policy of Mr. Stalin, and the failure of this country to have any definite foreign policy at all.

The most revealing picture of the minds of Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin was contained in the two articles by Forrest Davis in the Saturday Evening Post. The material was evidently obtained directly from the President According to those articles, the President's foreign policy up to this time, his "great design," is "to secure the goodwill of Russia as a sincere and willing collaborator in post-war settlements." To accomplish this purpose he concentrated on personal charm and avoided all issues which might bring about a difference of opinion. He seems prepared to sacrifice all principles of foreign policy to appease Russia. He "avoided the slightest cause of offense to the Kremlin," and avoided any statement of fundamental principles, such as Wilson insisted on in the World War. He feared to renew our offer of good offices in the Russo-Polish controversy. He promptly came to the support of the Communist, Tito, in Yugoslavia. He made an immediate and generous response to Stalin's demand for a share in the surrendered Italian fleet, or its equivalent. Its equivalent is now said to include one of our own cruisers. He urges the Finns to quit the war at once, without reference to Soviet terms. He "quipped and yarned, relieving tension" suggesting compromises between Churchill and Stalin. No agreement was reached at Teheran on the disposition of a defeated Germany "or in truth on any other major post-war issue." Yet on most of these issues Mr. Stalin stated his own policy "pushing his claims, directly and indirectly, in the vast areas of Europe which he has staked out as his sphere of influence. Stalin had a hearing on his point of view regarding Poland, and expressed his view that since the British hadn't done so well in managing the Balkans, Russia should have a whirl at it. When the three leaders got around to the Baltic States, Stalin upheld his contention as to the legality of the Soviet controlled plebiscites in Esthonia, Latvia and Lithuania so the President thought there was little point in pressing his own principles that a plebiscite be held under impartial auspices, because the subject was "touchy with reference to Russia." The week before these articles appeared I stated in Cleveland that I had every hope the Russians would agree to conditions on which permanent peace might be founded, but that Mr. Roosevelt did nothing whatever at Teheran even to suggest restraint to Mr. Stalin. I did not imagine, however, that Stalin had reaffirmed so many Russian policies without serious dissent. A man like Stalin certainly assumes that silence gives consent.

From these Davis articles it is clear that our policy is based on the delightful theory that Mr. Stalin in the end will turn out to have an angelic nature and do of his own accord those things which we should have insisted upon at the beginning before supplying $4,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease supplies.

Forrest Davis' articles do not contain any clear statement of Mr. Churchill's attitude, but from his public statements it is reasonably certain that he intends to urge at every point the interests of the British Empire. In his speech of May 24 he discussed the proposed organization of nations, and spoke of a "world-controlling council * * * comprising the greatest states which emerge victorious from this war." As an afterthought he says that there must also be a world assembly of powers whose relations to the world executive or controlling power he is in no position to define. No doubt Mr. Roosevelt also listened to this conception of a league of nations bossed by England, Russia, and America, without expressing any dissent that might produce a conflict of opinion.

Nor has there been any effort, as far as one can see, to suggest to the British a more liberal policy in the Far East to carry out the principles of the Atlantic Charter, and make a sounder basis for peace. It is rumored that when Chiang Kai-shek raised the question of Hong Kong at the Cairo Conference, he was promptly slapped down by Mr. Churchill. Yet, to the layman, Hong Kong would appear to be a Chinese island, appropriately a part of a restored China. Apparently we are about to restore the Dutch East Indies to the Dutch without any conditions as to the freedom of any of those islands, or any arrangement for their determining for themselves their form of government. I believe a successful league of nations can probably be based on the former status of India and the Indies, if there is some assurance of gradual independence or autonomy, but I cannot see that we are doing anything to urge even that policy upon our allies.

I do not wish to judge finally any of the problems I have discussed, but I do want to suggest that they are far more important and far more difficult than the theoretical discussion of the terms of a covenant of an association of nations; and their solution along present lines would make the association a mere shell.

The policies which thus seem to be gaining in strength would destroy the idea expressed in the Connally resolution of a "general international organization based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving States." While Mr. Hull discusses with the senatorial committee the terms of a league of nations, the President abandons the principles upon which alone we can hope to attain permanent peace.

For there are three essentials, as I see it, for the setting up of such an organization, and all three are threatened by our present policy

1. There is not much use in talking about an organization based on the sovereign equality of all peace-loving States, unless we can be sure at the beginning that boundaries are drawn so that each people is in fact equality sovereign and independent. We can't expect success in protecting the freedom of independent nations unless we are certain that that freedom exists from the start to be protected. The failure of the Treaty of Versailles resulted largely from the unwise terms relating to boundaries.

The Atlantic Charter definitely recognizes the essential nature of national freedom as a basis of hopes for a better future for the world. It says "First, their countries seek no aggrandizement, territorial or other; second, they desire to seek no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned; third, they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them."

It is hard for many to see how the conditions of the Atlantic Charter are met unless we start with the freedom, for instance, of Poland, Finland, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. Of course, this is not a time to determine exact boundaries, but up to this time we have not established the principle of the freedom and sovereignty of these states. England went to war to protect Poland against Germany. Certainly the war becomes a grim farce if we are unable to protect the essential integrity of Poland against Russia.

Our attitude toward Finland is strangely inconsistent with our general professions for national freedom. We are apparently insisting that Finland accept a peace with Russia based on the transfer to Russia of large sections of completely Finnish territory, with the implied threat that if they do not do so, they will get much worse treatment.

An association of nations to be successful must eliminate political sore spots throughout the world, and not create a new rash even more numerous than those created by the Treaty of Versailles. The policy pursued at Tehran not only scuttles the Atlantic Charter but I believe that it may prevent one of the essential conditions to make an association of nations an instrument to secure permanent peace.

2. There are other questions whose sound solution is just as important for ultimate peace. Economic sore spots are as likely to bring about war as are political sore spots. There is general agreement on the principle that every nation shall have access on equal terms to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity. It is furthermore necessary that in some way countries requiring raw materials have markets for their own goods by whose sale they may pay fo these materials. Freedom from want for nations is a desirable and perhaps attainable goal, even though it is not attainable for individuals throughout the entire world. Here, again, we must base the whole plan on freedom and equality of treatment for every nation.

This whole problem is very complicated and difficult to work out, but, as far as I know, no steps have been taken in that direction at all. As usual with the New Deal, there is in substance only one solution suggested up to this time. That is that American money and American charity shall solve every problem. The proposed international stabilization fund and the proposed international bank are based on that fallacy.

At the recent session in London of the commonwealths of the British Empire, Mr. Churchill's policy of Empire preference has been made very clear. We cannot object to most features of that policy, but a peaceful world will depend on equal access to raw materials, and our Government should be making every effort to establish that principle. We should also be willing to sit down in a conference to determine what kind of modification of tariffs through reciprocity treaties should be negotiated in order to give the poorer nations a better market to which to export the specific goods on which their life depends. The Federation of British Industries has proposed a whole series of quotas, preferential tariffs, import and export controls. Surely there should be in progress today an international trade conference, designed not to increase our trade or British trade but to remove economic discrimination which might threaten to prevent the success of any organization for peace.

The real difficulty in Washington is the philosophy of spending which dominates our Government. The only policy we can see clearly is one of loaning money, directly and indirectly, and indiscriminately to any foreign nation that desires it in a fervor of international love, and with the idea that it will create a tremendous demand for our exportable goods. Of course, this policy amount to giving away the products of our farms and our labor, for the loans will never be repaid. It means inflation and more debt. It is a grand form of international W. P. A. hidden behind the jargon of reciprocal exchange and international cooperation. The sad thing about it is that charity is even more demoralizing to nations that receive it than it is to individuals who receive it. It discourages the aided nation from measures which are absolutely essential if ultimately it is to stand on its own feet. In the end, instead of creating gratitude to the United States, it brings abuse and hard feeling for Uncle Shylock. Of course, it is vitally important to develop foreign trade, but it is of no value unless based on the sound foundation of reciprocal exchange and advantage.

3. The greatest danger to an organization for permanent peace seems to me to lie in the new idea that England and Russia and the United States shall rule the world. I have quoted Mr. Churchill's reference to a world-controlling council. It is this idea which seems to have made tremendous headway in Tehran. The plan recently announced for the occupation of Germany by England, Russia, and the United States in three separate zones, sounds much more permanent than a military occupation. Mr. Churchill has suggested that Europe's problems be solved entirely by England and Russia, and a 20-year alliance has been made looking in that direction. The idea is current in Washington among well-informed circles that Europe is to be divided into spheres of influence, Russian to the east and British to the west. Certainly, the attitude of both England and Russia looks more in that direction today than it does toward any bona fide league of equal and sovereign nations. Both England and Russia would like to have the United States in a triparty alliance. Churchill on May 24 spoke of a "fraternal association of the British Commonwealth and the United States" and made it sound a good deal more like an alliance than any vague ideal of "hands across the sea." He spoke of these American and Russian alliances as being within the framework of an association of nations.

My own view is that such an alliance policy absolutely destroys the hope for a real or a successful association of nations. The idea of such an alliance is to make it so strong that no one can challenge it successfully. It becomes, therefore, the old balance of power policy. That policy was not a successful insurer of peace.

The very existence of an alliance inevitably creates another alliance. It would cut us from our Latin-American good neighbors. Certainly England and Russia and the United States will have the most powerful military forces in the world for many years to come. Their support of a league as individual members is essential to its success; but the moment they make an alliance they subordinate the league to their interests, and relegate it to a secondary position. They substitute an ideal of force for a rule of law. In effect, a world dominated by a three- or four-power alliance is not a free world. We cannot maintain our freedom permanently by destroying the freedom of others. We must guard against the tendency to continue the arbitrary power of the three great nations which is necessarily acquired during wartime. There is some indication that even now we are inclined to use this power arbitrarily and selfishly. I believe that we are engaged in bullying the neutrals to an extent which we would bitterly resent if we were neutrals, and the same methods were used on us. In refusing to take any measures toward the relief of starving children in the occupied countries, we have shown little indication of our ability to use power unselfishly. History shows that power once acquired is reluctantly relinquished.

The strange thing about this development is that it is at complete variance with the views of Secretary Hull. He made it clear in his speech of April 9 that no conclusions of the large nations would be accomplished without the participation of the other United Nations. He has repeatedly used language which excludes the idea of alliances. Thus, in the strange manner of the present administration, we have two conflicting policies carried on by different departments of the same Government. Surely the people are entitled to know what our real foreign policy is.

Beside the President's acquiescence in the Stalin-Churchill intentions, the New Deal philosophy which animates so many Government officials today looks with great favor on the idea of regulating the affairs of the world and of other nations, just as it favors the regulation of the farms and the homes and the businesses of the American people. The world is too dumb to understand, and a small group of brain trusters must manage its affairs. We have seen little glimpses of this tendency in the Arabian pipe line and various plans for somewhat distant military bases. The twentieth century, they say, is the American century and it is our manifest destiny to rule the world.

I do not believe the American people will ever stand for such a policy. They want this war won, and they want the boys home again just as soon as they can get home. They don't want to run the world, and the boys don't want to run the world. They see no reason for occupying Germany after every military weapon has been destroyed. If any policing job is to be done in the future, it should be done by a volunteer force recruited for that purpose.

Incidentally, I don't see any basis for universal military service. The very purpose of this war, and of the peace to be made hereafter, is to prevent a condition in which America shall become an armed camp and be diverted from the progress, the liberty, and the pursuit of happiness for which this war is being fought on six continents. I see no reason why all the men required to carry out our defense and our share in enforcing peace should not be recruited on a voluntary basis if adequate pay and advantages are given. I believe it is important that the President make it perfectly clear that when this war ends it really does end and that we give up any idea of ruling the world or telling other countries how to manage their own affairs. We do not propose to make the United States part of any world state and have our laws made for us by others. Nor do we intend to make their laws for them. Our plan is founded on the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states. We believe that a successful peace can only be based on that foundation. If England and Russia are to divide Europe between them, I see no choice for us except to let those two countries attempt by force to insure the peace of Europe, while we confine ourselves to associations of sovereign nations in North and South America and the Far East banded together to insure peace.

Many efforts have been made in the past to insure permanent peace in the world. There is no lack of desire or determination to bring that about. The day for propaganda and pious declarations in favor of international cooperation is over. What we need now is:

1. Definite steps to persuade England and Russia to join in making a political settlement which will give freedom to those peoples who are capable of self government and desire freedom.

2. A definite plan for world trade which will eliminate economic injustice.

3. A determined stand against those who propose that the United States, with or without allies, shall dominate the world under perpetual New Deal dictatorship with steamlined W. P. A., and deficit spending.

The time has come when the American people should insist on these principles. There isn't much hope for permanent peace as long as the administration rejects them. Apparently the President's method of preventing a third world war is to satisfy, at all costs, the demands and self-interest of the large and powerful nations. If that is the foreign policy of the United States, there will be no permanent peace. Neither will there be, in the meantime, any freedom in the world.

The Growth of Administrative Process

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I am herewith calling to the attention of the Congress and the country a discussion which should be read by every thoughtful American.

This article appears in the July issue of the Women Lawyers Journal. Its author, Adele I. Springer, is a member of the New York Bar and is chairman of the Committee on Administrative Law of the National Association of Women Lawyers.

In the final paragraph of this article is found the following words which I hope will stimulate careful study of the entire article by citizens interested in preserving our Republic and its formula of self-government which has served us so well for so long:

The very survival of our institutions, including political democracy and private enterprise, depends, in the post-war period, upon our regulation of the Federal administrative agencies, a restoration of the checks and balances of the Constitution, and the preservation of a rule by law instead of a rule of men.

The article follows:

THE GROWTH OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCESS

(By Adele I. Springer, member of New York bar; chairman, committee on administrative law, National Association of Women Lawyers)

When the American Bar Association first proposed legislation to regulate the procedure before administrative agencies of the Government,[1] an article in support at that time [2] quoted a decision of the court of appeals at Breslau, Germany, as follows,[3] with an admonition against it happening here:

"The courts have no right to decide on the political acts of the administration. Today's constitution is governed by the principle of political leadership."

Those significant words are here repeated in the light of a parallel statement made recently by the Attorney General of the United States [4] that:

"In time of war no court should attempt to substitute its judgment for that of the Executive."

A reminder is therefore timely that a similar declaration by an autocratic state was made, not only as aforesaid but also as follows by the Reich Commissioner for Justice in his statement on the extinction of the principle of separation of powers:[5]

"There is today only a single power in Germany. That is the power of the leader."

To accept such definition of wartime law, as proposed by our own Attorney General, would be tantamount to adopting the principle declared by the Reich law leader, Dr. Hans Frank, when he laid down as the new commandment for lawyers and judges, in 1936, the following test: [6]

"The party program is a guiding line for decision. Say to yourself at every decision which you make, 'How would the leader decide in my place?' Then you will have a firm, iron foundation."

Has it begun to happen here?

The aforementioned remark of our Attorney General has stirred the public mind as never before to a realization of the dangers inherent in the growth of bureaucracy and notably intensified the public demand for administrative reform.

The limitation of Executive powers was strongly urged at the Constitutional Convention in 1787 by Gouverneur Morris, a delegate, with the following warning:

"The mind of man is fond of power; increase his prospects and you enlarge his desires."

Other great charters, Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights, had placed limits upon the power of kings.

The exercise of increased powers by the Executive in recent years, as administered by the numerous boards, departments, authorities, and commissions, gives rise to a reminder that the framers of our Constitution believed liberty depended upon the separation of powers. The declaration by James Madison, father of the Constitution, bears reiteration:

"You must first enable the government to control the governed, and in the next place oblige it to control itself."

Today the governed are conscious of Government control in the daily administration of their personal and business affairs, exercised by Federal agencies to an unprecedented extent never visualized by the framers of the Constitution. The administrative process, in its direct impact, now reaches far more people more intimately and more vitally, than do the judicial and legislative branches of our Government. As such regulation expands into wider fields of economic activity, public interest in administrative operation multiplies. Not many decades ago the average citizen scarcely was aware of the functioning of our Federal Government. We are now a long way from Jefferson's doctrine, "That government is best which governs least."

The development of modern administrative regulation can be traced through the evolution of the past century. The past decade witnessed its more rapid growth, as the result of economic reforms occasioned by the depression. Many economic and social concepts may change, however. The granting of such all-inclusive power to the executive branch of the Government established a precedent which, it must be recognized, may eventually be used for reactionary as for liberal purposes. The Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to remind an agency,[7] that:

"The philosophy that constitutional limitations and legal restraints upon official action may be brushed aside upon the plea that good, perchance, may follow, finds no countenance in the American system of government."

The great issue, therefore, is the danger of this new absolutism of administrative expediency as against the historic experience which lies behind the tripartite division of power, fundamental in American constitutional law, and which has served as the bulwark of our liberties.

The question and answer are found in Jefferson's admonition:

"What has destroyed liberty and the rights of man in every government which has existed under the sun? The generalizing and concentrating all powers into one body."

The situation thus calls for a restoration of balance.

The number and variety of administrative agencies now in existence and their different procedures, can best be realized by a review of their development.

For a period of 143 years from 1789 to 1932, such Government agencies totaled about 15, excluding the emergency agencies of the First World War. For the 7 years from 1932 to 1939, at least 51 new Government agencies emerged. The years from 1939 to the present time witnessed the addition of many more agencies, necessitated by the period of war emergency.

The first major regulatory agency of the Federal Government was the Interstate Commerce Commission, created in the year 1887. Then followed the Food and Drug Administration in 1906, Postal Savings System in 1910, Federal Reserve System in 1913, Federal Trade Commission in 1914, National Advisory Commission for Aeronautics in 1915, United States Tariff Commission in 1916, also the Shipping Board in 1916, predecessor of the present Maritime Commission, Federal Power Commission in 1920, Federal Intermediate Credit Bank in 1923, War Finance Corporation in 1924, also in 1924 the Inland Waterways Corporation and the Board of Tax Appeals, and in 1926 the Railroad Adjustment Board and the Federal Radio Commission.

During the ensuing period, from 1932 to 1939, there was, first, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in 1932. The following year, 1933, witnessed the addition of fourteen: the Farm Credit Administration, Civilian Conservation Corps, Federal Emergency Relief Administration, Tennessee Valley Authority, Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Public Works Administration, Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Export-mport Bank of Washington, Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, Executive Committee on Commercial Policy, National Emergency Council, and Central Bank for Cooperatives. In 1934 an equal number of 14 were added: Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, Securities and Exchange Commission, the Commission on Trade Agreements, Foreign Trade Zones Board, Federal Communications Commission, National Mediation Board, the Committee for Reciprocity Information, Federal Housing Administration, Federal Committee on Apprentice Training, Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, National Power and Policy Committee, Federal Prison Industries, Inc., Federal Savings and Loan System and Railroad Adjustment Board. In 1935 an almost similar number, 13, were created RFC Mortgage Company, Resettlement Administration, Works Progress Administration, National Resources Committee, National Youth Administration, Rural Electrification Administration, National Park Trust Fund Board, National Labor Relations Board, Social Security Board, Electric Home and Farm Authority, Prison Industries Reorganization Administration, Federal Alcohol Administration, and National Munitions Control Board.

In 1936 the United States Maritime Commission was established. In 1937 there were 2 added: Disaster Loan Corporation and Railroad Retirement Board. In 1938, 6 more were created: Civil Aeronautics Authority, Maritime Labor Board, Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, Federal National Mortgage Association, United States Film Service, and the Radio Division of the National Emergency Council.

All the foregoing regulatory agencies emerged before the critical state of international affairs introduced the defense program and war agencies, such as the subsequently established War Production Board, Office of Price Administration, and the many other agencies directing wartime production, allocating scarce resources, or regulating prices. These latter, being of a temporary nature, are segregated, in a consideration of this subject, from the previously entrenched agencies of permanent form. The extensiveness of control by the war agencies necessarily surpasses the pre-war controls. These war agencies have enveloped almost all business affairs in a net of complex administrative regulation. Such wartime control has left virtually no aspect of economic affairs unaffected. Many of these new controls may be retained in the post-war period, however. The widespread character of Government regulation, therefore, constitutes the public's greatest problem.

Today, such regulation is accepted as inevitable. The current public attack upon bureaucracy is not upon its necessity or feasibility but upon its procedural aspects.

The procedure followed by these various agencies differs widely. It ranges from an adjudication by the single head of an executive department, who may act with or without a hearing in his discretion, to formal hearings on notice before a commission or board, with or without a preliminary investigation. Ordinarily, the courts may review any final administrative action in some prescribed way, and may not review the facts if the agency has offered "substantial" evidence to support its findings. Some agencies are not subject to any judicial review whatever. Of the 49 regulatory agencies appraised by the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure in 1940, 33 operated within the framework of a department or agency, their activities differing from those of independent commissions.

A simple illustration of unnecessary chaotic Federal administrative procedure is the matter of admissions to practice before the various agencies. A committee of the District of Columbia Bar Association reported in 1938 that about 30 administrative agencies each regulated for itself admissions to practice and the disciplining of attorneys appearing before it.

No less a consideration is the cost to taxpayers of maintaining the administrative hierarchy with millions on the Federal pay roll whose wages total more than $5,000,000,000 a year. The cost of bureaucracy cannot be measured by Government pay rolls and taxes alone, but embraces also a stupendous invisible tax. The cost to business is enormous in the value of the time of executives and hire of clerical and professional help to fill out the numerous Federal forms annually returned to many different Federal agencies.

A review of the operation of such administrative agencies discloses generally an increasing assumption of unlimited powers and of unhampered discretion, a continued tendency to impose and enforce their own policies irrespective of the legislation creating the agency, with a frequent disregard of the citizen's rights, without adequate notice or full hearing, and little opportunity to meet the charges.

Although from earliest times our common law has denounced the performance of a multiple role in a case as judge, jury, investigator, prosecutor, and executioner, we find the same administrative tribunal not only making the complaint, investigating its own complaint, conducting a hearing by its own prosecutors before its own trial examiner or its own hearing commissioner, and rendering its own adjudication of the case and its enforcement measures. Such proceeding would not be tolerated in a court of law, yet, such variance from the constitutional guaranties of due process have become an established part of our administrative process. A high-ranking representative of the executive branch of our Government has even gone on record that, "We have overemphasized what might be called political or Bill of Rights democracy."[8] This, notwithstanding Jefferson's specific incorporation of a Bill of Rights into the Constitution. The warning of Woodrow Wilson may well be heeded, that—

"The history of liberty is a history of the limitation of governmental power, not the increase of it. When we resist, therefore, the concentration of power, we are resisting the processes of death, because a concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties."

The great need for administrative reform in recent years was recognized by Congress when it passed by a large majority vote the Logan-Walter Administrative Law bill,[9] sponsored by the American Bar Association and supported by the National Association of Women Lawyers, among others, and endorsed by various business, labor, farm, and civic organizations and by numerous State, city, and local bar associations, but which was vetoed by President Roosevelt. The Logan-Walter bill, drafted by the then Special Committee on Administrative Law of the American Bar Association under the chairmanship of Col. O. R. McGuire, represented an attempt to standardize procedures and to augment the opportunities to litigate against governmental action.[10] As described by the Senate Judiciary Committee,[11] it provided "means and methods whereby the Governors may be governed and the regulators regulated." Although vetoed, it blazed the trail for such future legislation. It also gave rise to the appointment by the President of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure, which, after intensive study for 2 years, reported that further study of existing practices was essential for the welfare of both the Government and the public.[12] The Attorney General, after admitting many of the evils, concluded: "The house of administrative justice must be set in order now, not when the problems have run beyond us."[13]

During the last few years State legislative bodies, as well as national, have displayed an active interest in the procedures of regulatory agencies. Laws regulating practice before commissions have been passed or proposed in several States. In New York the Association of the Bar of the City of New York recently adopted unanimously a resolution recommended by its special committee on administrative law, calling for the establishment in the executive department of a division of administrative procedure, as an aid in the continuous improvement of the administrative process in this State. Such recommendation has also received the formal approval of the New York State Bar Association.

The problem now confronting us is the extent and form of simplifications and procedural improvements in the Federal administrative process.

Among the many recommendations made in recent years is the proposal for an office of Federal administrative procedure, patterned after the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, as headquarters for the correlation of the procedural experience of all the administrative agencies. The Attorney General's committee was impressed with the need for a clearing house of information concerning administrative procedure, to accomplish greater uniformity.

In the interim, a new bill to prescribe fair standards of administrative procedure has been drafted by the present special committee on administrative law of the American Bar Association[14] and unanimously approved by the house of delegates at its mid-year meeting. The basic purpose is the same, to crystallize administrative regulation.

There is not space here to enter into a discussion of the particular provisions of this new proposal for legislation. Generally, it provides for the right to a full hearing to all parties before any determination is made; that hearings and decisions be conducted in such manner as to preclude any secret reception of evidence or argument; that nothing to be used against a party's interest be withheld from his inspection and that an opportunity be given him to answer charges and that nothing to be used in arriving at the determination be withheld from the record for review; that specific findings of fact and a record showing the evidence upon which the findings are based be required; and that the foregoing be fostered by requiring an intra-agency segregation of deciding and prosecuting functions and functionaries. All war agencies are excluded. A number of these reforms were in substance recommended also in the reports by the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure. The proposed legislation, however, restates but does not expand the right of and procedures for judicial review. It is hoped that measures be taken to broaden the scope of judicial review.

The full text of the revised bill is set forth in the American Bar Association Journal, issue of April 1944. It is urged that all lawyers give it proper study and cooperate in the enactment of remedial legislation.

The very survival of our institutions, including political democracy and private enterprise, depends, in the post-war period, upon our restoration of the checks and balances of the Constitution, and the preservation of a rule by law instead of a rule of men.

Tonnage Output Under Maritime Commission Shipbuilding Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein a letter from Admiral Vickery, of the Maritime Commission, showing tonnage output under the Maritime Commission's program through May 31, 1944:

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., June 7, 1944.

The Honorable S. O. BLAND,
Chairman, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives.

DEAR JUDGE BLAND: Believing it may be of interest to you, I am enclosing a tabulation showing tonnage deliveries under the Maritime Commission's program through May 31, 1944.

During May American merchant shipyards completed 155 vessels, totaling 1,537,915 tons deadweight. As of the end of the month, deliveries aggregated 719 ships of 7,247,557 tons since January 1, and 3,370 ships of 34,668,090 tons since Pearl Harbor. New tonnage completed since the United States' entry into the war now is more than triple that of the entire pre-war American Merchant Marine.

In view of the manpower shortage, coupled with the fact that a larger portion of the 1944 tonnage is comprised of fast ships with more complex machinery, it has been anticipated for some time that monthly shipyard output would level-off below the peaks attained last year, and this has been borne out by the April and May deliveries. Nevertheless, the tonnage completed since the beginning of the year is still greater than deliveries during the first 5 months of 1943.

With kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

H. L. VICKERY,
Commissioner.

Floods in the Missouri River as a Threat to Irrigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH A. BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 9 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Threat to Irrigation" published in the Nebraska Farmer.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

THREAT TO IRRIGATION

Another spring of serious floods in the Missouri River Valley and its tributaries—the second in as many years—has emphasized again the importance of a Federal flood control program for the river basin to impound the surplus waters in the upper regions and make them available for irrigation where needed. The much-talked-of Pick plan for Missouri River development seeks to do this, giving first consideration to flood control and irrigation; Missouri River navigation below Sioux City would be of secondary importance. This project has been estimated to cost as high as $1,000,000,000 and would require several years to construct after the close of the war.

Since the details of the Pick plan became known, there has sprung up among Lower Valley groups a determined effort to place navigation ahead of irrigation by specifying that sufficient water must be released from storage reservoirs to provide a 9-foot channel from Sioux City to the mouth of the river. Such a provision is contained in House roll 3961, the rivers and harbors bill.

The Upper Valley people are dead against any plan to make irrigation secondary, claiming that moisture limitation in the Upper Great Plains will always make irrigation paramount to any other objective. There is not enough water for irrigation and a 9-foot channel, they say. States in which water originates should determine the use of that water, they point out, so long as the Lower Valley areas are adequately protected by flood control. But they are unalterably opposed to sending needed irrigation water down the stream to sail a battleship.

The clash between irrigation and navigation groups has been carried by their respective Congressmen to the floors of Congress in the numerous and heated debates and hearings on the Pick plan and the rivers and harbors bill. In the meantime the National Reclamation Service has espoused the claims for irrigation of the upper-valley people, while Army engineers and on-river interests of the lower valley are definitely on record for navigation and a 9-foot channel.

Nebraska Congressmen for the most part have alined themselves on the side of the irrigation-first group since several Nebraska streams and some contemplated irrigation projects within the State are involved and would benefit from irrigation. Senator BUTLER, who operates farms in the Great Plains area of southwest Nebraska along the Republican River and therefore knows the needs of both irrigation and flood control from actual experience, and who is a high-ranking member of the Senate Irrigation Committee, has backed the Pick plan to give flood control and irrigation first consideration, on the grounds that there may not be enough water for both. A 9-foot channel would mean releasing water from storage reservoirs even at the expense of irrigation. Congressman CURTIS, also a member of the Flood Control and Irrigation Committee in the House, has taken a similar stand, as has Congressman MILLER.

In the light of Nebraska's serious need for more irrigation to stabilize and increase agricultural production and to protect the State's valuable livestock resources, Senator BUTLER and Congressmen CURTIS and MILLER are right in their contention that flood control and irrigation should come first in the development program for the Missouri River and its tributaries. Expanded irrigation facilities will add more wealth and income from increased crop and livestock production than will come from any prospective navigation development on the Missouri River. Farming opportunities for returned soldiers, more factories to process agricultural products, greater industrial employment, would all result from the maximum use of our water resources for irrigation. We must first produce the products before there is need of any kind of transportation.

There is another phase of river navigation that deserves serious consideration. For nearly 25 years the Nation has been spending millions of dollars in deepening the Missouri River channel below Sioux City. A 6-foot channel for navigation has been the goal of the Army engineers in charge of the project. They have sought to obtain this by a series of bank revetments to narrow and deepen the channel. Although we have such a channel now, the residents of Missouri Valley from Sioux City south have not been thrilled by the resonant whistle of steamboats coming around the bend or by the chug-chug of gasoline-driven boats. There has been some barge traffic, it is true, as far as Omaha, but so far of minor importance.

Some critics of this project contend that the narrowing of the channel has been responsible for the serious floods of 1943 and 1944, because it has reduced the water-carrying capacity of the stream.

Would a 9-foot channel mean extensive and profitable Missouri River navigation? It could be, but the odds are against it. The trend of transportation in the future will be toward faster service by rail, by air, by truck, and by water. There may be some exceptions such as heavy bulky products like coal, ore, and some grains. However, the increased use of electric power in the Midwest is likely to reduce this section's needs for coal; oil and gasoline are already being transported in considerable quantities through pipe lines. We don't have the ore to ship, and increased local uses of grain for feed, for alcohol manufacture, and food processing will curtail their shipment to outside points.

In any event, the claim that lower freight rates by water would add to the value of agricultural products in an amount equal to the total production times the saving is faulty. These products could not all move by water, and if the railroads were forced to meet such competitive rates, it would cause rate disturbances elsewhere that would offset any savings. For example, farm and livestock interests have been seeking for some time a needed reduction in dressed meat freight rates from Nebraska to the Pacific coast, in order that our livestock producers could share in the Pacific-coast market and more labor would be employed within the State in processing this meat. Difficulty in obtaining this and similar readjustments in freight rate would increase with the railroads facing greater competition from inland waterways.

Finally, the railroads of the Nation are facing a critical situation in the post-war competition of air and highway transportation. Their problem won't be made easier by further inland waterway developments that may take away more of their freight tonnage. They can and should lower rates if assured enough tonnage to make it profitable, but they can't lose tonnage, lower their rates, and survive.

The Nation needs a healthy railroad transportation system and therefore Congress should ponder seriously whether we can have it by subsidized water transportation to compete with rails.

At least let's make sure that flood control and irrigation receive first consideration in the Missouri River program. If it develops that there is enough water for both irrigation and deeper channel, it will then be in good time to consider the latter.

Unity at Home

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post:

UNITY AT HOME

In a moral sense, D-day found most of us at home shamefully unprepared. Perhaps the slackness was inevitable. We have been at war for 2½ years—a long, long time for human nature to sustain selflessness and exaltation. The unity welded by Pearl Harbor has been wrenched and weakened. The sense of national devotion has been thinned. We have lapsed, if not back into a business-as-usual point of view, then into something which might be termed a war-as-usual attitude. All the customary strain and struggling for personal, sectional, group advantage were in progress when the great ordeal of our time suddenly came upon us. We had adjusted to war as a more or less normal condition of existence. Now a new adjustment is demanded of us—an adjustment to the greatest and most terrible challenge of our history.

In the fact of this challenge our domestic discords, however grandiloquently we may have related them to matters of principle, seem trivial and inglorious. Men who were out on strike when D-day came, whether they were wage earners or wage payers, cannot have escaped a desperate sense of shame. A Sewell Avery striking against the Government of the United States by means of litigation, no less than a coal miner or a factory worker holding up production, is wholly out of harmony with what is going forward now upon the coast of France. So, too, of course, is the politician who seeks partisan advantage at a time when the sole test of any proposition must be its serviceability for the great undertaking in which we are engaged.

We are a people who live by competition. The basis of our political system is open rivalry and contest between groups of men espousing different courses. Our freedom is rooted in the opportunity available to all of us to join with our like-minded fellows in voluntary associations and press for the advancement of our common interests. This is, moreover, an election year, and we neither can nor should set aside the orderly processes by which we determine the character of our own Government. Our major political parties are soon to hold their national conventions. The will extol or condemn the present administration and seek the suffrage of the public on such bases as they see fit. This is our way of life and we cannot abandon it.

It is a way of life, however, which must be tempered to the times. And the times call for the sharpest possible focusing of our loyalties. They impose upon each of us, individually, an immense moral responsibility to forego self-seeking, to match, insofar as it is possible for any who are secure and comfortable at home, the devotion of those Americans who have been selected to storm the fortress of Europe. We shall not escape this responsibility either by glib rationalization of our own desires or by eloquent professions of patriotism. There is a noise of wrangling on Capitol Hill which has a discordant, ugly sound today. There is a jostling among us for preference which is incongruous in comparison with the unity among those safeguarding us overseas. Like them, we need to remember now how much unites us, and again to draw together.

We have paid the men who landed on the coast of France the tribute of a minute's silent prayer. Let us hearten them, and ourselves as well, with a somewhat longer silence—a silence which will encompass all those issues, conflicts, and dissensions which are not directly germane to the great business now at hand. There is a world dying and a new world being born. Let us attend the pangs of death and rebirth with reverence.

Kimmel and Short

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of June 8, 1944:

KIMMEL AND SHORT

It has hitherto been our view that the blame for Pearl Harbor belongs to our system of divided command. Granted the system, as Gen. Billy Mitchell declared a generation ago, there was bound to be a Kimmel and Short at Hawaii when the crisis happened. But only in a classroom can you crucify a system. Mudslingers and political campaigners are not interested at all in such an exercise. They believe in men, not measures. In a campaign year they believe in the crucifixion of men, not in the formulation of measures. These are the "reformers" who have succeeded in prevailing upon the House to vote a resolution directing the Secretaries of War and of the Navy to bring Admiral Kimmel and General Short to trial immediately. The court martial which hangs over these officers had been postponed till after the war. If the sponsors of the vote weren't interested in making a circus out of the trial, they would have directed the two Secretaries to drop the trial altogether. For there was something anachronistic in the decision when it was made. What Pearl Harbor displayed in sunken ships and blazing material and lost lives and damaged national prestige was the epitaph of a system. Congress has it in its power to get rid of the system and so to expiate Pearl Harbor.

But, assuming that the court-martial order will remain, there are three reasons, as we see it, why the trial should be postponed. First, at a time when all the national energies should be consecrated to the prosecution of the war, this Nation cannot afford to divert time and industry to this court martial. Secondly, the jurors and witnesses cannot be spared from active duty. For instance, since Kimmel is a rear admiral, there would have to be no fewer than 13 rear admirals detached from their posts in order that Kimmel might be tried by a "jury of his peers." These admirals, not to mention some of the witnesses, are now holding positions of vast responsibility, with the lives of many thousands of men committed to their charge. Thirdly, the sponsorship of immediate court martial, as is plain from the House debate, and as we have already intimated, is only secondarily due to a concern that justice shall be meted out to Admiral Kimmel and General Short. It is the Republicans who are calling for the trial. In present circumstances they are hell-bent upon making a political circus out of the court martial. With the elections close at hand, the object is evidently to pin the responsibility for Pearl Harbor upon the administration, and thus to try to prevent the return to office either of Mr. Roosevelt or his nominee.

We come to these conclusions reluctantly. Constitutionally every American is entitled to a speedy trial when charges have been preferred against him. Admiral Kimmel and General Short are Americans. For 2½ years they have been living under a cloud of undetermined charges, and they and their families have every reason to feel victimized. Moreover, a court martial would do a great service in clearing the atmosphere of rumor and whispered charge, it would expose the truth in a matter on which the truth must one day be told, it would pave the way for reforms which tradition and vested interest are in cahoots to frustrate. Yet, in spite of these weighty arguments for a court-martial now, the scale tips over very heavily in favor of postponement till after the war. That there is no legal impediment to postponement is indicated by the waiver of the statute of limitations which has been signed by the affected officers.

There is no desire on our part to exculpate the political higher-ups for the tragedy of Pearl Harbor. No doubt some of the dirt which has been flying around since December 7, 1941, will find lodgment on them when the principals are haled to court. However, there is no question that the ultimate responsibility for the miscalled day of infamy will be attached to the system of divided command which governs our national defense. That must be wound up. Even in wartime we have made only slight improvements upon it, such as a Joint Chiefs of Staff, which is an impermanent committee system. A committee such as we have today throws up only the lowest common denominator of the brains composing it. For its decisions are of necessity compromises. In this case they are also vitiated by the fact that they are hortatory; that is to say, recommendations of action to the actual decision makers in the field.

As soon as this war is over, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, if left to themselves, will fly apart, and we shall be back where we were. There is nothing sure in this unsure world. So we say that only at its peril will this Nation let the armed services revert to their prewar organization. What is needed is unity of command on the German model. At present a study of this requirement is in progress in both the War and Navy Departments at the direction of the respective chiefs. It is as if a dispute at law were handed over to the litigants themselves to settle. The new organization of our armed services after this war is a problem which rightfully belongs to Congress. Army, Navy, foreign policy—they should all be brought into a single pattern of organization. This is what Pearl Harbor proved, and no court martial is needed to make the demonstration.

Office of Price Administration and the Oil Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following editorial from the National Petroleum News of June 7, 1944:

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF! DO YOU AGREE THAT O. P. A. HAS PUT THE OIL INDUSTRY ON A SOUND OPERATING BASIS?

The price of oil, as well as many other things in this country, is so mixed up with screw-ball thinking, misinformation, fourth-term politics and down-right falsehoods, that it is difficult to figure out how to make a dent against it all. The mixture just flows from Washington as an avalanche. About all one can do is to pick out a point and with it, try to illustrate the oil industry's unfair predicament.

O. P. A. Chief Chester Bowles, after his recent appearance before a congressional investigating committee, sent over to Congress a letter and a folder of some alleged facts about oil supply and the refusal of O. P. A. to increase that supply by permitting an increase in price. Under the circumstances, Bowles escaped cross-examination on this information.

General Counsel Brown, of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, has made several critical comments to Congress and the press on these latest Bowles statements, to show how inaccurate and unfair they are. N. P. N. will take only the last paragraph of Bowles letter in which in large all-embracing sentences, he says:

"We feel sure you (the Congress) will agree that the policies followed by O. P. A. in controlling prices will prove and is proving of lasting benefit to the industry and the country as a whole. Besides saving the public as consumers and taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars, price control has placed the industry upon a sound operating basis which has virtually eliminated the possibility of drastic post-war readjustments."

Here are some of the things O. P. A.'s oil policy has bestowed upon the country and the taxpayers, the car owners:

It imposed an oil shortage on this country so severe that supply for our absolutely essential needs is seriously threatened.

It deprived the taxpayer and motorist of the few gallons of gasoline he needs in his daily living, on two false assumptions:

(a) That the motorist, for some unknown reason, would rather save a few cents a week in his gasoline expenditure than use his car.

(b) That the 10 or 20 cents or so a week more that the average motorist might pay for a reasonable advance in crude prices that would get more drilling done, would bring inflation, whereas the few cents additional for gasoline is but an infinitesimal part of the average car owner's increased income, and many of them are spending hundreds of times that for more whisky.

(Incidentally, neither O. P. A. nor the new dealers have ever indicated any willingness to let the people decide whether they would prefer to pay a few more cents per week and have more gasoline.)

O. P. A., through its stringent and uncalled-for price policy on oil, has found it necessary, or perhaps has created the shortage as an excuse, to impose on the American motorist one of the greatest and most inefficient Government controls in history, a control which is giving thousands of radical reformers unnecessary, unconstitutional, and un-American power over American business, and particularly over small business.

O. P. A.'s price and shortage-of-supply policy is hitting with increasing severity at the body of greatest competition in the oil business, the independents, as if O. P. A., or its bosses in the White House, are determined to drive the strong army of independent competitors out of the oil industry.

O. P. A. Chief Bowles says in his letter he is "saving hundreds of millions of dollars." In a folder of charts that he also gave to the Congressmen he claims a "saving" to the Government of $175,000,000 and to the public of $350,000,000 more. How these figures are arrived at he does not say. But as offsetting figures we might suggest the $134,000,000 the Army is spending—or wasting—on the Canol project, the $30,000,000 Secretary of the Interior Ickes wants to spend to put the Bureau of Mines into the gasoline-from-coal business, and the $175,000,000 President Ickes of the P. R. C. wants to spend on an Arabian pipe line, to say nothing of almost as much more, reportedly, on a Mediterranean refinery. Add this up and it comes close to a half billion dollars, all of which the oil industry was and is only too glad to keep from loading onto the public. The White House backers of the schemes are the same backers of O. P. A.'s oil shortage policy.

But the greatest misstatement of all by Bowles is that "price control has placed the industry upon a sound operating basis which has virtually eliminated the possibility of drastic post-war readjustments."

That misstatement alone shows the abysmal ignorance of Bowles and his White House supervisors concerning the oil industry. A sound operating oil industry is not one with idle refining capacity as at present, thanks to O. P. A.'s price policy, and with idle distributing facilities, as at present, also thanks to that same price policy. A sound industry is not one with a price structure based on the large percent of big volume of Government business done practically exclusively by the major oil companies. A sound oil industry is not one that is drawing its below-ground and above-ground stocks of oil down to unprecedentedly dangerous levels, so that the oil authorities are constantly hedging every statement concerning the doling out of supplies to the private consumer with the qualification "subject to local shortages" which are nothing but shortages of needed working stocks. Nor is a sound American oil industry one subjected to a domestic oil shortage policy that forces the diversion of more and more much needed tankers to South American oil supplies and the carrying out of an alleged good neighbor policy that might far better be foregone in favor of a good American policy.

One thing certain is that if and when the administration takes its heavy hand off price, the leaping post-war demand will jump the price, undoubtedly higher than any needed price today, in order to bring in the direly needed additional supplies of crude. Another thing that is certain, is that when that higher price brings in the almost certain flood of new crude, the price will fall, perhaps to present levels, maybe even lower.

Maybe one thing the New Deal's economists do understand, is that shortages bring higher prices and higher prices bring additional supplies and additional supplies mean the end of the shortage and should mean the end of rationing and price fixing and the end of a lot of soft jobs for many tens of thousands of incompetent officeholders. In the oil industry there is certainly a long, long series of floods of crude oil that followed the public's bidding higher prices for what it wants, and which floods always brought lower prices. That price for crude oil, as bid by the oil industry on behalf of the public, is as free and sensitive a price as that of any commodity, we believe, and there are 85 years of history to back it up.

But then, we, and many others, also hold the opinion that neither Bowles, the rest of O. P. A., the administration, nor all their economists want anything but an oil shortage because such a shortage fits their political and reform aims.

Price Ceiling on Watermelons

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROSS RIZLEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I think it appropriate, especially in view of the fact that we are considering the extension of O. P. A., to have the views of a typical country editor in a typical rural community, with reference to some of the silly things that the O. P. A. is doing.

Watermelons are generally classified as a luxury, and if people who can afford to buy a watermelon want to pay a little extra for this luxury and thus encourage, or may I say, give the farmers who raise watermelons a decent price for their effort so that they can buy an extra War bond to help out their boy or girl in the armed forces, why should anyone who thinks straight take the position that watermelons should have a ceiling price?

The editorial is timely and to the point, and I believe reflects the sentiment of 99.9 percent of the farmers and others in Oklahoma, with respect to a ceiling price on watermelons:

COUNTRY IS SAVED—THERE'S A CEILING ON WATERMELONS

What a sigh of relief went up all over the country when the news went out from O. P. A. headquarters a few days ago that there would be a ceiling on watermelons this year. Just think, we have fought this war now for nearly 3 years without a watermelon ceiling. Maybe the Italian campaign bogged down in its beginning because the O. P. A. had not put a ceiling on watermelons. Until history is written nobody will know how the war effort has suffered just because the bureaucrats that run the O. P. A didn't think about putting a ceiling on the watermelon crop until now.

The farmers of Grady County thought that maybe they could raise one crop that the starry-eyed bunch that runs the O. P A. wouldn't get their fingers on but they are doomed to disappointment, the ceiling is on. It will probably take a whole office full of bureaucrats at Washington several weeks to figure out how many millions they saved the poor defense workers by putting the ceiling on watermelons. But this is campaign year, probably the members of C. I. O. in the big centers of the country can increase their campaign fund for the fourth term now that they will be saved at least a dime on their watermelons.

We can really look for our war effort to get in high. Maybe the fourth-termers put the ceiling on watermelons just so the plutocratic melon growers down in the sand hills around Rush Springs would come to realize that there is a war on. Henry Mileur, of Rush Springs, who always puts on the "rousins" when Franklin D's name is mentioned, can really go to town now. Franklin D. has once more come to the help of the poor folks. Yes, the country is saved; long live the O. P. A. With a ceiling on watermelons, it will never be forgotten in south Grady County, at least.

The ceiling on watermelons along with no cuffs on trousers and no gasoline bought on credit will be the three outstanding accomplishments of the O. P. A. on the home war front.

Yugoslavia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED E. BUSBEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a letter delivered to the Honorable ANDREW J. MAY, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, House of Representatives, today.

The letter is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1944.

Hon. ANDREW J. MAY,
Chairman, Military Affairs Committee,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I write this letter to you to solicit the help of yourself and your committee, that the people of the United States might learn the facts, and the truth regarding the real situation in Yugoslavia.

Please be assured that I can readily appreciate our Government's desire to cooperate with any individual or group of individuals who can bring about an early defeat of Hitler and everything he stands for, but I still believe that the people are entitled to the facts and the truth.

From the attitude taken by the high commands of our allied forces in regard to our Yugoslav situation, one might think that the Chetniks were a group of bandits trying to do everything possible to hinder the war effort. This, I am sure, is not the case.

Regardless of any appreciation that might be shown toward Tito for his fighting on the side of the Allies at this particular time, I do not believe that the Congress should stand by and let misrepresentations continue. We have men and materials involved in Yugoslavia, and in all fairness we should allow impartial newspaper reporters to be assigned to the headquarters of General Mihailovich, as well as those of Tito.

For almost a year the United States has had two experienced competent observers in Yugoslavia; namely, Lt. Col. John F. R. Seitz, of the United States Army, and Capt. Walter R. Mansfield of the United States Marine Corps. These men have recently returned to the United States to make their report to high Government officials, but have been muzzled and thereby prevented from making any statements that would bring the true situation to public attention.

The policy of withholding facts from the public and Congress by the present administration is nothing new. All too often it remains for some newspaper commentator to find them out by accident, and smoke out the various departments of our Government until the facts are released.

To be more explicit, I call to the attention of your committee the text of the radio broadcast made at 6:30 p. m., May 15, 1944, over WWDC, a local Washington station, by the well-known commentator, Leon Pearson. The text I here quote:

"Now sit back a minute, and let me give you an inside story about Jugoslavia. This is an inside story in perfectly literal sense. It is the story of what two American officers think, who have just returned from inside Yugoslavia.

"You know all about the controversy between the factions over there—Marshal Tito, leader of the Partisans, against General Mihailovich, leader of the Chetniks. And also that this Government, like the British Government, is throwing its weight behind Tito and letting Michailovich languish without assistance.

"Yet the story I have tonight is that the two American observers who spent some weeks with Mihailovich forces have come back with a report highly favorable to that faction, and refuting the claims that Mihailovich is a collaborator with the Germans.

"That report is being kept from the American people—which is natural enough, since it is a confidential military report. But what seems strange is that the two officers are also being kept from contact with the press. They are not allowed to see anybody, and even their names are withheld.

"But I have learned their names. Here they are: Lt. Col. John F. R. Seitz, of the United States Army, and Capt. Walter R. Mansfield, of the Marine Corps.

"The muffling of these men has aroused considerable opposition even within the Office of Strategic Services—which has charge of them. I have talked with two officers of O. S. S., who said, 'Don't quote me, but'—and then they went on to say what they really felt about the matter.

"One man, when I asked to see Colonel Seitz or Captain Mansfield, said: 'They have orders not to see anybody. Personally, I have definite views in the matter, and I am partial to the cause of Mihailovich. Frankly, nothing would give me more pleasure than to let Mihailovich be defended.'

" 'Mihailovich,' he continued, 'is accused of collaborating with the Germans and of getting arms and ammunition from them. But it may be that he has simply penetrated the German lines and seized German arms for his own use. When you fight as they have to fight in Yugoslavia—guerrilla warfare—you dive beneath the surface and employ whatever means you can.'

"Then this officer of O. S. S.—I cannot reveal his name, because in Strategic Services they are not supposed to talk to the press—brought the question right home by saying:

" 'Suppose, for example, that Washington and Virginia were overrun with Germans. We might be very ingratiating to the occupying forces—not because we favor them, but because we want to work from within and get arms for our own defense. Yet this does not justify our being called collaborators or traitors.'

" 'And, then,' he added, 'My sympathies being what they are, I would be delighted if the story could be told.'

"Well, that is the story. There can be no doubt that the other faction, under Marshal Tito, is doing an amazing and successful job, but I fail to see why a good word cannot be permitted to be said for Mihailovich, if he deserves it.

"This is Leon Pearson. I'll be back in a minute."

I believe in the sincerity of the commentator in his broadcast. Further information which I have and believe to be authentic, is that the two military observers, Lieutenant Colonel Seitz and Captain Mansfield, are about to be ordered out of the country, thereby making them unavailable to appear before any committee of Congress. These reasons impel me to make this urgent request of you and your committee to hold a meeting immediately, for the specific purpose of hearing the testimony of these two men.

No one will deny that Congress should know all the truth; and certainly one way to obtain the truth is that your committee within its own prerogatives should hold a session to receive first-hand statements which these two military men can present. They are the men who can give you the truth about the Yugoslav situation, and it is urgent that this information be given to all of the Congress, the press and the public. We should know the whole truth.

I have personally kept closely in touch with the Yugoslav situation for many months. We have had so much drivel, bunk and misrepresentation about this setup in Yugoslavia, that I cannot impress upon you too strongly the urgency of this request.

Respectfully yours,

FRED E. BUSBEY.

Our War Aims in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 9 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Our War Aims in Europe," published in the Washington Times-Herald of recent date.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR WAR AIMS IN EUROPE

We're talking about our war aims in Europe, not in Asia. The two sets of war aims are different and distinct.

Our first war aim in Europe is to defeat the German enemy. We've made an encouraging beginning, with the seizure of beachheads along the 60-mile section of the French coast between Cherbourg and Le Havre—though, as Allied supreme headquarters in Britain keeps emphasizing, the real fight has just begun and the Germans have yet to show what they can do in the way of counterattacks.

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH GERMANY?

But that Germany is going to be defeated seems no longer in serious doubt. The main question appears to be how long it will take the Allies to do the job.

The next war aim should come into focus as the job of beating Germany proceeds. Just now it is pretty foggy, pretty obscure. This next war aim is the post-war treatment of Germany so as to make that nation incapable of disturbing the peace of the world for a long time to come.

There are several things that could be done, once we catch the bear.

Germany might be cut up into a number of small, weak nations, as was done by the treaty of Westphalia in 1648, winding up the Thirty Years' War. That kept the Germans weak and divided for quite a while—through it also kept many of them determined to reunite for revenge.

Or we could conceivably destroy the German people. The Romans destroyed the Carthaginian people, their long-time mortal enemies across the Mediterranean from Italy; and though Rome made plenty more enemies as time went on, Carthage was never again a threat.

One school of thought feels that it will be well enough to wipe out Hitler and the body and bones of his National Socialist Party. Another thinks we ought to wipe out the Prussian militarists as well as the Nazis. These views remind one of the prevailing belief in World War No. 1 that if the Allies could only throw the Hohenzollern dynasty the rest of the Germans would promptly go back to making toys and reading Goethe and Schiller and Heine. We overthrow the Hohenzollerns, but Hitler grew up in their stead.

Still another plan is to let Russia dominate eastern Europe, to force on Germany a government subservient to Russia, and restore the status quo ante in western Europe. That would mean to reestablish Norway, Holland, Belgium and France as they were before September 1939, with the British backing them up, and with us backing up the British.

Of one thing we feel sure—that this second war aim is a matter for our Congress to formulate as far as the United States is concerned.

It should not be worked out by one or more great brains in secret, then flashed on Americans as an accomplished fact. We all have a big stake in this war aim, and our elected Representatives in Washington should figure out for us, publicly what this war aim is.

WHAT SHALL WE DO FOR OURSELVES?

Which leads us to our third war aim, at present, the remotest but also the most important of our war aims. That one would be to stay out of future wars in Europe. The main problem connected with it would be how to do it.

It seems doubtful that the majority of Americans will care for a post-war set-up under which we shall periodically have to send our best young men and heavy slices of our real wealth overseas to protect or restore the European status quo ante. We have now done that twice in a generation. It seems likely that a lot of Americans will have wearied of it by the time this second performance is over.

We may not return to old-time, out-and-out isolationism after this war. And it may be better not to, if we are to realize the war aim of staying out of future European wars.

It may be better for us to try some businesslike internationalism with Canada—meaning to try to get together with Canada on plans to keep the peace in the Western Hemisphere and look out for ourselves first. Most Canadians already know that Canadian and United States defense problems are identical, because geographically we are a unit.

A defensive and offensive United States-Canada alliance, with a joint general staff, joint defense plans, and all the trimmings, would at least make the North American Continent by far the most powerful influence for peace or war in the Western Hemisphere. Canada and ourselves would be about as safe as we could hope to be in this uncertain world, as long as we kept our guard up.

And this arrangement might even keep the world at peace a long time. If Europe could get it into its head that North America really did not intend to throw its immense wealth and power into any war which it considered none of its business, European politicians might be a good deal more hesitant about starting another European war than they were about starting World Wars Nos. 1 and 2.

Wages of Postal Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I just want to discuss for a few minutes the case of the white-collar worker, or more specifically the post-office employees in Los Angeles, Calif., during wartime. In normal times post-office employees' wages are only fair in comparison to skilled-labor crafts, but the men stick to their jobs for security reasons. Since the outbreak of the war, and despite rationing and price control, the economic situation of post-office employees has become deplorable. While they received a wage bonus of $25 a month in March 1943, which is almost 15 percent of their regular pay, the living costs have gone up no less than 43.5 percent since 1941.

The post-office employee must buy commodities at inflated and speculative prices. He must clothe, feed, and shelter his family on a pre-war 1926 dollar. He must compete with highly paid war workers who receive swollen pay checks and care not for the future.

While skilled craftsmen throughout the labor world are receiving time and one-half and double time for Sunday work, postal employees are working day and night to move the mail. Sundays, holidays, every minute around the clock, many hours of overtime, for a wage of 86 cents an hour. H. R. 4501 provides that these employees receive time and one-half for overtime. I respectfully urge the passage of this legislation for these most deserving men.

Price Control by O. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the Price Control and Stabilization Act being considered by this House will undoubtedly be considered thoroughly because both the proponents and opponents to certain amendments will present their arguments to the House. It is hoped that when the arguments are presented that the House will have as much information as is humanly possible. Too frequently on the floor of this House we permit bitterness, partisanship, and emotion to sway our thinking and judgment.

I believe it should be clear to the majority Members of the House that it is necessary to continue some form of price control and stabilization during the continuance of this war. If this House were to absolutely destroy the act at this time it might lead to some serious economic disturbances.

It does seem, however, Mr. Speaker, that since the birth of the Emergency Price Control Act on January 20, 1942, that we have had certain experiences with the trial by error method which indicates that certain amendments are in order if we expect the act to be administered to the best interests of this country.

I do believe that under the present Administrator we are finding there is a much better handling of the problem than under the Henderson regime. Much of this credit is due Congress, who insisted a year ago that the long-haired professors, experimenters, and social reformers devoid of business experience and yet holding key positions must be replaced by experienced businessmen. This has been accomplished in part.

The O. P. A. was established to prevent uncontrolled wartime inflation. They have failed in many instances to control inflation. The best success they have had to date is in controlling those articles which are plentiful. We all know that they need no control. Many of the rules and regulations by the O. P. A. has discouraged production, which in turn causes inflation. Let me refer to their attempt to put into operation price ceilings for fresh fruits and vegetables. Their regulations have resulted in a confusion and chaotic condition which has seriously affected the production and distribution of these commodities. Price ceilings have not been flexible enough to meet situations of the growers and of conditions which affect their crops. I refer to floods, frosts, droughts, and crop hazards which continually beset the producer. Fruits and vegetables are highly perishable. They cannot be stored for any length of time. They are seasonable. They must be moved quickly. Sometimes at a loss. The O. P. A. has failed to recognize these problems. Whenever an article becomes scarce it goes through the black market. This is true on many articles besides fruits and vegetables. The black marketers pay no taxes. They force the legitimate dealer who does pay taxes out of business. Much food has been permitted to spoil because of the inflexible rules and regulations laid down by the O. P. A. The O. P. A. appears to have been much more concerned with keeping prices down than it has been interested in maintaining a proper supply of food.

If we are to control inflation in this country, we must have ample production. The O. P. A. has attempted to force, control, and regulate far too many articles. I would like to refer to the food trade alone, where we find some 7,800 pages, which means millions of words, of code and regulations issued by a bunch of individuals who are trying to regiment and control the will of the American people. The O. P. A. has had difficulty in construing its own regulations. It has meant confusion, discouragement, and the breaking of many rules and regulations. The Congress must insist that the Administrator simplify the rules so that all can understand. There should be no cracking down and prosecutions on rules and regulations of which the individual has not had proper knowledge of their being put into effect.

Certainly one amendment which we should adopt is that of making it possible for the individual to have some recourse to the regularly constituted courts after he has been convicted by a court set up by the O. P. A. In the past they have acted as the policeman, the prosecutor, the judge, and the executioner. The individual has had no opportunity to appeal to the properly constituted courts of this land.

The regulations set up under the O. P. A. permitting triple damages to be assessed should be changed at once. Congress should spell out in no uncertain terms just what they meant when this part of the law was passed.

The Congress should set a limit upon the paying of subsidies and roll-backs and should set a definite time for their discontinuance. They should prohibit all future subsidies. Congress has spoken on this occasion twice and has been overruled by the President. It can only be effectively ended by writing into the law future prohibition against new subsidies. The use of subsidies are controls which try to create and freeze excessive cash balances. Their elimination, if long continued, will be difficult. The longer we tolerate subsidies the more difficult they will be to eliminate. Special interests who are getting some supposed assistance will ask for their continuance. The elimination of not only subsidies, but war controls, will be a difficult task for their continuance will be supported by the bureaucracies and their personnel whose jobs depend upon the continuance of government regimentation. It will require sacrifice, patience with determined and persistent efforts to rid ourselves of these wartime controls and regain our individual initiative and freedom of American enterprise.

The subsidies and roll-backs forced upon the livestock growers and dairy industry has been most discouraging to the ample production of meat and dairy products. When the roll-back was established and benefits paid to the packer it did not reach down to the producer of livestock. It is my honest belief that the scarcity of many articles, particularly meat, can be traced to the direct door of the O. P. A. and the regulations set up to govern the industry. The shortage of meat has been caused by directives which change the rules of feeding cattle and the sale of meat. These rules have been changed in the middle of the feed lot which caused uncertainty and confusion among the producers of meat.

The Congress should insist and write into the law a provision which will force the Administrator of the O. P. A. to take the considered judgment and advice of the men in industry and business upon rules and regulations affecting their business.

Mr. Bowles, the Administrator, is a supersalesman. One is convinced of this fact when he reads and looks over the charts which he inserted in the hearings in both the Senate and the House. A careful examination of many of the charts shows that they are full of flaws and fallacies and will not stand the full light of a critical examination. Take, for instance, the chart in which he indicates the cost of living has not advanced. He takes a 52-month period of the last war and of this war. The last war for this country did not last 52 months nor has this war lasted that long. He does not take into consideration that the 20-percent withholding tax is a part of the living cost. He does not take into consideration that many articles on the market are of lower quality and at a higher price. He fails to take into consideration the articles upon which no price control has been established, like second-hand automobiles. The prices of these have skyrocketed. He fails to take into consideration the black-market operations.

The bill also deals with the Stabilization Act.

I think the Members of the House and the people of the country should realize that the Office of Economic Stabilization which was created by an Executive order and is a preconceived brain child of the inner cabinet, has the right to nullify the acts of other agencies which were created by Congress. This agency is superior and above the Secretary of Agriculture, the War Food Administration, and the Price Administrator. The acts of Congress which establishes and outlines the law can be superseded by edicts from this Office. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we expect our democracy to survive that we should let no man, not even the President or his inner cabinet, have the power to supersede by directives the acts of Congress. The President never had the power to transfer the duties and functions established under the First War Powers Act. He nevertheless has proceeded to do just that.

Much of the opposition to the Price Control Act comes from the way it has been administered. The O. P. A. attempts to enforce the mysterious, theoretical freeze and hold the line order issued in 1942. This was an order of the President. Only one end of the line is being held. It is true, prices were frozen for the retailer. The price of labor and many other articles going into the production of goods was not frozen. Margins of profits were wiped out. In fact, it seems that this Office is more concerned with the control of profits than it is in ample production. This freeze-the-line order has forced many articles off the market. Articles from cigars to pancake flour disappears from the trade. In their place the public finds many new brands of inferior grade and at a higher price. This procedure is permitted under the Price Control Act. In the matter of the production of meat, the ceiling price of a cow and hog is pretty well fixed. We did not have the cost of production, such as proteins, hay, labor, salt, and taxes fixed. The producers of meats and farm products have not been permitted to reflect any of these increases in their selling price.

I repeat, again, Mr. Speaker, that the only way to control inflation and to get rid of rationing and price control is to have ample production of instead of controls. There are too many individuals in the several agencies of Government that would like to control and regiment everything from your shoe strings to your hair tonic.

It is my honest belief that with the conclusion of this war we must make every effort to abandon at once those controls which are not necessary. We must restore the American tradition of private enterprise and personal freedom. Our Government must encourage production and employment which will insure our citizens full freedom and the right to enjoy the fruits of their toil. We must remember that private enterprise can live and flourish only in freedom. We must have freedom from Government regulations, freedom from authority lodged in Washington. Peacetime functioning cannot be efficiently combined with wartime controls. The O. P. A. and the Office of Economic Stabilization should recognize these fundamental principles. The citizens must be freed from the plague of unexplainable, dogmatic attitudes frequently adopted by minor Government officials. Some one has said that "no law, rule, or regulation will work well unless we permit a little play at the joints." This is certainly true of the Government and man-made edicts now flooding the country.

American Youth Looks Toward New Horizons

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, a young University of Chicago student delivered a remarkable address some months ago entitled "Toward New Horizons," at the graduation exercises of the Sullivan High School in Chicago.

In this speech, young Sheldon Newberger appraises the world and its problems, as he sees it, and makes certain keen and penetrating observations relative to current international developments.

This young man reveals a perceptive mind and exhibits a militantly liberal viewpoint.

I commend the reading of this address to those who would be interested in modern youth's reaction to the world today.

Here is his speech:

We have considered this evening some of the primary requisites for a lasting and just peace. We have discussed the Atlantic Charter with its idealistic statements about the future, and we have talked about the "four freedoms" which when put into effect will guarantee the very principles stated by Roosevelt and Churchill in August of the year 1941. Yet, we have merely touched the great book that tells of the future of America and the world.

I have emphasized the word "world," because it is the whole world that we must think of if we plan now for future peace. We cannot any longer hide behind the cloak of normalcy—the shades of isolationism and declare that the affaors of China and India—and even little Luxemburg do not affect us. Starving natives in the East Indies affect the peace and security of the people of Chicago in the same way as did the Touhy gang when they escaped from Stateville a few months ago; and a depression-ridden Germany threatens the prosperity of the United States as much as, say, a flood striking the cotton lands of the deep South.

We have had a tendency this evening to be idealistic. We have visioned the coming world in glowing phrases quoting glorious statements from world leaders. There are some people who protest against this. They call themselves the practical realists; they think we must win the war first and then bother about the peace; they feel that the sooner American boys get back from Africa and Guadalcanal and we get out of European affairs, the better off we'll be. Yet, these so-called realists are not realists at all; they are pessimists. They cannot see this war for what it is. They do not understand that winning on the battlefield and failing at the peace table is just the same as losing the war—that no longer can the American people say that the affairs of Asia and Africa and Europe do not concern them.

We, the youth of this world, are in the process of fighting a war. It is a horrible war, deadly in all its aspects, yet I may honestly say that the thought that inspires all our efforts is the hope that our children and our children's children may live in peace. Without this hope, what is there to fight for?

The future of this world will depend upon the genius of the peoples who inhabit it. It will depend upon a spirit of internationalism blessed with feelings of brotherhood and resolve. We are pioneers in the creation of peace, much as our forefathers were pioneers in the opening of the West. We will obliterate hate and greed and want in much the same way as they conquered the forests, the mountains, and the streams. We in truth are twentieth-century crusaders, striving valiantly for justice and the "four freedoms."

Specific plans have been presented for a post-war world. Our job, the job of youth, will be to consider them, to debate them, to make preparations now for the time when the last shot will be fired and the last bomb will be dropped.

This war must be a war without revenge. As much as the slaughtered Poles will want to kill the plundering Hun, and the American father avenge the death of his son—this war must be one to set the Germans, the Japanese, and the Italians on the right track rather than to destroy them. For if we force the peoples of the Axis to pay reparations, if we treat them as conquered nations, then we will merely find the whole world economy ruined, and future peace will be merely a passing dream. This is not a popular thing to say. Yet our first step must be one of charity and kindness, of firm resolve never to let this catastrophe take place again.

It might mean an international police force, whose job it will be to keep the defeated countries disarmed until they can once again join a council of nations. It could mean a system of education, of reopening the minds of the peoples of the Axis to the arts and the humanities, to showing them that a new world is beckoning for creative genius in the fields of technology and production. International committees to rule the defeated countries until their citizens are once again ready for self leadership may very well be one of the steps we must take. A world federation, of all nations, in which each state will sacrifice a little of its sovereignty in return for economic and political security is another suggestion that deserves discussion and comment. A code and a court for international justice, a policy to educate and prepare the backward countries for independence, free world trade, all these are prospects for a glorious and free future. But, this future can only come to men with open minds—minds intellectually free to understand the changing world, and meet these changes with vigor and foresight.

We, sitting here tonight, cannot remain naive about the world to come. We cannot hide behind the parental blanket and hope to avoid the realities of the world. For the future of this country and all other countries will depend upon youth—on our sense of international responsibility and our determination to establish a society where everyone has the opportunity to work—not to make one man or one country wealthy—but to add to the enjoyment and prosperity of all men everywhere.

We are entering a great technological age. Soon there will be modern air-conditioned cars with high-compression engines able to go 50 miles on a gallon of gas. There will be streamlined family cruisers, boats as plentiful as autos are today. There will be air flivvers, helicopters, capable of landing everywhere, and taking one to Norway to spend the evening with some friends. There will be plastic factories and glass houses, in fact, things that today seem like dreams will be realities tomorrow. These will be the products of the inventive genius of the peoples of the world.

But, along with these great products will come social problems that must be solved. This will be the role of a dynamic, conscientious youth. Fresh from the battlefields of the world, we must make it so that the common man will have the security and income to enjoy these inventions, that a heretofore nonconsumptive population will become the great buyers of all the miracles of the coming age. We can only do this through the establishment of freedom from want, where man can eat and live in decent homes and have proper clothing; freedom from fear, where man can be secure from loss of work, where from the cradle to the grave, they can depend upon having the basic necessities of life.

If I were a dramatist recording the history of the present times, perhaps I would do it this way. The first act consists of those horrible years after World War No. 1; of the failure of the United States to accept the League of Nations, of false prosperity and the havocs of depression; of the rise of the Fascist States; of the failure in Ethiopia; in Spain; in Munich; to stop the Nazi hordes.

The second act would include this war; the courageous British at Dunkerque, the valiant Russians at Stalingrad; a fighting America that overcame the perils of a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor and began fighting, working, manning and arming the armies of democracy.

And, in the final act, I foresee the future—a glorious victory by the United Nations, because ultimately right always conquers the forces of evil. And then, the peoples of the world, led by an inspired youth, will begin their march.

This will be the heroic march of peoples bent on freedom, the march not only for political democracy, but for economic and social democracy as well. This will be the march that will lead to full employment, to an adequate diet for all, to security from the threats of illness, old age, and sudden depression. This will be the march that will mean for the sharecropper of California and the coolie of China, a decent home with proper clothing and a chance to work as freemen. This will be the march of the youthful chemist and scientist toward creating products that will not benefit one man nor one class, but will aid all humanity. This will be the march of the industrialist who will recognize the rights of the laboring man and cooperate in producing goods for all. This will be the march toward world government, toward free trade, and a policy of enlightenment toward all the backward nations.

Yes, this will be the march, the inevitable march of the common man toward new horizons full of peace and justice and hope.

Andresen Amendments to Price Control Bill, H. R. 4941

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me, and for the information of the Members of the House, I am listing herewith five amendments which I will offer to H. R. 4941, the price-control bill, when I receive recognition by the Chair:

NO. 1

Page 3, line 5, after the colon, insert the following: "Provided further, That when the Administrator establishes a wholesale price on any commodity or article to be sold at retail, all retail distributors shall have the full benefit of the lowest wholesale price so established, and nothing in this act or otherwise shall be construed as authorizing the Administrator to issue any regulation or order which does not allow all retail distributors to compete freely in all commodities and articles of merchandise available for sale in every price line."

NO. 2

Page 11, line 6, after the last comma, insert the following: "nor to deny the allowance of a fair and equitable margin of profit for any given commodity, product, or class of a commodity or product."

NO. 3

"SEC. 7. Effective with respect to proceedings instituted after June 30, 1944, section 205 (c) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) Except as provided in subsection (f), the courts of the several States and Territories shall have jurisdiction of criminal proceedings for violations of section 4 of this act, to the extent, in the case of any such court, that such court would have jurisdiction if such violation constituted an offense against the State or Territory, and also have jurisdiction of all other proceedings under this section. In any case in which under the laws of a State or Territory, there is no court of such State or Territory which can exercise the jurisdiction of criminal proceedings or other proceedings, as the case may be, conferred by this section, then the appropriate district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of such criminal proceedings or such other proceedings, as the case may be. Except as provided in this subsection and in subsection (f) the district courts of the United States shall not have jurisdiction of any proceeding under this act instituted after June 30, 1944. No right, benefit, or privilege, the granting of which is under the control of the Administrator pursuant to this act, or otherwise, shall be denied, suspended, or revoked by reason of a violation of any law or regulation, unless such person has been convicted of such violation, or has been found to have violated such law or regulation in some other court proceeding to which such person is a party.'"

Renumber the remaining sections of the bill accordingly.

Page 21, strike out line 23 and insert:

"following new paragraphs:

" 'No action shall be taken under authority of this act with respect to an increase in any wages or salaries in any case in which such increase has been agreed upon by the employer and employee and will not result in the payment of wages or salaries at a rate greater than $37.50 per week. For the purposes of the preceding sentence, if the employee ordinarily works overtime and extra compensation is paid therefor, such extra compensation shall be included in determining the rate of wages or salaries paid.' "

NO. 5

"SEC.—. Section 5 (a) of such Act of October 2, 1942, as amended, is amended by striking out the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

" 'Effective with respect to wage and salary payments made after June 30, 1944, the President shall prescribe the extent to which the excess of any wage or salary payment made in contravention of such regulations over the portion thereof which would not be in contravention of such regulations shall be disregarded by the executive departments and other governmental agencies in determining the costs or expenses of any employer for the purposes of any law or regulation. In the case of a wage or salary payment made after October 1, 1942, and prior to July 1, 1944, the portion thereof which was not in contravention of regulations issued under this act shall not be disregarded or disallowed in determining the costs or expenses of any employer for the purposes of any other law or regulation, and, if already disregarded or disallowed, shall be allowed notwithstanding the previous disallowance.' "

Make Mediation Decisions Final

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the Banking and Currency Committee for writing into this price control bill section 10, in which the committee provides that the decisions by the Railway Mediation Board, or such agencies settling matters of dispute between railroad management and railway employees, shall be final when rendered.

If this amendment is approved by this Congress it will prevent the playing of politics and the shameful practices by those high in official authority here in Washington who, by their buck passing and delay, caused a strike to be called by the railway labor men of the Nation which hurt the cause of railway labor organizations unjustly, during the latter part of last year and which brought about a situation which gave the President of the United States an opportunity to seize the railroads all of which could and should have been avoided and which will be made impossible in the future if this amendment is approved by the Congress.

Members of this House will remember that for a year prior to the calling of the railway strike in December of last year through the Board set up for the hearing of such disputes every legal step had been taken as between the railway employees and railway management. The facts are the railway management recognized the railway employees were entitled to more money and the two groups had agreed upon the amount. At that point through the operation and on the advice of O. P. A. the matter was appealed to Director of Stabilization, Mr. Fred Vinson. He ruled against it on the theory that it might increase the cost of living. The President came into the picture and set up a new Board to make a restudy and a recanvass of the entire matter which had been restudied and recanvassed for an entire year and when the facts were brought in again Mr. Vinson offered some increases but wanted it done in his particular way which was inequitable to the men involved. It was at this juncture that the President seized the railroads, apparently in order to prevent a Nation-wide tie-up of transportation. After the railroads were seized and held for 48 hours they were turned back to the companies and a settlement was made with the men involved at as much or more costs than would have resulted from their contract had the matter never been appealed to Mr. Vinson, to Mr. Byrnes, or the President.

This amendment provides for the using of the Railway Mediation Board and other well thought-out plans for arriving at just decisions between railway employees and railway management growing out of collective bargaining.

It removes the possibility of delay in the future and the possibility of playing politics at the expense of the railway workers and railway management. It compels such disputes to be adjudicated and settled in an impartial way and in a way that has proven satisfactory in the past.

It is the right step in the right direction to settle labor and management controversies by sound principles of mediation which is so necessary to the economy of this country.

Organization of World War No. 2 Veterans, as Proposed by Charles G. Bolte

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, a recent article by the eminent radio commentator and newspaper correspondent, William L. Shirer, appearing in the New York Herald Tribune of May 21, 1944, discusses the status of the veterans of World War No. 2 and an attempt by one Charles G. Bolte to organize these veterans and, through such organization, to promulgate a liberal program.

Mr. Bolte is organizing a group of young veterans, who have an agenda which has wide appeal.

Mr. Shirer discusses the efforts of Mr. Bolte and his associates at some length in the article which I am appending herein below:

PROPAGANDA FRONT

(By William L. Shirer)

I am going to toss in a little propaganda today concerning the seven or eight million citizens fighting, or about to fight, or who have fought overseas and who will be coming home one fine day to make this country and possibly this world either better or worse, either secure for peace and a decent living or ripe for more wars and more idiotic chaos.

One of them, only 3 years out of college but already minus a leg he lost on an African battlefield, came in to see me last week. And because I have a feeling he may be representative of an American generation of which the Nation knows very little, not having shared its bloody experiences at the front, or ever paid much attention to its hopes and fears, I would like to tell you about him and what he and some of the young veterans are up to.

EDITED HIS COLLEGE PAPER

His name is Charles G. Bolte. Three years ago he was editor of his college paper, the Daily Dartmouth. A year or so later he was a young lieutenant at El Alamein. In the holocaust there he lasted for 3 days and the terrible distance of 1½ miles. Then the Germans shot a leg off.

He did not mention these things. I learned of them from another only after he had left. He merely presented himself as an honorably discharged veteran who had been in touch with other American servicemen about the kind of a world they would like to fight for, peacefully and democratically, after the war.

In view of the widespread reports that Americans in the armed services do not know what they are fighting for and care only about getting home as quickly as possible to ma's apple pie, this young man's ideas and present activities may be of some interest to the rest of us.

MEN EXCHANGED LETTERS

In January 1943 a group of men in the service or recently discharged, of whom Mr. Bolte was one, began exchanging letters about the attitude of the veterans after the war. They agreed that any attempt to organize formally or to devise a final program before complete demobilization would be futile. Mr. Bolte himself has joined the American Legion, of which his father is a member, though he does not rule out the possibility of a separate organization of the veterans of this war if the returning soldiers and sailors want it.

But in the meantime, so this group thought, it might be useful to try to crystallize the ideas of the men fighting the war and also to keep them reliably informed of what was going on at home, something the official Army publications, because of a peculiar fear of mixing in partisan issues, cannot do too well.

STATEMENT OF INTENTIONS

One of the first products of the group was a statement of intentions, the joint work of servicemen scattered around the world. It is a preliminary statement, but the group sincerely believes it honestly represents the thinking of the overwhelming majority of the fighting men. Here it is:

"We look forward to becoming civilians; making a decent living raising a family and living in freedom from the threat of another war. But that was what most Americans wanted from the last war. They found that military victory does not automatically bring peace, jobs, or freedom. To guarantee our interests, which are those of our country, we must work for what we want.

"Therefore, we are associating ourselves with American men and women, regardless of race, creed, or color, who are serving with, or have been honorably discharged from, our armed forces, merchant marine, civilian agencies in the field or Allied forces. When we are demobilized it will be up to us to decide what action can best further our aims.

"These will include:

"Aid for every veteran and his family during demobilization.

"A job for every veteran with private enterprise and Government working together to provide full employment for the Nation.

"Thorough social security.

"Free speech, press, worship, assembly, and ballot.

"Disarmament of Germany and Japan and the elimination of the power of their militarist classes.

"Continuance of the United Nations as partners, acting together to stop any threat to peace."

There were many drafts of this statement of intentions before the young soldiers could agree on a final one. Some of the ideas expressed in the earlier drafts are instructive as showing at least what some of the members of the war generation think about certain national issues.

In regard to aid for veterans, for instance, one draft stated: "For American veterans our Government will provide mustering-out pay, benefits for those who will have suffered illness or injury through their service and special aid to veterans who wish to resume their education. These measures are just. We shall strongly oppose any grab-bag attempts to secure unnecessary and undeserved benefits."

These sentiments did not represent the thinking of all of the men and were left out of the final draft. But that they were advanced at all is interesting.

Since, as Russell Hill pointed out in a recent dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune from Algiers, the Army newspaper in the field, Stars and Stripes, avoids controversial subjects, apparently partly because of the Army's fear of congressional wrath. Mr. Bolte's young veterans publish a monthly bulletin whose purpose is to inform the men overseas of the real goings-on at home and also to serve as a forum for the G. I.'s.

The May number will give you an idea. It contains a résumé of Mr. Hull's speech and the local and foreign reaction thereto. It gives the lowdown on the recent mutinies of Greek soldiers and sailors in Egypt.

It tells the soldiers the sad truth about their chances of voting this fall: "You have been deprived of your part in the election, unless you write now to your State election board. If you're from the right State and have good mail connections, your vote may count." And it advises that a Washington bet is that if 25,000 soldier votes are counted it will be surprising; if 50,000, a miracle.

Judging from these items it is not so easy to fool the American war generation as some of our politicians seem to have imagined. A biting cynicism runs through most of the letters sent in.

Take this letter: "We want to stay alive; we want to get home. * * * We want to do work we're trained for and enjoy doing. We want to be paid enough for that work to have a car, a decent place to live, and decent food. If we're going to have kids we'd like them to find the world in less of a mess than we found it. Above all, we want no more wars!"

Now, the author of this letter is not naive, for he continues: "But the hell of it is that we're very likely to find after a while that the things we thought we won the hard way weren't won at all. We're likely to find the same old cut-throat competition for the under-paid, dirty job, the same old empty pants pockets we wrapped our fingers in during the thirties and a new war all set to tip us over the edge again. These things will happen * * * if we let them * * * We can prevent wars by stepping on any nation trying to start them. The best way to get another war is to listen to the boys who told us this time we could keep out of war by pretending the world didn't concern us."

I get the impression that Mr. Bolte and his fellow veterans, despite their youth and what they've been through, are both intelligent and adult about the problems of their generation. Maybe they are too cynical but maybe they have reason to be. The kind of America they will make after the war may be even a little better than the one they left to defend.

The Pope's Remonstrance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from a recent issue of the Boston Post:

THE POPE'S REMONSTRANCE

The phrase "unconditional surrender" has, during the past year, been the source from which great controversy has arisen and, now that Pope Pius XII has so brilliantly analyzed the effect of the phrase upon the prolongation of the war, the Allies should draft more concise peace terms.

What the Supreme Pontiff has said about those who would harm Rome being matricides is a solemn warning which must be heeded by the Nazis, who have imperiled Rome, and by the Allies, who must for reasons of strategy and military necessity, wrest the Eternal City from the grasp of the Germans.

The term "unconditional surrender" imperils not only Rome, but many other fair cities of Italy, France, and the whole European continent. Actually, of course, there is no such thing as unconditional surrender. Every surrender has conditions of some sort. If there is no surrender there is only annihilation.

Pope Pius XII is a saintly man, and more skilled in the arts of diplomacy than many recent Popes. He knows the Germans well, and is aware of all their tricks of propaganda and guile. But, he is also aware of the great agony of soul of the Italian people and of the city of Rome.

A little something of the best of all the world, and of all races, has filtered into Rome during the centuries of propagation of the Christian faith. To make a battleground of the Holy City is a crime against all humanity.

His Holiness knows that the decision to destroy Cassino came only as a last resort, when Allied commanders had seen frightful sacrifices among their men because of the existence of German arms on the peak. But there is small comfort in that.

He is the guardian of Rome, the father of its people. It is not Rome, the city, which is of such world-wide importance, but Rome, the spiritual fountainhead of all that is best in men's nature.

The time has come when an eloquent plea by the Pope might be heeded by the combatants, when the enormous influence for good of the church may be thrown into the balance, and an endeavor made to search out the roads to peace.

If there is to be a surrender it must have conditions. And, if there is to be peace, the conditions must be made known to the enemy, in such manner and in time, to permit the peace terms to filter through the obscuring shield of propaganda and censorship flung around the Third Reich.

It has been known all along by the United States and our allies, that when the time was ripe, conditions for surrender must be enunciated. The Germans have not yet acceded to any demand for surrender Nor have they yet acceded to a request to save historic places or shrines from destruction. But, if they contemplate the crime of making Rome a battlefield, the words of the Pope will give them reason to pause and reflect upon the guilt which will rest upon the German people for centuries afterward.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES E. McKENZIE

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, today we are debating the price-control bill. The purpose of this bill is to control prices, prevent run-away inflation, and consequential bankruptcy. We know we must have these controls or at least some of them. We also know that they should be administered with common sense and justice. They should be so administered as to regulate prices, prices to the ultimate consumer, but they were never intended to be used as a means of regulating business. It was never intended that a Federal bureau should set up its own "kangaroo courts" to support its own gestapo methods of coercion and regimentation

It was never intended that the small-town merchant, the country store, or the little one-man operated mercantile business handling low-priced merchandise should be told what price goods or merchandise he can sell, and prevented by these dictator-inclined administrators from handling a higher-priced line of merchandise, which, because the lower-priced goods are not now available automatically puts him out of business while his larger, richer, and more influential competitor a few blocks down the street, and in some instances right next door, is permitted to sell this merchandise, because he never did specialize in low-priced merchandise that the poor man and his family can buy. Why, right today, Mr. Speaker, with the price of cotton to the farmer $15 per bale below its parity of 23,37 cents per pound the price of cotton dresses is up 100 percent to 200 percent over what they were last year and the year before. But the farmer who produced that cotton gets no more for it than he has gotten for the last 2 years, yet he has to pay from two to three times as much for the same cotton dress or pair of overalls or cotton pants. He pays half to twice as much again for a shirt. And he cannot buy them from the merchant who has been his friend and neighbor for years because the O. P. A. says that merchant has never handled any other than a $2 dress and now the $2 dress costs $3.98, therefore it is above the "price limitation" which has been arbitrarily set by the O. P. A. and so the little merchant must lose that part of his business and if he cannot make it up on something else—then he must go out of business. Who makes these rules? Why? Why cannot this little merchant sell these dresses? Why do they cost any more than they used to cost. The farmer is getting no more for his cotton than he got last year.

And speaking of cotton. There is supposed to be a surplus of some 10,000,000 bales carried over—at least, that is what they tell the farmer when he asks for a better price—when he asks for just the parity that the Government itself has set—the parity of 23.37 cents per pound, still and yet this same little businessman and his friends and neighbors cannot buy half the cotton goods they need. They cannot buy piece goods to make their dresses and shirts out of; they cannot buy towels; they cannot buy sheets; they find there is a shortage of denims and work clothes and yet there is a surplus of cotton. When you inquire about these shortages they tell you that the Army is using up all the cotton. That is only partly true. If the Army was using it all there would be no surplus, so while the Army and Navy is using a considerable quantity, there is by no means a shortage of raw cotton. Witness the surplus in warehouses. Witness the price nearly 3 cents below parity. So what is the squeeze play? Is it the rayon manufacturers? Is it the fast moving broker or job salesman? Why are not they regulated as well as the little merchant?

And, Mr. Speaker, there is another thing that I would like to know. Why is it that when the Navy and the Marine Corps overbought on seersucker, the very finest quality available, why did they not turn this seersucker back to the trade so American men and women could have the privilege of buying it and making it up into dresses and suits? Why did they turn it over to lend-lease to be sent to foreign countries and given away, while American men and women had to content themselves with the inferior qualities? Are not the folks at home just as good as the people in foreign lands? Mr. Speaker, the people of the South need more cotton goods; they need more cheap dresses and work clothes; and they need to be put on a par with the manufacturers and jobbers and tradesmen of the East. They should be paid parity for their cotton and they should be given an opportunity to buy that cotton back in the form of manufactured goods or clothing. They should not be penalized by any group for the benefit of any other group. The production of raw cotton is one of the greatest industries in this Nation. Eighteen States grow cotton and in 14 of those 18 States cotton is the principal industry and money crop. As long as the cotton farmer is held down or throttled by O. P. A., or any other agency, you are stopping progress in one-third of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I urge careful consideration of each amendment to the price-control bill so that we may see that we get a fair and just price control act, without regimentation or discrimination against any of our people.

Juan March—Power Behind Fascism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been familiar with the activities and career of Sr. Juan March, the richest man in Spain, whose activities in World War No. 1 were a stench in the nostrils of international decency and whose movements as of this moment are such as to provoke the wonderment of the students of international affairs.

In frequent speeches made by me, Mr. Speaker, on this floor and on public platforms throughout the United States, I have attempted to arouse the American people to the dangers of our continuing to collaborate with Franco Fascist Spain and the behind-the-scenes lackeys and flunkeys of fascism—the satraps and courtiers who have encouraged, cajoled, and flirted with fascism.

Spain is appeasement's child. We have a long and sorry record for which to apologize to lovers of liberty throughout the world because of our illogical policy toward Spain.

We embargoed the export of munitions and arms to the legitimate and established Government of Spain in 1937—a policy dictated by expediency and, perhaps, induced by influences from the British Foreign Office. As a result, the Spanish Republican Government fell, after a long and bloody and heroic conflict, in which thousands of Americans and British volunteers participated.

Had France, Great Britain, and the United States supplied adequate arms to the Spanish Government, the Franco revolution would have been crushed and World War No. 2 might well have been postponed or indefinitely held in abeyance.

Mr. Speaker, we continue to appease Spain. The Prime Minister of Great Britain rebukes those of us who have had the audacity to suggest that, in a war, which we are told is a world uprising against fascism, we are only concerned with one kind of fascism, and that, in fact, other forms of fascism should be endured, if not actually aided and abetted. Thus, for the sake of expediency, we have justified our partnership with Badoglia and the King of Italy, with King George of Greece, with King Peter of Yugoslavia, with Vichy, France, for 30 months after the Republic of France collapsed. We accept Finland as a neutral, recognize her legation and Minister in our National Capital, though she is engaged in bloody conflict with our most powerful ally, the U. S. S. R.

We continue to allow Thailand to operate in the National Capital, through diplomatic representatives, though General Chennault's air forces are bombarding the capital of Thailand, Bangkok, constantly; and, unhappily, that country is used by Japan as the jumping-off place and outfitting point for expeditions against our own armed forces.

Furthermore, we grant visas to Americans to travel in Europe and participate in international banks, the majority of whose directors are Nazis. We are about to participate in an international exhibition in Barcelona, sponsored by the Fascist, Franco.

We pretend to believe that Franco is sincere and honest in his promise to reduce drastically his export of war matériel to the Nazis and Italian Fascists. I recall that the Japanese made similar promises before Pearl Harbor and that we were justifying our sale of vast quantities of war matériel to the Japanese by the argument that we must appease Japan and keep them from fighting us, the very same argument we now advance in an attempt to convince people of the logic of our sale of war matériel to a Fascist enemy of the United States, which is using us solely for its own purposes.

Here is an interesting article by Walter Winchell, which discusses the career of Juan March. This article is syndicated by the New York Daily Mirror and appears in hundreds of daily newspapers this week throughout the United States.

WALTER WINCHELL IN NEW YORK

THE LAST OF THE KING MAKERS—JUAN MARCH

Next to A. Hitler, Senor Juan March is the most dangerous man in Europe today. If his name means nothing to you now, it is only because his talent for keeping himself out of the papers is as great as his knack of picking up a dishonest million dollars and his genius for spreading misery in the world. More than any other man—not excepting his pal, Hitler—Juan March was responsible for touching off the explosion called World War No. 2.

Today Juan March, the richest man in Spain, shares control of the Iberian Peninsula with the big boys who own the Nazi cartels. His old, greedy fingers are in the mines and factories that supply Spanish coal, iron, copper, wolfram and mercury to the German war machine. He controls a big chunk of the "neutral" Spanish merchant fleet, which carries Nazi agents and Falangist propaganda to South America and returns with oil and gas for the planes and tanks of the Nazi Wehrmacht. He leases scores of water-front properties to the Nazis for use as secret submarine and refueling bases. March now lives in Lisbon—trying to make London and Washington believe he is a poor, helpless exile.

Juan March's agents and stooges, however, are in Spain—and other places. His lawyer, Tomas Peire, still has an office in Madrid. And one of Peire's partners in this Madrid firm is young Rafael de Jordana, son of Franco's foreign minister. Early in January, Peire and young Jordana arrived in New York on a mission for Juan March. Peire proceeded to hold a number of secret conferences with Gen. Juan Beigbeder, of the Spanish Army. Beigbeder, an old pal of March, worked with the Germans against the French in Morocco in World War No. 1. A year ago Beigbeder came here as a Franco official. Now he claims to have broken with Franco, says he is working for the restoration of the Spanish monarchy. By a peculiar coincidence, this is March's plan.

Peire and Jordana returned to Spain in March, but another old pal of Juan March reached Washington at about that time. He is Luis Garcia Guijarro, the new commercial attaché of the Spanish Fascist Embassy. During the last war, his defense of the German submarines, which were sinking the Spanish ships carrying food to the Allies, got him expelled from the diplomatic service.

Juan March also has a permanent financial agent in Wall Street, one Jose Mayorga. Mayorga made the headlines 8 days after Pearl Harbor was bombed when Federal agents seized the Isla de Tenerife, one of Juan March's freighters, just as it was about to sneak out of New York Harbor with an unlicensed cargo of lubricating oil, airplane silk, and enough radio parts to build 50 military short-wave transmitters. The cargo was confiscated.

The Juan March who is working so hard to bring the Bourbons back to the empty throne of Spain was not born an aristocrat. His love for the monarchial principle was born in 1931 when the people of Spain voted to end the Bourbon monarchy. The first act of the new Spanish republic was to throw Juan March into the clink for wholesale thievery, corruption, and bribery.

Under the monarchy, Juan March had done all right. A bootblack at 12, he became a smuggler while still in his teens. By the time World War No. 1 broke out, March was king of the smugglers in the Mediterranean. He sold oil to the German submarine fleet and peddled a little oil to the British, too. He also sold secrets about the movements of undersea fleets to both sides.

The Last Pirate of the Mediterranean, as a great Spanish writer dubbed him, now began to really expand * * * He became a large-scale shipping magnate, financiar, banker, chain newspaper publisher, textile mill and mine operator, and a great landowner With King Alfonso's backing March became the economic overlord of Spain. March's power to flout all laws came to a halt when the Republicans jugged him. But they neglected to jail every key man in the March empire. Had they taken this drastic step, World War No. 2 might have been averted

Juan March's money was able to stuff enough ballot boxes in Valencia to guarantee the "election" of the jailbird to the Cortes, Spain's Congress. Cortes members enjoyed immunity from arrest. Would have been a nice trick, if it had worked But the Republic proved the election was a fraud—and kept him behind bars. A million peseta bribe to the warden finally got March out on November 3, 1933. He shipped to Paris, where he arranged a coup which put his protege, Gil Robles, in as Premier of Spain. The Gil Robles government in 1934 declared March had been legally elected to the Cortes. As a deputy, March went back to Spain

While March was in jail, the man he admired most in Europe, A. Hitler, became Fuehrer. The Germans needed the raw materials and the military control of Spain as part of their plan of world domination. The Spanish Republic barred their way In February 1936, the people of the Republic voted Gil Robles and his gang out of office. Juan March promptly elected to call the Nazis into Spain—as his partners. The deal was consummated on July 18, 1936—when German and Italian troops invaded Spain and installed the puppet Franco in Madrid. Madrid finally fell to the Axis in April 1939. By September the Nazis moved on Poland, France, and England. At the start the Axis idea had been to keep Spain officially neutral—to keep it from becoming a battlefield But when they realized that Hitler was going to lose this war, March knew that eventually fascism would have to wear a false face in Spain

March and Gil Robles became exiles and enemies of Franco in Lisbon. And now March and his German boy friends are preparing for the return of the monarchy in Spain—a new government supposed to fool the world. The Nazi carteleers plan to set up an Iberno-American federation after the war, with Spain as the heart of a Fascist empire to include Argentina, Bolivia, and other Latin American countries. And March will be their partner.

March today is chuckling over the way characters like Beigbeder are convincing innocents in North and South America that the return of the Spanish monarchy would be a good thing for the United Nations. He feels confident of his chances. But if the master plan March and his German partners have drawn up does succeed, it is an automatic guaranty of world war No. 3 within a decade—with the Western Hemisphere as its battlefield. And there are still some cheerful idiots at large who insist what happens in Spain is none of our business.

Amendment of the Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I wish to state that the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee, of which I am chairman, consisting of 44 Members of the House, has for the past year been giving extensive study to all the problems relating to the production, processing, distribution, and consumption of food. Acting under instruction of this committee I appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency, which at that time had under consideration the matter of extending the life of the Emergency Price Control Act, as amended, which is under consideration in the House of Representatives at this time.

The Republican Congressional Food Study Committee has recommended that the Price Control Act be amended in several particulars. I wish to discuss these proposed amendments briefly.

Several months ago it clearly appeared that the food situation was being seriously bungled by reason of the fact that there were so many agencies vieing with each other in an attempt to control certain phases of the food problem. The Republican congressional food study committee took the position that the only way to relieve this muddled situation was for the establishment of one central agency with full authority to control all food activities from production to consumption.

The committee had prepared and introduced into the House of Representatives a bill numbered H. H. 2739 which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Later by reason of the efforts of this food study committee, H. R. 2837 was introduced and it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. That bill, with some amendments, was recommended for passage by the Committee on Agriculture and has been pending before the Rules Committee for several months.

The following is in effect one of the amendments that the Republican congressional food study committee thinks should be adopted as a part of the pending bill now under discussion in the House of Representatives:

Amendment offered by Mr. JENKINS, of Ohio: On page 12 after the word "emergency" in line 2, add the following:

"(k) That in order to provide full responsibility for and control over the Nation's food program there is hereby established in the Department of Agriculture a War Food Administration which shall be under the direction and supervision of a War Food Administrator appointed by the President and who shall be directly responsible to the President. Notwithstanding any provision of any other law, no functions, duties, powers, authority, or discretion transferred to, vested in, or imposed upon, the War Food Administration or the War Food Administrator by this act shall be transferred to any other officer or agency of the Government, except as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 2. The War Food Administrator is authorized and directed, notwithstanding any other provision of law (including title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941), exclusively and finally to exercise on behalf of the United States, either directly or through such other officers or agencies as he may designate, all powers, functions, and duties conferred or imposed upon any officer or agency of the United States by any law, order, regulation, or directive with respect to the Nation's food program in the United States and its Territories, including the production, processing, distribution, rationing, procurement, requisitioning, allocation of, priorities, storage, exportation, and importation of, provisions of labor and facilities for, and the establishment, maintenance, and adjustment of prices for food and food facilities.

"SEC. 3. The provisions of every rule, regulation, license, and order prescribed or issued prior to the enactment of this act which were included in such rules, regulation, license, or order in the exercise of any power, function, or duty which this act authorizes and directs the War Food Administrator to exercise shall continue in full force and effect until amended or rescinded by him.

"SEC. 4. The provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect upon the termination of title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941, or upon such earlier date as the Congress by concurrent resolution may designate. Upon the termination of this act all powers, functions, and duties which this act authorizes and directs the War Food Administrator to exercise and which have not otherwise expired shall be exercised by the officers or agencies of the United States from which transferred or upon which they are otherwise conferred or imposed by law."

Another amendment proposed by the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee is as follows:

SEC. 3. Nothing in the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, as amended, or in such act of October 2, 1942, as amended, or in any other provision of law, shall authorize the establishment of any maximum price in the case of any of the following perishable fresh fruits and vegetables: grapes, berries, cherries, peaches, pears, plums, apricots, melons, lettuce, and tomatoes. And any maximum price heretofore established in the case of any such fruit or vegetable shall cease to be in effect on the day following the date of enactment of this act.

The third amendment offered by the committee is as follows:

Provided further, That should the President adjust wages or salaries upward in accordance with the above proviso, the Administrator shall at once revise all pertinent regulations or orders issued under authority of the Price Control Act of 1942 in order that said adjusted wages or salaries shall be properly reflected in maximum prices or rentals.

Our committee further recommends an amendment to be placed in the proper place in the bill to the effect that the Administrator shall, when he issues orders, regulations, and so forth, accompany the same by a statement as to whether said regulations, orders, and so forth, have received the approval of his industry advisory committee, and if not, he must state the reason for his failure to receive said committee's recommendation.

The language of said amendment, if applicable to the present law, would be to insert the following after the word "Chairman" in the fifth line from the bottom of page 2 as the Emergency Price Control Act is printed in Public Law 421 of the Seventy-seventh Congress:

The Administrator shall, at the request of the committee, advise and consult with the committee with respect to the regulation or order, and with respect to the form thereof, and classifications, differentiations, and adjustments therein, or any amendments thereto. The committee shall make such recommendations to the Administrator with respect to such regulation or order or amendment thereto as it deems advisable, and all regulations, or orders, or amendments thereto shall, in addition to the "statement of considerations involved" referred to herein, be accompanied by a statement as to whether said regulations or orders or amendments thereto have received the approval of said committee, and if at variance with the recommendations of the committee, the reasons therefor.

Our committee also offers an amendment as follows:

That Public Law No. 421, Seventy-seventh Congress, as amended, be amended by adding paragraph (j) to section 2, as follows:

"No maximum price shall be established, or continued in effect, after June 30, 1944, on any food product not included in the list of food products making up the cost of living commodities as published in the Cost of Living Index of the United States Department of Labor."

Price and Rent Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include a set of resolutions adopted on June 2, 1944, by Local No. 1116, United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America at Newton, Iowa, on the subject of price control and rent control, and I ask to include this set of resolutions in my remarks in order that all Members of Congress may be advised of the action of this large labor organization:

RESOLUTION DEALING WITH PRICE CONTROL

Whereas we firmly believe in the principles set forth in the Price Control Act as sound and the only sure way to prevent inflation; and

Whereas we believe that those who propose to change such act are bent on a problem of uncontrolled inflation in which a few gain at the expense of the rest of the citizens of our country; and

Whereas sacrifices are being made by the men and women in the service of their country, even to the extent of giving their lives; and

Whereas such sacrifices by persons in active service calls for sacrifices on the part of those on the home front to protect the Nation from economic chaos so that those who are fighting may return to civilian life free from the threat of a post-war depression; and

Whereas we believe the present Price Control Act has to a large extent prevented runaway prices and stabilized our economy and therefore should be extended without any crippling amendments and with adequate appropriations for its enforcement: Therefore be it

Resolved, That local 1116 U. E. R. M. W. A., representing 3,000 war production workers, goes on record in support of the present Price Control Act and urge our representatives in both Houses of Congress to support same without the pending amendments and see that appropriations sufficient to enforce the act are provided; and be it further Resolved, That copies of the resolution be sent to our Representatives and Senators and to the press.

RESOLUTION DEALING WITH RENT CONTROL

Whereas the findings of the committee investigating rent control deals primarily with a few outstanding cases of seeming injustices and fails to give facts on the entire situation of housing, rent, and property values; and

Whereas the committee as set up by the Newton Chamber of Commerce was composed primarily of lumber dealers, real estate men, and not individuals as property owners, and failed to give any recognition to the workers and low-income groups in the community; and

Whereas the report indicates a desire on the part of some individuals to raise rents in the community from $10 to $15 per month on dwellings without regards to the ability of the renter to pay; and

Whereas such report fails to give consideration to the fact that large groups of workers have had no increase in wages, particularly white-collared workers, and that many workers are working at wages below the 50 cents which is considered substandard; and

Whereas many industrial workers have had no increase in hourly rates and the increased income comes from an abnormal condition of employment for which overtime pay is received. Such overtime pay may be discontinued by a reduction in working hours thereby decreasing the income of these workers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Local 1116 goes on record endorsing the present program of rent control; and be it further

Resolved, That we firmly believe that the adoption of the recommendations of the committee representing the chamber of commerce would bring undue hardship on those in the lower-income groups of our community; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to all Congressmen from our State or district.

A Suggested Post-War Employment Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents, Mr. John Geissler, has promulgated a permanent thrift plan and post-war employment recommendation, which, I believe, will be of interest to my colleagues. At the request of several friends, I am asking unanimous consent that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Here it is:

A POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT PLAN

(By John Geissler)

FOREWORD

The United States of America may well be classed as a progressive and thrifty nation. In general, we have ascended to a noble and good standard of living. The majority of employed people and farmers are able to have substantial food and comfortable clothing, as well as many of the comforts of life, which only a minority of people in other countries can afford. However, we are confronted with many problems of a very serious nature which require solution. History has told us that the course of progress since the very early days of the previous century has been somewhat wavy with ever-recurring depressions at almost regular intervals. Naturally, as we are constantly picking up speed in every phase of activity, owing to the continual introduction of improved speedy and labor-cutting machinery, depressions come to us at shorter periods. Whether prosperous or depression periods, we have at all times a large army of workable unemployed people ranging from five or six millions in prosperous times to fifteen or twenty millions during the depressed periods. It is safe to say that the average unemployed would be from seven to nine million workers receiving little or no compensation for existence or the support of their dependents. Obviously this army of the people must be cared for somehow. The cost is tremendous; every man, woman, and child is taxed for this cost. It is not only the expense of keeping the unemployed and their dependents in existence, but also the consequence of deprivations. This immense army of people will continue to live. Evil results are many. It is one of the sources that fill our public institutions—penitentiaries, asylums, hospitals, etc.

I heartily approve the efforts of the administration since 1932 in introducing measures to combat the unemployment problem. Much is being done to increase our markets. Consumption and buying power is the base of manufacturing and keeping the manpower busy. Could every family have compensation sufficient to buy the necessities at all times, our markets could be held at top level, and our recurring depressions would be nil. However, this achievement is still a serious puzzle.

By intelligent cooperation between business and Government, business may be promoted to a point where the majority of our workable people will be employed. (Possibly bringing the number of unemployed down to one or two million.) This would be termed "prosperity." Having accomplished this, another question would be how to hold it that way. Now, I wish to define a plan that should it receive recognition and be adopted, would prove a favorable solution to the many problems afore-mentioned. This plan had its inception in 1932 and was rewritten in 1934, then revised March 1, 1939.

THE PERMANENT THRIFT PLAN

THE WORKING MATERIAL

No. 1. The manpower, the army of unemployed. The major factor. An inestimable treasure, now a heavy liability which must be converted into a working asset.

REAL ESTATE

No. 2. In every town, city, and community in the United States we have innumerable parcels of real estate which are either entirely dormant or perhaps at one time have been occupied but now dilapidated and in ruin. The same is true in the counties of every State in the Union. Many farms, by mismanagement, overcropping, without proper treatment, were allowed to deteriorate to such an extent that an individual family is unable to provide a living for themselves. Such farm lands require scientific methods for redemption to normal productivity. There are also virgin tracts, large and small, which are possible to be made into small farms, or where practicable into small homes. All such dormant properties as mentioned form a tremendous acreage. It would be equal to the area of several of our largest States. Putting these properties into habitable shape, would absorb an unlimited volume of the unemployed, thereby returning a good revenue from the investment and giving lucrative income to those employed.

FINANCES

No. 3. Statistics tell us there are huge amounts of capital in bank-deposit boxes or hoarded elsewhere. Also, accumulation of savings invested in long-time bonds or other low-rate interest institutions. Some of these money-holding methods may be safe for the individual holder, but prove to be of no aid for a community.

It is imperative we have adequate ways for people to keep their money safe. But such, or, rather, all moneys, should be kept alive and doing some good publicly. To have a 100-percent loaf of nutritious, healthy bread, we must first have the proper ingredients. Then it must be properly combined to meet with the proper success. The same is also true of a plan of this kind. Now that we have the factors of resource, they are to be so composed as to form an auxiliary to national activities as they prevail.

The first vital feature is to have a head—this, however, is to be in our National Capital—and there originate and maintain a bureau, similar to the F. B. I. These men are to be trained for field work as organizers for local community associations. Such properly established, the following procedure is to prevail.

Capitalizing each association will depend upon what is practical for each individual locality. This may be from ten thousand to ten million dollars. All subscriptions to come from local or otherwise individual investors. The Federal administration to have general jurisdiction over all local associations established. Organizing of each will be governed by rules and regulations as directed by the official field men from headquarters. Each local to have the necessary officers and may draw up by-laws to conform with the basic rules from the head bureau. Investors to have Federal guaranty equal to prevailing rules of banks and loan companies now under such ruling. Locals to establish their own interest rates. Investments also subject to dividend earnings. However, caution must be adhered to, so investment will conform with conditions as they prevail.

REAL ESTATE

Real estate used in this system, as the purpose of this entire plan indicates, is that which is dormant and not marketable, privately. Which would be—dormant city lots, dilapidated premises, also tracts large or small in city or country. Efficient engineers to be engaged to determine how such properties can be utilized to the best advantage.

PURCHASING

Actual values of such properties should be ascertained by the advice of engineers and an appointed committee of each local. Idle properties that cannot be bought at a price that is right a limit of time should be agreed upon as to how long such properties were dormant, then be subject to condemnation and the owners forced to relinquish. Thus, properties in possession of these associations are to be improved with homes and small farms. Homes should vary from two-room houses graduating in size and value not to exceed a total value including premises of more than $8,000. Mostly to be of the smaller cozy type as much as possible. Garden and lawn space should be provided so any members of family with spare time may keep busy and provide table supplies, flowers, etc. Value of farm should be limited to $10,000 equipped.

This plan is not meant to give people out-and-out material presents. Just a grand, most valuable present, which is vital to everyone. That is opportunity. An opportunity to have something to do. Earn his livelihood, a chance to progress and be a member of the revenue producer.

CONDITIONS

As stated there will be homes to fit the condition of everyone. A couple just married, a small family, a large family, an ageing couple, also single persons. The smallest home may consist of a combination living room and kitchen, a bedroom, a bathroom, and basement or woodshed; also, ground for garden and lawns. This type should rent at a rate that a man starting to work at common labor could easily afford to pay.

Homes from this class up to value of $8,000. Homes or farms provided by the association are not to be sold on contracts. All revenues must come from rentals or cash sales. This is to avoid anyone's loss by foreclosures.

One starting employment with association may select a home appropriate for him. He would be entitled to occupancy as long as rent and care of premises are kept up to standard requirements as to rules of association. Should he acquire a growing family and be able to maintain a larger home he would be entitled to exchange his option to a home that would fit his need at that time. The same would apply to a family having occupied a larger home and the family having diminished to a lesser number he could exchange for a smaller place. Sales of homes to be in cash only. One wishing to buy, could accumulate his savings a sufficient amount to acquire a contract from outside interests that would be O. K. Association to have both male and female instructors to help train tenants keep house and premises in the best of condition, also help all members of the family as to planting seeds and taking care of garden. A good book of housekeeping rules should be in every tenant's home.

RULES OF EMPLOYMENT

It is quite natural that the adoption of this plan would require considerable time to reach the ultimate capacity of potential achievement. But from inception it would be of tremendous help in each community as soon as a local association is established. All idle men would be put to work. After associations are in full operation, all unemployed in the community would be absorbed, provided that a moderate amount of public projects were used to take up slack.

In operation of this plan there will be classification of workers, tradesmen of all kinds. Common laborers work for young men just from school or college, also women and girls. The motive is to keep them busy until they can find their place outside. Fairly good wages should prevail but would have to be kept under outside prevailing rates, so as to leave an incentive to find positions in the normal economic life of the community.

Employees of associations, and occupants of association homes would not have to vacate when finding positions elsewhere.

GENERAL REMARKS FOR THIS PLAN

No. 1. Several million people in the United States, now indigents, will earn their keep, being able to buy the necessary food, clothing and other comforts, thus creating markets running into the billions in addition to what is furnished by the normal economic life.

No. 2. It will answer the much needed question of giving ex-convicts a chance so as to reestablish their integrity.

No. 3. It will allow young people to marry at the appropriate time, as to age and other conditions without facing poverty and economic distress.

No. 4. It will provide means of keeping young people busy, and put thousands on the road to success, who would otherwise drift to the degrading and criminal class.

No. 5. With the discipline necessary in caretaking of these association homes, it would raise the general morale of those boys and girls, and add new accomplishments for many generations.

No. 6. Federal cost will be amply reimbursed with the revenues from the additional workers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most infamous articles I ever read appeared in the Times-Herald of yesterday, June 8, 1944, and came from the pen of John O'Donnell. Under the title, "Capitol Stuff," O'Donnell has for months, by means fair or foul, been devoting his talents to discrediting our Commander in Chief. Yesterday, it seems to me, he overstepped the bounds of just common, ordinary decency; and, in my opinion, if his years are extended beyond those lived by Methuselah, will never live down the infamy that the article, in the minds of all God-fearing men and women, will attach to his name.

The article follows:

CAPITOL STUFF

(By John O'Donnell)

Three things have hurt and sorely wounded the fourth-term board of strategy. They have even raised mutterings among the F. D. R. faithful that the once sure and adroit political touch of the President has become fumbling and awkward.

What has alarmed the White House palace guard are these three political errors, each treading on the heels of the other:

1. The President's Monday night radio broadcast on the occasion of the entry of American troops into Rome.

2. The President's prayer, supposedly composed by F. D. R. early Tuesday morning and recited by him over the radio that night.

3. The decision on D-day, in the face of all the emotion of the long-awaited invasion of Europe, of the voters in the ancient Democratic New York City stronghold of the Eleventh Congressional District to reject the New Deal Democratic-American Labor candidate and elect a Republican.

The trouncing handed the Roosevelt candidate in New York City was a simple political fact—significant so far as it reveals the deep anti-Roosevelt bitterness of the voters once they are free to express their opinions in the safety and privacy of the polling booth.

But the resentment created by the two Roosevelt political addresses of Monday and Tuesday has been swift, deadly, and Nation-wide. Lesson No. 1 in the bright lexicon of all politicians is to steer clear of issues of race and religion.

For months one of the worries of the fourth-term candidate is that Roosevelt strength has been drained away from those ancient reservoirs of New Deal political support, the voting power of American Catholics and the political strength in great cities of Americans of Italian descent.

The White House address to be delivered on the evacuation of Rome by the Germans was timed and aimed at the political target of winning back this former Roosevelt support. The White House palace guards are frankly confessing that they have lost the all-out support of Americans of Irish, Polish, French-Canadian, Latin-American, Scandinavian, Finnish descent, along with those from the Baltic republics. But the Italian vote they insisted they could win back.

But from reports now coming back to the Capital, the President's June 5 address was worse than a dud. It backfired right in Franklin's political face.

As a journeyman reporter, we have never felt qualified to read copy on a formal prayer—particularly one which was industriously composed, mimeographed at public expense, and then broadcast on highly valuable radio time. And so yesterday we sought the advice of professionals—Protestant and Catholic clergymen.

They didn't like the spiritual qualities of the Roosevelt prayer. All declared that better and more appropriate prayers had already been written—plain, simple words that best suit the ear of grief and call upon the spirit with the welcome familiarity of old friends. Above all, they objected to the note of grating arrogance in the plea of supplicants—and they didn't like the overtone of politics—even when it was spread out on a global scene.

But if the Roosevelt address on the fall of Rome was a political bloomer, his prayer on the night of D-day was complete disaster. This really has hit F. D. R. where it hurt.

After all, there are going to be more American women voting for President next November than men. The reaction of the mothers, wives, sisters, and sweethearts to the Roosevelt personally composed prayer, with all its bland and smug overtones (probably quite unconscious) indicating that F. D. R. and the Supreme Being were partners in these days of death, was an immediate and shocking feeling of revulsion toward the Big Brain and Golden Voice in the White House.

The gentlest criticism that we heard yesterday from one distinguished Washington clergyman was the observation:

"After all, I thought after listening that perhaps the President was being a bit dictatorial toward God."

Another, reaching back to his memories of Shakespeare, said that the radio voice of Roosevelt reciting his prayer called up memories of a politically minded uncle of Prince Hamlet—a gentleman who had also been a bit ruthless in his efforts to perpetuate ruling power. He quoted:

"My words fly up, my thoughts remain below;
"Words without thoughts, never to Heaven go."

The Washington Post has been a sturdy supporter of the Roosevelt brace-new-world foreign policy and the spiritual spur with which the Lord Franklin furrows the flanks of his political backers.

Both the role of Roosevelt as a self-anointed apostle of the Prince of Peace, the emergence of a political messiah from the mountebank, was too much for the editorial stomach of that journal. Gently, they utter the soft impeachment:

"Perhaps there are some who think the President's prayer might have been still more moving and eloquent had he protested less about the righteousness of our cause and the inflexibility of our purpose—since it is, after all, God who judges causes and disposes of the purposes of men—or had he been content merely to repeat some ancient and hallowed formulary, such as the Lord's Prayer. But doubtless the President was obliged to speak as a statesman as well as an humble suppliant.

"And doubtless, too, there are few of us whose prayers would not be the better for some amendment in the attitude of heart, if not in the form of language, in which they are uttered. * * * One of these days we may discover in ourselves those things which are necessary to all real prayer—humility, contrition, and the sense of dependence upon God, with whom, it is said, all things are possible, and without whom nothing is possible."

Scoffers still scoff; those with faults still throw stones; and to the hirelings of partisan politicians in an election year not even holy prayer, it would seem, is sacred.

Let the scoffers scoff on; the stone throwers keep on hurling their poisonous missiles; and the hirelings of partisan politicians continue to receive their 30 pieces of silver to crucify the political opponents of their masters even though the crucifixion calls for belittling and desecrating holy prayer; and yet, in spite of all the scoffing, the stone throwing, the belittling, the desecration, honesty prompts me to admit that the prayer touched me deeply, and I still thank God that he prayed.

In the House of Representatives, the morning of the invasion, I first heard the President's prayer. It was sent to the House as a message from the President. When the Clerk read the opening sentence of the message, "In this poignant hour I ask you to join me in prayer," I did that very thing, and I am not ashamed of the faith, the need, that prompted me to the act. That night in the quietness of my own room, all alone, I again joined the President in his prayer, and I am not ashamed of the faith, the need, that again prompted me to repeat the act. And, somehow, I am persuaded that the faith, the need, of the American people as a whole, led them, as it did me, to join with the President that night as he prayed for our boys in combat, their mothers, their fathers, their wives, their children, their loved ones, for a speedy victory over our enemies, for the preservation of our Nation, and for a just and lasting peace, until the prayer literally became the voice of this Nation going up in humble supplication to a just and righteous God.

The skeptics, the political assassins, to the contrary, the great majority of our people still believe in prayer, and I rejoice that our present President, like the first President of this Republic, is among the number that so believe. Prayer with our President is nothing new. I remember that fateful day back in March 1933 when our people knew not which way to turn, our President, before assuming leadership attended divine services and prayed. No one questioned his sincerity then. No one thought that his spiritual attitude was that of the Pharisee. With hunger abroad, with millions idle, with banks crashing, we all stood in need of prayer. And, my colleagues, today, with vacant chairs in every home, with millions of our boys meeting in deadly combat the greatest force the gods of evil ever assembled, with the wires and mails daily bringing death messages to further stricken our people, we stand in need of prayer as never before in the history of this Republic. Shame upon those who in this grave hour are so devoid of charity, yea, of just common ordinary decency, that, in order to further their political ends, they will call in question the President's sincerity in leading our Nation in prayer. There are still some things that are so sacred that they are above and beyond politics. From now on I hope that the tongue of the politician may remain silent and the pen of his hireling still when our Commander in Chief seeks divine help and guidance for the people, for the Nation, over which he presides.

Government by Subterfuge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we are experiencing a revolution in the United States. No; it is not one of bloodshed. Nevertheless, what is being done today by the New Deal, under auspices and through the medium of foreign ideologies, is a violation of the very spirit of the American Constitution. The words of that great document are left intact, yet they are cunningly being deprived of their meaning and intent by misconstruction of its provisions by both the courts and the bureaucrats.

Plato 2,000 years ago said:

The States are as the men are; they grow out of human characters.

The United States were founded and grew great and prosperous under the banner of our Constitution which so magnificently reflected the character of the founding fathers and the character of the American people. For a century and a half Americans could proudly claim that the States were as the men were. And all the world looked toward our shores in admiration and with a measure of envy. Our American way of life, our principles of liberty, of free opportunity, of tolerance, became the inspiration that advanced the cause of democratic and constitutional government in distant lands. Our American Constitution, as conceded by every student of events, marks one of the great milestones in human history and in individual liberty.

A quarter century ago we had an agonizing experience in this country. We won a World War and came out of our victory defeated on every major issue of ideals. Wilson's Fourteen Points were scrapped. The Atlantic Charter is being scrapped today. In fact, it is already scrapped. So instead of the peace that seemed within reach, we get a renewed outburst of power politics which will lead us straight into another and still more terrible World War. After the peace of Versailles the American people were thoroughly disillusioned and promised themselves never to be entangled in another European war. They did not look kindly upon internationalism when the strong American economy in the late twenties was wrecked by the economic follies of the peace settlement in Europe. The great depression proved to be more than the American people could overcome. Our attempts to bring back normal conditions were even less effective than those of any of the other 16 more important nations of the world, and as late as 1937 we were seventeenth in point of economic recovery of all those 17 more important nations. This was in spite of the fact that we had greater resources, greater initiative, greater productive capacity. We made the mistake of believing a regimented America could do a job in a way which no other supposedly intelligent nation would even attempt. We are paying and will continue to pay for generations for the folly of trying to lift ourselves out of our misery by methods which have failed whenever and wherever they have been tried. The net result has been more misery.

In times of misery and distress, new prophets arise. They have always arisen when the breadlines formed and the tragedies of unemployment were spreading. It was thus with our people in 1932. It is under such conditions that the revolutionists thrive, and, in fact, get the upper hand. It was due to this that Lenin and his Bolsheviks let loose the bloody orgy in Russia. In Italy, Mussolini marched on Rome. Adolph Hitler seized power in Germany first, and, later, by cunning and force, in Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Luxembourg, Belgium, France, Yugoslavia, Greece, Hungary, and Romania.

In this country, the New Dealers appeared on the stage with their new gospel, which in reality was an imported old doctrine propounded by the German, Karl Marx, radical advocate of socialism and communism. In such days of intense social and political stress, it is a strange fact, known by all countries which have passed through this horrible experience, that a certain type of upper-class revolutionaries appear on the stage, as did Kerenski in Russia, Count Karolyi in Hungary, the Communist, or Nazi lords and university professors of England, etc.; men called "idealists" by their friends, "degenerates" by their enemies; men who deliver the society, of which they themselves form a part, to destruction by the mob in the streets, whether that destruction was accomplished by brutal force or by less painful but just as effective means. Vice President WALLACE has chosen to call this war a revolution rather than a war. As far as constitutional government in the United States is concerned, it must be admitted that he and his revolutionary friends have achieved amazing results from which the American people will suffer greatly.

Plato, who was a very wise man, had this to say about the rise of one governmental system out of another:

> All political changes originate in divisions of the actual governing power.

Twenty-four hundred years ago, a Greek genius could see the truth of a principle and warn his contemporaries against the very same development that is happening today in our own country. Constitutional government is being systematically destroyed and a foreign pattern of government, aping the vicious methods of the great dictators and their bureaucracies, is being substituted. If the majority of the people acquiesce, perhaps under the influence of excitement, the result will be that which James Bryce predicted in 1888:

> Then it matters little whether what is really a revolution be accomplished by openly violating or by merely distorting the forms of law.

The New Dealers have chosen to proceed as far as possible along the latter path and with conspicuous success.

Our domestic revolutionaries violently resent any suggestion that what they are doing to this country is destructive and harmful to the people. On the contrary, they claim their only intention is to help the common man, though they profess little interest in the uncommon man who, by his vision, his enterprise, his untiring energy and indomitable willpower, created the very basis for an American standard of life—a standard such as has been known to no other people in all human existence.

Daniel Webster a century ago knew the fallacy of that kind of argument and warned against those false prophets:

> It is hardly too strong to say that the Constitution was made to guard the people against the dangers of good intentions, real or pretended. * * * There are men in all ages who mean to exercise power usefully—but who mean to exercise it. They mean to govern well—but they mean to govern. They promise to be kind masters—but they mean to be masters. They think they need but little restraint upon themselves. Their notion of the public interest is apt to be quite closely connected with their own exercise of authority. They may not, indeed, always understand their own motives. The love of power may sink too deep in their own hearts even for their own security and may pass with themselves for mere patriotism and benevolence.

Judge T. M. Cooley, writing in the International Review for January 1875, and quoting Edward Livingston, pointed out:

> The gloss of zeal for public service is always spread over acts of oppression, and the people are sometimes made to consider that zeal as a brilliant exertion of energy in their favor which, when viewed in its true light, would be found a fatal blow to their rights. In no government is this effect so easily produced as in a free republic; party spirit, inseparable from its existence, aids the illusion, and a popular leader is allowed in many instances impunity—and sometimes is rewarded with applause—for acts which would make a tyrant tremble on his throne.

Thomas Jefferson saw a particular danger to good government in a concentration of power. He said:

> A single consolidated government would become the most corrupt government on earth. * * * What has destroyed the liberty and the rights of men in every government which has existed under the sun? the generalizing and concentrating all cares into one body. * * * It is not by consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution that good government is effected. * * * I like the organization of the government into legislative, judiciary, and executive.

So did the author of a passage that appeared in John C. Hamilton's The Federalist in 1866, who said:

> The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny.

Roscoe L. Ashley has in the American Federal State described the intentions of the framers of the Constitution in this way:

> The eighteenth century ideal of good government was one of checks and balances. This was undoubtedly due to the belief of the people that individual liberty should be the prime object of government. * * * In order, therefore, to keep the government from harming the individual, an attempt was made to separate the legislative, executive and judicial departments with the intention of balancing them against each other, and making them serve as checks upon one another. * * * The Central Government created by the Constitution of 1787 was the nearest approach to this eighteenth century ideal that ever existed.

Elihu Root, finally, had this to say as a solemn warning to guard the distribution of power to the different departments of government and the limitations upon the officers invested with authority in each department.

> If whatever great officer of State happens to be most forceful, skillful, and ambitious, is permitted to overrun and absorb to himself the powers of all other officers and to control their actions, there ensues that concentration of power which destroys the working of free institutions, enables the holder to continue himself in power, and leaves no opportunity to the people for a change except through revolution.

The preceding series of quotations I have deliberately selected from authors who knew nothing of the New Deal and the Roosevelt administration, but who were wise men with a profound knowledge of human nature and its innate weaknesses. That is the true reason why those old statements now seem to us to reveal almost uncanny prophetic gifts. The truths they spoke then are the guide posts for us now. We must still exercise that eternal vigilance which is the price of liberty or we will risk losing our liberty. That must never be.

Guarding Veterans' Families Against Eviction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. STEVENSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news release which appeared in the Sparta (Wis.) Herald and other Wisconsin newspapers:

WASHINGTON NEWS LETTER

(By Congressman WILLIAM H. STEVENSON)

GUARDING VETERANS' FAMILIES AGAINST EVICTION

There are other benefits arranged by the Federal Government for the war veterans.

Other servicemen's benefits I desire to mention include protection against eviction of servicemen's dependents for nonpayment of rent under the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act. Under this law, evictions for rentals not exceeding $80 a month may be made only on court order and may be stayed for 3 months by the court.

In addition, stays of judgments, attachments, garnishees, in the discretion of the courts, on actions against men during their service or within 90 days thereafter, may be granted. Further information concerning this legal protection is available at the local courthouse or soldiers' relief agent in your town.

The Seventy-eighth Congress during its first session has already enacted several sweeping and vital measures extending liberal benefits and rights to servicemen and women. Those include Public Law No. 10, providing hospitalization, domiciliary care, and burial benefits to World War No. 2 veterans on a parity with World War No. 1 veterans; Public Law No. 13, authorizing renewal of the expiring 5-year level premium term insurance policies by the agent or beneficiary of an insured serviceman who is outside the continental United States; Public Law No. 16, providing for the rehabilitation of disabled veterans, mentioned earlier in this article.

MUSTERING-OUT PAY

Of very direct interest to all discharged veterans in certain categories is the so-called mustering-out pay bill, which provides for payments ranging from $100 to $300, depending on the length and character of service of the veteran. Now that this legislation has become law by virtually the unanimous vote of Congress, veterans eligible for mustering-out pay receive such payments as they are discharged from the service without making the special application required of the 1,300,000 or more veterans discharged prior to the enactment of this bill. Of this number, about 700,000 are believed eligible for mustering-out pay. I desire to make some brief observations for the benefit of these men and women which may help them to expedite their respective applications.

Discharged veterans desiring to apply for mustering-out pay may obtain application forms from your county veterans' service officer. These same forms may be used by Navy, Coast Guard, and Marine veterans. In addition, local veterans' organizations also have a supply of forms, and newspapers throughout the country have printed the official blanks, which are readily procurable.

CERTIFICATE NEEDED

Let me emphasize here that the serviceman must return this application with his original service discharge certificate. Under regulations photostatic copies will not serve the purpose inasmuch as the original certificate itself must be marked with appropriate notations that the serviceman has applied for and has been granted mustering-out pay. This ruling was made in order to minimize duplicate or fraudulent claims, and at the same time expedite payment to the veteran, inasmuch as centralized discharge records will not be consulted for some time following actual payment of these benefits. The applications of all discharged veterans who were inducted from this area must be returned to the Army finance officer, and payment will be made from that office. Veterans should not become concerned if they receive their first check without their discharge certificate returned in the same envelope. The certificate will be sent in a day or two as an added protection against theft. These safeguards were deemed necessary to prevent fraud and misrepresentation.

Status of the Premedical Student

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD DAVIS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, from all theaters of war have come glorious reports from supreme commanding officers and the men in the ranks of all military services, covering the efficient, courageous, and patriotic ministrations of medical officers.

No single group in this country has exceeded the medical profession in the proportionate withdrawal of men from normal pursuits to active military duty; in fact, some communities are now without competent medical men.

In the future, when our country will be called upon to care for increasing medical needs in occupied countries and when the sick and wounded are returned to our shores and the danger of tropical and unusual diseases must be met in our own country, as a result of the war, there will be imposed upon this already overtaxed medical profession, increased responsibilities and demands.

The medical fraternity is rightfully giving serious and intelligent thought to this problem.

In order that the membership of the House may recognize the steps already taken, I have asked permission to extend my remarks and to include an editorial which will appear in the next issue of the American Medical Journal.

It is interesting, challenging, and must be considered by the people of the countries, and by the Congress.

STATUS OF THE PREMEDICAL STUDENT

Under Medicine and the War in this issue of the Journal appears an official statement by the directing board of the Procurement and Assignment Service relative to the present status of the effort to secure a continuous supply of physicians. The condition seems to have reached a stalemate. Apparently the responsibility for action lies now with the Director of the Selective Service System, General Hershey. Several high officials of our Government have indicated their complete sympathy with the necessity for maintaining continuity of medical education on a high standard. Apparently, however, the Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson, and the Secretary of the Navy, James Forrestal, are not sympathetic to this need. They have said in a joint communication that the proposal to place premedical and predental students on an inactive status in the enlisted reserve corps so that they may continue their studies would provide immunity from military service for 5 or more years to a selected group of young men. They suggest, moreover, that the essential in the selection would be the ability of the parents to finance the education, together with the ability of the student to complete the premedical or predental courses and thereafter to qualify for entrance into approved medical or dental colleges.

Apparently the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy oppose granting deferment to premedical students, notwithstanding the fact that it will lower tremendously the number of graduates in medicine and dentistry in the years 1948 and 1949, on the grounds that the armed forces need young men of intelligence with the proper physical qualifications and that the immediate needs of the war for their services ought not to yield to the prospective use of these young men as doctors at a later date. They support this contention with the argument that many doctors at present in the military service will be released by 1948 and 1949.

An alternative suggestion has been that the Army agree to supply qualified premedical students by selecting from young men now in the armed forces those who had previously been engaged in a course of study in the premedical years and who had already completed at least a year of military service. This would, of course, involve selection of medical students by the Army, rather than by the medical schools. It would involve picking out young men from remote areas like the Aleutians, North Africa, and the South Pacific, and transporting them back home.

Up to now, Government officials have apparently comprehended the need for maintaining continuous medical education of a high standard in the United States. Evidently the pressures on them have caused them to abandon this point of view and to gamble on the future of health in this country. The available statistics indicate that persistence in the policy now prevailing will mean disastrous conditions in the years to come. About 3,500 doctors die each year in the United States. If the armed forces are to take 3,330 out of 6,440 in each medical class, leaving the balance of 3,110 to be filled by women and physically defective men, the situation 5 years from now will be hazardous. There will be an actual deficit of physicians coming into the profession each year.

The statement that men will be released from the armed forces by that time sufficient to compensate for the deficit in new graduates shows a complete lack of comprehension of the needs of medical service. Where will our hospitals secure interns and residents? Where will the specialist branches in medicine secure the men who will be willing to undergo 3 to 5 years of additional training to qualify? Who will take care of the veterans in the greatly expanded medical care program of the Veterans' Administration? Who will supply the needs of our allies and, particularly, the people of the liberated countries, where medical schools have been closed and physicians taken as prisoners to take care of the laborers from their own countries deported into Germany? What about the great program of extension of advanced medical education to our neighbors in South America? What about the tremendous needs of China for modern medical aid, which is so strongly emphasized by all of the leaders of our Government? At a time when the whole world is confronted with a need for well-trained physicians as never before, American officialdom is apparently willing to cut off the supply at its very source.

By June, young men now engaged in premedical education will begin to be inducted into the service. Letters pour into the headquarters office of the American Medical Association from leaders in education, from physicians and from citizens everywhere urging that everything possible be done to halt this folly.

The situation has been complicated by the fact that a committee representing the Council of the Association of American Medical Colleges and another representing the American Dental Association have agreed with the Director of the Selective Service System that the taking of young men from the armed forces after they have completed at least a year of military service will be a satisfactory solution to the problem. From this agreement the directing board of the Procurement and Assignment Service, the Council on Medical Education and Hospitals and many leaders in medical education strongly dissent. The statement of the directing board appears in this issue.

The Council on Medical Education and Hospitals is convinced that the plan cannot insure an adequate supply of qualified medical students. The argument has been offered that the Selective Service System was able to carry out a similar program successfully for the supplying of coal miners and copper miners. Anyone familiar with the requirements in the field of premedical education will realize that there can be no analogy between these two situations. The continuing production of physicians of a high standard of education should have precedence because of the fundamental demand for such services at all times by the armed forces and because the needs of our civilian population now and in the future cannot be met by the education of men who are physically substandard and of women. It is, to say the least, uneconomical to spend the time, the effort, and the money necessary to put a boy through a premedical course, a medical course, and an internship when his physical condition is such as to indicate a lessened life expectancy and the possibility of invalidism in the future. Ten years of service to the people at the end of his career will be of far more value from every possible point of view than 10 years at the beginning.

Certainly, this problem is one to which the house of delegates of the American Medical Association should give most careful and serious consideration at the forthcoming session in Chicago. Certainly, it is of sufficient importance to demand that it be taken, if necessary, directly to the Congress of the United States and to the President.

Transportation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address before the Kiwanis Club of Baton Rouge, La., June 1, 1944, by Lewis I. Bourgeois:

Transportation is with us just as sure as death and taxes—not however as negative as that but as definitely necessary as it was to early man who used his back to transport to his cave the fruits of his hunt; as sure as we see it today in the movement of man and material in war or in peace.

We probably rarely think of it but transportation is a commodity which we use more of than anything else in the world. Take the clothes we wear or the food we eat. All of it has been transported some time or other from somewhere to somewhere. Your suit of woolens; it started out as wool on the back of some sheep on the western slopes of the Rockies or the far-off plains of Australia or the pampas of the Argentine. From there many things have taken place. After shearing, first the wool was sorted and baled and transported by cart or truck to rail siding or river port or ocean terminal and again transported for grading, processing, cleaning, weaving, dyeing, cutting, tailoring and selling; then it on your back. During that time it was moved, and pushed and pulled and carried and carted and trucked and railed and shipped and barged around numerous times. Between your movements in your travels, and between home and laundry, it continues to be transported, until it is carried in that last journey from which there is no return.

A good deal of your money is used for transportation—as a matter of fact—you are a big buyer of transportation. Most of the energy of this great country is expended just moving things around.

I was on an inspection tour of one of our large defense plants the other day and I dare say that half of the men and machines within the plant were busy transporting or moving things around. And it took thousands of items moving to that plant to make an implement of war which itself will be moved by derrick, by rail, by barge lighter, by ship, again by lighter and then perhaps by air, to its ultimate destination of destruction of the enemy.

But the normal course of peacetime commerce seeks the cheapest mode of transportation and finds the answer in inland waterway transportation.

In the last half of the nineteenth century we found the rivers dotted with steamboats of every size and description—stern-wheelers, side-wheelers, regular floating palaces, the interior of which rivaled the appointments of any hotel lobby of our great cities. Romance, glamour, tradition lived with the steamboat. In addition, we saw towboats pushing wooden scows filled with coal down to the cities of the lower valley and again slowly winding their way back to the coal-loading ports of the North and the East.

Then came the iron horse, with its highways of steel, following the course of the rivers and tapping the great river cities which the steamboat had helped to build, and gradually the boats disappeared. First, the passenger and then the freighter, so that by the time we first heard the cannons roar over the European Continent in 1914 we could only find a small steamboat here and there, probably hauling apples in the Ohio Valley, and a few towboats and barges moving coal and steel on the Monongahela.

And then the Kaiser sank just one too many of our ships and we were plunged into war. The wheels of industry turned and as they turned materials of war moved; and materials moved so fast that they actually poured toward our embarkation ports; and soon our railroads could not handle all. The yards clogged up with loaded cars from the seaboard to the Mississippi; the ports congested faster than the ocean vessels could load and clear. And so the Government took over transportation. In looking around for every means possible to clear the jam, it was discovered that the river was there all the time waiting to do its share of the job. Rivers that had been idle when all the nations of the world were developing and using their rivers and canals and coordinating them with rail and highway.

Worn-out towboats were bought and corrugated iron and wooden barges were taken over and a barge line was established on the Mississippi between St. Louis and New Orleans, and thus the Federal barge lines of today had its origin. Its first sailing was but a few months before the armistice, and it handled during those few months of that year about 18,000 tons of freight. When the war was over it had a variety of river craft on its hands which seemed well ready for the scrap heap.

However, the leaders of this Mississippi Valley seemed to sense an opportunity for a return of inland-waterway commerce; a commerce which our forefathers developed to make this a great valley, and this river equipment seemed to be just what was needed for a start. And from that start we have seen a quarter of a century of river traffic which has surpassed in volume all of the river-tonnage figures of the century previous.

Down through the years we have seen a constant development of inland water-borne traffic and when the figures are eventually released we will find that the total tonnage has reached proportions far beyond the predictions of those valley leaders whose vision and courage made this commerce possible.

Barge lines are operating today throughout the Mississippi Valley. From the Great Lakes through Chicago, down the Illinois waterway to meet the Mississippi; from the Twin Cities on the upper Mississippi; from the grain metropolis of Kansis City, on the Missouri to its confluence with the Mississippi; from the great industrial cities of the Ohio Valley down that stream to Cairo; all forming a network with the Mississippi, and tapping the Intracoastal Canal which borders Texas and Louisiana, and which reaches to Florida, and on its way connecting at Mobile with the Warrior in Alabama up into the Birmingham steel and coal areas.

The variety of commodities on inland waters covers great numbers; some are peacetime domestic consumer goods, but in the beginning of this great war-preparedness program the river tonnage encountered a drop, and perhaps understandingly so. Material was needed and needed badly and fast movement became a necessity. But soon stock piles began to grow and warehouses started bulging with material and yet those directing the movement of material continued to employ the quicker deliveries of land transportation until there came a realization that the river was there to be used—that the river was there waiting to take its share of the burden of war transportation. Gradually war commodities found their way by inland waters to factory and base and camp and embarkation port and now the importance of inland waterways in time of war as well as in peace is being fully realized and demonstrated again.

Modern towboats, Diesel-powered, twin screw, high horsepower, today push tows of from 8 to 12 barges in 1 tow; some of these barges have capacity as high as 2,240 net tons, so that a tow today may have a total tonnage of as much as 10,000 to 12,000 tons.

Before we opened the intracoastal canal in Texas and Louisiana, it was my experience in 1933 to participate in a traffic survey of potential tonnage to move on that canal. By fairly conservative research we found approximately a half million tons which could be developed. Today, recent figures divulged by the authorities show that over 21,000,000 tons have moved in 1942 on that waterway alone.

Inland waterway tonnage figures announced for the first time since the outbreak of war show that the inland waterways of the Mississippi Valley handled in 1942 over 125,000,000 net tons, an increase of 29 percent over 1940.

The combined traffic moving on all inland waterways, river and canal, was over 146,000,000 tons, and this I am informed does not include that tonnage embracing strategic materials of war or lend-lease.

But probably the two most unexpected developments of inland waterway transportation came about during this war.

This is a war of transportation. This is a war of motorized and mechanized movement. Modern weapons on land, on sea, and in the air consequently must use fuel and the most strategic material of the war today is petroleum and its products. No sooner had the ink dried on the war proclamation, than we began to hear the explosions of torpedoes up and down our Atlantic seaboard and in the Gulf. Enemy subs were sending our freighters and tankers to the bottom at a terrific rate.

Our great industrial eastern seaboard is served greatly by coastwise tankers. It seemed that the subs were concentrating on our tankers and slowly but surely our oil supply in that area began to dwindle and rationing became severe. Not only the motorist suffered but home and fireside suffered, too.

With tankers needed to bring fuel to our far-flung battle fronts, it was inevitable that the service of the coastwise tanker would soon disappear. And so all the tank cars and tank trucks of the Nation were mobilized and thrown into the breach but still that proved insufficient. But the rivers and canals were there—safe from submarine warfare—safe from air attack. Government agencies awoke to this realization and quickly hundreds of dry cargo barges were taken over, converted to oil carriage, and promptly assigned to oil transportation. Immediately contracts were let for new barges and towboats and they were built and are in use now in the movement of oil.

Today petroleum is king of the water-borne commodities and every day we see tows after tows moving from the oil fields and refineries of Louisiana and Texas, moving east on the Intracoastal Canal to the Florida tanks and pipe lines, north to the Birmingham district, up the Mississippi to St. Louis and Minneapolis; up the Illinois to Chicago; over the Ohio to the eastern territory, hardest hit by the scarcity of oil tankers. No other individual commodity has grown in volume as this waterway petroleum traffic. The river filled a need; the river again proved the answer in the emergency. Oil is moving with dispatch, and efficiency, and with economy; oil movement by barge is second only to the ocean oil tanker in economy in the transportation of this comodity.

Another surprising development of water transportation during this war, and in which the river again was the answer, was the construction of floating equipment for war purposes on the upper Mississippi and on the Great Lakes, and the moving of such equipment down the Mississippi to the open sea. Before the war, no one would have dared to predict the building of submarines on the Great Lakes and their subsequent movement to the Gulf. Far removed from coastal attack and even token air raids, shipyards built over a thousand military and naval vessels of considerable size, and river towboats brought them down the river without interruption of channel obstruction by sand bars or ice; brought them down past your city on their way to the Gulf, where they were placed in commission and sent on to the theaters of war in the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Yes; the river is serving the Nation today, and at a time when its need is greater than ever before.

And when the conflict is over and the peace is written, inland waterways transportation will continue to serve the peoples of this great valley, attracting to itself those commodities which are natural to slow but economical transportation; and coordinating and cooperating with all other forms of transportation it will then, as now, always be a potent factor in the growth of agriculture and industry, which ultimately will make of this Mississippi Valley the largest area of prosperity in the entire world.

Extension of the Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and a unique sensation to receive a communication which approaches the problem of extension of the price-control law objectively and without any selfish motives whatsoever. As a part of this extension of remarks I should like to include the following statement, which represents the position on this matter of some of the most outstanding organizations in America:

We, the undersigned representatives of organizations, call upon the Congress to extend the price-control statutes as they are—without any weakening amendment—and to provide the O. P. A. with the funds that are necessary to do the job laid upon it.

For the past 2 months witness after witness has appeared before committees of the Congress, professing support for price control but demanding that the law be amended to give his industry or his product special consideration.

One hundred and twenty-five amendments have been proposed, each one intended to force the O. P. A. to raise prices. While some of these proposals have been submitted sincerely, for the most part it has been a shocking exhibition of greed.

We repudiate these proposals. These men do not speak for us. They do not speak for our men at the front and they do not speak for many businessmen and farmers of this country.

We know many businessmen and farmers in our communities. They are our neighbors. We know they do not wish to profiteer from the war. We know that, like us, they want the line held.

The claim that these amendments will not weaken, but will strengthen, price control, misleads no one. Under the existing law the line has been held for a solid year. What has been done under the statutes during the past year can be done under the same statutes in the year ahead.

And if the law is amended and the line bends and breaks, no amount of talk will stand against the record. The American people will know what did it and who was responsible for doing it.

The Congress acted wisely 2 years ago in enacting the price control law. We call upon the Congress today to reaffirm its wisdom—so completely demonstrated by the record—by extending this law without weakening amendment and by providing the O. P. A. with the funds necessary to do its job.

The Eternal City

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by George E. Sokolsky, from the New York Evening Sun:

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

THE ETERNAL CITY

The fact that Rome is intact, that its historic magnificence has not been reduced to rubble, that the symbols of western civilization blossoming in the religion of our various peoples still stand—that is a triumph that speaks of the miracles that for thousands of years have saved the city on the Tiber. And today this city is important to us not for its Caesars, ancient or modern, but for its association with the religion of God.

One need not be a Roman Catholic to appreciate the importance of Rome. We live in an age of ugly, base materialism, an age in which morals have been debased to the principle that if you can get away with it, it is right. We live at a time when even the ideal of God has been subjected to a degenerative whittling away from a glorious leadership toward the heavenly life to a doctrine that there is no absolute truth at all and that what is one day provable is on that day right, and that what is right today may be everlastingly wrong tomorrow. The industrialization of vast multitudes, the shifting of population from one part of the earth to another, the swiftness of transportation are a few of the causes for the uprooting of individuals from their traditional moorings. But even more, these and other forces have almost succeeded in destroying the one instrument of civilization which is wholly conceived in love, the family as the central unit of society, the core of everything we are and everything we have.

FORCE FOR FOOD

Against these destructive forces making for the enslavement of the spirit of man, poisoning the wells of civilization, reducing man to a statistical entity, a dot on a chart, a thing to be used and moved about and even destroyed in the interest of force and power, stands the symbol of the instrument of God's good. It matters not at all whether one is a Jew or a Protestant, or even if one is utterly without religious affiliation—to all who love God and who recognize that it is the force of religion that moved the western people from the degeneracy of paganism, from the savagery of Thor and Wotan and the droolings of the Druids and a life of murder and rapine to this day when even those who make and fight wars swear that they hate war—all those who recognize the progress of man since Europe has come to know God, must respect and cherish the force for good, even when it has erred, that has come out of the City of God. Rome—the Rome of Christianity—stands as the beacon light against the heavens for that ideal, for the dreams of Micah and Isaiah and Jesus of Nazareth, Jews, it is true, but Jews whose dreams are still unfulfilled by a world that yearns toward their realization.

AVOIDED EASIER VICTORY

I am proud, as an American, that it was my people and my flag that marched into Rome to liberate it. And I am prouder still that those who commanded our troops restrained an impulse to an easier victory by bombing the Eternal City into a mass of unidentifiable rubbish. Perhaps we shall save Paris and Vienna from destruction, and even Berlin, for say what one will of the need for speedy victory, it cannot ever be won if nothing remains of Europe but a desert of destroyed cities and homeless, broken people.

The instruments with which this war is being fought are so horrible in their effectiveness that one cannot be human who does not dread in each day's news the accounts not of what is being conquered but of the irreplaceable that is being destroyed. Only the railroad yards in Rome were completely demolished, and they can be built anew in little time. But who could begin to dream of restoring the walls upon which Raphael and Leonardo da Vinci and Michelangelo spent their souls to the glory of God and man. The Eternal City stands—to remind the erring sons of this earth that their wisdom and genius in this age of efficiency and statistics have yet to reach the beauty and truth of its spirit.

Crippling U. N. R. R. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of June 6, 1944:

CRIPPLING U. N. R. R. A.

The Republican Members of the House on Saturday showed an alarming spirit of partisanship in respect to the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. By what Representative WOODRUM referred to as a strict party vote, they lopped $350,000,000 from the $800,000,000 appropriation sought for that agency by the President. The curtailment can in no sense be considered an economy. The three hundred and fifty million had already been appropriated to lend-lease and would merely have been transferred for U. N. R. R. A.'s use as needed. Besides, Congress is already on record as having authorized an American contribution of $1,350,000,000 to U. N. R. R. A. The effect of the action, therefore, can only be, as Mr. WOODRUM put it, "to cripple U. N. R. R. A."—and to do so as it stands on the very threshold of its tremendous undertaking. The liberation of Rome indicates how near at hand may be the need for its healing efforts.

U. N. R. R. A. cannot do its job with promises—or with promised but unappropriated funds. It must have money with which to purchase the great quantities of food, clothing, farm equipment and repair materials which will be needed to succor the homeless and the hungry and to set the wheels of devastated Europe's economy back in motion. It cannot wait to order these things until liberation is actually achieved. Recognizing this, the British have already appropriated the whole amount of their pledged contribution. So has the little Republic of Iceland. But the United States, the wealthiest and most powerful of the member nations, holds back—and for reasons of partisan politics. To the anguished peoples of Europe whose hopes have been kindled by our promises, this parsimony can bring only dismay and a dangerous disillusionment.

U. N. R. R. A. is the first concrete mechanism for interallied cooperation in the solution of post-war problems. Our adherence to it ought to be wholly divorced from domestic political divisions. The action of the House Republicans is a sorry commentary indeed upon the meaning of the Mackinac declaration to which their party subscribed: "We must aid in restoring order and decent living in a distressed world." It cannot fail to suggest that this declaration was mere lip service to the principle of international collaboration. Clearly the House Republicans have defaulted before the first practical test of their intentions. We hope that the members of their party in the Senate will set aside this sort of partisanship. They must do so if they are to sustain the faith of the world in America's post-war leadership.

General Federation of Women's Clubs Resolutions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday June 8, 1944

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, which is doing an outstanding work in promoting the welfare of our country, recently held its annual convention at St. Louis, and adopted a number of resolutions which are of much interest, not only to us in the Congress but to the Nation at large. I include these resolutions as a part of my remarks, which are as follows:

GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS—RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT ANNUAL CONVENTION, APRIL 25–28, 1944, ST. LOUIS, MO.

NEW RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO AND ADOPTED BY CONVENTION

Alaska

Whereas Alaska has been a part of the United States since 1867 and is a land of great economic potentialities as well as an important link in global transportation; and

Whereas its strategic position is of vital importance in the defense of the continental United States; and

Whereas the people of Alaska are making a magnificent contribution to the war effort; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, urges upon Congress the speedy enactment of legislation that will admit Alaska as the forty-ninth State of the Union.

Presented by:

Mrs. JEFFERSON D. ATWOOD,
Chairman, American Citizenship Department.

Mrs. GUSTAV KETTERER,
Chairman, War Service Department.

Japanese in western coastal area

Whereas powerful groups in the United States have been fighting for the release of Japanese and the abolishment of the evacuation order; and

Whereas if the war with Japan were to cease tomorrow many Japanese would be free to return to the western coastal area without any legislative control: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled April 1944 goes on record as favoring the prevention of the return of any Japanese or Japanese-Americans to the coastal area for the duration and the transfer of control of all Japanese in America from civilian authority to the United States Army; and be it further

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs urges upon the Congress of the United States the expatriation of all convicted, disloyal Japanese-Americans, and that Congress make an exhaustive study, with conclusive action, of every phase of the Japanese problem in America before the close of the war in order to safeguard the future security of the United States.

Presented by:

Mrs. JEFFERSON D. ATWOOD,
Chairman, American Citizenship Department.

Metric system

Whereas the irregular, numerous, unwieldy, and complicated units of weights and measures used in the United States and Great Britain are a hindrance to the teaching of arithmetic, everyday commercial transactions, and world trade; and

Whereas the metric system of weights and measures has only three units—meter, liter, and gram—interrelated and decimally divided like our dollar; and

Whereas the metric system is now used in the United States in science, some factories, jewelry and optical industries, all electrical and radio measurements, athletic events, some hospitals and Government departments, and especially at present in the manufacture of ammunition; and

Whereas the Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry of the American Medical Association has recently decided that henceforth it will use only the metric system; and

Whereas the gradual introduction of the metric system in this country (exactly as it has been introduced in 55 other countries) is feasible; and

Whereas the full adoption of the metric system by the United States would be of great benefit to this country in post-war reconstruction, in promoting international commercial relations, particularly with the countries of Latin America, continental Europe, and Asia; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, endorses legislation in Congress for the Nation-wide adoption of the metric system of weights and measures.

Presented by:

Mrs. HIRAM C. HOUGHTON, Jr.,
Chairman, Education Department.

Mrs. GUSTAV KETTERER,
Chairman, War Service Department.

Nursery schools

Whereas there are approximately five million women in industrial plants today, many of whom have children at home inadequately provided for; and

Whereas the health, habits, and mental attitude of children are developed in the early formative years of their existence: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, earnestly requests the establishment of nursery schools with recreational and handicraft programs, for the duration of the war and 6 months thereafter, and that these nursery schools have qualified teachers and become a part of the educational system of the community and State—provided that, if Federal aid is extended, it will be administered by the States.

Presented by:

Mrs. HIRAM C. HOUGHTON, Jr.,
Chairman, Education Department.

School-lunch program

Whereas the Congress of the United States has made a vital contribution to the health and well-being of the Nation's children through successive allocations of customs duties to move farm surpluses to be used for school luncheon programs; and

Whereas under this program thousands of children have been assured a hot, nourishing mid-day meal at nominal cost, which has been reflected in the improved mental and physical condition of the children as shown by their attendance and scholastic records; and

Whereas Congress in the first deficiency act cut out the $50,000,000 to continue the school lunch program because farm surpluses have all but vanished, and the time has come for direct legislation to take care of the luncheons of the Nation's children, our most valuable national asset: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, petitions Congress to appropriate not more than $50,000,000 annually for a school luncheon program, the administration of such fund to be left to the State departments of education.

Presented by:

Mrs. HIRAM C. HOUGHTON, Jr.,
Chairman, Education Department.
Mrs. HARVEY W. WILEY,
Chairman, Legislation Department.

General international organization

Resolevd, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled April 1944 urges the Government of the United States:

To take definite steps to accomplish the codification of international law;

To further necessary procedure to obtain international commitments to include collective force to prevent or stop aggression;

To cooperate immediately with other United Nations in setting up a United Nations Council now to proceed with the formation of the general international organization in accordance with the principles of the Moscow declaration and the Connally resolution—to the end that important decisions affecting world security and international policies, many of which now seem to be made independently, shall be concerted decisions of the United Nations.

Presented by:

Mrs. NANCY RUPLEY ARMSTRONG,
Chairman, International Relations Department.

Federal expenditures

Whereas Federal expenditures and the growing Federal debt are in such volume as to challenge the financial status of the American people; and

Whereas the ability of our citizens to carry the heavy taxes which are inevitable in the future depends on the healthy, courageous expansion of our system of individual enterprise; and

Whereas the impact of taxation must now directly reach all scales of living and income groups; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, requests the Congress to practice more economy in planning future Federal expenditures, in order to preserve our representative form of government and our American way of life; and be it futher

Resolved, That the Congress employ financial experts to make recommendations for reductions in the most intelligent manner.

Presented by:

Mrs. HARVEY W. WILEY,
Chairman, Legislation Department.

Children's Bureau

Whereas the General Federation of Women's Clubs has fostered and supported throughout the years the aims and purposes of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor; and

Whereas bill H. R. 4663 would remove services to the health mothers and children from the Children's Bureau, which is now constituted for services to the whole child: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, protests any effort which would interfere with the continuation of service to the whole child.

Presented by:

Mrs. HORACE B. RITCHIE,
Chairman, Public Welfare Department.

Policewomen

Whereas the employment of policewomen has shown its value in those communities where the system has been given a fair trial; and

Whereas the point of particular value in the use of policewomen has been in the treatment of women and children who are in conflict with the law; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, expresses its approval of the system of employing policewomen and its support of plans to extend the system to all municipalities where there are cases involving any considerable number of women and children.

Commissioned rank for women in United States Army Nurse Corps

Whereas the Army Nurse Corps has been a part of the United States Army since 1901 and is the only corps without commissioned rank, relative rank having been granted in the last war to meet specific needs; and

Whereas although relative rank has served its purpose of demonstrating that women nurses can fulfill the great responsibilities placed upon them, the time has now come to recognize women nurses on the same basis as women serving in the other branches of the armed forces; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs, in convention assembled, April 1944, goes on record as favoring legislation to give regular commissioned rank to members of the Army Nurse Corps.

Presented by:

Mrs. GUSTAV KETTERER,
Chairman, War Service Department.

Crude oil

Whereas it is a well known fact that the citizens of the United States are faced with a definite crude-oil shortage which will become increasingly acute; and

Whereas the present price of crude oil offers no incentive to the discovery and development of new fields, but an increase of 35 cents for barrel in trade would provide this incentive, increasing the price of gasoline to the consumer 1 cent per gallon; and

Whereas statistics show that raw material prices increased 35 percent from June 1940 to September 1943, while crude oil prices remained stationary, and since crude oil is an important commodity in winning the war; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, hereby expresses its conviction that international machinery must be created for the establishment of a just and lasting peace and the prevention of future aggression, and that the United States in its own self-interest must participate therein.

WAR SERVICE DEPARTMENT AND STANDING COMMITTEE CHAIRMEN OF THE GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS.

Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron

Whereas the Women's Army Corps, the Reserves in the United States Navy, Coast Guard, and Marine Corps, are official in the United States service; and

Whereas women are serving in the Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron, which at the present time has no official status; and

Whereas their contribution to the war effort is of inestimable value; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, requests the Congress of the United States to enact legislation which would establish the Women's Auxiliary Ferrying Squadron on the same status as the other organized women's armed forces.

Presented by:

Mrs. GUSTAV KETTERER,
Chairman, War Service Department.

Conservation of natural resources

Whereas natural resources are indispensable during times of war and peace; and

Whereas emphasis upon judicious use and fullest development of renewable and nonrenewable natural resources will assume greater importance in new and widened horizons in the maintenance of a just and durable peace; and

Whereas there is danger of many nonrenewable natural resources being depleted; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Womens Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, reaffirms its convictions that a comprehensive program for the conservation of our natural resources is necessary through the study of the evaluation of the status of our natural resources of soil, water, forests, wildlife, minerals, metals, gases, fuels, helium, and other renewable and nonrenewable basic raw materials; through work for remedial action that will keep our renewable resources in continuous production, and promotion of measures to safeguard the prolonging of the life of nonrenewable natural resources; and through continued efforts to promote conservation education of adults and school children.

Mrs. T. M. FRANCIS,
Chairman, Conservation of Natural Resources Committee.

RESOLUTIONS PREVIOUSLY ADOPTED AND REAFFIRMED BY CONVENTION

Restricted immigration

Whereas the most serious problem which will confront this Nation in the post-war period will be to provide gainful occupations for war veterans; and

Whereas it has been conservatively estimated that the United States must provide 10,000,000 more jobs than it had in 1940 if the disillusionment and want occasioned by large-scale unemployment are to be avoided; and

Whereas there are indications that efforts will be made to liberalize our immigration laws; and

Whereas the admission of wage-earning immigrants will add to the complexities of our labor problems; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, reaffirms its belief in the principle of restricted immigration and urges the continuation of such a policy.

Mrs. JEFFERSON D. ATWOOD,
Chairman, American Citizenship Department.

Uniform marriage and divorce

Whereas a condition of conflicting, varying laws governing marriage and divorce in the several States has challenged the attention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs for many years; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, supports the principle of uniform regulation of marriage and divorce through uniform State laws throughout the United States.

Presented by:

Mrs. EDWIN I. POSTON,
Chairman, American Home Department.

Character building and crime prevention

Whereas the American home is the keystone of the Nation in the preservation of moral, ethical, and spiritual values; and

Whereas, American women can and must assume the challenge presented by the alarming increase of juvenile delinquency to safeguard American youth, upon whom the future of the Nation depends; and

Whereas a well-coordinated and thoroughly integrated crime-prevention program demands the whole-hearted cooperation of the home, the churches of all denominations, the schools, as well as the social, civic, and commercial agencies in the community with the full participation and assumption of responsibility by youth itself: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, calls upon the national, State, and local agencies to make available on the community level, practical assistance in the form of school character-building programs; sex and marriage counseling courses; vocational guidance; psychiatric and psychological clinics; properly supervised recreational facilities for all age groups, including adult and youth forums for the development of civic responsibility and patriotism; proper control over commercial enterprises which are harmful to youth; adequately staffed socialized juvenile and adolescent courts and socially trained police and probationary officers; and be it further

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs requests its membership to use every available means at its command to secure the adoption and implementation of this program throughout the Nation for the protection of American youth.

Mrs. HIRAM C. HOUGHTON, Jr.,
Chairman, Education Department.
Mrs. HORACE B. RITCHIE,
Chairman, Public Welfare Department.

Federal Communications Commission

Whereas the decision of the United States Supreme Court of May 10, 1943, confers upon the Federal Communications Commission broad and expansive powers, including the right to control business policy and program content of radio stations; and

Whereas the very existence of such power and the constant threat of its exercise constitutes a form of censorship which may interfere with the freedom of speech over the radio and marks a distinct step toward Government control of this great medium of communication; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, asks that Congress thoroughly review the legislation governing the regulation of radio, and specifically limit the power of the Commission to regulate the physical aspects of communication by radio; and that specific provisions be written into the law, to the end that no Government agency shall be clothed with any power whatsoever, over the program content of this greatest of all systems of mass communication.

Mrs. J. WARREN BURGESS,
Chairman, Fine Arts Department.

Pure Food, Drugs, and Cosmetics Act

Whereas the Pure Food, Drugs, and Cosmetics Act, passed in 1906 and amended in 1938, has proved of inestimable value to the American people in safeguarding their health by protecting them against adulteration and misbranding; and

Whereas from time to time efforts are made to evade or violate these principles: therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs, which helped enact this legislation, goes on record in convention assembled, April 1944, as endorsing its principles and upholding its enforcement from attack in every way possible.

Presented by,

Mrs. HARVEY W. WILEY,
Chairman, Legislative Department.

Black markets

Whereas the health and welfare of the people of the United States would be threatened by the breakdown in the national attempt to secure for all our people their just share of the available consumer goods; and

Whereas black markets are now an alarming evidence of a possible breakdown; and

Whereas these black markets constitute also a menace to the legitimate business of this Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, condemns the disloyal practice on the part of citizens in seeking advantage by patronizing such black markets: and, be it further

Resolved, That all persons and agencies possessing powers of enforcement be urged to use all diligence possible in investigation and prosecution of infractions of these laws by consumers and dealers.

Juvenile delinquency.

Whereas the problem of the rapidly mounting rate of juvenile delinquency is confronting every community in the United States; and

Whereas this condition is a responsibility of the forces of the home, the school, the church, and the community: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, urges the formation of committees within the individual clubs, districts, and States of the federation, which shall work toward the coordination of effort of all organizations and agencies of the community interested in the welfare of children and youth, to combat juvenile delinquency through the establishment of such community services as a survey shall prove to be necessary in the local communities.

Strikes and riots

Whereas this Nation and its Allies in the present world struggle have been shocked and dismayed by the strikes and riots which have occurred in this country; and

Whereas serious delays in production of war materials have resulted which threaten the success of the war effort; and

Whereas organized labor has outlawed strikes during the war emergency: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, condemns selfishness of purpose and failure to cooperate in the war effort, in accord with this agreement of organized labor, as unpatriotic and regards inflammatory agitations as sabotage; and be it further

Resolved, That it urges its member clubs to foster a public opinion which will not tolerate such attitudes and practices on the part of any person or groups of persons, but will demand that prompt, consistent and impartial execution of the punishments now prescribed by law be meted out to those proved guilty; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be given to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Labor, the members of Congress, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the National War Labor Board, the American Federation of Labor, Congress of Industrial Organizations, and United Mine Workers of America

International cooperation for peace and post-war planning

Whereas two world wars in a single generation have brought upon humanity immeasurable death and destruction and have demonstrated the urgent necessity of international collaboration for the maintenance of peace and justice among the nations; and

Whereas the United States, after attempting to remain apart from each of these wars, has, in defense of its own security and freedom, been drawn into them at heavy cost in human lives and material wealth; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, requests the President of the United States, the Governors of the several States, and each Member of Congress to use their best efforts to advance the present price of crude oil 35 cents per barrel, and thereby create an incentive for drilling an adequate number of exploratory wells, which will increase our rapidly dwindling crude-oil reserves; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Secretary Harold Ickes, Ralph K.

Davies, and the chairman of the committee on production.

Establishment of an Independence Hall National Historical Park

Whereas the Independence Hall Association, formed as a nonprofit organization, was founded July 4, 1942, by local, State, and National services and civic-minded individuals for the purpose of saving historical structures in old Philadelphia and improving their surroundings; among these being the outstanding shrine of America, Independence Hall, where the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were signed, and where rests the Liberty Bell; and

Whereas Independence Hall and its flanking buildings—old City Hall and old Congress Hall—have been maintained by the city of Philadelphia, not only for the benefit of that city but for the Nation and all the peoples of the world; and

Whereas these famous buildings and the historic square in which they stand have been recently designated by the Federal Government as a national and historical site, and further cooperation from the Government should now be secured: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, heartily endorses the purpose of the Independence Hall Association to safeguard this American shrine, to improve its surroundings by demolition of dangerous and unsightly buildings, and to develop in their places landscaped areas and proper accessories, affording dignified approaches to the hallowed grounds on which are located these and other notable historical buildings, thus enshrining the symbol of freedom and liberty for the world; and be it further

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs urges its members and all citizens to do everything in their power to assist in bringing about this desirable result, and request the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives to give favorable consideration to the establishment of a national park in the old part of the city of Philadelphia, for the purpose of preserving the historical buildings therein.

Mrs. GUSTAV KETTERER,
Chairman, War Service Department.

Community school forests

Whereas conservation education of adults and youth is more necessary than ever before in order to insure the judicious use and fullest development of indispensable natural resources to keep renewable resources continuously productive and to prolong the life of irreplaceable natural resources; and

Whereas war, the great destroyer, has levied heavy tolls upon our rich heritage of natural resources, creating new technologies which often substitute wood and fiber for such products as steel and iron; and

Whereas new concepts of the relationships of natural resources to human welfare are viewed with increasing concern due to the serious depletion and devastating waste of indispensable basic resources: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs, in convention assembled, April 1944, favors the establishment of more community forests in addition to the various federation forests being sponsored as demonstration projects in good forestry, such as school forests, town forests, county forests, and freedom forests, for the development of intelligent citizenship in conserving trees, wildlife areas, recreational parks, watershed protection, and other accruing advantages for economic and aesthetic living; and be it further

Resolved, That we work for the establishment, wherever needed, of school forests which shall be used as conservation laboratories where the pupils may learn not only conservation principles through actual participation in conservation work, but through pride of ownership, the exercise of their personal skills, and participation in community development, may also be imbued with attitudes of civic service and good citizenship.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS, JUNE 1943, AND RATIFIED BY THE CONVENTION

Teaching profession and liberal arts colleges

Whereas the teachers in many public schools are leaving the school system to join the armed services, the Federal Government, and private industry; and

Whereas curtailment of the teaching staff is causing overcrowding of classrooms, elimination of subjects from the curriculum, and the employment of teachers without adequate professional training; and

Whereas the education of future teachers is being disrupted by the discontinuance of many liberal arts colleges: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, reaffirms its stand relative to the maintenance of public education as an essential function of democratic government; and that the educational authorities throughout the country be urged to maintain salaries sufficient to obtain and retain competent teachers; uphold high professional and personal standards for teachers; recognize the teaching profession as essential to the winning of the war and the liberal arts colleges as essential to the winning of the peace as well as the war; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Commissioner of the United States Office of Education, and all Members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Presented by:

Mrs. HIRAM C. HOUGHTON, Jr.,
Chairman, Education Department.

Kindergartens

Whereas the kindergarten is an effective means of promoting democracy since, under the guidance of the trained kindergartner, many young children receive their first opportunities to learn to work and play harmoniously together with others of their own age group; and

Whereas the early formation of right habits and attitudes, as practiced in the kindergarten, is a recognized means of reducing delinquency and retardation; and

Whereas work to secure kindergartens in the public schools of many communities throughout our Nation is still needed: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs, in convention assembled, April 1944, reaffirms its belief in the extension of kindergartens and urges its member clubs to petition their school authorities to provide this educational advantage for the children of their respective communities.

Presented by:

Mrs. HIRAM C. HOUGHTON, Jr.,

Official Pan-American policy

Whereas events of recent years have demonstrated the value and efficacy of the system of international relations that has been developed on the American Continent; and

Whereas the principles that now govern our relations with the other American republics constitute the national policy of the United States, to which both major political parties have contributed; and

Whereas the maintenance of the present system of inter-American relations is essential to the future peace and security of the Western Hemisphere: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, urges the maintenance of the existing machinery and the strengthening of the bonds of friendship and understanding that now prevail between the United States and the other American republics and the preservation of those basic principles of mutual respect, cooperation, and reciprocal assistance that now characterize the system of international relations on the American Continent.

Presented by:

Mrs. NANCY R. ARMSTRONG,
Chairman, International Relations Department.

Reciprocal trade-agreements program

Whereas international trade is an essential element in the intercourse between nations, and satisfactory international economic ties are an important factor in promoting the well-being of peoples and friendly relations among nations; and

Whereas to achieve these ends it is indispensable that artificial barriers to trade be reduced or eliminated, and that economic transactions be conducted with a proper regard for the interests of each party, as well as for the effect on the international community as a whole; and

Whereas the reciprocal trade agreements program of the United States is based on these principles and should contribute to the realization of these economic objectives in the period following the war; therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944,

1. Recommends the continuance of the reciprocal trade agreements program by the Government of the United States.

2. Expresses the hope that other governments will adopt these same principles in their international economic relations not only with this country but with other nations of the world.

Presented by,

Mrs. NANCY R. ARMSTRONG,
Chairman, International Relations Department.

National parks

Whereas the conservation and scenic standards of our national-parks system have been maintained by the United States Government for more than half a century for the inspiration, education, enjoyment, and general welfare of all generations; and

Whereas the necessary standards under which these areas have been selected and administered have been assailed again and again by commercial and selfish interests that lower and break down the national values; and

Whereas the General Federation of Women's Clubs throughout the years has stanchly upheld the excellent standards under which the national parks were established, defending them against encroachment and commercial exploitation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1944, reaffirms its unqualified support of the absolute maintenance of high standards, ideals, and purposes, under which our national-parks system was created in order that the integrity of the national parks may be preserved for all time, not only for ourselves, but for future generations; and be it further

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs urges the enactment of legislation which will reserve to Congress the exclusive right to create national monuments and national parks.

House Approves Numerous Postal Bills—Further Action Expected in Senate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I placed in the RECORD a summary of the legislation which has been approved by the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and which has become law so far during the two sessions of the Seventy-eighth Congress.

My today's statement concerns a number of other bills of interest to the general public and of particular interest, perhaps, to postmasters and postal employees have been considered by our Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported out favorably, and passed by the House. They are now pending in the Senate.

Pending postal legislation passed by the House includes the following bills:

H. R. 2922, BY MR. M'KENZIE, OF LOUISIANA; PASSED HOUSE JULY 5, 1943

To further amend the act of June 25, 1938, entitled "An act extending the classified civil service to include postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, and for other purposes."

The purpose of this proposed legislation is to authorize the Postmaster General to grant leave of absence without pay to postmasters relinquishing their positions to engage in activities which shall have been defined by the lawfully constituted authorities as essential to the war effort, as well as for service in the armed forces of the United States. It would also permit postmasters 38 years of age and over, who are eligible for discharge from the armed forces at their own request, to accept employment in essential work, to be considered, upon assuming such activities, as on leave from their duties as postmaster and eligible for reinstatement thereto, upon application within 40 days after the termination of such essential activities.

H. R. 3688, BY MR. FAY, OF NEW YORK; PASSED HOUSE MAY 2, 1944

To change the name of "watchman" in the Postal Service to that of "post-office guard."

H. R. 3870, BY MR. BURCH, OF VIRGINIA; PASSED HOUSE FEBRUARY 7, 1944

To amend section 214 of the act of February 28, 1925.

The purpose of this bill is to facilitate the administration of cost-ascertainment studies and simplify the accounting for the funds expended therefor by authorizing the inclusion in the regular salary appropriations for the several bureaus of the Department supervising or conducting these studies, sufficient funds to meet the requirements for the work, thus obviating the necessity of making allotments from the appropriation for railroad transportation as provided in the act mentioned. The major portion of the expenses thus incurred are for personal services and not properly chargeable to railroad transportation or other transportation items.

H. R. 3998, BY MR. MADDEN, OF INDIANA; PASSED HOUSE JANUARY 18, 1944

Authorizing payments of rewards to postal employees for inventions.

The purpose of this proposed legislation is to encourage inventions and suggestions by employees which result in improvements and economies in the Postal Service, and to provide for the payment of suitable rewards for same.

H. R. 4033 (SUPERSEDES H. R. 2001), BY MR. BURCH, OF VIRGINIA; PASSED HOUSE FEBRUARY 7, 1944

Relating to the use of the penalty-mail privilege.

The object of this legislation is to establish a method to control the penalty-mail privilege by the executive departments and agencies and the independent establishments of the Government, which has increased over the years to such an extent that it appears necessary that action be taken to prevent its abuse and to exercise control over the volume of such mail in order to restrict it to purposes necessary to essential functions and effective operations of the Government. It is provided that these executive departments and agencies and independent establishments shall receive appropriations for their use of the penalty-mail privilege. Because of the war conditions and the heavy use of mail by the agencies incident thereto, the War and Navy Departments are exempted from the principal provisions of the bill.

H. R. 4517, BY MR. HOLIFIELD, OF CALIFORNIA; PASSED HOUSE MAY 15, 1944

To remove restrictions on establishing post-office branches and stations.

H. R. 4680, BY MR. BURCH, OF VIRGINIA; PASSED HOUSE MAY 2, 1944

To amend an act to grant increases in compensation to substitute employees in the Postal Service, and for other purposes, Public No. 266, Seventy-eighth Congress, chapter 134, second session (H. R. 2836), approved March 24, 1944.

The purpose of this proposed legislation is to correct an unforeseen result in the operation of Public Law 266, H. R. 2836—an act amending an act granting increases in compensation to substitute employees in the Postal Service—whereby the compensation of certain substitute village carriers—approximately 200—would be reduced.

H. R. 4687, BY MR. BURCH, OF VIRGINIA; PASSED HOUSE MAY 2, 1944

RELATING TO ISSUANCE OF POSTAL NOTES

This measure provides for the establishment of a United States postal-note system. Its purpose is to place in operation an inexpensive and safe method for the transmission in the mails of small amounts of money up to $10. Approximately 70 percent of the postal money-order business is for amounts of $10 and less. The postal-note system will be advantageous to those persons who do not have banking and other convenient facilities to transmit money, and will eliminate to a large extent the necessity for transmitting postage stamps, currency, and coins in the mails. They may be sold at a flat fee of 5 cents for any amount up to $10. They are not negotiable. The bill provides that the Postmaster General may fix the fees for such notes at not less than 3 nor more than 6 cents, upon reporting proposed changes to Congress 60 days before effective date thereof.

H. R. 4215, BY MR. MURRAY, OF TENNESSEE; PASSED HOUSE MAY 15, 1944

To extend to the custodial service employees of the Post Office Department certain benefits applicable to postal employees. The purpose of this legislation is to extend to the custodial employees of the Post Office Department—other than charmen and charwomen working part time—certain benefits and privileges now received by other postal employees.

In conclusion, as a member of the committee, and I am sure the others will join in with me, I want to pay tribute to the staff of our able chairman, the Honorable THOMAS G. BURCH. The folks in his office have been on the job steadily and have given us efficient and valuable services at all times.

Anyone interested in knowing the further status of these legislative proposals can secure the information from their own Member of Congress or one of the two United States Senators in their own State.

Address by Walter White, Executive Secretary, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Walter White, executive secretary, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, over the Columbia Broadcasting System network, Sunday, April 30, 1944:

It has been my good fortune during the past three and a half months to travel more than 20,000 miles and to talk with many officers, soldiers, and civilians of our own and other countries in Great Britain, north Africa, Italy, and the Middle East. I have seen the European theater of operations as it prepared for invasion of the Continent. My capacity to observe and absorb has been taxed almost beyond belief by the immensity of production of American factories of war materials, their transportation through submarine-infested waters, and their efficient distribution in preparation for D-day. As Americans one cannot help but be proud of the job done, which belies much of the carping criticism here at home.

It has been permitted me also to see the north African theater of operations over which the war has passed. I have seen the desperate fighting in the hills around Cassino in Italy, where our troops have been momentarily checked by the enemy. And I have seen a little of the fabulous Middle East, where the fighting is not with planes and guns, but intrigue over the prizes of oil and human destinies.

Many disturbing rumors had come from these war theaters and from the Pacific, which I hope later to visit, of friction between white and Negro American soldiers. Both as a war correspondent and as Secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, I was charged with the responsibility of investigating these rumors and recommending corrective action where the rumors were found to be true. Here is what I found:

The majority of American soldiers abroad have been decent Americans interested in but one objective—winning the war as speedily as possible and returning home. A surprisingly large percentage of them—both officers and enlisted personnel—are concerned over the bad name being given to the United States by the friction which some of their number have caused. A gratifying large percentage manifest deep concern about the world problem of race and the necessity of working out a solution to it. Many of these are from the South. But, unfortunately, a highly aggressive and vocal minority has sought to transplant patterns of racial behavior like that of the most backward States of the South to the countries where they have been sent as soldiers to fight a war against Nazi racial theories.

Some of them have sought to poison the minds of British, Italian, north African, and other peoples against Negro Americans. They have told such stories as these: That Negroes are inferior, illiterate, diseased, and savage. Some of them have even used physical violence to prevent the association of Negro soldiers with British, Italian, and other people. They have objected to the use of places of public accommodation such as pubs and restaurants by Negro soldiers.

Such behavior has puzzled and antagonized many of the people of these countries. They have found it difficult to understand why some American soldiers should be so violent in their hatred of other American soldiers, especially when all of them are fighting in a common cause. They have resented the action of visitors presuming to dictate to them who they should or should not invite into their homes or associate with. Many of our allies are puzzled, too, by the American pattern of segregation. Repeatedly I was asked why the United States, fighting a war for freedom, should send abroad two armies—one white and one Negro.

It is particularly unfortunate for America that brawls and other disturbances created by Americans of this type should overshadow the decent behaviour and attitude of the far larger percentage of Americans who did not create scenes. As one American officer phrased it, "Two men having a friendly drink together is not news; while one man objecting to another having a drink in the same pub is news." Col. Carlos P. Romulo, one of the great heroes of the battle for the Philippines, recently wrote of similar repercussions in the Pacific: "When race riots broke out in Detroit and Harlem, Tokyo for days thereafter gave the Orient a lurid picture of racial war being waged in the United States. Such rioting plays beautifully into the hands of Jap propagandists, because they use it to prove what they have been telling the Orientals—that the white people have nothing but hatred for the yellow and brown."

It is difficult to appraise how far-reaching is the combined effect of the episodes overseas of racial friction and what is going on here at home. The news we have received abroad during the past 4 months has been almost universally depressing. It has been of certain Members of Congress pouring forth hate-filled tirades against the Commander in Chief of our Nation, and against racial and religious minorities, as vicious and intenperate in content and tone as any sent out by Goebbels from Berlin. It has been of politics being played on the soldiers' vote bill, and of blatant boasts of filibusters against the anti-poll tax bill. It has been of amazing statements by Governors, Congressmen, and professional hate-mongers against the United States Supreme Court because it outlawed disfranchisement by means of a so-called "white" Democratic primary. It has been of predictions of post-war strife against racial and religious minorities in the United States.

Many American soldiers with whom I talked—both white and Negro—are gravely concerned both by the conduct of some of their fellow soldiers abroad and by the news from back home. Many of them are becoming aware of the need for more information. But when they try to get objective information, they are not permitted to do so. Recently ANDREW J. MAY, Kentucky Congressman and chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, threatened a fight against the War Department if it distributed a factual, nonpropaganda pamphlet on The Races of Mankind, written by two of America's most distinguished anthropologists, Profs. Ruth Benedict and Gene Weltfish. The War Department revoked its plan to distribute the pamphlet.

Fortunately, there are brighter aspects of the picture. In the European theater of operations Gens. Dwight Eisenhower and John C. H. Lee, supreme Allied commander and deputy theater commander, respectively, have issued unequivocal directives and have taken other steps to eliminate the causes of this kind of trouble. They have acted on specific recommendations made to them after exhaustive investigation, and are considering further steps to be taken. Among the latter is the remedying of the condition when I was in England where the overwhelming majority of the Negro troops there were assigned to service units. The importance of this may be seen by contrasting the situation in England with that in an active theater of operations like Italy.

Among the units now fighting in Italy is the Negro Ninety-ninth Pursuit Squadron, which has made an enviable record in dive bombing enemy targets. Three other Negro squadrons, recently arrived on the Italian front, are beginning to demonstrate their effectiveness. One of the most courageous feats now being performed on any battle front is the running of supplies into the Anzio beachhead by quartermaster and trucking units, about 70 percent of them being Negroes, according to Ernie Pyle. The record being made by these Negro soldiers has earned for them respect as fighters. It is also interesting to note that as men approach actual battle and face the dangers of combat, they tend to discard many of the prejudices and preconceived notions they formerly held.

It is startling to find upon returning from war zones that there are still many Americans who believe that the war in Europe is virtually over, and that victory is certain. I found no such illusions overseas. We face a resourceful and fanatical enemy, both in Europe and in the Pacific. The division in our ranks and the fomenting of racial or other antagonisms are postponing the day of victory. They are creating doubt among our allies as to our sincerity when we assert that we are fighting a war for freedom for all peoples. Whoever causes the war to last 1 single day longer than necessary is as much a traitor to our country as one who sinks a troop ship or reveals military secrets to the enemy. If for no other reason than to win the war as soon as is humanly possible and to save the lives of American men—perhaps among them the life of your son—it is imperative that any person, whatever his race, who causes trouble should be stopped. That will be done only if the people of America and their Government stop evading or temporizing with this fundamental question whose solution is imperative if we are ever to have a world of peace.

Electricity Great Help to Farmers During Manpower Shortage and Hereafter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, with farm manpower drastically depleted because of war needs, one thing which greatly has helped the farmer is electricity. Extension of electric power lines to farms in northwestern Minnesota has enabled the farmers to install many pieces of labor-saving equipment and lessened the shock of the labor shortage.

It has been my pleasure to cooperate with the farmers in my district in this respect, and often to assist them in obtaining service through the rural electrification associations or from private or publicly owned companies in the Ninth Congressional District, as well as help them with priority problems involved in getting equipment and material.

At the present time, there are 7 R. E. A. co-ops operating in the Ninth Congressional District area, which I represent, and in the entire State of Minnesota there are 51 associations. Those in the Ninth District are the North Star Electric Cooperative at Baudette, the Roseau Electric Cooperative at Roseau, the P. K. M. Electric Cooperative at Warren, the Red River Valley Cooperative Power Association at Halstad, the Wild Rice Electric Cooperative at Mahnomen, the Lake Region Cooperative Electrical Association at Pelican Rapids, and the Itasca-Mantrap Cooperative Electrical Association at Park Rapids.

A few days ago I received a letter from Mr. Avery C. Moore, secretary of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, with headquarters here in Washington, and because of the important information it contains relative to the R. E. A. program I desire to call it to the attention of the House, readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and especially to farmers of northwestern Minnesota. It follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 8, 1944.

Hon. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: We appreciate having your letter of the 2d and, of course, we recognize your interest in and support of the rural-electrification program.

The agricultural appropriation bill in the first session of the Seventy-eighth Congress, H. R. 2481, provided $22,558,000 for the Rural Electrification Administration. The agricultural appropriation bill in the second session of the Seventy-eighth Congress, H. R. 4443, provided $22,550,000 in the form the bill passed the House, but this amount was increased to $42,750,000 by the Senate. The bill is now before the House and Senate conferees and we are hopeful the House will accept the Senate figures. You will recall that delegates to our second annual meeting at Chicago in March adopted a resolution requesting $60,000,000 for the use of R. E. A. in carrying forward the rural electrification program, and also asked for "sufficient funds to enable R. E. A. to proceed at once with the development of a post-war program."

The Revenue Act of 1943, H. R. 3687, provided for the filing of income-tax reports by the co-ops. It was enacted in the first session and its passage was opposed by some of the co-ops.

The Rankin-Russell bills, H. R. 878 and S. 742, introduced in the first session, are still pending in committee in the two bodies.

Of outstanding importance is the Pace bill, H. R. 4278, which has now passed both the House and Senate. Title V of this bill deals with R. E. A. and will—

1. Extend authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to R. E. A. Present authority expires June 30, 1946.

2. Amend sections 4 and 5 of the R. E. A. Act, providing for interest at the rate of 2 percent on new and existing loans.

3. Extend from 25 to 35 years the period of loans under section 4 of the act.

4. Amend section 3 (b) to authorize the appropriation of such sums as the Congress may from time to time deem necessary for the purposes of the act.

The R. E. A. cooperatives all over the country have supported the Pace bill vigorously and regard title V as a real victory. The bill is now in conference to iron out differences in other sections, but title V remains as passed by the House.

You may be interested in the fact that there are 51 R. E. A. cooperatives in Minnesota. Of these, 35—with 34,797 connected consumer—are members of our national association, Harry Edmunds, of Cedar, Minn., is our director for region 6, consisting of Minnesota and North and South Dakota. Our records show the following R. E. A. co-ops in your congressional district:

North Star Electric Cooperative, Baudette.
Roseau Electric Cooperative, Roseau.
P. K. M. Electric Cooperative, Warren.
Red River Valley Cooperative Power Association, Halstad.
Wild Rice Electric Cooperative, Mahnomen.
Lake Region Cooperative Electrical Association, Pelican Rapids.
Itasca-Mantrap Cooperative Electrical Association, Park Rapids.

You are on our mailing list to receive our monthly bulletin and we assume it is reaching you regularly.

If there is any additional information we can give you, please do not hesitate to call on us for same.

With cordial personal regards, we are

Sincerely yours,

AVERY C. MOORE,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Address by James A. Farley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I present for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an interesting and illuminating address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley at French Lick, Ind., last Monday, as follows:

As I travel throughout the country it is my good fortune to enjoy continually, valuable, and enlightening contacts with men of the business world. Naturally, they are thinking about how future developments will affect the interests they are charged with protecting. Their unquestioning support of the war effort is rivaled only by their questioning doubts concerning post-war developments, and uppermost in their minds is a deep concern over the survival of free enterprise.

Their interest in this very foundation of our American system of economy sources from their realistic appraisal of definite trends that have been manifest during the past two decades. Since the close of the last war, ideologies, previously repugnant to American ideas, have found fertile fields for development within our boundaries and the seedlings have grown fast under the unrealistic encouragement derived from the surface indications of the workability of these planned economies.

The depression also forced this Government to devise instrumentalities to meet that emergency, which devices, when once set into motion, were difficult to terminate. These activities, in the sequence of events, had to be followed by the inevitable regimentation necessary to fight a war. Hence the question which years ago might have been academic and one for solution by the deliberate processes of Government, has taken on serious import as a result of the developments of the last two decades. Thus simple interest has been twice compounded.

I find, too, that when the private-enterprise system is discussed, there is no clear understanding of what is meant. Hardly any group of businessmen can be found in agreement when it comes to setting down a definition. Therefore with those most concerned so much at variance in their understanding of either the scope or limitation of what is encompassed in the term free enterprise, it is not surprising that various other segments of our population, such as agriculture and labor, should find it difficult to think clearly on the subject.

Since we live in a democracy where the majority controls, it is imperative that all members of our population have an understanding of what is meant. To many laboring people, the term private enterprise means that business remains what it was 20 years ago. To many of them it indicates that business is to be privately owned, privately run, and privately operated, solely and wholly for the benefit of the owners and management. The mere mention of the term arouses a suspicion in the minds of the workers that all the gains they have made during the past 20 years, through legislation, court interpretations, and organizations are to be discarded and a return made to the status quo ante.

To many farmers who have likewise made progress and gained certain rights, privileges, and advantages in recent years, the private-enterprise system means the oppressing of the farmer for the rights of labor and business.

To the businessman himself, the meaning of this term runs all the way from the old autocratic czarlike capitalistic system to the more progressive liberality that forward-looking executives have found desirable.

It thus must be apparent that the lack of any uniformity of understanding as to what the terms "free enterprise" or "private enterprise" encompass, aggravates the fear so prevalent today in the ranks of those most concerned with future developments in the commercial world.

The American democracy was deliberately built on a foundation of powers delegated to the Federal Government. So conscious were the citizens of the various States of the importance of protecting the rights of the individual that, 2 years after the adoption of the Constitution, amendments were proposed, and ratified within 30 months thereafter, specifically designating these inalienable privileges of our citizenry.

Thus did our forefathers guarantee to the free people of these United States freedom of religion, of speech, of the press, and the right of petition; the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures; the right of trial by jury; and the right that protects private property against seizure without just compensation.

At the time these inherent rights of the individual were specifically reserved the various associations of persons for mutual profit, protection, or advancement, such as partnerships, corporations, trade associations, labor unions, agricultural cooperatives, either were of minor importance or did not exist at all. Indeed, most of the generally accepted organizaions so important in our present-day society have come into being because of the economic and technical developments that could not have been within the vision of those creators of our fundamental law.

But despite the many changes that have taken place in the century and a half of our development from a struggling group of little frontier colonies to a great empire of States, there has been maintained in the warp of our complex weave of Federal, State, and local laws, a bulwark of protection against the infringement of those basic rights of the individual citizen, the surrender of which no real American will even contemplate.

To briefly define what we are ever ready to fight to protect, I can think of no better phrase than "the American way of life." True, the meaning of these oft repeated words do not connote the same thing to every citizen but they do have a real significance in their every interpretation that is predicated on the pride of those enjoying the privileges they indicate.

These privileges in their essential elements are what make us a free people. They compose the very basis of our liberties. They are the distinguishing factors that set us apart as Americans. Their meaning can best be demonstrated in the simple declaration that under our system of a free government for a free people, every American has a right to live his or her life in any way he or she pleases, so long as any citizen's action does not infringe on the rights of his or her fellow citizens.

Consequently, since the American way of life is predicated on these basic individual liberties, it can only continue to prevail if these liberties are secure.

No inconsistency is involved if some wish to voluntarily surrender the exercise of these rights to an association of mutual benefit, while others, within the limitations of laws enacted by majorities, wish to work out as individuals their own economic situations. Some there are who prefer to have the protection of groups. Others prefer to select their own mode of working and individually make their own terms of employment. Both must be protected in their choice of method.

There are surely in our complex economy opportunities sufficient to make successful the operation of legitimate trade unions without infringing on the heritage of liberty possessed by those individuals who prefer to go it alone.

In business also there is ample opportunity for associated capital to gain the benefits that may accrue from cooperative management without shutting out the opportunities of others who, as individuals, can profit from the fruits of their energy and intelligence. To insist on complete control of any segment of our economy along any single path would be regimentation. To keep open all roads of advancement multiplies opportunities, promotes industry, and encourages incentive in the true American way.

Economic problems, which at the close of this war will be as great, if not greater than, the political problems, the continuation, stimulation, and assistance of business by government will become a prerequisite to our recovery. The fixed charges of government plus the carrying charges of the war debts will necessitate our striving to produce an annual national income approaching $150,000,000,000. Such an achievement can only result from full-time employment. As all are customers, there can be no customers without jobs, and no jobs without customers.

It therefore is necessary that business create jobs, that men will have pay, that the pay may be expended for goods, which will insure the making and the distribution of goods. No group has ever shown greater power, greater capability, and greater skill in the furnishing of jobs, than American business, sourcing from our system of free enterprise.

It is already set up. It only needs for the track to be cleared, the brakes which have been applied during the war to be gradually relaxed, the tax burden to be lightened, international trade barriers to be leveled and world credit and finance to be provided. Then business, lightened of these burdens, can move in the realm of the American way of life as it always has.

I would not have you think for one moment that what I have said here does not mean that business, as well as all other parts of our population, will not be afflicted constantly and continually with problems. They always have and always will be. Problems are ever the rash that irritates the surfaces as a result of the internal forces of progress.

Progress is inevitable. Sometimes it seems to be the one propelling force, placed in man by the Creator, which pushes ever forward and ever upward to bigger and better things. This force, moving within an individual, and within the body politic, constantly calls for adjustment. This adjustment cannot be made easily and speedily. It is a trying and tortuous process but its very irritations are indicative of the approaching solutions, and the passing of each upheaval has always been followed by a compensating calm.

It is erroneous to lay all the problems of business at the feet of government. You have, in your own business, competitive problems where industries chafe each other. You have labor problems within business that call for constant adjustments. You have cycles of depression and prosperity which come and go. You have the changes in taste and style. These all call for patience, thought, and adjustment. These problems, if met head-on, like two locomotives rushing toward each other on the same track, neither giving an inch, will produce disaster. Astute and forward-looking businessmen will accept them as inevitable, and will adjust and compromise, and give and take, and strive to strike a harmonious and reasonable balance for all parties concerned.

There has always been a demand for this type and kind of man. To meet the problems of the impending future, this demand will be greater than ever. The businessman of the future must see clearly, think profoundly, and act wisely. His adeptness in conciliation must be seasoned by good will. Thus motivated, his accomplishments will be limited only by his resources. This Nation composes three groups: The laborer, who works and makes things; the farmer, who works and produces things; and the financiers, the managers, the distributors, and the members of the professions. The first duty of the businessman is to remember that all are customers all the time. It is only after they are customers that they are workers, farmers, teachers, bankers, doctors, lawyers, salesmen, stenographers, clerks, engineers, and so on. The attitude of all toward a customer, actual or prospective, is wholly different from the attitude displayed toward the employee by the boss or toward the boss by the employee. Therein lies a great part of the problem. Let all acquire the attitude of equality toward each other and recognize the interdependence of all on one another, and our problems will be well on the way to solution.

The tastes of a hundred and thirty million Americans vary in scope and degree as do their capabilities. Each is an individualist and wishes to remain so. That is the mark of liberty.

But the very right to be an individualist implies a duty to recognize the individualism of all fellow citizens. The protection of that basic right necessitates respect for law and order. Sourcing from the desire for mutual advancement and mutual protection, and guided by the experience of the century and a half of progress that has marked our country's growth, surely we Americans have no fear of the future.

The darkest days of the present world upheaval have been successfully weathered. The impending victory draws ever closer. No matter how tremendous has been its cost, how great the sacrifices it has entailed, the war has proven the soundness of our American way of doing things. Again free enterprise has met the demands of the holocaust. Again our way of life has been vindicated.

We at home—labor, agriculture, and management—have been proud to have had the opportunity of backing up the supreme fight for the preservation of our Nation being made by the 11,000,000 men and women serving where death stalks and sacrifice prevails. We shall be equally as proud if, when they return, our wartime cooperation shall have developed a pattern that will insure their immediate assimilation into peacetime pursuits that will result in all of us enjoying together the fruits less would be tragic. To achieve the goal, and of victory in prosperous contentment. To do I am confident of its accomplishments, will be truly in keeping with the best traditions of the ideals of a free America.

Increased Postal Money Order and Parcel-Post Rates Provided in Recent Tax Bill Are Wrong

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, increased justification for the position of Members of the House who opposed the Revenue Act of 1943 is to be found in the results of the sharp increase which that bill put into effect in the rates charged by the Post Office Department for postal money orders and parcel post. Postal money orders have for years been the poor man's banking facility and billions of dollars of the country's business has been transacted by this means. Just as the establishment of parcel post under the administration of President Taft was opposed by the vested interests and the express business, so the financial interests have continuously tried to find an opportunity to undermine the use of postal money orders in any way they could. Changes in money-order rates provided in the Revenue Act of 1943 are roughly as follows:

Money orders	Before Mar. 26	Effective Mar. 26
	Cents	Cents
From $0.01 to $2.50	6	10
From $2.51 to $5	8	14
From $5.01 to $10	11	19
From $10.01 to $20	13	22
From $20.01 to $40	15	25
From $40.01 to $60	18	30
From $60.01 to $80	20	34
From $80.01 to $100	22	37

Even sharper increases were put into effect on c. o. d. mailing and insured mail. Completely accurate figures are not yet available from the Post Office Department, but I have been informed by the Department that reports up to the present indicate a substantial reduction in the amount of business being done by the Department in both parcel post and money-order business. There are some post offices where this reduction has been as great as 40 percent. It is, I think, inevitable that the upshot of the whole matter will be to create a very considerable falling off in revenue of the Post Office Department at the very time during this great war when it is important for all Government revenue to be kept at a maximum. A most illuminating commentary on this situation is to be found in the following advertisement published in a local newspaper by a banking house:

With post-office money-order rates increased you save even more when you pay by check. Why not pay bills with your own check? Open a special checking account in this bank. Eight cents for each check issued covers the entire cost. We also sell bank money orders at a great saving to you. Consult the schedule below for costs and savings.

Money order, amount of—	Old cost	Increase	New cost	Money order, bank	Saving
$0.01 to $2.50	$0.06	$0.04	$0.10	$0.10	------
$2.51 to $5	.08	.06	.14	.10	$0.04
$5.01 to $10	.11	.08	.19	.10	.09
$10.01 to $20	.13	.09	.22	.10	.12
$20.01 to $40	.15	.10	.25	.10	.15
$40.01 to $60	.18	.12	.30	.10	.20
$60.01 to $80	.20	.14	.34	.10	.24
$80.01 to $100	.22	.15	.37	.10	.27

I do not think any particular comment on my part is necessary in connection with this advertisement. It more than speaks for itself. In the light of these facts, Mr. Speaker, I am more than ever glad that I voted against the Revenue Act of 1943 and also that I voted to sustain the President's veto of it.

Recent action by the House and its Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads indicates recognition by that committee and by the House itself of the seriousness of this situation, for on May 2 the House passed a bill reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads providing for the issuance of what will be known as U. S. Postal Notes in amounts up to $10 at an original cost of 5 cents for any amount up to $10, which cost may be varied by action of the Postmaster General between the limitations of 3 cents and 6 cents, providing he informs Congress of his action. As I understand it, the purpose of this bill is to fill the gap left by the increase in money order rates and to attempt to restore to the people the opportunities for the use of postal services for transmittal of small amounts of money which has been impaired by the increased money order rates. The Senate has not yet acted upon this bill, but it is my earnest hope that it will do so at an early date.

Appropriations for the Naval Service

REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to read the body of a letter directed by the Bureau of Naval Personnel to the heads of all naval shore activities under date of May 24, 1944. The letter reads:

1. Attention is invited to the substantial reduction in appropriations under the cognizance of this Bureau for the fiscal year 1945. The statements made by the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives in its report on the bill and the statements made individually by members of the committee and others on the floor of the House when the bill was introduced should also be noted. Pertinent extracts from the report of the committee (reference (a)) and from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (reference (b)) are contained in enclosure (A).

2. The total amount appropriated for this Bureau for the coming fiscal year is $24,000,000 below estimated requirements. Furthermore, the amount of field funds that may be used for printing and binding (previously unrestricted) is now not only limited, but to an amount which is about two and one quarter million dollars less than the estimated requirements for the Navy as a whole.

3. The Appropriations Committees of the Senate and the House have consistently displayed a sympathetic understanding of the requirements of the naval service. During the period of the building up of the Navy and the Naval Establishment, the Appropriations Committees have recommended and the Congress has appropriated sufficient funds to meet all essential needs. In this period it has not always been possible accurately to estimate the cost of projects. The fluid military situation frequently made accurate estimates very difficult.

4. In the fiscal year 1945, the Navy will reach its full strength, and consequently the period of unprecedented expansion will end. As the use of personnel within the continental United States is thereafter reduced and cut back, many elements of expense can be eliminated or reduced. Furthermore, further financial economies can be effected by the addressees if they make a more careful attempt to economize in the use of personnel. It is incumbent upon this Bureau now to foresee and plan for diminishing activity just as carefully as it foresaw and planned to meet, during a period of inactivity, the demands for expansion and increased activity.

5. The House committee which initiates legislation on appropriations is determined to keep appropriations within the bounds of necessity. It is the committee's belief, concurred in by this Bureau, that this can be done without impeding the successful prosecution of the war. This is evident from the testimony of the hearings and furthermore, the committee has expressed its belief that it has appropriated sufficient funds for fiscal year 1945.

6. This Bureau will cooperate fully in keeping financial requirements at a minimum. It is not contemplated at this time that any supplemental funds will be requested during the coming fiscal year.

7. In order to effect these purposes, it is directed that no new project be undertaken until it is determined that—

(a) The new project will not duplicate another already established.

(b) Personnel and facilities already on hand cannot be used to meet the need.

(c) The new need cannot be met by discontinuing or reducing an existing project no longer vitally needed.

(d) Approval of the Bureau has been obtained and specific funds have been allocated from a definite appropriation for the new project.

Responsible officers must be alert to reduce maintenance demands, to eliminate projects, to close out facilities and to release personnel both civil and naval as the work load permits.

8. Addressees are directed to survey the maintenance cost of each activity within his jurisdiction and to recommend prior to July 1, 1944, any activity that in his opinion is not necessary in whole or in part and thereafter to advise this Bureau as the situation may change during the coming year. He should also assure himself that the maintenance charges are not only reduced to necessary expenditures but also that they are proper charges against the appropriations of this Bureau.

Mr. Speaker, that indicates a spirit which should make all of us proud of Navy's purpose to cooperate in saving dollars not essential to the conduct of the war.

D-Day Checks Strikes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARY T. NORTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article:

D-DAY CHECKS STRIKES—W. L. B. SAYS INVASION HAS PUT END TO LABOR DISPUTES

WASHINGTON, June 9.—The War Labor Board said today the European invasion had resulted in a general clearing up of strikes in this country.

For the first time since the Board was created in January 1942, not a single strike was before it today. The slates of regional boards over the country were also reported clean, with a few possible exceptions.

The Conciliation Service has only seven cases under consideration, affecting only about 4,000 workers. Normally the service handles 20 cases daily.

Seven cases were before the W. L. B. on D-day, but they have been disposed of. Since June 6 only a few flare-ups have occurred and they quickly died down.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, today called Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower at supreme Allied headquarters:

"National War Labor Board informs me that its docket shows not a single strike in the Nation involving American Federation of Labor unions as of this day.

"Our 7,000,000 members are on the job supporting you to the limit."

Free Ports

REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL DICKSTEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, it was, indeed, gratifying to learn of the steps the President has taken in authorizing the admission into this country of at least 1,000 victims of Hitler and his band of gangsters. In granting this haven of refuge to a small number of the suffering victims of our common enemy, I feel sure we have acted in accordance with the principles upon which this great country of ours was based. In extending a helping hand to our downtrodden brethren abroad we are again demonstrating that this country firmly believes in the sanctity and dignity of human lives.

Knowing the vast resources of this country and the great suffering abroad, I very much regret that the President did not see fit to authorize the admission of a greater number of refugees so as to save these women and children, who are doomed to die abroad; and to set an example for other Allied nations to do likewise. However, there seems to be a growing sentiment throughout the country to have Congress take the leadership in providing for the establishment of free ports to allow bona fide political and religious refugees to enter this country for the duration of the war only.

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ROWE. Does the gentleman feel that that should be done by a Presidential directive or by the Congress?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It can be done by both. At this point I would like to insert an editorial on this subject matter from the New York Times of June 10. Many organizations, labor, fraternal, and religious, have come out in support of free ports and I hope and pray that Congress will take the necessary steps to save as many people as possible:

PORT OF REFUGE

We believe that there will be prompt and generous approval of the President's plan to establish at Fort Ontario, near Oswego, a temporary haven for refugees who may escape from the European nations which are still under Hitler's domination. There is nothing in this proposal that seeks to evade the immigration laws or to disturb existing quotas. It is planned to provide food and shelter for approximately a thousand persons. This is only a tiny fraction of the great mass of homeless and helpless people, of many faiths and many races, who have been victims of the Nazi terror. We hope, ourselves, that more than a mere thousand can be sheltered under an expansion of the present program. But neither those who come now nor the others who may be enabled to come later will come as permanent residents of this country, in excess of the immigration quotas. They will come merely on a temporary basis—as war prisoners come, in fact, or as goods in crates are permitted to enter our "free ports," without payment of customs, if they are simply in transit from one foreign country to another. All that the plan involves is an overnight shelter, so to speak, until it becomes possible either to return these distressed people to their native lands or to find permanent homes for them elsewhere.

This is all that the plan involves, but it is enough to be helpful. For it will encourage other nations to take similar steps and, to the extent that it is generally adopted, it will remove one of the great barriers—a lack of places of even temporary refuge—which have been blocking the escape of Hitler's victims. This is a work of mercy. The President believes it important that the United States should share in it, not through words but through deeds. Every warm-hearted American will agree with him and approve his action.

The plan has nothing to do with unrestricted and uncontrolled immigration. It is simply a proposal to save the lives of innocent people.

Gov. John W. Bricker

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. JONES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I have asked leave to extend an editorial about Gov. John W. Bricker, of Ohio, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because I believe it is a fair statement of Mr. Bricker's stature as a Presidential candidate and a brief picture of the estimable character of the man as shown by his public record and speeches:

[From the Chicago Daily Times of June 3, 1944]

GOVERNOR BRICKER IN THE EAST

Governor Bricker grows in stature as he discusses the issues of the coming Presidential campaign.

One distinction between a politician and a statesman is that the latter has informed ideas and the courage to state them and fight for them. Such a man is bound to benefit by the test of a campaign. It is the candidate who is uncertain about his own principles who is guided by expediency and seeks to trim his sails to the winds of local opinion who has reason to fear open campaigning. Such a man is deflated by the test. His trimming is exposed and the voters are discouraged instead of inspired by his ideas.

The sound political maxim not to waste effort on territory that is hopelessly lost lay behind Jim Farley's famous remarks in 1936, when Alf Landon invaded California, then strongly pro-New Deal, that the opposition was throwing forward passes in the fourth quarter. Governor Bricker might have made this maxim an excuse to stay out of New Jersey. That State was supposed to be in Willkie's vest pocket until Willkie collapsed and, more recently, in the ironic words of the Tribune's Miss Winn, it has been reputed to be pulsating for Governor Dewey.

Governor Bricker did venture into the State, however, and his reception gave further proof of what has been apparent to anyone who has troubled to look beneath the froth of a few international newspapers and a noisy minority of social climbers. Americans in the East are no different from Americans in the Middle West, the South, or the Far West.

Governor Bricker did not pull his punches to fit the toadying internationalism that has been erroneously imputed to the majority of easterners. He told the voters in New Jersey the same thing that he has told the voters of the Middle West—that if there is to be an international police force capable of maintaining world order the majority of the policemen will be American boys; that while America must cooperate with other nations, we likewise have the power and right to insist that other nations cooperate with us. Cooperation cannot be one-sided.

The primary purpose of a national political convention is to select the best candidate that the party can offer for the Presidency. The Presidential candidate is often, and accurately, referred to as the standard bearer of the party. Not only does control of the national administration depend upon his leadership in the campaign but to a great extent victory in the thousands of other contests for State and local office. The delegates to the convention are the leaders of the State and local organizations of their party. They are interested, and properly so, not only in winning in the Nation but also in winning in their own areas.

The Republican delegates who gather in Chicago cannot fail to be aware of the leadership that Governor Bricker promises through his demonstrated ability to discuss the campaign issues honestly and courageously. Since the Governor has increased the tempo of his speaking engagements, Mr. Roosevelt has attempted to assure the country that he will refrain from committing the United States to any scheme of extreme internationalism or supergovernment. The value of any such assurance is naturally questionable, but there can be little doubt that the President was forced to it by the progress that Governor Bricker has been making as the only avowed candidate for the Republican nomination.

Louisiana's General Chennault

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, Louisiana is proud of Gen. Claire Lee Chennault. As leader of the Flying Tigers in China, Chennault has spread the story of American flying skill and valor across the flaming skies of China. As head of the Fourteenth Air Force, he has made known to discouraged and war-worn peoples of China the full meaning of the efficiency and power and protection of the Army Air Forces.

General Chennault is a native of north Louisiana where he still retains his home. He is the father of seven children, and is true to the spirit and courage of his native State.

I ask permission to reprint below, a short article appearing in the May 27, 1944, issue of Life magazine:

LOUISIANA'S GENERAL CHENNAULT

The final tragic side of an airman in wartime is the fight. Having mastered his plane and all weathers, he must learn to kill and fly home again. Killing in the air is an intricate skill, and there is no greater student of it than Claire Lee Chennault.

There is little of the spit-and-polish soldier in Claire Chennault. If he struts, it is because he has a tense spine, bowed legs, and a bitter spirit. During the Flying Tigers' early battles, when he was both studying and teaching tactics, he would go up into the control tower at Toungoo field dressed in a pair of shorts, a short-sleeved white shirt, and a battered felt hat, and he would dictate to a stenographer his comments on each pilot's way of fighting. Later he would sit down with each man, like a colleague rather than a commander, and would rub out the soft spots and help make another perfect fighter.

This informal soldier is bitter because he has always had to fight for what he believed. As a young man he was appointed teacher in the toughest school in backwoods Louisiana. He believed in discipline and whenever the big Athens boys got obstreperous, Chennault asked them to step out into the yard. Soon order came to the school.

When he first applied for flight training, he was turned down with the comment: "Does not possess necessary qualifications to be a successful aviator." But within 3 months he had fought his way to acceptance.

As a military man, he has consistently gone to bat for the men of his command, but he has also fought against them when it seemed right. When 30 of his 34 A. V. G. pilots handed in resignations in April 1942, because they felt they were being expended needlessly by Chennault, he called them in and said: "Under the Articles of War, the punishment for desertion in the face of the enemy is death. Think it over." They did.

His great work has been his fight for fighters, as opposed to bombers. He was the Billy Mitchell of pursuit. But his deafness made him resign from the Army in 1937, and it was not till he went to China as aviation adviser to the Chiangs and later formed the A. V. G. that his theories proved themselves. Now the Army has taken him back, and whether they know it or not, fighter pilots all over the world learn Claire Chennault's bitter lessons. They learn the three basic Chennault rules:

Be flexible: Chennault taught his Flying Tigers one set of tactics when they opposed the Zero with the heavy P–40—essentially dive, squirt, pass, run. But he said, "If we had Zeros, we would change our tactics and beat the Japs flying P–40's." And he would.

Be a team: Chennault's men on a flying trapeze were such a team that they could tie their planes together with short lengths of string, take off, go through brazen maneuvers, and land with the strings unbroken. In war Chennault devised the two-plane element rather than the V of three as the most efficient team.

Know your strength. In the bamboo barracks at Toungoo he would say: "Each type of plane has its strong points and weaknesses. The pilot who can turn his advantages against the enemy's weakness will win every time." Chennault used pencil and paper, blackboard and chalk, persuasion and the graceful hand movements of a pilot talking about planes to show his men their peculiar strengths and the enemy's weaknesses.

He fought the Army to put increased firepower in their two-gun fighters, but they would not give way until the Russians came out in Spain with four fixed guns firing synchronously through the whirring propeller. He fought for fighters dropping "frag" bombs on bombers. He fought for paratroopers, for more emphasis on markmanship, for better warning systems in days before radar.

Like all really good fighters, Claire Chennault has a warm, gentle core. There was no rank in his A. V. G.'s; there is no authority except excellence in his Fourteenth Air Force. He has seven children of his own, but Chinese poverty so moved him that he adopted several Chinese orphans. He is a good teacher because, having had a bitter fight in life himself, he is sensitive to other people's troubles.

But he is pugnacious, too, and he certainly looks it. One of his men was asked one day to describe his face. "He looks," the flyer said, "as if he'd been holding his face out of a cockpit into a storm for years." The flyer should have added that he was holding it out there to look for someone in the storm to fight with.

Extension of the Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the preamble of a petition for the extension of the Emergency Price Control Act containing approximately 22,000 signatures. The petition has been filed with the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned, believe that the Emergency Price Control Act, which expires June 30, 1944, has been effective in preventing runaway prices. In the light of what happened during and after the last war—rising prices and collapse, we are determined that the present law be renewed.

We are aware that major threats are being made to the price-control program. Casualty lists cast shadows over all of us. More and more of our sons, husbands, and friends will see active duty in the dangerous months' ahead. Our worries increase. It is unfortunate that in such critical times it is necessary for the citizens of this country to dissipate energy in this fight to renew a program that is so obviously essential for the general welfare.

Price control, like total war, is beyond party. We urge you who represent us in Congress to work aggressively to prevent inflation, and thus strengthen the morale at home and on the battlefront as well. Therefore, we petition you—our representatives—to continue and extend the price-control law without crippling amendments and with provision for adequate funds to strengthen its enforcement.

Back the Invasion—Produce for Victory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES M. LaFOLLETTE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to call attention to the official statement of the Evansville Industrial Union Council, C. I. O., upon the invasion of Europe which has been sent to me as the Representative of the Eighth District of Indiana, and which reads as follows:

STATEMENT OF EVANSVILLE INDUSTRIAL UNION COUNCIL, C. I. O., TO THE PEOPLE OF EVANSVILLE—BACK THE INVASION—PRODUCE FOR VICTORY

Allied invasion of Hitler Europe hastens the day of unconditional surrender and victory over fascism. The men and women of our fighting forces are making the supreme sacrifice to insure that the "four freedoms" will conquer the bloody oppression of Hitler's hordes. America proudly witnesses the triumphant march of her sons in their mission of liberation. Freemen of all lands are fighting today in France against the barbarians. From west, from east, and from the south, Europe is being liberated.

No American will hesitate to make his greatest effort in order to produce and speed the weapons of war to the fighting fronts. The people of Evansville are engaged 100 percent in war production. We want to supply the guns, tanks, ships, and planes to our soldiers in such great numbers that the enemy will be crushed speedily and our sons and brothers will have an early, victorious homecoming. Labor and industry in Evansville will produce without halt the weapons of war. We will not hesitate, we will not slow down or stop our work until victory is ours and the boys are home.

The C. I. O. is urging all of its members to support to the last dollar the Fifth War Bond drive; our members are marching down to the Red Cross blood banks in the hundreds of thousands to give vitally needed blood to our armed forces. The C. I. O. is backing the President in his program of price control and rationing to guarantee that the hardships of war will be distributed fairly among all the people. We have pledged our fullest support to all and any measures our Commander in Chief deems necessary for the successful prosecution of the invasion. Labor is ready to unite with all American organizations to produce for victory.

Men and women of Evansville, no sacrifice is too great, no task too heavy, to back the invasion and help destroy Hitler's gang. In the words of our President:

"Germany has not yet been driven to surrender. Germany has not yet been driven to the point where she will be unable to recommence world conquest a generation hence. Therefore, the victory still lies some distance ahead. That distance will be covered in due time—have no fear of that. But it will be tough and it will be costly."

Back the invasion. Produce for victory.

Extension of Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the immediate need for this legislation arises from the fact that the present Price Control Act and the Stabilization Act will expire on June 30, 1944.

It is essential that these two acts continue in force. The bill now under consideration provides for continuance of their operation for a period of 1 year. By limiting the extension of 1 year, it is not to be assumed that the continuance of the stabilization program after the expiration of that time will not be necessary. During the year of continued operation not only will consumers be insured against an inflationary rise in the cost of living, but Congress will also have an opportunity to observe the operation of the act and its effects and the necessity of its continuance a year hence.

No one will deny that in some particulars the regulations and requirements of the Office of Price Administration in its administration of the act have produced hardships and conditions that justified complaints. However, most of such complaints were based upon conditions arising from administration of the act. Some of the conditions represented, in my opinion, mistakes in administration that should not have occurred. Some have been corrected and promises made for suitable remedy as to others.

Notwithstanding all the complaints made, some justified and others not, the fact remains that without price control the resultant conditions would have been intolerable. Consumers, especially of the low-income group, would have been caught in an upward inflationary swirl that would have caused the cost of living to have gone far beyond the ability of the average family to meet. It is bad enough now, but what would it have been had there been no price control? It is unpleasant to even contemplate the misery and distress that would have resulted?

I am not in accord with the effort being made by selfish interests to break down effective price control by weakening amendments to the act, and thereby permit profit gains through price increases at the expense of consumers—workers in industry and trade, white-collar workers, farm workers, the aged living on meager allotments or pensions, the wives and dependents of soldiers, sailors, and marines who are serving their country, and those dependent upon the limited death benefits received as a result of husband or father having given his life in this or some previous war, and those servicemen and their dependents compelled to exist on the meager allotments or compensation allowed in case of injury in war service. The duty to protect these and others from the ravages of uncontrolled inflation and an ever-rising cost of living would justify measures to strengthen the Price Control Act instead of weakening it.

Furthermore control of prices on materials and equipment produced for the use of our armed forces means control of the cost of the war to the American people. According to Price Administrator Chester Bowles, operation of price control has meant a saving to our procurement agencies on munitions and other war contracts of nearly $65,000,000,000. This means that where between July 1940 and December 1943 we spent $136,000,000,000, we would have spent, in the absence of price control, at least $201,000,000,000. This is people's money. It is the money of holders of War bonds. It is the hard-earned money of the taxpayers of today and of the taxpayers of tomorrow.

Thus, whether the matter of price control is considered from the standpoint of the individual citizen or that of the Government, both being consumers, they are each deeply interested and their welfare requires adequate and effective price control. It is the duty and responsibility of Congress to provide such.

I shall vote to extend the Price Control Act, against weakening amendments, and to provide the funds that are necessary for adequate and efficient administration of the act.

The Curtain Rises

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE E. OUTLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. OUTLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have recently finished reading one of the most worth-while books it has ever been my pleasure to read. I refer to Quentin Reynolds' the Curtain Rises, published by Random House, Inc. The entire book is well worth calling to the attention of Members of this House as well as to the American people as a whole, but on pages 350 to 352 is contained one of the most enlightening statements concerning our war effort that I have ever read. Random House, Inc., has given me permission to quote this material, and I include it here as part of my extension of remarks. May I say, that I commend it heartily as an antidote for partisanship and prejudice.

I've been home for a month now, and for the first time in 7 months I'm completely bewildered. It was a shock to pick up the papers and read columns of criticism of our war effort. Everything I saw in the war zone led me to believe that our matériel was the best in the world; that a military miracle had been achieved in the rapid training of our troops; that our war effort was being handled with a minimum of red tape, lost effort, and inefficiency. I knew that neither General Marshall nor General Eisenhower could wave magic wands and have the ships arrive in the Mediterranean right on time, loaded with just what we needed for combat. I felt that somebody back home must be doing a wonderful job of organization and administration to effect this result. I knew that when an American soldier set foot on an enemy beach he had the best equipment possible. He had everything that human ingenuity could give him to protect himself and to minimize his danger. He even had two ampoules of morphine and a package of sulfa powder in his pocket. His emergency rations were the best ever devised, and they even included something which, to the G. I., is more important than food—cigarettes and matches. Somebody back home must have been responsible for all this. The Army could not do it alone. Yet, from the papers, one would think that Washington was a madhouse, inhabited by certified lunatics, crooks, or shady politicians. It was disheartening, because when you first come home you're so filled with pride at the great job America has done and is doing that you feel like waving a flag. You get so impatient with the snide, petty criticism of our leaders that you end up by diving into the sports pages. You read the most senseless, absurd speeches by some of our duly elected Members of Congress, and you shudder and wonder why they don't inform themselves about conditions before they spout preconceived political convictions. When you return you are laboring under the apparently absurd delusion that we are at war with Japan and Germany. Reading some newspapers, you might be pardoned for thinking that we are at war with Britain and the President of the United States.

I arrived home and immediately went to a quiet resort for a week to catch my breath and to get accustomed to the fact that when you are awakened at night by the sound of an airplane engine you don't have to freeze with terror or look for a slit trench. It takes some time to realize that any plane you hear back home is a friendly one. I tolerated the lovely country resort for a week. Elderly gentlemen dressed each night for dinner and then dozed off in comfortable chairs in the hotel lobby. I felt that every now and then one of them would wake up and stop a passing bellboy to ask, "Is Roosevelt dead yet?" When the bellboy said "No," the elderly, black-tied gentleman would look disappointed and then go back to sleep.

At the resort a man asked me where I lived. I told him I lived in New York City. "How awful!" he said, looking at me sympathetically. "All you see there are Jews."

"I'm used to being with Jews," I told him. "Where I've been lately the place is full of them."

"Where have you been?" he asked.

"I've been with the First Division in Sicily," I said. "Full of Jews. It'll please you to know a hell of a lot of them were killed."

He looked at me and blinked, not understanding, and I walked away because I was afraid that I might get sick or slug him.

This was the America I returned to. Our men abroad deserve something better than a country which is still stupid with reaction and prejudice. There are no Democrats, no Republicans at the front. There are no Protestants, no Catholics, no Jews at the front. There are men in uniform who, at the very best, are giving up a year or 2 of their lives to serve a country they believe in. To paraphrase Tolstoy again, those maggots who continually gnaw at the healthy body of America perhaps can do no permanent harm, but we would be fools to allow them to go too far.

I know no one in America—except the parents and wives and children of the dead—who has as yet been called upon to make any real sacrifice. We suffer some minor inconveniences, but actually the war hasn't touched us yet. It hasn't touched us as it has touched the people of Britain or Russia. I am sure that if we were called upon to make the sacrifices they have made we, as a people, would be equal to our destiny. Whether that time will ever come, I don't know. I doubt it very much. But if the time does come, it may find us unprepared—mentally.

Twenty Million Forgotten Americans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial by John Hanberg for the Daily Calumet of Chicago, Ill., of May 31, 1944:

TWENTY MILLION FORGOTTEN AMERICANS

The great mass of war poor, obscured beneath a flashy layer of war rich, has found a champion in United States Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS, chairman of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. In an article in the June Reader's Digest, condensed from 'the American magazine, Senator THOMAS cites evidence that more than 20,000,000 Americans are living on incomes that have not risen appreciably since Pearl Harbor, while their taxes have increased and the cost of their food, clothing, and shelter has gone up, leaving them, in effect, with a cut in income of from 25 to 50 percent.

Most of these people whom the Senator calls the forgotten men and women are salaried workers who ordinarily belong to no union, and have no experienced negotiators plead their cases. One group, he says, consists of 900,000 school teachers whose salaries average less than $1,550 a year. Then, he finds, there are more than 4,500,000 white-collar workers on public pay rolls, from the tiniest towns up to the Nation's Capital, whose earnings, in spite of an over-all increase, average up to only $118 per month. He also points out that 136,000 clergymen have received little, if any, increase in salary; and nearly a million employees of hospitals are notoriously underpaid.

In the Senator's opinion, the largest group paying more than its share of the cost of the war, however, is made up of workers in offices and stores, and salesmen. He says that a 1943 survey of 351 companies found that salaries for file clerks, typists, switchboard operators, and stenographers averaged $22, $23, $25, and $30, respectively, while the average wage for clerks in department stores in New York is $23. This average, he explains, combines the salaries of workers who are being paid a living wage with the salaries of multitudes who are not, which means that many an office worker is faced with the problem of buying food and clothing on $16.50 a week.

One of the ways in which Congress can help the white-collar worker, the Senator writes, is to increase the take-home pay of those who are suffering real privation by increasing their tax exemption. The take-home pay is what the worker actually has left after 20 percent has been taken out of his salary for withholding tax, 10 percent for War bonds, 1 percent for social security, and perhaps another percentage for a company retirement fund.

Most important of all, Congress should ease the War Labor Board restrictions on salaries in the lower brackets. But it should be made clear that the W. L. B. usually does not oppose raises that bring wages up to 50 cents an hour, and that most employers of 8 or fewer employees are exempt from W. L. B. rulings. Nor has the Board authority over State, county, or municipal employees, or nonprofit hospitals.

Lessening slightly the restrictions on raises will not bring more inflation, he insists. Inflation, writes the Senator, is brought by uncontrolled wasters squandering on luxuries, not by giving a shabbily dressed typist $2.50 more a week, or by increasing the wages of a bank clerk so that he and his family can keep up the payments on their home.

Lidice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New Yorské Listy, Czech daily paper:

LIDICE

(By Stanislav Budín)

We were never there. And yet, we see them clearly.

A typical mining town. A long main street, bordered with snug, miners' cottages. The seventeenth century church. A cheerful garden at the parsonage. An elementary school from which have graduated many generations. During the Republic, a new school was built, a light, beautiful, clean building. Two or three taverns where in the evening, it was so gay and where workers from the Bustehrad railway gathered, and card players played their games. Two tobacco stores where were sold the cheapest cigarettes, and where a legless invalid at about 11 o'clock received from Prague the evening papers, and, a few years ago, the workers' paper, too. At the end of the village was a large estate with a large garden. A mill at the brook. A herd of geese on the village square. In the quiet summer afternoon one could hear the little train thundering into the distant station. Behind the village a little forest, not full of hundred-year-old oaks, but a growth of underbrush on marshy soil.

We don't know anyone from Lidice. And yet, we see them clearly.

Miners. Before sunrise they go to work in the mines, carrying jugs of rye coffee. They have labored in the underground long now and the black dust has settled in their lungs. They return home from work, dirty, soiled, worn-out, but they slowly go their way, discussing events in a worldwise fashion. Nowhere in the world is there a more aristocratic worker. Nowhere in the world are there people who burn more passionately for truth, for justice. Nowhere in the world are there a people who more stubbornly fight for honor. Miners, miners for generations, proud of their proletariat state, haughty, informed, who above everything else in the world, despise treachery.

The miners. Mothers, who bring up their children strictly, who keep their small homes in shining cleanliness, who feed a thousand hungry mouths with one poor slice of bread. The girls, alert, sprightly, who work all day in the factories and in the evening, can dance so gaily. The children, grimy boys, lads and girls with hair like flax, playing on the village square.

And then came the night of the 9th to the 10th of June.

It was a pleasantly cool evening in Lidice, with the smell of the forest and fields in the air. Neighbors were sitting on the porches, talking of the laborious work in the mines, of the small starvation rations, of executions in Prague, remembered old times when a Czech was lord in his own home, whispered the latest news from London, and went to sleep. In Lidice, everyone always went to bed early. Especially today when hunger can be forgotten in sleep.

It was a quiet and silent night. And from the clean and clear sky a hurricane descended on the village.

On the road from Bustehrad automobiles, the panzer armored cars, and tanks clamored. The dogs in the village began to howl anxiously. A hundred and thousand murderers in black uniforms, with the death's head on their caps, surrounded the village, dashed to the mayor's home, dragged him from bed, fired a few rounds from the machine gun at the village square, divided into groups, raided the homes, and with the butt ends of their rifles chased the sleepy, confused people into the streets, with pocket flashlights looked under beds and into the sheds, whether anyone had hidden there, stuffed their pockets with watches, money, and with the butt ends of their rifles broke furniture, with bayonets tore the feather beds.

The cry of the drunken murderers, the wails of women and the weeping of children hung like a pall above the village.

In the light of floodlamps the killers divided the men from the women, the women from the children. Bloody from wounds, the men staggered to one side of the village square. The chin of the old priest shook. The children clutched at their mothers' skirts, but notwithstanding the terrible din, their heartbreaking cries, the murderers with vulgar curses tore them away and pushed them aside.

Horror descended upon Lidice. Machine guns barked. Blood splashed on the ground. The weeping and crying of maddened women and children only stimulated the fury of the murderers.

And then the killers shoved the wailing and fainting women into freight cars and threw the children into others. Again they ransacked the village, chased the livestock from the barns, threw straw around each cottage, poured on kerosene, and set fire to it.

On the morning of the 10th of June, the year 1940, Lidice burned like a torch. The police of the murderers surrounded the village so that no one from the neighboring villages could come near. The bodies of the murdered martyrs smoldered on the village square. Cars full of women and children disappeared in the direction of the German frontiers.

In the castle in Prague, the chief murderer dictated a message which the radio carried to the whole world: "The people of Lidice sheltered murderers, a subversive press, radio stations, large food stores; it is an established fact that the population of the village was in the active service of the exiled enemy. The village was leveled to the ground. Its name erased from the map."

Yesterday, even in Czechoslovakia, very few people knew the name of the village of Lidice. Today it is known all over the world.

Someone said that a day will come and Lidice will again be rebuilt from the ashes and that it will be better and more beautifully built than before. Oh, no. This the Czechoslovak nation will not permit. Adolf Hitler dreamt of a thousand-year German Reich. Thus, here, on the ruins and ashes of the mining town of Lidice, on an earth soaked with the blood of Czech miners and the tears of Czech mothers and children, here on this holy ground will for a thousand years stand a monument to Hitler's Third Reich. Centuries will pass, and perhaps people will want to forget that here at one time a nation of murderers and pyromaniacs stood, that here at one time hangmen and cutthroats ruled. It must not be forgotten. Lidice will stay just as it is today, as an undying monument to the glory and greatness of the German nation. Not Weimar, the seat of Goethe, nor Munich, the seat of Hitler, nor Berlin, the seat of emperors, nor the castles on the Rhine, the seat of thieving knights—no, Lidice will become forever the symbol of the German nation.

So, as sure as there is a God on high, this night of the tenth of June in the mining village of Lidice, must never be forgotten by men.

Unfair Competition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I enclose herewith a petition received from a number of responsible constituents and merchants in Cheboygan County, Mich., in my district, who resent the unfair competition which they are receiving from cooperatives subsidized by the Government which are seriously threatening the successful continuation of their own business, which in many instances represents their life work and the accumulation of their life's savings. It is a matter which merits the most careful consideration on the part of this Congress because if we dry up the source of revenue from the taxes which these small businessmen of America pay, we will not only seriously jeopardize any possible continued support for this type of unfair competition, but indeed will jeopardize the continuation of our form of Government under private initiative and private enterprise.

The petition follows:

CHEBOYGAN, MICH., June 1, 1944.

HON. FRED BRADLEY,
Member of Congress,
Eleventh District, Michigan,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BRADLEY: We realize that under presently prevailing conditions you are deluged with complaints of every type, both real and fancied. However, we do believe that the following is of sufficient importance to justify your consideration:

We refer to an apparently specially privileged group, whose ranks have shown a tremendous increase throughout the country during the past few years. We speak of the cooperatives. It does seem that this increase has been at the expense of private business of the same nature with whom they are in direct competition.

Their path has been smoothed by the preference accorded them in their dealings with governmental agencies. A case in point: A local milling company, privately operated, obtained during the period of August 1943 to January 1944 five cars of Government wheat. Since then no more has been made available to them, nor do they have any assurance that any will be available. This wheat, purchased through the Commodity Credit Corporation, is being delivered regularly to the local cooperative.

The position in which this situation places a private firm with their customers is readily understandable. If this condition continues to exist in one type of business, there seems to be nothing to deter any other group purchasers from going into the same set-up regardless of what the commodity might be.

The local cooperative was set up and organized by two men who are on the Government pay roll, namely, the A. A. A. county chairman and the F. S. A. county supervisor. These men spent considerable amount of time on the proposition the year previous to their commencing business and are also spending a good share of their time at the local co-op plant since opening last September. Also, while organizing, they sent their literature out to the farmers in franked envelopes which, we understand, are to be used for Government business only; and are operating on money loaned from the Government which is, after all, the taxpayers' money. Frankly, we believe this type of organizing should be investigated.

Further, the Federal tax exemptions enjoyed by these associations, particularly now when the tax burden is greatest on private business, adds tremendous advantage. Undoubtedly the Nation cannot exist without a strong and dependable tax structure, but the load must be borne in proportion by all.

The argument avanced by the Cooperatives that they have no taxable profits is weak when it is realized that whether it be a profit to some or a saving to others, the dollar is still there and somebody is not paying their proper share of tax. It would, therefore, appear that private enterprise is being made to pay the cost of subsidization of these associations.

There has been recently set-up in Chicago the National Tax Equality Association whose avowed purpose is to endeavor to correct inequality in taxes, particularly those concerning the Cooperatives. They intend to bring this matter to the attention of Congress, and we strongly urge that you give this your most careful consideration in order that it may be brought before our fellow members at the earliest possible date.

Yours very truly.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN S. GIBSON

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 27, 1944.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Following you will find, and I hope read in full, two speeches I made on the floor of the House this week.

These speeches deal briefly, but frankly, with a matter that is of great concern to every person who has instilled in him an appreciation of the principles and heritages of the Old South, and should be of momentous concern to every person who has enjoyed the blessings and protection of this great democracy of ours.

I know so well where the efforts of this un-American bunch of hoodlums are going to carry us unless they are stopped that I have dedicated myself, so long as I am able to speak, to fight them to the bitter end.

In the capacity I am serving you, I realize I am your spokesman, and after reading these speeches, if you think I am wrong in my convictions and efforts, then I want you to write me and give me your views. If you think I am right, then I want you to give me your full support from time to time as these issues arise.

With every good wish to you and your family, and pledging you to continue a relentless fight against these foes of our Government and the traditions of the Old South, I am

Your friend,

JOHN S. GIBSON,
Member of Congress,
Eighth District of Georgia.

While They Fight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 9, 1944

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, for more than 2½ years some of the finest young men of America have been fighting, suffering, and dying in the uttermost parts of the earth. Now the invasion of Europe has started. Hundreds of thousands of our young men have been wounded and thousands have been killed. Many of them were boys who had never lived as you and I have lived. To those of us who have passed the half-century mark, they were just children. They did not want war. They had no part in deciding whether we should have war. Many just fight, suffer, and die.

More than 5,000,000 of the future citizens of this country, upon whom the very existence of our Nation, to say nothing of its welfare, depended, have been sent abroad and, before this cruel war is over, all too many of them will have been sacrificed to the war god; all too many will lie buried abroad and many—yes, many—will have been utterly destroyed, even their resting places unmarked and unknown. We here at home should be humble, thankful, forgetful of self and selfish ambition.

This invasion means that almost every minute, every hour, of every day, somewhere in this war a life is snuffed out. It means that some mother's son, some brother or some husband, will be wounded, lose a limb, suffer physical or mental injury.

As we contemplate the sacrifices which have been made, which are to be made, upon us should come a deep sense of humiliation, of grim determination, that, while they fight, we will not in thought, word or act, in any manner, fail them, neglect thoughtlessly to do our utmost here to support and sustain them.

No one has ever clearly stated just why humanity must sacrifice itself on the altar of war. All know that greed, selfishness, desire for gain and power, are among the causes of war; that many of the reasons advanced for going to war are not reasons at all, but just excuses which govern and obscure the real reasons. Once committed to war, a people, a nation, find it difficult, if not impossible, to turn back, but all wars end.

We here at home can do no less, as we bow our heads in humble prayer for the success and the safety of those who have gone, who will go, into battle, than search our hearts and minds for some remedy which in the centuries to come will prevent future generations of young Americans being thrown by the hundreds of thousands—yes; by the millions—into wars abroad. We can forget our fancied, personal hardships and complaints, keep in mind what they are doing and let nothing—no; nothing—interfere with our support.

If, when this war is over, we will expend a fraction of the effort which we have put forth to fight and win this war in making ourselves strong, independent, and self-reliant, the sacrifices of those who have given their lives, who will pay the penalty may not have been in vain.

In the meantime, the very least that we can do is to every hour, by our considered action, aid by giving the things they need; by seeing to it that here at home, when the survivors return to their homeland—to them the most blessed spot on earth—they will find not only a welcome but material advantages and privileges which will aid them to forget their suffering, their losses; to go back to homes of their own, where, with wives, children, and friends, they can live as did their forefathers, in peace and prosperity, the memories of this war but as an unpleasant dream.

Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Mr. Lew Hahn, general manager of the National Retail Dry Goods Association:

NATIONAL RETAIL DRY GOODS ASSOCIATION,
New York, N. Y., June 7, 1944.

Hon. J. PARNELL THOMAS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN THOMAS: In response to the Office of Defense Transportation's call for a reduction in passenger transportation the National Retail Dry Goods Association recently, by voluntary action, postponed three important conventions which it had scheduled for this summer.

Instead the president of this association, Edward N. Allen, of Hartford, Conn., and the writer, have just completed a trip of nearly 10,000 miles and personally discussed conditions in many of the cities of the West, the Pacific Northwest, and the Pacific coast with the merchants of those regions.

It is our idea that you will be interested in the following statement which is based upon our direct contacts with several thousand retail merchants.

We found that retailers are doing an excellent job of supplying public demands up to the limit of their facilities during this war period. The difficulties they face in nowise discourages them. The high taxes they are paying they regard as necessary. As one man they are patriotically supporting all of the various war agencies and in most cases their advertising and other facilities are devoted chiefly to the sale of War bonds. Some outstanding stores have advertised no merchandise at all for a period of as long as 6 months. All the advertising space of such stores has been devoted to the Red Cross, the U. S. O., War bonds, and similar objects.

One thing, however, does distress these merchants. That is the unnecessary and unreasonable interference with business caused by the Office of Price Administration's stubborn insistence upon maintaining the restriction of price lines in three important price regulations.

Retailers favor a strong and effective system of Government price control during this war emergency. It is a matter of record that the National Retail Dry Goods Association, and its member merchants, began a voluntary control of prices before the war in Europe was 2 weeks old. To be specific, this campaign was started on September 12, 1939, and was carried on without any help from Government for 2 years. No group would suffer more from a serious inflation than the retailers who must carry costly stocks of merchandise at all times and whose losses at the end of an inflationary period would be prodigious.

Consequently, retailers do not desire any lessening of effectiveness in Government price control. They hold that O. P. A. has been authorized by the Congress to control the prices at which they may sell merchandise and they do not object. In the case of the restriction on price lines, however, O. P. A. presumes to say that one retailer may carry and sell a certain article of merchandise while his competitor shall not be allowed the same right.

Not only is this unreasonable but it actually is contrary to the public interest. Attached hereto you will find a small chart which shows that in those lines of merchandise to which the restriction on price lines applies the advance in prices has been much more rapid and acute than in other lines where this provision does not apply. The chart, however, does not presume to indicate the extent to which, in addition to the advance in price, deterioration of quality also has occurred.

Please bear in mind that this price line restriction applies only to women's and girls' ready-to-wear garments, men's and boys' clothing, and furs. If therefore O. P. A. is to be considered justified in holding that such a provision is a necessary part of price control, it would be difficult to explain why the same provision does not appear in regulations controlling all other lines of goods.

Retailers, as you know, do not produce merchandise. They buy it from the manufacturer and resell it to consumers. Unless the manufacturer who makes the goods is confined to certain price lines and required to produce goods of undiminished quality in those price lines, the retailers cannot have such goods to offer to the public. And unless the public wishes to buy such merchandise, it is wasteful to require manufacturers to make it and to confine retailers to such price lines. In short, the retailer cannot be bracketed unless producers and consumers are similarly bracketed.

The recent efforts of Administrator Bowles to provide relief from the unnecessary exactions of the price line restrictions are in no sense a solution of the problem. They can do nothing at best except to transfer the point of difficulty from one group of retailers to another. As retailers down the scale may be afforded some little relief, such relief can be had only at the expense of retailers a little higher up the scale. There is no solution to the problem except to do away with the provision completely.

Indeed, Mr. Bowles' latest effort to simplify the problem will only make it worse.

Because the O. P. A. folks are so stubborn in their persistence in maintaining this price line restriction provision, retail merchants can do nothing except to petition their representatives in Congress to amend the Price Control Act in such a way as to make this type of regulation impossible.

In view of the extremely earnest way in which retailers have sought to comply with the price regulations, we believe you will see the justice of Congressional action at this time.

It has been suggested that the situation could be adequately met with the following simple amendment:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to require any person to sell any commodity or to require any person to limit his stock of goods or sales to the highest price line offered for sale at any one time, and any rule, regulation, or order inconsistent with the provisions of this subsection shall have no further legal effect."

You will recognize, of course, that not even the Government of the United States could ever hope to control an economy so great and complicated as that of the United States without the sincere and complete cooperation of the men of business. This cooperation retail merchants have gladly given and will continue to give, and we hope you will see the wisdom of requiring O. P. A. to remove this unnecessary and useless barrier to the fair conduct of retail distribution.

In this spirit we invite your support for some such amendment as is suggested above. May we have a reply from you?

With best wishes,
Sincerely yours,

LEW HAHN,
General Manager.

D-Day Puts Sea Power in Focus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by James B. Hutchison:

D-DAY PUTS SEA POWER IN FOCUS
(By James B. Hutchison)

WASHINGTON.—The role of sea power in deciding the ultimate income of wars once again has been clearly demonstrated in the allied invasion of France.

There can be no longer any doubt that sea power is winning World War No. 2 for the United Nations. It was Hitler's reliance solely on a big air force, and well-trained army that cost him victory in the early days of the conflict.

At the Navy Department on D-day, Secretary James V. Forrestal, Admiral Ernest J. King, Navy commander in chief, and Admiral Royal E. Ingersoll, commander of the Atlantic fleet, tersely agreed that the invasion was "a perfect example of the silent working of seapower, and the airpower that goes with it."

The American Navy's Atlantic squadrons, in the past 2 years, have taken more than 7,000 ships across the ocean to England. Only 10 ships were lost, none of which were troop ships.

Without this astounding display of sea power, the Allies now would not have the millions of men and countless materials of war that make the liberation of Europe possible.

However, the war has made it clear, finally, that a nation can control the air, as the Germans did during the early part of the war, and still be unable to control the seas.

In the last analysis, it is ships that hold the seas, just as the land forces—infantry, artillery, and armored forces—must take and hold the land. But, in modern war, both land and sea services must have aid of the air arm, to soften up the enemy, find out what he is doing, and give protection from enemy air attack.

When the war started in 1939, and the Germans had an air force that completely dwarfed numerically, those of the French and British, adherents of air power were quick to assume that airplanes were the determining factor in getting control of land and sea areas.

But they were thinking principally of specific battles between airplanes and individual ships, or individual cities. Alfred Trayer Mahan, the world's greatest naval historian, back in 1889 wrote that:

"Naval historians have troubled themselves little about the connection between general history and their own particular topic, limiting themselves generally to the duty of simple chroniclers of naval occurrences."

What he said then applies precisely to the statements of those who came out overwhelmingly in suport of air power as the determining factor of modern war. Sea power alone cannot win a war. Land power alone cannot win a war. Air power alone cannot win a war. A nation must possess all three services, in great force, to win.

In every war in history, from the time of Hannibal's unsuccessful attack on the old Roman Empire, the country with the victorious land force has always also had mastery of the sea. It was true in Napoleon's time, in the American Civil War, and even in the American Revolution, after France threw her navy against the British Fleet operating off the Atlantic coast.

It has been true in this war. Hitler was stopped from invading Britain, after the defeat of France, not by the small but excellent Royal Air Force, but by England's Fleet.

Hitler had no navy to challenge the British fleet. He even had a difficult time assembling small craft for his one futile attempt at invasion.

A Royal Air Force pilot, who has been flying bombers ever since Britain entered the war, told the writer that it was the Royal Navy that broke up an attempt, about which little has ever been made public, by the Nazis to storm England.

The flyer said that some 60,000 German troops set sail from the Lowlands in assorted craft. The R. A. F., he said, had comparatively little to do with breaking up this attack. The Royal Navy, he said, sent large forces to sea. These ships intercepted the invasion barges, laid down a gigantic sea of oil around the Nazis, set it afire and wrecked the enemy forces.

Reports from Allied headquarters in London show that Hitler's lack of sea power, plus a diminishing air force, prevented him from challenging the Allied invasion fleet, either at sea or before the fleet left the coastal ports of England.

The WASP Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COSTELLO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the bill H. R. 4219, commonly known as the WASP bill, will be called up for consideration before the House in the near future, I feel that I should make some comments thereon. More particularly is this so in view of House Report No. 1600, which has recently been presented by the House Committee on the Civil Service following their inquiry into the expansion and proposed change in the civil-service status of the WASPS.

A study of this report, consisting of 14 pages, can be summed up briefly as a charge against the Army Air Forces for the continuance of the training of women pilots where there exists a large reservoir of trained, expert pilots ready and available to serve their country's cause. Having made this assumption, which is not justified by the facts, the report proceeds to criticize the entire WASP program.

It is unnecessary, I feel, to discuss paragraph by paragraph the discrepancies of this report. However, it is desired to call attention to the conclusions and recommendations contained therein. These conclusions and recommendations I would like to take the liberty of reading. They are:

1. The proposal to expand the WASPS has not been justified. Therefore, it is recommended that the recruiting of inexperienced personnel and their training for the WASPS be immediately terminated.

2. That the use of the WASPS already trained and in training be continued and provision be made for hospitalization and insurance.

3. There exist several surpluses of experienced pilot personnel available for utilization as service pilots.

Therefore, it is recommended that the service of these several groups of experienced air personnel be immediately utilized.

It is worthy to note that these conclusions and recommendations were not the opinion of at least five of the members of this committee who have reported as follows:

We, the undersigned, disagree with the report of the Committee on the Civil Service, House of Representatives, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, concerning inquiries made of certain proposals for the expansion of the WASP, pursuant to House Resolution 16, feeling that the termination, the continuation, or the further development of a woman's flying program is a matter for the Army Air Force to determine.

CLARENCE E. KILBURN.
RICHARD P. GALE.
GRAHAM A. BARDEN.
CHRISTIAN A. HERTER.
WINIFRED C. STANLEY.

As I have indicated, the most astounding part of this report is the assumption that there does exist a vast pool of well-trained pilots ready to serve the Army Air Forces at a moment's notice. This is an error that I would like to correct now.

This report calls attention to the fact that there are 4,689 pilot instructor-trainees available to the Army Air Forces to be used as pilot material. This unfortunately is not true.

On January 15, 1944, there were 4,687 trainees of the C. A. A.-War Training Service program called to active duty by the Army Air Forces at which time they were examined physically, mentally, and professionally as every other individual has been examined with the same standards applied. At this time I might point out that this was the first uniform examination that had ever been given this group. Your attention is invited to the fact that these physical and mental examinations revealed that many of these men were physically unfit to pursue flying training in the Army Air Forces, and that professionally, many of them did not have sufficient ability to warrant additional training for duty with the Air Transport Command.

The results of these examinations found 974 qualified to take aviation cadet training to become combat pilots; 651 were found qualified to take glider pilot training; 2,618 were assigned to technical training in order to fit them for the many and necessarily essential positions in the Army Air Forces; 310 were assigned as specialists when it was found that they had already perfected themselves and had practiced an occupation whereby their service could be immediately utilized by the Army Air Forces—I am speaking of laboratory technicians, radio operators, Chinese interpreters, and so forth; 128 were not assigned due to hospitalization, emergency furloughs, and so forth; 5 were discharged for miscellaneous causes; and 1 died.

From a study of this utilization by the Army Air Forces of this 4,687 trainees, it is very apparent that they have been utilized in a manner best suited for the problem of pursuing successfully our war effort.

The report further points out that there are a total of 5,882 civil instructors at present unemployed who are anxious and willing to assume the duties of a pilot officer in the Army Air Forces. Actual facts, again, reveal this to be untrue.

The truth of the matter is as follows: That with the termination of civilian contract schools and the C. A. A. war training service program on January 15, 1944, there were released a total of 904 pilot instructors. Of this number, 339 have already been certified by the C. A. A. and were employed by the Air Transport Command; 38 were certified to the Army Air Forces by the C. A. A. but were rejected on physical and general classification scores and were therefore reported to the Military Personnel Division of the Army Air Forces for disposition; 168 were not certified to the Army Air Forces by the C. A. A. and were also reported to the Military Personnel Division for disposition; a total of 104 are being employed in other programs and 255, all nonreservists and on whom the Army Air Forces have no records, are at this time awaiting examination by the Army Air Forces. I fail to see how by any trick of mathematics the Army Air Forces may utilize this group in any other manner than I have just indicated.

Between June 30, 1944, and August 4, 1944, there will be approximately 5,882 additional civilian instructors available, as the result of closing the college indoctrination program and other civilian contract schools. It is obvious that to date these instructors have not been available to the Army Air Forces. However, they will become available between the dates mentioned above, and I have been advised by the Army Air Forces that those who can pass the physical examination for flying and who are under the age of 27 will be given aviation cadet training, fitting them for combat duty; all who are under 38 years of age and capable of passing a class 2 physical examination will be given employment with the Air Transport Command or with the glider pilot training program; those who are unable to pass this examination will be given the opportunity of technical or gunnery training.

I would like to further point out that this report states that the qualifications are discriminatory between the girl trainees and these "expert" pilots. If there has been any discrimination indicated at all, it, in my opinion, has certainly been discrimination in favor of these pilot instructors. It is apparently not understood that every girl trainee must pass a physical examination in every way equal to that of a combat pilot. These girls must also be between the ages of 18 and 27. On the other hand, in order to qualify for duty with the Air Transport Command these "expert" instructors need only physically be qualified to pass a class 2 noncombat examination and be under 38 years of age.

Assuming for the moment that there are 8,000 well-trained pilots available and ready at this moment within the United States to be called to duty with the Army Air Forces, the entire 8,000 would merely fill the replacement losses of the Army Air Forces for approximately 2 months and after those 2 months have passed, we would of necessity again have to turn to the 17-year-olds or female pilots. I defy any man to produce for the Army Air Forces a single youth between the ages of 18 and 27, physically qualified to take aviation cadet training, who is not already utilized either in the Army, Navy, or vital industry. If we are to force the Army Air Forces to utilize these physically unqualified individuals we have merely furnished them with between 1 and 2 months of inferior material, leaving them at the expiration of that time in the same position in which they now find themselves, to wit, to militarize female pilots as necessary replacements.

On Tuesday, 11,000 airplanes covered our invasion assault on Europe. What replacements will be necessary as the result of the air battles to be waged over France none of you know, nor do I know. I am, however, firmly convinced that those men responsible for the placing of those 11,000 airplanes over our invading forces are somewhat more familiar with the problems of organization, training, administrative handling, and tactical employment of our aerial weapons than any group of individuals, no matter how well-meaning their intentions, can possibly be who wrote this report.

We have placed General Arnold, with perfect confidence, at the head of the 16 air forces now functioning throughout the world. The records of these forces speak for themselves. General Arnold himself has requested the passage of the WASP bill in order that the civilian women pilots now serving with our air forces and those hereafter to be trained might be removed from their civilian status and placed in a full military status. The desirability of this change cannot be questioned by anyone. Even the report of the Civil Service Committee urges in their second recommendation that "provision be made for hospitalization and insurance." The effective utilization of these women pilots can only be accomplished if they are made a part of the military organization. Having seen the development of the WAC's, WAVES, SPARS, and MARINES, I know no reason why this group of women pilots alone of the various military-service organizations should not be given the same status as had been accorded those other groups.

In conclusion, let me explain that the sole effect of the WASP bill is to bring these civilian women completely under military jurisdiction as they should be. Likewise, let me point out that the Army Air Forces have been more than pleased with the splendid success of the WASP program and its accomplishments, and this program shall be continued whether it remains in a civilian status or becomes a military organization. It will be continued because the Army leaders are satisfied as to the necessity for the organization and because it will aid materially in benefiting our aviation activities in this country and likewise relieving many pilots qualified for combat activities and enabling them to hasten our day of victory in this war.

School Teachers Deserve Our Praise and Thanks for Their Efforts on the Home Front

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, there is one group of unsung warriors on the home front that has been entirely overlooked as we have from time to time praised various groups and awarded others the Army-Navy E banner for efficiency.

I refer to the teachers in the schools of our Nation who are now waging a great campaign—a campaign which will to a great extent contribute to the kind of a post-war world in which we will live. These folk are helping the next generation get ready for tomorrow. And they are doing a fine job.

I know of the unpleasantries of teaching and of the difficulties and inconveniences and sacrifices, for I was once a school teacher myself. I believe it is a distinct credit to the profession that these loyal American citizens have remained at their post, spurning higher wages of the defense plants, in order that our school-age children might continue to receive a good education.

It would be only natural for persons in the salary category of these people to grasp the opportunity to earn higher wages which the war brought. Instead, the majority of them have turned their backs to this temptation and have remained on the job in the true American way and with unfailing devotion, helping boys and girls climb to greater heights. The contribution of our teachers to the greatness of America is beyond measure. To the institution of education, I say, should also go an E award.

We are all interested in the post-war program, and as a former teacher, I was particularly interested in the Federal portion of the program of the National Education Association of the United States. It is sufficiently important that I feel all Members of the House should study it. It follows:

1. Make the United States Office of Education an independent Federal agency under the general direction and control of a national lay board of education. Have this national board of education appointed by the President, with approval by the Senate, in such a way as to secure a high level of competence and minimize the danger of partisan political influence in Office of Education activities. Authorize the national board to appoint the United States Commissioner of Education and let it determine, within the framework of Federal law, the basic policies and plans which the Commissioner is to administer as head of the Office of Education.

2. Strengthen the Office of Education further with additional funds and personnel. Gradually make it the one Federal agency having direct contacts with State and local school systems. Let the Office of Education administer the distribution of all Federal money appropriated for State and local school purposes.

3. Establish a coordinating council of all Federal agencies having educational activities, with the United States Commissioner of Education as chairman. Let this council undertake to harmonize the educational activities of the several agencies and prevent unnecessary duplication of effort among them.

4. Let special needs for schooling be cared for, as a rule, by State and local educational institutions. Refrain from establishing Federal schools or classes except as they are necessary for children and youth on remote Federal properties or reservations, for persons in training for various branches of the Federal service, and for the development of a national university.

5. Invite the chief state school officers and other educational leaders of the several States to meet annually or oftener with the United States Office of Education staff to discuss problems of mutual concern.

6. Arrange to carry on all Federal business with the educational institutions of each State through, or by agreement with, the central State agency having jurisdiction—preferably an all-inclusive State board or department of education.

7. Provide financial aid for public education in general on an equalization basis, without any Federal control of the school curriculum and with only the barest minimum of Federal regulations to insure honest and impartial State administration of the funds. As the amount of such aid is increased, gradually eliminate Federal grants of money to the States for specific school purposes. During the early post-war period, however, provide funds for school building construction as part of a federally-supported program of public works.

8. Provide Federal funds through State welfare agencies to help the States and local communities keep economically handicapped persons in school as long as may be individually and socially desirable.

9. Provide Federal funds through the appropriate State educational agencies for necessary training and guidance of nondisabled war veterans and released civilian workers.

A Report on Efforts to Maintain a Continuing Supply of Physicians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFFORD DAVIS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I obtained leave to insert an editorial which will appear in the next issue of the American Medical Journal.

For your further attention, I am now authorized to include a report on efforts to maintain a continuing supply of physicians, made by the directing board Procurement and Assignment Service for physicians, dentists, veterinanians, sanitary engineers and nurses.

This problem is by no means a local one. It concerns every congressional district in this country.

I am hopeful that those in authority may soon recognize that attention must be given this serious matter.

The report follows:

In December 1942 it was agreed by the Surgeons General of the Army and Navy and the directing board of the Procurement and Assignment Service that classes admitted to medical schools for the duration of the war should be made up of the following groups: Army specialized training program students 55 percent, Navy V-12 students 25 percent, and civilian students 20 percent; the latter group to be made up of women and men physically disqualified or otherwise ineligible for military service.

The curtailment of the Army specialized training program in April 1944 provided that medical students and premedical students in the Army specialized training program should continue in training, but that no more students should be admitted to the program.

It is estimated that the number of premedical students remaining in the Army specialized training program is sufficient to fill only 28 percent of the places in the classes to be admitted to medical schools in 1945. The Navy will continue to fill 25 to 31 percent of the places.

The reduction in the Army specialized training program had the effect of increasing the number of places which must be filled by civilian medical students by 27 percent. This situation gave concern to the directing board of the Procurement and Assignment Service lest it be found impossible to secure an adequate number of properly qualified candidates for medical schools to fill the classes in the future and to keep the supply of doctors constant and adequate.

Early in April Selective Service, after conference with the Inter-Agency Committee on Occupational Deferment, ruled that premedical students acceptable to the armed services, unless accepted for admission and matriculated and entered into actual classroom work in recognized school of medicine on or before July 1, 1944, will no longer be deferred. The Procurement and Assignment Service wishes to record the following developments which have taken place since that time:

At a joint meeting of the directing board of the Procurement and Assignment Service with the Surgeons General of the Army, Navy, and Public Health Service these problems were discussed, and it was mutually agreed that the effect of these two policies on medical education would be dangerous in terms of production of physicians, continued existence of the medical schools, and the effects on public health.

On April 12, at the suggestion of the Procurement and Assignment Service, recommendations were made by Mr. Paul V. McNutt, Chairman of the War Manpower Commission, to Maj. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, Director of Selective Service, embodying the objections and apprehensions of the Procurement and Assignment Service to this program.

On April 15 a reply from General Hershey indicated that "No exceptions will be made as respects the date of July 1. We shall, as in the past, give full faith and credit to the certificates of professional colleges as to the status of students matriculated therein and engaged in actual classroom work within the school or under its immediate supervision."

On April 26 a communication was forwarded by Mr. McNutt to the Secretary of War and to the Secretary of the Navy, urging the armed services to provide some status for a sufficient number of students to fill the entering classes in medical schools.

On April 28 discussions were held by the directing board at one of its regular meetings with representatives of the War Department, and these apprehensions were stated to them and discussed with them.

On May 8 a discussion was held with Mr. James V. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization, concerning this whole situation, and it was his opinion that since this matter under the law was entirely in the hands of Selective Service it was not within his province to take any action in this matter.

On May 16 the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy jointly advised the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission that it seemed to them "that the immediate needs of the war for their [students'] services ought not to yield to the prospective use of them as doctors in 1949 or thereafter, particularly when it is to be expected that the course of the war will by then make it possible to release many doctors at present in the military service. The action of the Director of Selective Service in refusing these deferments was, therefore, in accord with the recommendations of the departments, and for them now to put these students into inactive reserve status would, in effect, be to defer them and so nullify the action of the Director of Selective Service, which we supported."

This now brings the matter up to date and in the accompanying table is submitted an estimate of what the status of medical classes will be under the program as it now exists.

Estimates of medical students for 1945

Total number of places in entering classes	6,440
Army students, 28 percent	1,790
Navy students, 25 percent	1,540
	3,330
Balance to be filled by women and by men disqualified for general military service	3,110

Past experience suggests that it should be possible to fill 400 to 500 of these places with women students. This leaves approximately 2,600 places which, under current policies of Selective Service, can be filled only by men who are disqualified for general military service.

It is impossible at this time to predict how many of these places the medical schools will be able to fill without lowering their standards of admission. Less than 10 percent of present medical students are physically disqualified for military service. The liberalization of deferments for men classified by Selective Service, and the discharge of increasing numbers of men by the Army and Navy, should make it possible to augment somewhat this proportion. Only time will demonstrate whether this situation will improve or deteriorate. No predictions are justified at this time for classes to be admitted in 1946 and thereafter.

At the present time the directing board of the Procurement and Assignment Service feels that it has exhausted all possibilities to secure more satisfactory arrangements to maintain medical enrollment. It presents this statement in order that the medical public may be made aware of the facts. Throughout these communications and conferences the directing board has constantly emphasized to all agencies concerned, in its opinion, the dangers of the situation. It will continue to do so.

Proposed Post-War Unemployment Compensation Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a proposed post-war unemployment compensation plan, prepared by Col. Willard F. Rockwell, chairman of the board, Timken-Detroit Axle Co., and Standard Steel Spring Co., and chairman of the board and president, Pittsburgh Equitable Meter Co. I am of the opinion that the information contained in this proposed post-war plan will be of much interest to Members of Congress, as well as the general public:

This program is presented as a contribution to post-war planning. It is designed to promote a measure of security for both labor and industry in the economic upheaval that will follow contract terminations.

Industry has already experienced cut-backs, or readjustments in the war-production program. The disruptions these produce are indicative. Probably sooner than is realized, readjustments will become everyday practice as military requirements diminish. The period between a whole or substantial cancelation of war contracts and the resumption of production for civilian use is fraught with danger for both labor and industry. Millions of employees will be thrown out of work for varying periods of time.

Under the present method of excess-profit controls, it is made exceedingly difficult to establish reserves for maintenance of employment during the period of reconversion. Nor has there been any practical provision set up to enable industry to absorb returning military personnel and at the same time continue to employ those now on the pay roll.

It is absolutely imperative that we recognize this problem and take some immediate steps if we are to avoid the disastrous consequences that must follow our failure to provide a workable solution before the actuality is upon both labor and industry.

The following program is submitted with the thought that it is at least based upon considerations of practicality.

1. Every company engaged in whole or substantial part with war production, be permitted to withhold from 1943, 1944, and 1945 gross income after taxes and normal profit, and before renegotiation, a sum up to the equal of one average week's wage or salary for each month of continuous employment of each person on the pay roll, with a maximum total equal to 24 weeks' wage or salary for employees who have worked 2 years or more.

2. Based upon the same formula, an equal sum to be withheld for each ex-employee now serving in the armed forces, with the same maximum and minimum withholdings operative.

3. These funds shall be held by each company. A complete record of such withholdings, together with the record of each active employee, plus those serving in the armed forces, shall be sent to the Social Security Board. Payments out of the fund shall also be recorded with the Social Security Board. These records shall be available to the public.

4. Disbursements of these funds to unemployed workers will start at the time of complete cancellation of war contracts. Or in the instance of graduated contract cancellations due to readjustments in the war production program, a joint labor-management committee in each plant shall determine the mutually satisfactory point at which disbursements shall start. In the case of ex-employees returning from the armed forces, payment shall start upon personal application of each ex-employee.

5. Disbursements are to be made at a rate in conformity with the maximum and minimum established by State or Federal Governments for unemployment compensation, until—

(a) a job of comparable skill and compensation as last held shall be made available to each person entitled to these benefits, or

(b) until such time as the total benefits accruing to each individual employee are completely disbursed, or

(c) until other employment is obtained by each person entitled to these benefits.

6. At the end of 2 years after complete settlement of all terminated war contracts, all withheld funds not disbursed by the companies operating under this plan shall be paid to the Federal Government.

In addition to the foregoing, and because it bears a definite relationship to the problems inherent in reconversion, the following recommendation is made:

"The Government shall apoint a joint board of labor leaders and qualified business experts to examine at once the present inventories of materials, commodities, semi- and finished goods, and production facilities in the possession or control of each claimant agency and to recommend to the Government immediate steps to readjust any production program, either up or down, where it is shown that threatening surpluses are clearly indicated. Such information can, if deemed advisable, be kept confidential. However, the admission by Government officials of a minimum of $50,000,000,000 surplus of raw materials and finished goods which will be on hand at the end of the war makes it evident that planning in advance of the time when such a condition can wreck whole industries must be started at once."

Unless some such action as the foregoing is undertaken at once, there can be no assurance that the period of reconversion will not find either the national or State Governments faced with mountainous unemployment compensation expenditures—expenditures so heavy in some instances that the financial structure of certain States may be imperiled.

If, however, the remedy is attempted by means of added national taxation to implement present State unemployment compensation funds, the termination of contracts will find industry saddled with a continuing and intolerable burden. This plan provides a definite termination point for the accumulation of reserves for this use.

This formula is presented as being equitable to all companies, large and small, and to the employees thereof, who have converted, in whole or in part, their normal production for peace to that of production for war.

To Mr. Avery

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Samuel Wolchok, president, United Retail, Wholesale, and Department Store Employees of America:

For us at home, this is going to intensify the crisis in manpower. This crisis has already reached staggering proportions requiring heroic measures to control all hiring of male workers, beginning July 1.

Your labor policies have interfered and are still interfering with the efficient use of manpower in the Chicago district and elsewhere.

You yourself reported to your stockholders that, in order to maintain a working staff of 78,000 for all the Montgomery Ward establishments, the company had to employ 151,000 people in 1943. This turnover of 193 percent is directly due to your policies of intimidating and underpaying your workers.

Montgomery Ward's methods of terrorizing employees are a matter of court record and have been described and condemned by the courts in a number of cases. Here is one instance out of many—the case of Hornin v. Montgomery Ward, 120 F. (2d) 500 (decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Ninth District), concerning the Ward's store at McKeesport, Pa. The facts, as recited in the court's decision, were:

Store manager, seeking to stop theft, forced culprit caught with stolen goods to implicate an innocent employee by threatening to fire the culprit's girl friend who worked in the store. The manager had innocent employee taken out of his home at night, locked up and held incommunicado, not being permitted to communicate or tell his family till the next day.

Said the court: "Stark (the manager) by threats forced Kasmareck (the thief) to give false testimony which, had it been unrepudiated, would have been sufficient to convict Hornin. This Stark did with a wantonness and disregard of the rights of others which plainly indicates that the want of probable cause was wholly unimportant to him. He apparently felt the need of an example for disciplinary purposes at the store, and the means by which he obtained his victim mattered not at all. * * *

"And there is also evidence that the defendant company's principal or main office knew of Stark's (the manager's) action with respect to the institution and maintenance of the criminal proceedings almost from the outset and never made any objection thereto."

Judgment for employee sustained.

Mr. Avery, did you remember this when you were gently carried from your offices April 27?

The American way of providing for fair and stable labor relations is embodied in the National Labor Relations Act. This law requires that employers must bargain collectively with representatives of the workers' own choosing.

Upholding this act, Chief Justice Hughes declared:

"Long ago we stated the reason for labor organizations. We said that they were organized out of the necessities of the situation; that a single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer; that he was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and family; that if the employer refused to pay him the wages he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and resistant arbitrary and unfair treatment; that union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on an equality with their employer. * * * Fully recognizing the legality of collective action on the part of employees in order to safeguard their proper interests, we said that Congress was not required to ignore this right, but could safeguard it. Congress could seek to make appropriate collective action of employees an instrument of peace rather than of strife."

In a big advertising campaign—paid for to the extent of 81 cents on the dollar by the people of the United States through loss of excess profits taxes—you have repeatedly stated that you have "no quarrel with the principle of unionism, no quarrel with the principle of collective bargaining," and that "Ward's stands ready at all times to bargain collectively with any union which has been selected by a majority of the employees in any appropriate bargaining unit."

But you did not tell the public that Ward's has been twice convicted by Federal circuit courts of appeals for spying on the activities of workers. (The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals issued an order in 1939 directing the Montgomery Ward plant at Portland, Oreg., to stop the practice of using undercover agents to observe and report upon the union activities of the employees. In 1941, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals issued a similar order involving the St. Paul, Minn., plant. Both these court orders required the company to cease using labor spies.) You cannot bargain sincerely unless you give up your use of labor spies and abandon your efforts to break up the union.

Even when you failed to break up the unions of your workers and met with them for the purpose of collective bargaining, you have failed to show an attitude of good faith. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals denounced your attitude as a "hypertechnical approach" and as involving "stalling tactics." "Throughout the conferences," said the court, "there is apparent a studied design of aloofness, of disinterestedness, of unwillingness to go forward, upon the part of Ward's."

The New York State Labor Board also declared in 1942 that Ward's did not bargain collectively in good faith. This finding was sustained by the New York Supreme Court. The court declared that the position taken by the company did not constitute good faith in bargaining. The judgment of the New York Supreme Court was affirmed by the appellate division, to which you insisted on carrying the case.

Mr. Avery, we challenge you—

To quit stalling.

To quit your private war against labor.

To join the war effort.

To bargain in good faith with our Local 20, and with every other union of your employees, and sign contracts that will eliminate turn-over, waste of manpower, help the workers to spur production, and win the only war which the American people is interested in winning—the people's war of liberation against the Nazi and Jap tyrants.

SAMUEL WOLCHOK,
United Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Employees of America.

SEWELL AVERY'S OPERATING MANAGER TELLS THE FACTS ON TURN-OVER

In a letter written on June 8, 1942, Mr. Odorizzi, mail order operating manager, wrote:

"Our labor turn-over problem is becoming increasingly serious. If we continue to replace employees that leave us at today's rate, if we permit our current high rate of turnover to continue during the next 12 months, we will employ approximately 25,000 new employees to replace an equal number that will leave our employment. The fact that we are able to replace those that leave us indicates that Ward's as a company can and does attract employees who come with us expecting opportunity and progress.

"Why do new employees become dissatisfied? Why does a large percentage leave us during the first 2 or 3 months of their employment? When you find the answers to these questions, you will find the reasons for your labor relations problem. Some employees become dissatisfied and leave—others become dissatisfied and stay with us, but reflect their dissatisfaction in the performance of their jobs. One is as bad as the other.

"Why are we anxious to reduce our labor turn-over? All of you have had occasion to witness the unfavorable effects of labor turnovers on the performance within your respective departments. The reasons we are anxious to reduce our labor turn-over can be summarized briefly as follows:

"1. Good employees are becoming increasingly difficult to find.

"2. New employees produce less work and make more mistakes during their training period—our mistakes displease our customers.

"3. At the current rate of turn-over we will spend more than a million dollars to train new employees during the next year.

"Is there anything that you personally can do to retain our good employees? People come to work for Wards because they believe Wards is a good place to work and because they believe they see opportunity. Only a small percentage of the employees that leave us do so to enter military service. A large percentage of the employees leave for reasons that are largely within the control of our department heads and supervisors. It is important that each one of you clearly understand not only the reasons why employees leave us, but specifically those things that each one of you can do to improve the company's relationship with its employees to the extent that our labor turnover will be reduced. For your guidance, I am attaching a summary of the most important factors that affect not only our turn-over but your day-to-day relationships with your employees. The company's personnel policies are simple. The fact that I am carrying this message personally to every department head and to every supervisor in all of our mail-order houses indicates the importance that our management places on these policies."

Mr. Odorizzi's memorandum accompanying the letter listed as "the most important factors that affect not only our turn-over but your day-to-day relationships with your employees," the following:

1. Reclassification of pay rolls (referring to the fact that in many instances employees are kept on temporary or part-time payroll classifications even though they are getting full-time employment).

2. Proper administration of Wards wage policy.

3. Our wage-increase policy (referring to the periodical moving of employees in each classification along a scale between given minimum and maximum rates).

4. Appraisal of employees' performance (stating in part that the success or failure of our wage plan depends entirely on the fairness of your appraisals).

5. Promotions (stating in part that in the case of promotions, employees are sometimes transferred at a rate considerably lower than the rate for the job, and there is hesitancy to bring the employee's rate up to what is justified by the new responsibility).

6. Assist your employees to improve their performance "in reviewing and appraising employees, and in handling wage increase, instances will be brought to light where employees are not making satisfactory progress. The unsatisfactory employee should be recognized quickly within a maximum of 60 days. He should not be permitted to continue to turn in an unsatisfactory performance that will not enable him to progress as he had hoped when he came with Wards. Not all employees whose work is rated as unsatisfactory are actually unsatisfactory employees." Then Mr. Odorizzi stated that an employee's failure might be due to lack of proper training, improper application of production control, not suiting him to his job, and real or imaginary grievances.

7. Know and understand your employees.

8. Don't be a "big shot."

9. Talk to the employees that leave us.

Commenting on this letter a panel of the War Labor Board wrote on August 1, 1942: "It will be observed that six of these nine items had to do entirely or predominantly with wage matters, and the remainder with personal attitudes of supervisors affecting the employees' feeling of security. Thus in this letter are reflected some of the reasons for the union's demands for increased wages and increased job security."

Ration Board Chairman Makes Practical Suggestions for O. P. A. Improvement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of one of the Minnesota rationing boards in the Ninth Congressional District, has made some very practical suggestions relative to the rationing program and at the same time his letter points out the very fine work being done by these boards in some of the rural areas.

Hoping that this letter, which is from Mr. James A. Baikie, of Bemidji, to Chester A. Bowles, O. P. A. Administrator, will lead to some clarification of this matter for the farmers and since it, at the same time, shows the fine spirit of the members of one of our boards, I submit it for the consideration of the House.

The letter follows:

BEMIDJI, MINN., March 20, 1944.

Mr. CHESTER BOWLES,
Administrator, Office of Price Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOWLES: This is in reply to your letter of March 13 requesting that I comment on specific problems encountered by the local board, of which I am chairman.

First, let me assure you that the men and women of Beltrami County are supporting the rationing and price-control programs, and are willing to sacrifice further in order to win the war in the shortest time possible.

Beltrami County has a population of 26,000 people and is a diversified county, in that we have farming, logging, manufacturing, and a large tourist business. Due to the war the tourist industry has naturally been below normal because of the gasoline rationing program.

Because of my own line of work, which is insurance and income-tax consultant work, I have had many opportunities since my appointment as board chairman to have conferences with farmers and other groups relative to all phases of rationing and price control. I think we can establish better relationship with the farmers if O. P. A. would make available to the farmer more information which shows relationship of farmers as consumers in the price-control programs and its relation between farm income and stable prices. Farmers, generally speaking, are unfriendly to the O. P. A. program in this area because as a group they feel they are receiving no consideration of their problems. O. P. A. is constantly being a victim for other agencies dealing with farmers. On several occasions, farmers have come to me and requested information relative to the rationing of lumber, farm machinery, etc., which is not a function of O. P. A. However, they feel we are responsible for them not being able to purchase farm machinery that they need.

It would also be my recommendation that every effort should be made to simplify rationing forms for farmers. Many farmers also resent the fact that they are, at present, being placed in the category as "black-market operators" with their nonhighway gasoline allowances. Speaking for the farmers in Beltrami County, I know they are very sensitive in applying for a B or C book allowance, and in a great many cases the farmer is getting along with an A mileage ration, which is not sufficient, and his farm activity is curtailed. As a group, I think they have used more of their nonessential gas for occupational driving than any other group of individuals. There is considerable doubt in mind whether or not the present plan of nonhighway gas allowance, whereby the community committee men, county committee men, and a member of the local War Price and Rationing Board gasoline panel must approve Mr. Farmer's nonhighway gasoline allowance will produce the desired results. This plan is having a tendency to further irritate the farmer. Personally, I feel that the gasoline station operators are the backbone of the successful operation of the gasoline rationing program in every community. Without their cooperation, a great deal of the excellent and conscientious work that has been done by the panels has been nullified and panels have been subjected to undue criticism.

This board has recently been notified by the district office that all local boards will soon be relieved of the responsibility of storing gasoline coupons, through establishment of an issuing center. We have handled this very efficiently and honestly through our excellent panel, which meets every day. The panel takes a great deal of interest, and they also have a certain amount of satisfaction when they are able to give good service to everyone without much delay. Personally, I am very willing to cooperate in every way to eliminate black-market operation of gasoline because of stolen coupons, but I know the gasoline panel at our board does not approve of such a plan feeling that they are going to be held responsible for any delay, of which they have no control. At the present time our report of storage of ration currency places us in group A, and we are willing to take whatever steps that the district office requires to further protect rationing currency in this office.

As rationing problems become more acute, I am of the opinion distribution centers, of which we will have two in this county, will become more valuable to the local board, and I sincerely hope sufficient funds can be provided to employ full-time board employees at these centers. Better public relations will result as such centers can be information centers with properly trained employees.

Our recent price survey in this county, of which we are very proud, in that we can report 100-percent coverage, indicates that rural stores are doing a better job than the city stores. Trade meetings and group meetings are being held, but I do not think they reach everyone and they do not accomplish the results they should. If price clerks could have price-clerk assistants, making the price clerk available for personal contact with the consumer and retailer, I am sure greater results can be obtained and better public relations will exist.

This board is completely organized, representing a true cross section of the community. All panels are meeting regularly and doing a mighty good job for the Office of Price Administration. We all appreciate the assistance and cooperation we are receiving from the district office. A regular contact with this office has been very helpful to us in our many problems. Our entire organization is loyal and willing to do their part to help win the war, and sincerely hope that you will further guide us in our work and will continue to simplify as much as possible the work at the local board level. We also ask you to do everything in your power to give us more authority at the board level to deal with our own people in making decisions as to the rationing and price-control programs.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES A. BAIKIE,
Chairman, War Price and Rationing Board.

A Congressman Looks Ahead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the fifty-second annual meeting and war conference of the National-American Wholesale Lumber Association held at Chicago, Ill., on June 6, 1944:

I am delighted with this opportunity to talk with a group of businessmen, especially businessmen who are engaged in handling building materials. Every businessman, no matter what line of endeavor he is in, is a part of our free enterprise economy in America. You gentlemen are not only in the business of handling raw materials for building purposes produced out of the trees which grow in this country. You are also in the business of helping to build and maintain the economy of your Nation. When this war is ended you will be in the business of helping rebuild the free-enterprise economy of this Nation, if we are to continue to have a free-enterprise economy.

It is my understanding that the member firms of your association in normal peacetimes distribute more lumber and lumber products than any other similar group in the Nation. You are the men to whom all the little mills, and many of the big integrated operators, have looked for a market in past years; you are the men upon whom these same producers, both large and small, will have to rely in the days after the war.

I have been told that the majority of you have aided in the sales of lumber incident to the war program, and that most of you have also been accorded the more dubious privilege of submitting your books to the Government for renegotiation, with results that are not always too happy.

Some of you favored the Committee on Small Business, of the House of Representatives, with the benefit of your views on this and kindred subjects. In New Orleans last November with the committee, I was privileged to hear your able spokesman, Mr. Darling, when he submitted several of his ideas to the committee.

I, of course, do not presume to know all the problems of the lumber industry, or the solutions to those problems. However, two problems, which Mr. Darling and others have called to my attention, seem worthy of comment. The first is the subject of renegotiation. While none of us are for excessive profits, I think we will have to exercise very great caution in carrying out the principle of renegotiation, to be sure we do not cripple American business and American industry, and disable it for a very vital task. When this war is over it will be the job of American industry to readjust itself to a peacetime basis; to open up new avenues of production, and even complete new industries; to provide the plant, the tools, the capital, and the management by which and with which jobs, purchasing power, goods, and services, can all be provided for all of our people. Therefore, I believe that we must guard against any overzealousness on the part of Government officials to make what might seem, in the narrow view, to be a saving for the taxpayers, but which might, in the long pull, prove to be of very great disadvantage to the Nation through the crippling of business and industry to a point where it might be unable to provide the plant, tools, capital, and management by which the American people could be provided with jobs, purchasing power, goods, and services.

You can be reassured on this point, however, by the fact that thinking in this direction is being evidenced. A member of the House Committee on Small Business, Representative ESTES KEFAUVER, of Tennessee, a very able and distinguished colleague and friend of mine, has, in his capacity of acting chairman of the lumber subcommittee, introduced a bill in the Congress designed to exempt the lumber industry from renegotiation for the balance of the war period.

This is a subject which will require very grave consideration and careful study from many angles in order that all of the effects and influences which may be exerted by renegotiation may be foreseen in every case, so that evils which might spring up may be avoided.

The second subject which, it seems to me, deserves comment, is that of the Government in the lumber business.

At New Orleans and at other public hearings the House Small Business Committee had the advantage of the testimony of our good friend, Col. Fred G. Sherrill. As you all know, Colonel Sherrill was until recently the Chief of the Central Procuring Agency, and is now the Chief of the Procurement Division of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army.

Most of you know Colonel Sherrill. He is a fine gentleman and a good officer in the United States Army.

In his official capacity Colonel Sherrill was assigned the very difficult task of supervising the acquisition of lumber vitally needed in the war effort. With military directness, the colonel proceeded to secure lumber in the only way he was permitted—to buy it himself. The colonel went to the source of lumber—the mills, both large and small—and bypassed Nation-wide organizations such as yours and others of similar capacity. This procedure raised some objections.

I would not presume to speak here in criticism of Colonel Sherrill, or to try to treat the subject of trade discounts, or added fees of 4 or 6 percent which were developed by the Office of Price Administration at the suggestion of the War Department.

Rather, I shall confine my comments to the basic theory which seems to have guided most of our Federal agencies during wartime in handling matters which normally are left to businessmen in peacetime.

Sympathetic as I am with the problems which beset a great procurement agency in time of war, when speed and volume are of the essence, I still say that I wish no Government agency would follow a policy which causes the Government to perform functions which properly are the province of established business and which could be just as well, or better, performed by business for the war effort.

I believe Colonel Sherrill himself was among the first to pose a question as to such a policy in his department, although it may have been that some of the authorities higher up, perhaps not even in the War Department, urged the adoption and continuance of such a policy of direct mill-to-consumer distribution. This policy appears to indicate a philosophy in Government which causes me to be disquieted. It is a problem which we must in the future be sure we keep within proper bounds.

So far as the O. P. A. is concerned, the question of its continuance is before the Congress now. I thought price control necessary when I voted for the bill creating the O. P. A., and I still think so. I do not believe there was very much wrong with the original price control bill. I think whatever trouble has arisen has been largely through the errors of inexperienced and inefficient administrators or the result of maladministration of the act. I think there may be a necessity for some clarifying amendments to tighten up the act, and if possible, plug some of the loopholes through which maladministration can find its way.

I now want to discuss with you some general principles which, it seems to me, we must keep very clearly before us as a people and a Nation if we expect to come out of this war with our American system of constitutional government, free private enterprise economy, and our free society intact. There is still an enormous amount of work in this country for everybody to do. There are still many privations for us to endure. There are still many griefs for us to suffer. There are still many burdens for all of us to bear before we have completed the terrible struggle in which we are engaged and before we have accomplished our readjustment to a basis of peace and prosperity.

Let me say to you at the outset that American businessmen of every character and in every line have distinguished themselves by the wonderful way in which they, together with labor and agriculture, combined and cooperated with the armed forces to meet the issues and the needs of this war. A modern miracle of production and distribution has been achieved by these combined forces in America. It is a fact of which you and other businessmen may well be proud. It is an achievement which, in the sunset years of your life, when it is well for you to spend much of your time in your easy chairs sitting on the sunny side of your homes, you can recount with pride to your children and your grandchildren and your great-grandchildren.

History will record the fact that for 40 years, under the lash and spur of the war lords, the Japanese people worked and slaved at intensive production, getting ready for the war with America which was planned.

History will record that for 20 years under Mussolini the Italian people drove intensively toward preparation for war. You will recall how Mussolini used to beat his breast and shout arrogant defiance at the world, and boast of the naval might and of the military power of the Fascist Italian state.

History will record that for 12 years, under the lash of Adolf Hitler and his ruthless Gestapo, the German people were driven and goaded into the most intensive preparations for war.

History will record that for 20 years under Joseph Stalin the Russian people worked at top speed relentlessly to prepare their war machine.

And history will record another fact: A fact that will stand out as a great, glowing feat which nobody but Americans believed could be achieved, and that feat was this: In 3 short years American industry, American industrial management, American business management, American labor and American agriculture, cooperating and working together as freemen, under a free economy and a free Government, equaled and surpassed the 40-year war preparations of the Japanese, the 20-year war preparations of the Italians, and the 12-year war preparation of the Nazis.

We are fighting an offensive war, and our Axis enemies know they are on the defensive. They are staring utter defeat straight in the face. No matter how far away it may seem to be in this hour; no matter how many battles may stand between now and that fateful day of defeat; no matter what rivers of blood may have to flow between now and the day of their collapse; that day of defeat inexorably comes closer, and closer, and closer.

We ought, here in America, to thank divine providence every hour in the day because that awful experience of seeing utter, complete, and crushing defeat, marching inevitably closer and closer, moving nearer and nearer, is not our experience, but the unhappy experience of our Axis enemies.

Our war effort is pretty well organized. Business knows its place pretty well in the scheme of things, in spite of confusion and contradictory policies. But there is another battle which we must be constantly fighting on the home front, while our heroic men and women across the seven seas are fighting on the battle fronts. That battle is to preserve our American way. This is not a partisan fight. Like the war itself, it is a struggle in which every man, woman, and child who wants to live under a free Government of laws, who wants to enjoy the opportunities of a free competitive enterprise system of economy, who wants to enjoy the priceless privileges which are the possession of people living in a free society, has a vital stake.

In the transition of the Nation from a basis of intense war effort to a basis of peace, the readjustment will be almost as difficult—sometimes, I think, perhaps more so—than was the shift from a peace basis to a war effort. The disruptions of business will be vast and serious. The chances for inflation will be uncomfortably numerous. The danger of too long continuance of governmental competition and control in business is ever present and grave.

I recognize that there could be a danger in relinquishing governmental controls too rapidly and that there must be a very close and skillful coordination between the process of readjustment to peacetime activities and the lifting of wartime controls over business and over the lives and activities of the citizens generally. This process is bound to be accomplished by the customary—and entirely wholesome—American system of proposal, disagreement, discussion, and compromise.

No good American citizen wants any form of dictatorship in this country, whether it be political, military, a dictatorship of an individual, a clique, a party, or even of the majority with a ruthless disregard for the rights of the minority. Therefore I wish to point out to you this fact, which seems so often to be lost sight of in the hurry to get something done, or in the rush of some high official to put some pet theory into practice. There are but two ways of conducting a government. One is by the American system of proposal, disagreement, discussion, and compromise. The other is by decree, or manifesto, or executive directive, or military order, or by some combination of autocratic powers that does not permit of disagreement, discussion, and compromise. Now, let's be perfectly honest with ourselves. No matter by what name we may call such a process of compulsion, it is dictatorship.

To a great extent in time of war, particularly a war of such magnitude as that we are now engaged in, much arbitrary control has to be delegated by the Congress to the Chief Executive. Such powers are not delegated to a Commander in Chief as such. They are delegated to the President of the United States, who is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, for the purpose of coordinating the plans and the efforts of the trained and experienced generals and admirals of the Army and the Navy. We should keep in mind that the Commander in Chief has no more power in wartime than he has in peacetime. The President has just as much more power in wartime than in peacetime as your Congress may give him.

The point I wish to make is that if these war controls, these arbitrary powers, which permit some official designated by the President to impose his will upon businessmen, and upon the people, and to deny, if he chooses, any right or privilege of disagreement or discussion, are carried too far over into the period of readjustment from a war to a peace basis, we could very easily slip into a condition where such wartime instruments of power might easily become shackles for the liberties of the people, hobbles upon business, and a fatal brake upon our postwar recovery under a constantly expanding economy.

In every case in our history when extraordinary powers have been granted to the President by the Congress, the people have promptly recaptured those powers through their Congress as soon as the necessity for their use had ended. We must do so when the conflict has ceased this time.

In time of war the Government becomes the principal employer in the Nation. In time of peace private enterprise must resume its functions of providing the capital, the plant, and the tools necessary to make jobs, and to create purchasing power, as well as goods and services, for everybody.

It is imperative that the Congress, through its committees and its individual members as well, and the officials in the Executive Department, have the benefit and advantage of the advice of experienced managers of business in the very difficult and hazardous effort to readjust ourselves into a peacetime economy and activity.

If business should fail, if industry and agriculture should be unable to provide jobs at good wages and salaries for the American people, under an economy producing more goods and services for the people at decreasing prices without wage reductions, we will have fought this war against totalitarianism in vain, because the Government, in such case, would have to continue to be the principal employer of labor. That would lead straight to a totalitarian form of government. It is not possible for a free government to survive in a controlled economy, any more than it is possible for a free economy to survive under a totalitarian government. American industry can expand and prosper, and make profits through our genius for mass production efficiency, under intelligent and reasonable governmental regulation; but it will wither and die under governmental domination and competition.

Without reference either to individuals or political philosophies, it must be said that power feeds on itself; it always strives to entrench itself; it never knows when to diminish itself, or to terminate itself. The great lesson of history is that power corrupts, and, to the extent that the power is absolute, the corruption becomes absolute.

The founding fathers, aware of this strange effect which the possession of power exerts upon individuals and governments, sought by a very clever system of governmental checks and balances to prevent any individual or any one or two branches of the Government overcoming another branch and rendering it impotent. The founding fathers were unwilling to trust absolute unchecked power to any branch of the Government because they believed that the long-continued possession of such power by any branch of the Government would lead to abuse and corruption as surely as it would in the individual or the group.

As I have said, the Government must have the advantage of advice from experienced business men and women if it is to be able to direct the Nation's transition from a war basis to a peace basis. You can see clearly why the Congress must have such advice when you stop to consider some of the questions which confront us. There will be contract termination; readjustment of small business; termination of wartime controls after cessation of hostilities; question of governmental financing of private business; methods of financing governmental operation; aviation; communications; reciprocal trade agreements; economy in government; social security, United States aid to other peoples; stabilization of foreign currencies; demobilization of our troops; demobilization of our defense workers; reemployment; foreign policy in the post-war world, together with the new unpredictable problems which will arise in connection therewith. This list of problems—and these are not all—presents the most stupendous array of major problems ever confronting Congress in the history of this Nation.

I have been very greatly amazed, and concerned over the attacks which are made from time to time against business leaders because they come to Washington in response to requests from committees of the Congress, or officials in the executive department of the Government, to contribute their advice, and give the Government the benefits of their experience. Some people are prone to regard such efforts of businessmen to aid their Government as something to be condemned rather than commended. Not only is that a serious mistake; not only is it grossly unjust; it is a grave disservice to this Nation. No political party can fight or win this war alone. No group, no class, no section can do the job. Victory can be won only by all the American people, united and working together. There never was a truer statement made than the old adage that "United we stand; divided we fall."

I want, then, as a Member of Congress, to urge you not to be deterred by slanders or assaults on your motives when you come to Washington to give your Government the benefits of your advice. In most cases those who assail you for so doing have never been in business; they have never managed an industry; they have never had to plan to meet a pay roll, or to put goods into the market. It has been well said by some wise man that he is first to criticize most bitterly who knows the least about the subject.

It is in line with the confused thinking which seems so prevalent today, for some people to imagine that businessmen, the managers of great and small industries, would be ready to ruin the country for selfish reasons. Most managers of industries, particularly the larger ones, are administering properties owned by thousands of stockholders scattered throughout the United States. The employees of many great corporations, such as the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., are stockholders in the company for which they work. I cannot see how anyone could imagine that the managers of industry, big or little, could ruin the country for their own selfish purposes when by so doing they would inevitably ruin their own stockholders, the businesses which they manage, and their own positions as well. To me, such reasoning simply does not make sense.

I understand just as well as you do that there is a small fringe, possibly 1 percent, of businessmen who are stupid, greedy, and short-sighted enough to do things which might injure their country and their own businesses. But I am convinced that probably 99 percent of American businessmen are sound, earnest, level-headed, patriotic citizens who are just as much concerned in preserving their country and its economy as any citizens possibly could be. It has been difficult, therefore, for me to understand the vicious attacks which are so frequently made on businessmen because they have the patriotism and the patience to try to help their Government, and try to give public officials and Members of Congress the benefit of their advice.

We must all recognize, and I believe you businessmen do recognize, that in the United States of America we will sink or swim together. In this great Nation we will survive or perish, not as a class, nor as a political party, nor as a section, nor as a clique or group. We will survive or perish together. If we lose our liberties, it will not be one class, or one section, or one group; it will be all of us together. If we lose our opportunity for individual progress according to individual capacity and initiative and energy, under a system of free enterprise and equality of opportunity, it will not be one group, or one class, or one political party, or one section which will lose that opportunity for progress and reward. It will be all of us—manager and workingman, farmer and city man—together.

I have a very valid reason for my intense and deep allegiance to a free-enterprise system of economy. I believe there must be both compulsions and incentives to induce men to work and plan and invent and progress. I believe, with Abraham Lincoln, that: "Few can be induced to labor exclusively for posterity, and none will do it enthusiastically. I like the system which lets a man quit when he wants to, and wish it might prevail everywhere. One of the reasons why I am opposed to slavery is just here. I take it that it is best for all to leave each man free, to acquire property as far as he can. Some will get wealthy. I don't believe in law to prevent a man from getting rich. It would do more harm than good. So, while we do not propose any war upon capital, we do wish to allow the humblest man an equal chance to get rich with everybody else."

I am convinced that the compulsions and incentives of a free private enterprise are vastly more efficient and preferable than the compulsions or incentives of governmental domination or competition or operation.

We Americans are all devoted to Lincoln's government of, by, and for the people. When we stop to analyze our economy we find that free private enterprise constitutes an economy of, by, and for the people. Under free private enterprise, properly and reasonably regulated by the Government as the umpire, the people are constantly voting for or against the products of the various producers. Every time the housewife goes to the market she votes for or against one product as against another. Quality, packaging, and price all enter into the reasons which cause her to prefer one product above another. The compulsions of that free competition force the manufacturers of all products continually to seek to better their goods and lower the price, in order to command a share of the market and reap the rewards of profit. The automobile was a shining example of the compulsions and the rewards of free private competitive enterprise. The man who produced the cheapest car in his time, and placed the automobile within the pocketbook range of even the poorest citizen, reaped a vast fortune as his reward for his inventive genius and his managerial ability. But he also provided a good automobile for the masses. He provided good jobs for thousands of people. He provided recreation for millions of people. He provided a new prosperity in a great segment of our economy. Good roads followed in the wake of the automobile, and the benefits generated by the vision, the inventive genius, and the managerial ability of one man have never ceased to this day.

Over and over again in a free enterprise economy it is the same old story of "a better mouse trap."

It is not conceivable that any government could find for its service officials who could be wise enough, and unselfish enough, to direct and control business, and to compel and direct the purchasing power and opportunities of the people a tenth as efficiently as can the people themselves.

I am reminded at this point of a declaration which was a profound fact when it was uttered, and which is just as profound a fact today. Let me quote it to you:

"The doctrine of regulation and legislation by 'master minds,' in whose judgment and will the people may gladly and quietly acquiesce, has been too glaringly apparent at Washington during the last 10 years. Were it possible to find 'master minds' so unselfish, so willing to decide unhesitatingly against their own personal interests or private prejudices, men almost godlike in their ability to hold the scales of justice with an even hand, such a government might be to the interest of the country, but there are none such on our political horizon, and we cannot expect a complete reversal of all the teachings of history." That profound statement was made by Franklin Delano Roosevelt, then Governor of New York, on March 2, 1930.

That philosophy applies just as much to our free enterprise economy as it does to our free society or to our Government.

Fellow citizens, we are confronted with the grim necessity of saving our Nation from assaults from without which would destroy us, and from dangers within which could destroy us. We, of this generation, have the choice and the task of saving this great, wonderful, free Nation of ours, or of losing it; of preserving or losing our Bill of Rights; of preserving or losing our free enterprise economy; of preserving or losing our free society; of preserving or losing those precious privileges and priceless liberties which make life in the United States of America the finest, richest, most beautiful, and most worth while of any human existence anywhere on this earth.

Our forefathers bled and died, sweated and sacrificed, to give to us this wonderful heritage of a free government and a free country and a free way of life.

The job of saving this country, the job of preserving the priceless heritage which is ours, to be held in trust for our posterity, as well as to be used by us in our day and generation, is the job of every man, woman, and child in this Nation. Patriotism is not a matter of party, it is of the heart and the soul. Love of liberty bears the label of no clique or section; it is common to all of us.

So, then, in conclusion, let me say to you that the businessmen of this Nation can and must contribute an immeasurable service to their Nation by their advice and experience brought to their Congress and to their public officials. In the fervor of this public service, in the fires of your patriotism, in the courage of your freedom, let the carping of narrow-minded critics be consumed and forgotten.

Idaho's Best Known Crop

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 7, 1944

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, few States in the Union are better known for the excellence of a great agricultural crop than Idaho for the excellence of its potatoes, an accomplishment that can be credited in a large measure to the enterprise of its people and the support of the Idaho Advertising Commission by the State government. It is my privilege to submit herewith a report of the commission:

[From the Idaho Granger for June 1944]

A REPORT TO THE POTATO GROWERS OF IDAHO

In reviewing the 1943–44 Idaho potato season, one fact stands head and shoulders above all others: Idaho potatoes sold at or near ceiling price the entire season and cleaned up early and easily.

This occurred in the face of the largest crop ever produced in Idaho and the United States plus the yield from 20,000,000 victory gardens. The largest Idaho crop previously marketed was 33,808 carloads. This season will exceed 47,000 pre-war minimum cars.

Another fact to consider is that every major production area except Idaho sought Government aid at support prices.

Many factors influenced this favorable movement of Idaho potatoes, including dehydration and Army purchases. But since all potato States participated in this extra demand, it appears that Idaho's success may be justly attributed to:

1. A superior potato.
2. Dependable grades.
3. Aggressive dealers.
4. Consistent advertising.

Advertising revenue this year will approximate $86,000. Of this amount, $73,000 was budgeted for direct advertising expenditure exclusive of administrative costs, which average about 10 percent.

Here's how Idaho's advertising assisted in moving the 1943–44 crop:

Because early shipments were large and might easily have caused an oversupply in terminal markets, Idaho joined with other potato-producing States in encouraging home storage wherever facilities were available. In this promotion, the country's most important retail stores joined forces with Idaho and other potato-producing States to sell thousands of extra carloads of potatoes in an orderly manner.

Accounting for some 42 percent of the $73,700 used for advertising during the 1943–44 season, Idaho's newspaper advertisements reached a total of 3,415,000 newspaper readers with some 62,000,000 individual messages. These messages were carried in 26 of the country's leading metropolitan newspapers, week after week throughout the selling season. These advertisements not only pointed out the superior qualities, but in addition promoted the use of Idahos to save ration points and conserve scarce foods.

More than 250,000 pieces of display material were printed in Idaho and distributed to retail stores throughout the country. Like the newspaper messages, these banners promoted the use of Idahos to save ration points and to conserve scarce foods; helped to put over the idea of buying larger quantities for home storage.

The hotel and restaurant operator, whose business has jumped more than 25 percent since the beginning of the war, was not overlooked. Idaho Russets and point-saving recipes were featured in a series of six full-page advertisements in magazines which are read by the hotel and restaurant trade.

More than 125,000 folders containing recipe and nutritional information were distributed to dietitians, home economics teachers, and students.

As a part of Idaho's publicity program, photographs, recipes, and stories appeared on newspaper food pages throughout the country at no space cost to the State.

Each year has shown the value of employing a man to represent the Idaho potato industry in the markets of the Middle West, East, and South. Main purpose is to advise wholesale and retail grocery stores and markets of the Idaho advertising program, to encourage purchase of Idaho potatoes, to promote store and window displays, educate produce clerks concerning Idahos and to report to the commission on crop outlook and competitive sales conditions in each section.

During the past season, in addition to doing this type of work in over 40 cities, C. G. Rice, Idaho's field representative, was assigned to many important potato-industry problems in Washington, D. C. Working under the direction of the Idaho Advertising Commission, Mr. Rice conferred with the War Production Board, War Food Administration, Office of Price Administration, Senators, Representatives, and many other individuals and agencies on behalf of Idaho farmers. This resulted in—

1. Price adjustments favoring Idaho growers. It was felt the original ceiling prices were unfair to Idaho and reasons were advanced to the proper authorities by Mr. Rice and others. Subsequent adjustment brought an estimated $3,500,000 extra revenue to Idaho on U. S. No. 1 potatoes alone.

2. Obtaining diggers and motors for the Idaho potato industry.

3. Securing additional allotments of fertilizer.

Idaho's advertising fund is small compared to those of other agricultural and industrial commodities, yet it is felt that it has clearly demonstrated its effectiveness this year.

Idaho Advertising Commission, R. H. Young, Chairman, State Commission of Agriculture, Boise; Chas. W. Barlow, Hazelton; H. M. Chase, Nampa; I. J. Longetieig, Craigmont; Joe Marshall, Twin Falls; H. G. Peckham, Wilder; Frank Westfall, Aberdeen; Lem Cook, Idaho Falls.

Prosecution of Insurance Companies Under the Sherman Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVE E. SATTERFIELD, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. SATTERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter addressed by me to the Attorney General of the United States:

JUNE 9, 1944.

Hon. FRANCIS BIDDLE,
Attorney General of the Unted States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BIDDLE: In connection with Monday's Supreme Court decision, on yesterday the press quoted you as follows: "Insurance companies now will be given a chance to change those rate-fixing and other practices which may be in conflict with the Sherman Act." A Justice Department spokesman was quoted in the same article as saying that the pending cases against 198 fire-insurance companies located in Atlanta would be called up for trial.

As a member of the Judiciary Committee of the House may I call your attention to the fact that the Walter bill, H. R. 3270, providing exemption for insurance companies specifically under the Sherman Act, and leaving to the States the control of insurance, has been favorably recommended by the Judiciary Committee and a rule was granted by the Rules Committee on January 27, 1944, for its consideration by the House. Before this measure could be brought up on the floor, arguments on the Atlanta case had been concluded before seven of the nine Justices of the United States Supreme Court. Sponsors of the Walter bill very properly refrained from asking that the bill be called up pending the deliberations of the Court.

Now that the decision of the Supreme Court, shocking in its implications and upsetting legal precedent of 75 years, has been handed down it seems to me that fairness and legal perception must lead you to the conclusion that the pending prosecution against the insurance companies in Atlanta should be held in abeyance until the people of this country, speaking through their Representatives in the Congress, decide this issue one way or the other but certainly beyond the pale of interpretative decision. To prosecute the Atlanta companies and to excuse or grant a grace period to all other insurance companies in the country who under the Supreme Court decision are equally guilty seems to me a very unfair procedure on the part of the Attorney General of the United States.

May I not suggest that all prospective prosecutions under this decision be held up until the Congress clarifies the legal situation. Surely, if members of the Court are of the opinion that, "Congress has not written one line of legislation deliberately designed to take over Federal responsibility for this important and complicated enterprise," and that nothing in the legislative history of the Congress suggests that the Sherman Act was intended to apply to the business of insurance, these defendants in Atlanta, with such distinguished persons in accord, ought not to be made scapegoats in the contemplated prosecutions.

Sincerely yours,

DAVE E. SATTERFIELD, Jr.

Handicapped Workers Used Many Years by St. Louis Firm

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I have just read an article in the June 7 issue of a publication known as the St. Louis Commerce which tells of the activities of the American Fixture & Manufacturing Co., of St. Louis, in the employment of handicapped workers.

This policy dates back, according to this article, 15 or 20 years, and at the present time 5 percent of their 400 workers are classified as handicapped. I am sure everyone will commend this company for rehabilitating handicapped citizens, granting them employment, and making them self-sustaining.

It is my hope that corporations all over the United States will follow this policy.

Under the permission granted me, I include as part of my remarks the article referred to:

Hiring handicapped workers is not a new policy with the American Fixture Manufacturing Co., although the number of these workers in our plant has increased somewhat since the manpower situation became acute.

We have been hiring such workers for a number of years—a few having been with us 15 or 20 years. And on the whole, we have found that they are dependable and excellent workmen. I do not mean to imply that some are not undependable and erratic. But I do believe that the percentage of undependables has not been any higher among these handicapped persons than it is among workers not suffering handicaps.

Approximately 5 percent of our 400 workers are handicapped in one way or another. They have lost hands, legs, eyes, or are deaf and dumb. One is almost blind and performs his work by touch and feel. In general, however, the type of work done in our industry does not lend itself to the hiring of blind persons.

These handicapped workmen receive the same wages for the same type of work as others in our plant. They work as bench hands, molding machine operators, carpenters, and maintenance men. Several earn nice bonuses each week because of their efficiency and ability. We will keep all who wish to remain with us after the war. Despite their handicaps, they are just as valuable to our organization as unhandicapped workers for they can do the same amount of work—and some can do more. They are happy to have jobs. Many have gone through the discouraging experience of tramping from one company to another searching work and they realize, even in these times, what it means to have a job. They do not take their responsibilities lightly.

Our most important task in hiring handicapped people is to sell them to the foremen under whom they will work. Unless the foreman is willing to work with them sympathetically, they may become discouraged. But we have found that most of our foremen, after seeing the enthusiasm which these people put into their work, and discovering that actually they can work as well as unhandicapped workers, will lose their objections quickly.

We intend to continue hiring handicapped workers, wherever practical, in cooperation with the United States Employment Service and the Red Cross. We have found that they make a valuable contribution to our plant.

Gasoline for Party Boat Fishermen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES G. AUCHINCLOSS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 10, 1944

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the decision of the Administrator of the O. P. A. in the matter of allotting extra gasoline for party boat fishermen who sell their catch in the commercial market. This request presented recently by 10 Congressmen from the eastern seaboard was denied on the grounds that the "amateur catch" turned in to the commercial market would be inconsequential. Conclusive evidence was submitted that this catch would total a considerable amount and would be a long way in making up the billion pounds' deficit for this year estimated by the Bureau of Fisheries.

The following editorial written by Bob Pierpont in the Wildwood Leader correctly expresses the feelings of the people in New Jersey on this short-sighted ruling. I plan to speak at length on this matter in the near future and explain the situation in detail.

CHESTER BOWLES NEVER WENT FISHING WITH US

In denying the request for more fuel for the operation of party fishing boats Chester Bowles made the statement that party-boat fishing was purely in the amateur class and that the catch of fish was quite negligible as a food factor. That is substantially as the report reached us. If the report is correct and Mr. Bowles actually said that, then Mr. Bowles' education in fishing has been most sadly neglected. Certainly he was never out fishing with us.

In the fishing season of 1941 party boats running from Wildwood brought in 1,625 tons, or 3,250,000 pounds, of fish. Party boats from Cape May in the same season brought in 1,350 tons, or 2,700,000 pounds, of fish. To catch those 2,975 tons of fish 89,000 gallons of fuel were consumed. Figure it out and you will see that each gallon of fuel brought in 67 pounds of fish. Reports from other fishing centers along the coast are in keeping with these figures. Long Island reports 50 pounds of fish per gallon of fuel.

When Mr. Bowles says party fishermen are in the amateur class and the fish caught are negligible as a food factor then indeed is Bowles talking through his bowler. A gallon of fuel for 67 pounds of food. That's a much better figure than farms can show. At a recent hearing on the matter in Washington figures were shown that a farmer requires and gets quite a few gallons for every 67 pounds of foodstuff he grows, and part of that stuff is spinach. Ugh!

But Mr. Bowles says party boats cannot have more than 125 gallons of fuel for the season. In a bureaucratic form of government the head of a bureau is a virtual dictator making his own rules according to his own opinions and understanding, or lack of it. So there is not much we can do about it now. But, perhaps, there'll come a time.

Barriers to Development of Air Transportation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PERCY PRIEST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, now that the invasion has actually begun I can speak out on a subject with which I have been greatly concerned. Everyone who has followed the news of the invasion of Europe, and I am sure we all have, must recognize the crucial role air-borne troops and equipment are playing in that operation. The Members must also realize that the transport airplane that is carrying those troops back of the enemy lines is not some newly designed military airplane but is the old familiar DC–3, which was developed as a result of the demands of our air-transport industry. That airplane, which has filled such a tremendous need in the most complicated and difficult military operation of all time, would never have been built if we had not been wise enough to see to it that a vigorous air-transport system was established and maintained. In the face of this conclusive proof of the wisdom of our previous policy with respect to air transportation it looks as if we are going to change it. It looks as if the airlines are to be subjected to State as well as Federal regulation. Thus, Congress, with ample power to prevent it, would permit the air-transport system to be engulfed in a sea of red tape and regulations so that its development will be impeded at every step of the way.

I have given long study to the unfortunate situation in which our interstate motor carriers find themselves because the Congress failed in its responsibility to protect them against burdensome and duplicating State regulation. I have been appalled at the effect these regulations have had upon their ability to do their share in the transportation of war materials. Their accomplishments have been heroic but they have been impeded on every hand with duplicating and unnecessary regulations.

Our air-transport industry up to this time has been relatively free of State regulation but unless Congress takes action to protect this means of transportation from burdensome State regulation, history will repeat itself and air transportation will never again be able to make its rightful contribution to the national interest. These fears of mine are not based upon imagination. I am not seeing ghosts.

On Tuesday, May 23, the Public Utilities Commission of the State of Colorado began hearings on a proposal for the State of Colorado to regulate all aviation in Colorado—both intrastate and interstate. Every Member of Congress will be interested in the fact that the Colorado proposal for the regulation of aviation covered 43 typewritten pages. Even the Federal Government could hardly write such a complicated epistle—and has not done so. Colorado even seeks to regulate the ashtrays within airplanes.

I recommend that each Member of Congress, both House and Senate, read the able speech by the Honorable A. L. BULWINKLE, of North Carolina, on this subject. It will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 23. Here is one more attempt to regulate, by duplication and confusion, American aviation out of the air. Today, our country stands first in the air; both in peace and in war. If each of the States should adopt a conflicting set of regulations in addition to the Federal Government, there would be 49 sets of rules. After carrying 49 rule books and a lawyer from each of the 48 States and the Federal Government, a pilot on a cross-country trip would have no room for cargo or passengers or even for his friends.

Recently a compilation was made as to the number of minutes that would be spent by T. W. A.'s Constellation over each of the States in a cross-country flight from New York to California. I am sure you will be interested in the figures. They are as follows:

	Time in minutes
New York	3
New Jersey	13
Pennsylvania	59
Ohio	47

Apparently there is a movement under way to hamstring aviation by having the States pass conflicting and confusing regulations against airplanes just as was done against trucks. If the Federal Government does not step into the picture and regulate this situation freedom of the air for the private flyer will not exist any more than it will for the pilot engaged in commercial activities. The House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee with foresight anticipated this situation as far back as 1942 and advised the world that hearings on this subject would be held. Hearings before that committee did begin early in 1943 and resulted in H. R. 3420, which has been pigeonholed in the House Rules Committee since last October. Thus, a few Members of the House, without particular study of all the facts are, in effect, whether they realize it or not, standing in the way of freedom of the air for the private flyer and permitting the origin of conflicting regulations against commercial aviation. The answer to all this is to take the Lea bill, H. R. 3420, out of the Rules Committee and pass it at this session of Congress. Otherwise, aircraft manufacturers, the backbone of our national security, will be greatly hurt, private flying will be hamstrung, and our air-transport system, which should be fit and ready for the protection of our national security, will not be permitted to grow.

What may happen to aviation, unless Congress acts, is well set forth in the parallel case cited on page 41 of the United States News of June 2, 1944, in an advertisement by Fruehauf Trailers which reads, in part, as follows:

A STORY OF CONFUSION RUNNING HALFWAY ACROSS THE CONTINENT

A passenger car is about to leave New York City—destination Des Moines. The automobile owner, with his driver's license and State license tag, knows that he can travel unmolested over the highways of the 7 States en route. A truck-trailer operator hauling a load of fresh ocean fish consigned to

Des Moines is also ready to leave New York. His route is through the same States as the passenger car. But here is the difference: New York permits him to use a 50-foot truck-and-trailer unit, with a gross weight of 50,000 pounds, including vehicle and load. He starts out. Upon entering New Jersey he is permitted a length of only 45 feet and a gross weight of 60,000 pounds—his equipment is 5 feet too long, but 10,000 pounds underloaded. Pennsylvania presents a bigger problem—a 45-foot length limit and only 45,000 pounds gross weight—5,000 pounds less than New York, 15,000 pounds less than New Jersey. That's not all, for he must also pay the State of Pennsylvania an 8 mills-per-dollar gross receipts tax on that part of his total mileage traveled in the State. Assuming that he were permitted to travel on to the Ohio line—again his truck-trailer is 5 feet overlength, while his vehicle is 6,000 pounds underloaded. And here he has to register with the public utilities commission and pay a fee of $72. In Indiana the length restriction is still 5 feet less than in New York, but the weight allowance is 3,900 pounds more. However, another payment is to be met, this time a $24 charge for obtaining operating authority from the Indiana Public Service Commission. Now, into Illinois—and serious trouble—the gross weight must be cut 10,000 pounds and the vehicle length slashed 15 feet, one-third less than the majority of States. And he must pay a special gross weight tax of approximately $245. Upon arriving at the border of Iowa he is 5 feet overlength, but underweight 3,900 pounds. Here he discovers that if he is to make regular runs he must buy an annual Iowa compensation tag, costing $250.

All of these restrictions and conflicting requirements take dollars out of your pocket. You eat the food and use the goods brought to you by trucks and trailers from all over the country. And the higher delivery cost resulting from unfair State taxes and lack of uniformity in State laws is in the price you pay.

Art of Politics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the Washington Post has printed an excellent editorial on the art of politics. I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the RECORD. I feel sure Members of this body will approve the views expressed therein.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ART OF POLITICS

Prompted by a University of Denver survey indicating that almost five out of seven Americans think it virtually impossible for a professional politician to remain honest, Mayor LaGuardia has sprung to the defense of "the art of politics." In a recent radio address, inspired by a New York Times editorial on the subject, he suggested that he might some day launch a campaign to bring politics into better repute as a profession or vocation. In our opinion, there is no kind of publicity work that would pay higher dividends. Exaggerated ideas of the extent of political corruption have undoubtedly been fostered by the featuring of political scandals and attacks on dishonest politicians. The press and other organs of public opinion are to be praised rather than blamed for concentrating attention on political abuses with a view to exposing and expelling the scamps and scoundrels who hold public office. Nevertheless, this one-sided emphasis has resulted in too little attention being given to the valuable services performed by honest public servants.

The work of enlightenment might well begin by giving the people more information about the activities of Members of Congress. Most of the hard and grueling labor performed by our national legislators is transacted behind the scenes or in committee hearings, with only a handful of people present. Casual tourists visiting the Capitol listen to Congressmen and Senators delivering speeches from the floor to empty seats or amidst a conversational din. They go away believing that their representatives are playboys, not even interested in the oratorical extravagances of their colleagues. If these same tourists knew how many hours of mental labor and how much physical effort are expended by Members of Congress in attending committee meetings and holding hearings preliminary to reporting out countless bills, they would revise their opinion of the caliber of the National Legislature. For that matter, anyone with the stamina to read without prejudice debates on important issues reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will almost certainly conclude that the art of politics, as practiced in this country, has brought into Congress many men of keen minds and public spirit.

The public often does injustice to professional politicians by failing to understand that willingness to compromise an issue does not necessarily imply lack of integrity. There is a vast difference between making concessions to secure needed support for a favored measure and bartering away one's principles for the sake of selfish political advantage. Minor compromises have to be made by any man who aspires to hold political office; indeed, compromises must be made to keep the legislative machinery from stalling.

Political reputations also suffer because the public is inclined to put a premium on show-off qualities that handicap the sober, conscientious man who may be inclined to hide his light under a bushel. As a result many politicians seek votes by trying to satisfy the public taste for the bizarre or the spectacular. The remedy for this situation lies obviously in elevating public standards of taste and education. That is a long-time process, but we can and should begin right now to give the public more information about the positive contributions that practitioners of the art of politics make to the national welfare. That is essential not alone in the interest of the unjustly maligned but as a means of preserving public respect for democratic institutions.

WASPS Want Fair Play for WTS-CAA Men First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. MORRISON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. MORRISON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the Washington Daily News of June 12, 1944:

MANY WASPS REPORTED QUITTING IF THEY ARE GIVEN ARMY STATUS

WASPS themselves question their essentiality to the war effort and a sizable number may resign if Congress gives them Army status, according to Mrs. Jeanne Robertson, 26, Los Angeles, Calif., a WASP who resigned recently for "personal reasons" after piling up 400 hours flying time.

In Washington en route to her home, she said:

"Twenty-five percent if not more would resign, in my opinion, if they are militarized," commenting on the bill to commission the WASPS scheduled for House debate this week. She made clear that she was basing her opinion on conversations with WASPS she knew.

"All these reports of thousands of trained civilian pilots released and now grounded make them wonder how necessary they are," she said. "And there's a reluctance to fly the heavy, fast planes because they're a challenge, particularly on the part of those who have husbands and children."

It's the girls who went into the WASPS from patriotic motives, some of them at considerable sacrifice, who would resign if they thought they weren't needed, Mrs. Robertson said.

Mrs. Robertson's report of the question about WASP essentially was backed up by another resigned WASP, in a letter recently received by a friend in Washington.

"Ever since we arrived at our ferry bases after graduation, and were promptly disillusioned as to their need of our services, the situation has been a source of discussion among the members of our class. There seemed to be no need to train women for ferry pilots as the bases were apparently overstocked with capable men who sometimes begged for a chance to fly just 4 hours in the month to keep on flight pay.

"As we saw it, the only possible reason why they might need us would be that a sudden, terrific (but unlikely) reversal in the war's progress would drain the country of men pilots. Since the program did exist, however, we were darn glad to have had the opportunity to receive the training, and hoped we would be able to fly."

The Upper Basin Speaks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am inserting in the RECORD two editorials from the Miles City Star, of Miles City, Mont. I strongly urge the membership of the House to read the fighting words contained therein, because they express our feelings in the use of the Missouri's waters in no uncertain tones.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike taking up so much of the House's time with this particular subject, but I feel it is necessary to do so. Our water is our lifeblood and our dependence on it is far greater than most people outside our area imagine. We know that if you study this problem that you will agree with our viewpoint and realize the difficulties which will confront us if our water is taken away from us.

The editorials follow:

[From the Miles City (Mont.) Star of June 4, 1944]

THE KANSAS CITY GENTRY

We apply the term "gentry" to the Kansas City pirates, who would rob us of the waters of the Missouri River Basin, with due regard for its meaning and not that it applies to them in its true sense. But according to the Kansas City Star (the mouthpiece of these super-de luxe pork barrel artists) the water filchers are a high class type of God's appointed children, while we of the upper basin States are "provincial," "selfish," and "local." A couple of their editorials on the matter of the Missouri River development abound with those terms, as well as "provincial," "selfishness," "sectional," "regional," and "dangerous proposal." All are applied to us who live in Montana, Wyoming, and North Dakota.

If we did not know that the editorial writer of the Kansas City Star was a highly paid individual, well trained to do the bidding of his overlord, we would be appalled at the ignorance of the man. However, we fully understand that editorials such as the Kansas City Star is putting out at the present time, vilifying the upper basin States and their inhabitants, are written for the purpose of putting us in a bad light. The writer of those editorials is a little haywire on some of his geography and the Fort Peck Dam, but, by and large, he is writing for the purpose of throwing the unthinking people of the lower States off the trial. You see, the water pirates of the lower Missouri aren't the least bit interested in irrigation and only slightly more in flood control. Oh, yes, they shout from the house tops about "flood control," which they could easily have by cooperating with the upper States. But they want cheap navigation for the transportation rackets which they carry on at the expense of the taxpayers. The Government subsidy for water-borne freight has been going on for a long time. But now it is out in the open because of the greediness of the Kansas City, Omaha, Sioux City, and Mississippi Valley gangs. The Federal Government has been subsidizing river transportation to the tune of millions of dollars. One disgusted resident of the State of Missouri says that the Government would be money ahead if it stopped subsidizing these navigation filchers and carried all the river freight on the Missouri by mail at first-class rates.

Those fellows in and around Kansas City, and their lesser counterparts at Sioux City, know full well that they can have the flood control they prattle about by going along with the irrigationists. It is as simple as A, B. C. If we build dams in the upper reaches of the Big Horn, Yellowstone, and Missouri Rivers in Wyoming and Montana and if additional storage dams are built in North and South Dakota, won't the run-off waters that flood the boys out of house and home down Kansas City way be controlled?

That is exactly what the Bureau of Reclamation proposes to do. But in that kind of a plan the navigationists do not fare well, and that is what the Kansas City, Omaha, and Sioux City boys are kicking up all the ruckus about. They want more water for a 9-foot channel in the Missouri River from Sioux City to the Mississippi. They have a 6-foot channel authorized now, but shucks, if you can carry on piracy on a 6-foot channel, you can carry on 50 percent more on a 9-foot one and twice as much on a 12-foot Government subsidized waterway. Don't let anyone kid you that the "cheap" transportation boys down there are not thinking of a 12-foot channel. That will be the next rabbit to come out of the hat.

At this point we address a few words to our friends in Sioux City. For years the livestock commission merchants of your city have been after the cattle and sheep marketing of this territory. The newspapers of this section have cooperated with you in many ways, not the least of which was seeing that your market quotations were before our people. All in all, a very friendly relationship has been built up for you, at the expense of such other points as Chicago and South St. Paul. In this present fight against the water pirates of your section we find the St. Paul and Minneapolis fellows on our side of the fence. Your business associates are lined up against us. Now then, which do you want most—our cattle and sheep or the water we need for irrigation to raise crops to feed those cattle and sheep? You can't have both and you may end up without either. Whatever else happens, we still control our cattle and sheep and when the smoke of this battle clears away, we will deal with our friends. The people of your territory who are trying to steal the water of our rivers are not our friends. Neither is the highly paid propagandizing head of the Mississippi Valley Association (who maintains his home in California, we are told) or your competitors, the Kansas City commission houses.

When this issue has been settled, are you going to have any friends left in the Wyoming-Montana-North Dakota territory? Certainly you are not if you don't get your water pirates in and around Sioux City straightened out. The Kansas City lay-out will write you off their calling list as soon as the final whistle has blown.

We hope you will see to it that your section ceases its opposition to a plan which is good for everybody except the cheap transportation addicts of Kansas City and Omaha.

And now a word to the lad who writes the Kansas City editorials on the subject under discussion herein. You, my friend, in your issue of May 8, refer to the free water for irrigating lands coming into production under the proposed Missouri River development. We can understand that having been associated with the predatory navigation interests of your section so long you cannot think of anything unless it is free. For your enlightenment (and you could have learned this by reading the Bureau of Reclamation plan instead of that of the Army engineers) the total cost of the Bureau of Reclamation plan is set at $1,257,645,700. Of this amount, $516,545,700 is charged off as a gift to the needs of flood control and navigation. This is the free stuff you don't talk about, but nevertheless it is free to you and your cohorts. Not a thin dime of that amount will ever be returned to the Federal Treasury, which is, of course, the taxpayers of the Nation. But the same plan does call for repayment by the lands irrigated under this expansion of the enormous sum of $298,000,000. Does that strike your intelligence as being free water? In addition to that, by the proper location of the dams, an additional recovery of $423,100,000 can be made from the sale of power generated. That is more than the entire amount of $419,300.70, allocated for flood control alone, and which will not be repaid. Who is going to use that power? Well, it's dollars to doughnuts that the revenue from it will come from the consuming population that will grow up on the irrigated lands; from the sugar factories, the packing plants, the railways and the processors of the unlimited natural resources of the upper Missouri States. There is nothing free about providing water for the reclaiming of lands of this vast empire and if you, the editorial writer of the Kansas City Star, would point your nose foursquare with the rest of the world, instead of hiking it up to look at the moon, you would be as well aware of that fact as are the people who really do know something about irrigation.

Instead of being bound down by their narrow navigation viewpoint, the owners of the Kansas City Star could do this Nation a great service by getting behind the Bureau of Reclamation plan for the development of the Missouri River. For out of that development will come flood control and a vast new empire as well; a land in which the underfed and underclothed of the industrial sections of the Nation can become producers of sufficient food and fiber to maintain themselves on a happy and healthy basis. An industrial center like Kansas City cannot help but profit immensely from such an empire and we are surprised at the shortsightedness of a great newspaper such as the Kansas City Star in the stand they have taken.

We hope they will see the light and join up with the progressive forces who are moving to stabilize the economy of the Missouri River Basin.

[From the Miles City (Mont.) Star of June 7, 1944]

SO THE OMAHA BOYS WILL ALSO UNDERSTAND

There appears in the Omaha (Nebr.) Evening World of May 15 an editorial entitled "The Aimless Fight," wherein the Missouri River development is discussed. The conclusion of the editorial is that "it is a dismal picture" because the plans of the Army engineers as expressed in the Pick plan are not supinely and at once accepted by all of the interests on the river. The Bureau of Reclamation, charged by law with the primary obligation of reclamation development in the 17 reclamation States, is smeared by the editor as merely an agency seeking projects. The irrigation interests are pictured as having no more laudatory objectives than to support the designs of railroad carriers. The conflict between uses of water for navigation and irrigation are belittled by a "stroke of the pen" without any supporting evidence and contrary to the showings made before the Commerce Committee.

Thus the editor places the controversy on the narrow basis of a conflict between two Federal agencies and not on the fundamental basis of working out a broad framework of future economic development. He apparently has little patience with those who would create new agricultural wealth to supplement the future growth of such cities as Omaha and Kansas City. In the narrow confines of an editorial observation, he would decry and wholly disregard the conclusions of the agricultural interests and the agencies, Federal and State, which have long studied the water requirement for future irrigation development. He would leave all this to the engineering judgment and discretion of the agency primarily concerned with flood control and navigation. He is oblivious to the great need for flood control and the part upper basin storage for both irrigation and flood control will play in river basin project adjustments.

This editor, too, does not seem to appreciate the fact that the whole controversy was precipitated by a headlong effort to obtain authorization of the Pick plan without any reasonable effort being made to coordinate the plan of the Army and that of the Bureau. This hurried endeavor for congressional authorization was made in the face of the availability of the Bureau of Reclamation report on May 1, 1944. The Pick plan was rushed to the Halls of Congress in disregard of any final action by a Basin States' committee set up to deal with the problem; and this plan was submitted for action by Congress in aid of navigation which would have the effect of establishing the primacy of water use on the river in favor of navigation. Such authorization was sought on the expressed view that if present and future irrigation needed water not the law but the good will and discretion of the Army engineers would determine whether such uses would be met. This view is supported by the theory that irrigation interests should not seek the protection of the law which is fundamental to our form of government, but should become supplicants at the feet of a Federal agency, the Corps of Army Engineers. That the Army engineers and not the law should become the masters of the situation is the central theme of this position.

The Chief of the Corps of Army Engineers and nearly all of the proponents of the navigation improvements in the Pick plan asserted in the hearings before the Commerce Committee of the Senate that irrigation uses should be accorded primacy over navigation requirements and yet they did not want this principle written into law. If these men are sincere in this opinion, then there should be no objection that the principle should be expressed by a congressional act. If there is doubt of their sincerity, then there is surely abundant reason for such a congressional declaration.

Aside from all this, the amendment proposed by the irrigation interests provides the machinery to bring about a coordinated plan which all advocate as the constructive approach for the protection of maximum uses of the Missouri River water for all purposes. But this proposal was labeled a crazy amendment by one of the Army engineers at the Commerce Committee hearings.

Yes, indeed, Mr. Editor it is a dismal picture so long as one interest insists upon navigation by project authorization, being placed in a position to control the situation. It is not only dismal but disheartening so long as constructive efforts to encourage cooperation of the Federal agencies with the States, cooperation among Federal agencies and integration of project planning is so blindly opposed.

Six to One Is Average Ratio Federal to State Civilian Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from Washington Close-up for May 1944, issued by the Citizens National Committee of the District of Columbia:

SIX TO ONE IS AVERAGE RATIO OF FEDERAL TO STATE CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

About 5 percent of the working population of the United States works in the executive branch of the Federal Government, approximately three million people. Ten percent of them are in the Washington, D. C., area, 10 percent are in the State of New York, 9 percent in California, and the remainder are scattered across the other 46 States.

Some interesting comparisons of the extent and detail of this distribution are available from the figures below, based on Department of Labor statistics as of October 1943, and Department of Commerce figures for State government employment. Broad variations appear. In one State only, West Virginia, State employees exceed Federal, 9,383 to 8,000. Connecticut with 9,704 state employees to 10,700 Federal and New Hampshire with 3,250 State employees to 3,700 Federal are close to even. Preponderance of Federal employees graduates proportionately to those of States like Florida and Georgia, where the proportion of Federal to State is 12 and 13 to 1, respectively.

Much of this excess is due to the war agencies. Navy yards, arsenals, camps, airfields, shipping centers use large numbers of Federal workers. But with the elimination of all activities of this sort, Federal workers in admittedly nonwar agencies exceed State workers in all but 10 States. The figures include Federal employees within United States continental limits. State figures with symbol (*) are for closest available date:

Contribution of Polish-Americans to the War Effort

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpts from a speech recently made by me:

Speaking at the dedication of the honor roll at the Polish Hall, Green Street, Clinton, Mass., tonight, Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN of Clinton, vehemently attacked the organized communistic minority, which, he asserted, was carrying out well-laid plans to undermine basic American institutions while the war is on and the boys are away.

Praising the great contribution of Polish-Americans to our war effort, and the upbuilding of the Nation and pledging his continued support of efforts to preserve Poland from both Nazi and Russian domination, the Clinton Congressman warned that unless the American people, acting as a whole and without regard to party, class, or racial distinction, make a determined drive to smash the present and ever-widening influence of avowed radicals in the Government and our industrial and social life, the American form of government will, in the not too distant future, be uprooted and replaced with Marxian Communistic bureaucracy, similar to that which prevails in Russia.

Congressman PHILBIN said in part: "Commingled tonight with profoundest feelings of sympathy for the parents and families of those of this brave band who have paid the supreme sacrifice and whom we here honor, are sentiments of heartfelt pride and gratitude for the valor and heroism of our noble Polish-American sons who are serving our country in this greatest crisis. Their efforts and their sacrifices are but additional evidence of the devotion and loyalty that has marked the history of Polish-Americans since the time they first set foot upon our shores.

"We can never give adequate acknowledgment to the contributions of this group to America, her upbuilding and welfare, nor to the unexcelled patriotism of these noble sons.

"But we can and must make sure that the great and stirring sacrifices of these boys shall not be in vain. We must strive to effect self-determination for all nations, great and small, and the very early and certain liberation of valiant little Poland, whose centuries of struggles for liberty has been an inspiration to the whole world, above all, to the freedom-loving people of America. I pledge my continued and utmost efforts toward these ends in the Congress of the United States.

"Another subject should command our attention on this sacred occasion, namely, the ominous spread of communism throughout the world, and more particularly in our own country. Most of us never thought we would 'see it happen here,' but the fact is that strongly organized, well-financed, skillfully directed Marxian communism has reared its head in our own congressional district. Hiding behind the war effort, taking advantage of the concentration of our people on the course of our arms and the well-being of our boys fighting on global fronts, these dangerous groups, once working surreptitiously, have now brazenly come out in the open and are seeking to dominate in behalf of the world-wide Red colossus of communism our industrial and social, our business and political life.

"I warn you, my friends, tonight, as we gather here with bowed heads to laud and pray for our brave young war heroes, both the living and the dead, that unless the American people shall soon awaken to this creeping, sinister menace which has crawled into our midst, and smash once and for all the power and influence of radical schemers and crackpots in government, the industrial and the political affairs of our Nation, the free America that we have known in the past, all our liberties and most cherished institutions will be undermined and replaced with a minority-organized radical bureaucracy, modeled after the fashion of Russia which will sound the death knell of human freedom in this country.

"Having firm faith in the ultimate wisdom and soundness of our citizens, I have supreme confidence that the American people will not let these heroes down while they are away in distant lands engaged in foreign wars. As true believers in Americanism—the greatest ism of all times—we must and will break the power of organized communism in this district and in the Nation, whatever banner under which it masquerades, and thus recapture and forever sustain our rights as free men and women under the Constitution of the United States."

Six-Year Limit Urged for Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAT ARNOLD

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent having been granted me by the House of Representatives, I extend in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following article which appeared in the Washington Star, Sunday, June 11, 1944. I respectfully submit the article to attention of the Congress and the country:

SIX-YEAR LIMIT URGED FOR CONGRESS—REPRESENTATIVE WAT ARNOLD CITES BENEFITS HE SEES IN PROPOSAL HE ADVANCES

(By Gould Lincoln)

WAT ARNOLD, of Missouri, is a rara avis. A Representative of the First Missouri Congressional District, he is seeking to put a 6-year limitation upon tenure of office, not only of the President and Vice President, but also of Members of the Senate and House.

"I am," said Mr. ARNOLD, "a political heretic. The dubious distinction is perhaps more real than apparent, for the subject of my heresy is one which must be trod upon lightly by my congressional colleagues, for fear of public reaction.

"I favor a limitation of the terms of office of all elected representatives of the people of the United States of America, and such an attitude seems to border closely upon betrayal of the sacred trust of political office-holding."

The Missourian, who holds these unusual views about the number of terms Senator and Representative shall have—he limits a Senator to one term of 6 years and a Member of the House to three terms of 2 years each—is a successful businessman in Kirksville, a small city of 10,000 population in the very heart of the district which he represents. For 40 years he has operated a lumber business there.

PROPOSES AMENDMENT

Mr. ARNOLD has introduced in the House a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution to carry out his tenure of office ideas. It is before the House Judiciary Committee. A Republican, Mr. ARNOLD plans to go before the resolutions committee of the Republican National Convention when it gets down to work on the G. O. P. platform in Chicago in the next week or two.

Discussing further his hobby, tenure of office, Mr. ARNOLD said: "Perhaps my background and admitted political innocence as a freshman Member of Congress are partially responsible for my unorthodox views. I am happy to plead guilty to the charge of viewing the problems of the National Legislature from the standpoint of a small businessman, from a small town in the Middle West, and I am equally eager to admit that I am a political neophyte, for I am now serving my first term of public office of any description or kind as a Member of the Seventy-eighth Congress.

"However, I am not in the least convinced that my views are rendered the less intelligent or progressive by reason of the nature of their conception. Rather do I feel that a fresh approach to the whole structure of our political economy is the crying need of the moment.

"I find that I am, by virtue of my election, enrolled as a Member of the strongest pseudo union in the world. The rights of protective employment, seniority, and the innumerable privileges of office are mine to use as I will; and the payment of my dues, in the form of periodic reelection by my constituents, promises to become increasingly painless with the passing years. By careful tending of political fences, I find that representation is expected to blossom from the promising bud of popular service to the full flower of professionalism in the art of purveying legislation by the years."

SENSE OF PERSPECTIVE LESSENS

"To me, such a metamorphosis is a crime committed in the name of democracy. No American should aspire to a career as a President, or as a Congressman. Industries, institutions, and ideas change too swiftly. Overlong exposure to the impersonal glare of the public spotlight focused upon Capitol Hill causes the sense of perspective which guides a public servant to diminish or even disappear entirely."

Mr. ARNOLD has another distinction. He is a Republican in a district which has gone Democratic except in the Hoover landslide of 1928, for three generations. He is a candidate for reelection this year and has no opposition for the nomination. Two years ago he won the Republican nomination against two opponents. Then, without making a speech during the entire campaign, he took the veteran former Representative Romjue to town. He defeated the Democrat who had represented the district for a score of years by 8,300 votes. Since he has been in the House, Mr. ARNOLD has confined himself to being on the job and voting. He has made no speeches. During the coming campaign, however, he does intend to make a few addresses in his district.

"A public officer, in my opinion," said Mr. ARNOLD, continuing his comments, "should be so restricted in his tenure of office that his efforts as a legislator would not have the opportunity to become completely unhinged from everyday realities, as calculated from the standpoint of John Q. Public.

"His period of service to his country should be spent in complete freedom from the aggravating responsibility of continuously building toward reelection. A Congressman should serve his term of office and then return to his district to see if he could earn a decent moral living under the laws which he had been instrumental in enacting. No Congressman who cannot demonstrate his usefulness to his constituents in a practical enough way to justify his continuance in office for three terms should expect to be returned to Congress indefinitely. Such a down-to-earth approach to the problem should be a forever effective bar to the overloading of the statute books with legislation as ill-conceived as is its effect upon a red tape-ensnarled citizenry."

WOULD INFUSE NEW BLOOD

I asked Mr. ARNOLD what would be the effect and the benefit from his plan of limiting tenure of office should it be adopted. He replied:

"The infusion of new blood into the Nation's Legislature, which would be the direct result of limiting the eligibility of a public servant to reelection, should produce the immediate benefit of breaking up congressional and administrative cliques—those instruments of perversion whereby the popular mandate and the true functions of the republican form of government are so viciously inverted.

"No legislator needs to be reminded of the archaic procedure by which standing committee chairmanships pass to the senior member in point of service. There is no qualification, other than endurance, which a Congressman need possess to inherit the tremendous burden of power and responsibility inherent in the administration of committee activities.

"Such practices will cease, to the ultimate good of the Nation, if my resolution is enacted into law. This resolution, which I introduced in the House on October 14, 1943, provides for a 6-year limitation of the office of the President, Vice President, Senators, and Members of the House. The Representatives may, if my bill is enacted into law, have three terms of 2 years each so that the idea of the framers of the Constitution can still be carried out, that of a change in the House every 2 years.

"It was not my intention, in introducing the bill, to question the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution. The stipulated 2-year term of office will stand, but with the added qualification that no more than three such terms may be served by any one person."

Mr. ARNOLD said that another benefit, if his plan became law, "will be to sponsor a much more progressive approach to the entire legislative program.

"It should foster the growth of such sorely needed innovations as the staffing of all full committees with legislative experts whose duty it would be to analyze critically all projected legislation. The aid of such impartial advisers would tend to increase the effectiveness of committee functions tremendously. No legislator under existing circumstances, can do full justice to every official decision which he is forced to make. His public life is so full of extraneous matters, mainly in the interest of reelection, that he has scant time to explore the extensive ramifications of the State affairs which come within his purview."

BUREAUCRACY IN LEGISLATURE

The Missouri Representative at this point advanced a new idea—that bureaucracy may exist in the legislative as well as in the executive. He said:

"It seemed to me, in framing the resolution, that the manifest evils of bureaucracy are as well entrenched in the legislative branch of government as they are in executive. I could see no reason for limting the tenure of the one department and yet allowing the other to remain a snug harbor for career politicians and the domineering cliques which impose their selfish will upon the Congress and the country at large.

"It is a humiliating commentary upon the native intelligence of America to consider that we must have a ruling class of legislators. This Nation was born to demonstrate the antiquity and inadequacy of monarchy as a form of government for free men. Yet our democratic process, by its occasionally overweening liberality, has spawned a school of chosen rulers who acquire their right to regulate the conduct of their peers by a system as morally unwholesome as the 'divine rights of kings' theory.

"There is no elected representative of this people who is so superior intellectually or so faultlessly correct in his judgments as to deserve an exclusive monopoly upon the right of government. When a servant of the public comes to regard himself as an indispensable asset to his constituency, then the warning signal of fascism is flying. When the notion runs rampant that the people serve the state—in the form of its elected leaders—then the time has come for a more diligent exercise of the right of independent choice and self-determination by the individual citizen. It is by virtue of these functions alone that our Nation remains unassailable in strength and stability."

CITES AGE OF LEADERS

Mr. ARNOLD pointed out that long tenure of office inevitably resulted in the holding of important positions by men of advanced age. In this connection he said:

"These revealing facts were published recently. The ages of committee chairmen of Senate Committees on Appropriations, Agriculture, Post Offices, Privileges and Elections, Commerce, Reclamation, and Naval Affairs are 86, 80, 75, 77, and 71, respectively. In the House the chairman of the important Ways and Means Committee is 80; Foreign Affairs, 74; Rules, 78; Rivers and Harbors, 83.

"The public functions of government should be given the benefit of mature wisdom in their administrations. There is, however, no reason why Washington should become the happy hunting ground for senility.

"Contrast the ages of these present Members of Congress with those of the men who served in our Republic's first administration and the reasons for the all-too-frequent ineptitude of our current Congress and Cabinet will be plainly revealed. Thomas Jefferson was 46; Alexander Hamilton, 32; Henry Knox, 29; Samuel Osgood, 41; Edmond Randolph, 36.

"The fruitful years of a legislator's public life too often becomes the laurel wreath of acclaim upon which he pins a monotonous sequence of public acts. Gradually, as term succeeds term, the affairs of the Congressman's district become more remote to him. He becomes a part of the Washington scene. The details of organization and maintenance of the machinery of election are left to his henchmen back home. To all intents and purposes, he becomes a Capitolite in fact, and the State or Territory which granted him his seat continues to be his home and center of interest only as necessity and convenience dictate."

FEARS PROLONGED STAY

"The exigencies of war make it imperative that the Congress remain in almost continuous session. Until the moment of victory comes, and well into the period of reconstruction following the conflict, it will be necessary to follow the same legislative schedule in the interest of the Nation's welfare.

"Naturally, such a condition tends to expand tremendously the dangerous policy of increased centralization of government in Washington. The issue of State's rights may become irrevocably lost in the complex maze of bureaucracy and government by directive, unless a substantial bulwark is established against further encroachment.

"To guarantee a regular infusion of new blood into the ranks of Congress would provide an excellent means of anticentralization control."

The fact that many Members of Congress after they have been retired remain in Washington and open offices here brought from Mr. Arnold the following comment:

"The shores of the pond of Washington society are littered with an accumulation of humanity deposited there by reason of the presence of public servants in various stages of activity—mostly defunct. Like the college football star who loves to play football and hates to quit his playing and go to work, they are victims of the system which produces them. Once they have gotten a taste of the undeniable glamor which attends the position of an elected official of the United States Government, they are forevermore grandstand players. Their sense of value becomes distorted. They lose interest in their former pursuits as a rule, and willingly adopt the profession of staying in Washington."

WOULD LIMIT NEPOTISM

"Congestion in the metropolitan area has passed the point of being merely humorous. It has become a civic necessity to relieve the pressure wherever possible, and there could be no better place to commence than in the ranks of congressional entourages whose official status has been liquidated."

A limitation of office tenure, Mr. ARNOLD contended, would have the effect of limiting nepotism in Washington.

"Despite the unfavorable publicity which has always attended the practice," Mr. ARNOLD said, "nepotism flourishes in official Washington, particularly on Capitol Hill. To limit the tenure of office of public servants would force healthful purgation of the process of hanging an assortment of relatives on the public pay roll. If such political et ceteras were placed on notice that they could expect no more than 6 years at the most as beneficiaries of the United States Treasury, it is certain that there would be much less enthusiasm displayed by them for the plums of patronage which are the present just due of every Congressman."

Referring to the crisis through which the Nation is passing, Mr. ARNOLD continued: "No one will attempt to minimize the terrible urgency of the tasks facing the Congress today. As the physical strife of battle ceases, the moral and spiritual strife of the search for a just peace will begin.

TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-THREE LAWYERS IN CONGRESS

"It is a time when the voice of the people—all of the people—must be heard. It is not an occasion for a lawyer's convention, of whom there are 57 in the Senate and 233 in the House; nor should it be the occasion for a private council of career politicians. We must have as broad as possible, a cross-section of American opinion in the solution of our problem. We shall not have it unless and until we take steps to introduce into the legislature a new and politically untrammeled group of elected representatives; men who will be solely dedicated to the task of impersonal judgment and the enacting of legislation with neither fear nor favor designed to benefit the Nation as a whole.

"So long as there is no restriction, however, upon tenure of office, there will be an unabated continuation of all the old evils. The aggravating political conspiracies and boondoggling practices will continue to plague the Nation. The ancient compromise between electoral sin and saintliness will rule, as it always has.

"An adult nation deserves something better than these immature modes of conduct. The age of idealism in political affairs is upon us. To demonstrate our worthiness to act as a leader in the world community to come, we should hasten to eradicate some of the ugly stains which mar the perfection of our fundamental concept of government of, by, and for the people."

D-Day Statement of R. J. Thomas, President of the United Automobile Workers, C. I. O.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Mr. R. J. Thomas, president of the U. A. W.-C. I. O., addressed on June 6, 1944, to the union's members employed in war plants:

R. J. Thomas, president of the U. A. W.-C. I. O., today issued the following statement addressed to the union's 1,200,000 members employed in war plants:

"Our 'negotiations' in Europe have entered their final stage. It is the kind of "negotiation' that is being carried on with cannon and machine gun, with naval batteries and with bombers. General Eisenhower is our chief negotiator.

"For years before 1939 the forces of freedom tried to negotiate peacefully with persuasion. The Nazis and Fascists could not be persuaded. They preferred the force of arms. Taking peace-loving peoples unaware, they won the first rounds in the battle.

"Today the tide has turned. The negotiators of the United Nations have carried the war into Hitler's front yard. Before long they will be giving Germany a bitter taste of warfare on their home grounds.

"Union men and women will understand when I say that General Eisenhower is our chief spokesman, the general staff of the United Nations is our top negotiating committee, and the millions of men in allied uniforms our rank and file.

"We in the war plants of the Nation are the second formations of the rank and file who are today invading the European continent. We must apply ourselves as never before to the tasks of producing weapons of warfare. Every man, every woman, every minute of manpower counts. Every shell and bullet we turn out today is scheduled for delivery and explosion in the heart of nazidom.

"It may be a U. A. W.-made shell or bullet that will find Hitler cowering in some hideaway and smash his miserable carcass into perdition, a U. A. W.-made gun or plane that blasts Goering and Goebbels into pulp.

"On the outcome of this final stage of our campaign rests the future of freedom and labor. If we match the courage of our men of war—and we shall do that—we cannot fail. Our objective is a collective agreement, a contract whose first clause will call for the total elimination of nazi-ism and fascism, and the destruction of the leaders of these twin scourges.

"I call on the rank and file in the U. A. W. shops to join with our rank and file in uniform to help make invasion day the day of freedom for Europe and for the world. We want a closed shop for freedom; a shop, a world, that will be closed forever to totalitarianism, dictatorship, and the barbarism of Hitlerism.

"General Eisenhower, we greet you with a pledge: Every man, every women, every possible hour of production for victory."

If You Have Tears To Shed for Chain Stores, Prepare to Shed Them Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, the question "When a corner grocery store is not a corner grocery store" is answered in the Little Businessman, a newspaper which carries at its masthead the Voice of Small Business. The following article appeared in a recent issue of that publication:

IF YOU HAVE TEARS TO SHED FOR CHAIN STORES, PREPARE TO SHED THEM NOW

A few of our small businessmen have been moved to tears because the people's government has been compelled to take over the Montgomery Ward chain business. Their emotions have run with bitter tears when they saw in the press a picture of the chairman of that large corporation being hoisted out of his business by men in military uniform, and they even protested that our President was making a grave mistake—that the end of free enterprise had come—and from now on we will be under a terrible dictator.

These few folish little businessmen should open their eyes and begin to do a little thinking. Does not the chain system of business represent the greatest threat to the life of independent enterprise? Is not our President in office because the majority of Americans have put him there? Is not our Government a government of the majority? There can be no dictator in a land where the people have a vote. When the majority of our people decide that we want a change in leadership, we will have it.

Our President, due to the war, has been given enough power to enable him, not only to raise an Army to fight, but to keep the country working to furnish the needs of war and to keep all business operating to achieve a quick victory over our enemies.

We are in the midst of the most devastating conflict the world has ever seen. We will lose more lives in this war than in any war heretofore. We must bring it to a successful conclusion as rapidly as possible. War is costly, and men in business or in any other position who do things which will delay the winning of the war quickly must be dealt with in a manner that will leave no doubt in their minds that the people's government in this critical period will not stand for anything which will delay a quick victory. If some of our chain corporations believe that they are bigger than our Government, let them take care. The American people will not think that way. And the few small businessmen who have been shedding tears for Montgomery Ward's chairman, should stop their crying and take a look back to the twenties when the chain system of business threw thousands of little fellows out of business by their sharp business practices, loss leader selling and tricky advertising. These small businessmen had families and homes. It was they who made up a large part of the million and a half unemployed during that period.

If the Montgomery Ward workers want a union shop and the majority have voted for it, they are entitled to have it under our democratic form of government. To deny them their rights is to confess that our democracy is a failure. Their employers are not questioned about their rights to belong to merchants' associations or other forms of business unions. Why then should there be a denial of the rights of workers to belong to unions and to enjoy the union shop?

The large corporations of America cannot overlook the fact that if we are to win the war quickly and to enjoy a lasting peace that will bring prosperity not only to big business but to little business as well, we must all be united in our effort to make our democracy work in the common good. The concentration of business through chain enterprise creates an unhealthy state not only for individual enterprise but also threatens the very existence of our economy of free enterprise.

Coalition Seemed Doomed By G. O. P. Labor Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSF OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, in the opinion of David Lawrence, as expressed in the following article, the Republican Party "missed the boat" when they refused to go along with the Jeffersonian Democrats in support of the rule granted by the Rules Committee on the O. P. A. bill. In view of the fact that the Republican Party now holds the balance of power in the House and therefore is in reality responsible for the type and character of legislation considered and approved, we cannot and should not shirk our responsibility. I therefore submit the article by Lawrence for the serious consideration of my colleagues:

[From the Washington Evening Star of June 9, 1944]

COALITION SEEN DOOMED BY G. O. P. LABOR VOTE—RESULTS MAY BE FAR REACHING AS RESULT OF PARTY FAILURE

(By David Lawrence)

Within the last 24 hours the Republican Party in the House made an important decision. It was overshadowed by the war news and hence attracted very little attention. The results, however, may be far reaching.

The Republicans had a chance to maintain a coalition with the southern Democrats and compel the House to vote on various amendments to the pending Wage and Price Control Act—amendments that are designed to require court review for War Labor Board orders and also to prohibit maintenance-of-membership decrees.

Although the House Rules Committee, by coalition of Democrats and Republicans, had recommended to the House that the Wage and Price Control Act be opened to amendment from the floor under a special rule, the House Republicans joined with the Democrats to vote down such a rule. This remarkable performance, which was denounced by southern Democrats as hypocrisy, means that for all practical purposes the chances for legislation restrictive of the War Labor Board or banning maintenance-of-membership contracts is lost for this session of Congress.

The defense by Republican leaders was that the labor legislation should not be tacked on to the Price Control Act because it was not "germane." This is the first time the Republicans have appeared solicitous about the use of the parliamentary method of attaching amendments to current bills on subjects that are not really related to the bill.

POWERFUL LEVER

The practice, however, has long been a powerful lever in the hands of the minority, especially since the majority party has the veto power through the Executive. Congress has again and again put legislation on extraneous subjects in a piece of legislation. Thus, the Smith-Connally Act contains amendments to the Federal corrupt practices law. It is surprising to find the Republicans arguing that the amendments relating to the War Labor Board's activities were not "germane" to legislation that relates to wage stabilization—a function exercised by the War Labor Board itself with respect to practically all employees earning less than $3,000 a year.

The excuse that the proposals were not "germane" is not taken seriously by the southern Democrats, who argue that the real truth is the Republicans became fearful of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee and the labor union vote. Certainly there was much talk in the cloakrooms of Capitol Hill that the Republicans did not wish to get messed up in a controversy with labor unions on the eve of an election.

But the worst feature of the Republican behavior is that no record vote was taken on the proposed rule which a majority of the House Rules Committee had favored. Thus it is impossible to know just which Republicans had recorded themselves along with New Deal Democrats in killing the rule proposed by the House Rules Committee.

THEIR DEFENSE

In defense of the action of the Republican leaders, it is argued that attaching the amendments on the War Labor Board would not have meant anything because the Senate would not have passed them, or that the President might have vetoed them. This is in contrast to the attitude in minority parties before, which have been content to make a record of their convictions and principles, leaving it to the country to decide at the polls whether a minority should be transformed into a majority.

The Republican Party is soon to go on the stump to tell the country that the Democrats have taken away important rights of the people. The Montgomery Ward case, for example, will be used as an issue, but the Democrats can now point to the action of the Republican Party. When it had an opportunity to insist upon legislation compelling court review of War Labor Board orders and prohibiting the maintenance-of-membership clause in union contracts under Government compulsion, the Republicans, although possessing nearly half the membership of the House and assured of the support of a sufficient number of Southern Democrats to make a majority, refused to stand up against the pressure groups that have been supporting the New Deal.

A Labor Leader's Analysis of Motor Transportation Industry Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, recently the eminent labor leader, Mr. Dave Beck, of Seattle, Wash., made an outstanding and notable address entitled "The Problem Before Us," in which he analyzed the situation confronting the motor transportation industry, the effect of the war thereon, and the future prospects thereof.

Mr. Beck is one of the leading labor statesmen of the United States. He is vice president of, and international representative for, the 11 Western States of the Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, a great international union, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, of which Mr. Dan Tobin, another distinguished, able, and courageous labor statesman, is international president.

My friend, Mr. Dave Beck, enjoys the respect and friendship alike of trade unionists and of management, capitalists, and employers generally. Mr. Beck possesses an affable and engaging personality. He is a remarkably efficient organizer. He has that rare gift which marks successful men—drive.

There is no man in America more qualified to discuss the difficult problem besetting the motor transportation industry than Mr. Dave Beck. Mr. Speaker, as one who has, throughout his congressional service, befriended and fought militantly for the motor transportation industry, I regard Mr. Beck's suggestions, observations, and recommendations relative thereto, in the form of a speech I am inserting herewith in the RECORD, as worthy of careful scrutiny and intense study. But let Mr. Beck's address be its own witness. Here it is:

TRUCK OPERATORS URGED TO SUPPORT THEIR ASSOCIATION

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, my associates in the trucking industry, gentlemen, I am pleased to be with you this morning and again to have the privilege of addressing the operators of the trucking industry of the State of Washington. I am glad that Ted V. Rodgers, president of the American Trucking Association, is here. I want to assure you men, representatives of the trucking business of this State, that he is doing a splendid job as your national spokesman. Our international union, and its representatives, have found Mr. Rodgers ever anxious to cooperate and to help solve our common problems. I trust that his long journey to the western slope of our country will be rewarded by a finer allegiance on your part to your own association, for that will strengthen the national association, as well. This would be the greatest compliment you could pay him.

I listened with keen interest to the remarks of Harold C. Arnot, Director of the Division of Motor Transport of the Office of Defense Transportation, as he unfolded to you the intricacies of every-day work in our National Capital and described to you the tremendously important problems that must be solved. I was also impressed by his tribute to the earnest men who labor to meet your common problems. I want to commend especially the fine tribute he paid to our friend, the late Joseph B. Eastman, who, for so many years, served his country well as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, since the beginning of the war emergency, had directed the O. D. T. It is worthy of Harold Arnot that he was engulfed with emotion when he mentioned our departed friend.

It is easy to see this this great man left his imprint on the character of Mr. Arnot.

EASTMAN WAS ABLE, COURAGEOUS; IDEAL SERVANT OF NATION

I, too, wish to pay my respects to the memory of Mr. Eastman. My experience, and the experience of our people, with him was always pleasant. We found him to be eminently fair, extremely courageous, and a great administrator. He was a deep student of the problems of all types of transportation. He was sound and logical in his opposition to waste; he was a hard worker, a constructive worker. In my judgment, he was unquestionably the ideal Government servant. His memory will long be recalled by those who had the privilege to know him. His directives and his achievements undoubtedly will chart a pathway for future I. C. C. procedure and for the Office of Defense Transportation during this great war emergency.

INDUSTRY IS PLAYING STRATEGIC PART IN COUNTRY'S WAR EFFORT

There are so many problems confronting our industry, in performing our wartime duty to our country, that it will require every ounce of our vitality, our keenest vision, and our best judgment, to bring us through the trying days of the struggle and to measure up to our responsibility to the Nation.

We must understand our responsibilities; we must realize the strategic part that we will play in promoting the welfare of our country. We must discharge that responsibility in such a manner that, in the performance of our serious work we will not only strengthen our industry, but also bring a full realization of its value into every community in America. We must shape the conduct of our everyday work on the highways so that we can transport the war materials, the implements of destruction, and the lifesaving medicines and life-sustaining foods, by the millions of tons.

We will deliver these precious cargoes in freezing weather and in boiling sun. We will traverse roads decked in ice, as well as those which plunge through dangerous, fog-bound lowlands. Our trucks and their drivers must struggle over mountain passes, brave torrential rainstorms and sun-baked deserts, to pour a gigantic flood of freight into the ports of embarkation. We must haul the raw materials from mill and mine, and, when they are shaped into the completed products to further our war effort, we must deliver them to railhead, shipside, and training camp.

We must explore every avenue of sound business procedure, while performing this all-important task for our Government, to the end that we may earn our rightful reward of public confidence and that America will understand that our industry is a great national asset in time of war as well as in time of peace.

ARBITRARY BARRIERS PREVENT FREE AND FAIR COMPETITION

We must awaken our State legislators and our Congressmen to the essential part that this industry is playing in the development of America. They must be made to understand the necessity to protect it; they must grant it the right to compete, under fair rules, with all other forms of transportation. Government generally must be made to see this industry as a potent national servant; Government must remove the arbitrary and artificial barriers that have been erected selfishly to stifle its growth and prevent it from giving its full service to the country.

RAILROAD PRACTICES ARE DETRIMENTAL TO PUBLIC WELFARE

Competing types of transportation must stop appealing to the ignorance and prejudice of uninformed legislators and Congressmen to injure our industry; they must be prevented from using chicanery to erect barriers that impede the free flow of commerce on the Nation's highways. The barriers that have been erected must be removed, for they do not permit fair and open competition; they do not serve the public interest; they are detrimental to public welfare. There is no legitimate excuse for the destructive practices that the representatives of the railroads have adopted to block honest competition.

There is a place in our country for every form of transportation. They must compete with each other in the public interest, they must survive and prosper or fail and be forgotten, according to their value, or lack of value, to the public. No form of transportation must be retarded by schemes hatched in the minds of selfish competitors, and selfishly enacted into law, at the expense of the public welfare. Our industry must solve this problem.

We must develop the kind of administrative policy, by our common efforts, that will stop such nefarious proceedings in our legislative halls. We must carry our story to the great industries whose products we purchase. We are the customers of the motor-car industry. We buy millions of tires from the rubber manufacturers. We buy billions of gallons of gasoline and millions of gallons of lubricating oil from the petroleum industry. We must arouse these industries, which we support in part by our purchases, to the danger of the destructive competitive practices now being used against their best customers. We must point out to these industries that this unfair competition comes from those to whom they pay a tremendous revenue every year.

We must tell the true story of the stifling of our industry to all of our employees across America. Our drivers, helpers, checkers, office help, dockmen, traffic personnel, managers—and the bankers and merchants, the corner grocers, and the druggists in thousands of communities, that depend entirely on truck transportation—must be given the facts.

TELL PUBLIC TRUTH ABOUT TRUCKS AND SHACKLES WILL GO

When we make this possible, when we intelligently present our case to the American people, the shackles which now prevent our rightful progress will be stricken off. The result will be a greater expansion of service to the public, greater employment, and purchasing power. The benefits will flow back to business and industry, and will serve the public welfare.

THERE IS NO PLACE FOR CHISELERS IN OUR INDUSTRY

We must eliminate the chiseler from our industry. Individuals who own no trucks, operate no terminals, employ no traffic personnel, but who are simply brokers playing one company against another as they grab the lion's share of hauling revenue by their chiseling tactics—with destructive results to the whole motor-freight industry—must go. They have no place in the scheme of things.

We must compel the establishment of fair rates, and, in harmony with the best interests of the public and of industry, we must enforce these rates. Not only must these rates provide a fair return on the investment of the operator; they must also be sufficient to pay good wages and maintain good conditions of employment for those who work in our industry. These employees, too, invest their only capital in the industry; that capital is their labor.

We must participate in the work of tested and well established agencies that have helped develop the business life of America. We must advertise in the newspapers in our various communities. We must be represented, as an industry, in the pages of our national periodicals. We must be in the forefront of those who support projects beneficial to our communities.

We must place our most competent leadership in community service, so that their ability and activities may reflect dignity and standing on our industry and hasten the realization of our industry's value to all communities.

We must use the radio to inform the public. We must support financially our own association work in a manner that will permit it to function in our best interests.

We must, in every phase of our industry, stop driving a horse and really operate a modern truck.

We must educate our drivers on every highway in the land to be salesmen for the trucking industry. They must be leaders in courtesy. They must observe every rule of the road. By their consideration for the motorist they can build public confidence and friendliness. Each driver must be encouraged to stop and aid those who are in trouble along the road—to repair a tire or help start a balky motor. The time and effort thus consumed will bring a tremendous reward in public good will to the industry, far in excess of the cost. It is our duty to observe fair standards of employment on our trucks.

TAKE ADVANTAGE OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR IMPROVING SERVICE

We must establish division points that represent an honest day's work at a driving speed in concert with observance of the speed laws.

ANALYZE FUTURE OPPORTUNITIES IN AIR COMMERCE

We should, as our contribution toward the solution of post-war problems, study carefully every opportunity for our industry to give additional service. Thus, we will aid in creating more employment. We should analyze carefully the possibilities of air commerce. We should foster it as a progressive development for the public good, and take every advantage of the opportunity it affords our industry to render a feeder and delivery to and from the air terminals. It is, moreover, the duty of our industry to see that no monopoly is created in rendering this service. It must be kept open to all trucking companies. The development of this new service should be expedited by the establishment of the lowest possible rates that will provide us with a fair return on investment and service.

The representatives of the industry should keep in daily contact with such important problems as the preservation of fair and equitable competitive practices. We must not have a repetition of the incident that occurred a few weeks ago, when a trailer company from the Middle West drove equipment 2,500 miles across country, at great waste of gasoline and rubber, and in violation of both the I. C. C. and the State safety regulations. Thank the teamsters for stopping it this time, but let the industry see that it does not happen again.

I ask you why trucking companies will bid on a haul when the rates are established by Government regulatory bodies. If such a haul were to be made by railroad, service alone would be the determining factor. Railroad rates are established and published, and are not subject to arbitrary or frivolous change. Yet, in this particular case, the trucking companies were asked to sharpen their pencils and bid. Would the same procedure be followed if it were a question of which railroad would get the business? No. The Army, or the Navy, or the industry would ascertain the established tariff and award the haul solely on the basis of service.

CONFISCATION NOT JUSTIFIED NOW BY ABUSES OF PAST

I am a great believer in free enterprise, in the generally accepted meaning of that term. I believe in competitive industry and I am unalterably opposed to monopoly and cartels. I believe in our system of capital investment in private industry. I believe in a minimum of Government regulation and Government competition. I look with doubt on too much public ownership.

I do not agree that past abuses justify confiscation now. I recognize the fact that many power companies have in the past developed unsound practices that are detrimental to the public interest. I am not ready to admit, however, that this justifies socialization of the industry.

NATIONAL WELFARE IS BEST SERVED BY CAPITAL SYSTEM

It is my firm belief that the future of America will be best served by encouraging incentives and stimulating the initiative of its citizens, by providing opportunity for personal reward through our capital system. In my judgment, this is for the best interest of our country. It offers the best approach to the future for both capital and labor.

I believe in recognizing sound and constructive leadership in the families of both capital and labor. I do not believe labor's interests are well served by destroying good leadership in industry. Neither do I believe that it is good judgment for industry to destroy sound labor leadership.

It is a crime against the public interest to use the press, the radio, or other agencies of public expression, with trained and experienced personnel, deliberately to misrepresent either labor or industry, for the selfish purpose either of promoting collective bargaining or preventing it.

I am opposed to rascals in labor just as I am opposed to rascals in business, in the professions, or in the church. In all fairness, however, when we focus attention on Bioff and Scalise, we should also remember Whitney and Insull. Doctors have committed crimes, and men of the church have forgotten their vows to their church and to their God. Attorneys have dishonored their profession and robbed their clients; bankers have swindled widows. But, by far the greatest percentage of men in these walks of life are fundamentally sound and basically honest.

It is with sincere pleasure that I commend the fine work and liberal expressions of Eric Johnston, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. I think he has rendered a tremendously valuable service, not only to business but also to labor, and, above all—more important than either—to our country. I cannot approve his every thought, but I can publicly attest my belief in his sincerity and his desire to be fair.

OUR WAR VETERANS WILL WANT GOOD JOBS AND SECURITY

More than 200,000 members of our international union—your employees and the employees of your associates—have gone into military service. What are we going to do to get them back in gainful civilian positions in the life of our country when they return? They want, above everything else, the kind of good jobs that spell security for the future. It is our duty to devise ways of adjusting our economy so that we can assure them such jobs.

CHANGE FROM WAR TO PEACE ECONOMY REQUIRES SACRIFICE

Some of our returning veterans, having learned in the bitter school of experience what a handicap the lack of education can be, will seek opportunities for more schooling. Everyone who enters school will make easier our adjustment to peacetime employment and, in addition, will equip himself or herself to be of greater future value to the country.

It is my opinion that we must envision the problem of readjustment from war to peace, just as we do the continuing struggle for victory, insofar as it pertains to cost.

We do not shudder today at the loss of a great battleship, or an airplane, or guns, or tanks, or other costly material of war. We are concerned only at the loss of human life and the maiming of human bodies and minds. All of us here today, who have sons, brothers, sisters, or sweethearts in the armed services, would give all that we possess in money and other physical assets for their safe return. What father or mother would hestitate to sacrifice his earthly possessions if the life or welfare of a son or daughter were in the balance?

If we will accept this philosophy, we will not fail the returning veteran. If we are prepared to pour out our wealth for the rehabilitation of America to the same degree that we support this war, we will have no difficulty in finding the solution of our post-war problems. By this means we will prevent the crackpot and the visionary, who develop under the stimulus of suffering and privation, from getting a serious start. There is no short cut to Utopia; the panacea of the crackpot and the schemes of the visionary merely retard the solving of our problems and delay national progress.

We must realize that it will require billions of dollars to rehabilitate our national economy. We must realize that the old days and the old ways are gone, forever. The American people will not give up Social Security, the guarantee of bank deposits, or protection from unregulated investment sales agencies.

I am not going to violate the hospitality you have shown in asking me to speak here, by discussing politics. I only regret that there is a possibility of injuring our war effort because this is an election year.

SUPPORT MEN ON BASIS OF ABILITY AND AVOID PERSONALITIES

Let us avoid personalities, wherever possible, in the interest of our common welfare. Let us support men on the basis of ability and without reference to political party. As a representative of labor, I applaud those men and women in both parties who are progressive and who are abreast of the problems that are presented by changing conditions in the world.

No fair man in labor can stamp his approval on many southern Democrats and northern Republicans, simply because of party.

MUST NOT PERMIT CAPITAL TO REPEAT MISTAKES OF PAST

Let us not forget that the frailties of our American democracy are far outweighed by its benefits and advantages; no government in the world has so well served the common man.

We must not, in the future, give Government sanction for private capital to repeat the abuses of the past. The destruction of the resources of other countries must not be permitted, their wealth must not be taken away, or their native labor abused. Private industry, with the consent and assistance of Government, must never again be permitted to repeat the history of the Dutch East Indies, or Malaya, or other similarly dominated regions. Private capital, for private gain, must not, when invested in other countries, do those things that breed hatred against our country. That is in direct opposition to sound national policy.

I trust that the doctor, who opposes the principle of the union shop, will not attempt to justify his insistence that all members of his profession belong to the local medical association. If he argues against labor's right to observe a picket line, will he refuse to practice beside a physician, or in a hospital, that his association has designated as unethical?

I trust that no attorney will contend against the principle of the union shop, and yet demand that his fellows at the bar pay dues into the lawyers' association. Certainly he should not have the legislature write it into the laws of the State that all lawyers must be paid-up association members, simply because the economic strength of his association is not sufficient to require it, or is not as efficiently exercised as that of labor.

By the same line of reasoning, I trust that labor will recognize the right of members of the professions to protect their economic interests by the adoption of union shop principles. In short, all of us will benefit if we are more tolerant of the things that affect the welfare of our fellows.

TRUCK SPEED LIMIT TO SAVE RUBBER MUST BE OBEYED

I am of the opinion that this industry must conform to the directives of authorized Government agencies that do not violate our constitutional rights. I do not care if Bradley Dewey, the United States Rubber Director, sets our speed limit at 35, 40, or 50 miles an hour, provided that his decision is based on the need of our country to solve the rubber problem. If constituted Government authority insists upon the observance of a maximum speed of 35 miles an hour, as necessary to the national welfare, it is the duty of both capital and labor, in this great trucking industry, to observe this speed limit until such time as they are able to convince the authorities that it should be changed. The fact that your profit may be disturbed, or that our wages, in cases where we are on a mileage basis, are affected adversely, does not justify violation of the speed regulations.

GET READY TO LOSE MEN UNDER 30 TO ARMY AND NAVY

What is our duty in connection with the manpower problem and the selective service? In my judgment, every man under 26 years of age should be in the military service and out of our industry. We should also exert every effort to see that, as soon as possible, every man under 30 years can be released to military service, when, in the opinion of the Army and Navy, the national welfare requires such action. To make this possible, we must adopt training programs and put up with less skill and ability on our trucks. I say this with the keen realization that our industry is most essential to the war effort.

That great skill is required to operate our powerful equipment, that weather and highway conditions as well as public safety require us to get the most competent personnel we can, and that transportation by truck is just as essential as transportation by rail or air—neither can do the job alone—is evident to all who have any knowledge of our country's transport problems.

I wish at this time to pay my respects to the leaders of our military services. It has been my duty to be in Washington D. C., nearly every month since Pearl Harbor. I am the chairman of the national rubber committee of our international union. It has been my privilege to meet with leaders of the American Trucking Association almost every month, and with officials of the O. D. T. We have passed through crisi. after crisis; we have shouldered the responsibility of helping to solve the problems presented by the rubber shortage, the gasoline shortage and the manpower shortage. We have tackled many issues involving grave national emergencies, and we are still doing business.

LEADERS OF ARMY'S TRANSPORT CORPS ARE MEN OF ABILITY

It has been my pleasure to meet the high-ranking officers of the various branches of the military, and I can attest that they know their jobs. Maj. Gen. Charles P. Gross, Col. W. J. Williamson, Lt. Col. Charles E. Martin, and Lt. Col. John J. Lane, of the Army Transport Corps, are leaders of outstanding ability. They have a complete understanding of the problems of this industry, and they know its value to the war effort. These men have always given courteous and sympathetic consideration to our industry representatives.

BRIGADIER GENERAL DENSON'S WORK OUTSTANDING AT SEATTLE PORT

The late Joseph B. Eastman, Director of the O. D. T.; Interstate Commerce Commissioner John Rogers, Assistant O. D. T. Director; Harold C. Arnot, Director of the Motor Transport Division of O. D. T.; Otto Beyer Director of the Personnel Division of O. D. T. and many others have rendered valiant service, though we have not always agreed with them.

William Jeffers, who resigned as United States Rubber Director a few months ago to resume his duties as president of the Union Pacific, and his successor, Bradley Dewey, have kept their doors open to us. They, and their competent staffs, have listened to our problems and kept us advised of developments.

Paul McNutt, Manpower Director; Donald Nelson, Chairman, and Charles E. Wilson, Vice Chairman, of the War Production Board, and their assistants, have been helpful in meeting our emergencies.

Maj. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey and Brig. Gen Edward G. Greenbaum, and the high officers of the Navy, with whom we have met, have always been desirous of cooperating with us and with the trucking industry.

In the course of my work it has also been my duty to travel into every important port of embarkation in the country. I have observed that nowhere is a better, more efficient job being done than in Seattle by Brig. Gen Ely P. Denson and his staff. It is a pleasure to tell you this well recognized fact. Surely, General Denson and his able assistants have a right to be proud of the record they are making. Both labor and businessmen of the entire Northwest are proud of their splendid accomplishments here.

It is my firm conviction that our military leadership is well qualified and that we can rely on its judgment and decisions. There will, of course, be curbstone generals and bath-tub admirals to offer solutions for all of our military problems, but I am certain that you, in this industry, who have been privileged to meet our national leaders in Washington, D. C., and in our own Northwest area, will agree with me when I say that they are doing a splendid job.

WORK, SACRIFICE TO WIN WAR; PRESERVE OUR WAY OF LIFE

In concluding, I have this last appeal to make to you:

Let us pledge anew our allegiance to our Government and its institutions. May we continue to work and to fight beside our allies, making our sacrifices without complaint. May we accord our associates in this war the right to their own philosophy of government. And, when this war is over, let us preserve our own form of government with an affection and a love that transcends even life itself.

We Must Stop Snarling Here

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE G. SADOWSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article by Elizabeth Hawes, which appeared in the Detroit Free Press of Sunday, June 11, 1944:

WE MUST STOP SNARLING HERE, MISS HAWES SAYS

(By Elizabeth Hawes)

"A union is only as strong as its weakest link. A minority, even a handful, can do a union irreparable harm, even destroy it * * *. If you value your union, if you want it to live and serve us after the war—we must restrain ourselves and our hot-headed brothers today."

All over the country people have hailed the appeal to cease striking which President R. J. Thomas, of the U. A. W. (C. I. O.), made to the union members on May 27; the frank admission that there have been too many wildcat strikes; that some union members are behaving like anarchists rather than disciplined union members or disciplined citizens in wartime.

The U. A. W. has already proven its sincerity in saying that strikes will not be tolerated, by suspending the union leadership of a large local here and ordering a new election.

When is someone on the management side in this dynamic Detroit going to speak out with equal clarity? It is not only some women in this town who are a bit backward, not only a handful of U. A. W.-C. I. O. dissidents who create trouble.

Everyone in Detroit seems to agree that a primary occupation of a portion of the population here is simply opposing someone or some idea. When this behavior enters into the relationship between labor and management * * * where it endangers the production of the materials with which our husbands and sons and brothers and friends are fighting Fascists in the Pacific, in Italy—and now, in France * * * then things have reached a point where laughingly remarking that "everyone in Detroit just loves to go chop, chop, chop" must change into everyone in Detroit stopping the chopping.

WHY NO CHAIRS?

In this day and age no management which wasn't primarily occupied with thwarting people could possibly refuse to provide chairs where a worker can sit down for a few minutes.

This is not the early days of the industrial revolution, and normal managements do not expect their employees to seize a little rest on the stone-cold floor of a lavatory. It's even the law that women shall have chairs.

Wouldn't it seem natural to you that a worker should have a place where he or she could have a smoke twice a day?

Would you expect any well-balanced employer to allow just 20 minutes for lunch and then make it so hard to get lunch that starvation is preferable to indigestion from hurried eating? And the Government has offered to pay for adequate eating facilities.

Would you believe that any management would employ women who go into rest rooms and deliberately pick up newspapers and wet them and drop them all dripping and mushy into refuse cans so nobody will be able to read them?

NINETY-NINE PERCENT

Well, I wouldn't have believed any of this until I came to Detroit and found it to be true.

Over 99 percent of U. A. W. members don't believe in strikes in wartime and don't strike in wartime—because the records show that over 99 percent of U. A. W. man-hours have been worked. And certainly 99 percent of managements in the United States of America do not believe in deliberately depriving the workers of a few simple and humane comforts.

As Donald Nelson suggested, it's about time a spokesman for management in Detroit came out flatfootedly and called a halt to work of the anarchists on the company side. If the managements want to live and serve the populace after the war they better restrain themselves and their hot-headed brothers today.

Striking in wartime is a foul business which, as Thomas pointed out, cannot be tolerated under any circumstances, nor have the approbation of any union member.

Of course, strikes are not directly provoked by such small things as I have mentioned. However, the hell with which a lot of industrial Detroit is paved—out of which strikes rise—is made up of the blocks of small actions by all those who constantly, individualistically, sometimes thoughtlessly, go about thwarting other people. Some in management as well as a handful of union members lay those blocks. For months we have prayed that the final knockout blow to Hitler, the invasion of Europe, would start. Now we pray for a quick victory.

Cannot all of us who are engaged in producing the goods that make victory possible—management and labor—subordinate our past hatred of one another, wipe out the things which constantly give rise to irritation with one another, to the end that the home front may stand solid and united behind the Allied troops who are in reality going through the hell of death and destruction in our behalf?

A Mother Prays

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. MURPHY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem:

A MOTHER PRAYS

A PRAYER ON INVASION DAY

Somewhere, Dear God, within this tragic world of Thine,
There is a boy, a precious lad—protect him, please, he's mine.
To some, perhaps, he may appear to be a boy like all the rest,
But they can never know the things I've planted in his breast.

Why, You remember Jimmy, God, he knelt here at my knee,
And bowed his sleepy little head and lisped his prayers to Thee;
I never trained the boy to fight, I taught him only good,
And why he wanted so to go just can't be understood.

The evil men who planned this war must feel ashamed tonight,
As they look out upon the world—blood-stained—a sorry sight.
I hear they bombed your churches, too, where Christians used to kneel,
And so—when Jimmy marches off—You know just how I feel.

I'm awfully anxious 'bout him, God, and yet, "Thy will be done"—
You understand my feelings, for You gave Your only Son;
My hands are tied by distances, o'er land and 'cross the sea,
I can but bow my head and pray, "Watch o'er my boy for me."

—George Z. Keller, from Along Life's Highway.

The Nation's Missouri River

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROGER C. SLAUGHTER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Kansas City Times of June 9, 1944:

THE NATION'S MISSOURI RIVER

From the beginning the American people have regarded navigable streams as a trust of the Federal Government, to be protected against the inroads of special interests and maintained for the good of all.

The special interests' attack on the omnibus flood-control bill asks Congress to reverse that fundamental policy. These interests would set up a precedent that would make one of the greatest of the navigable streams, the Missouri River, primarily a huge irrigation ditch clutched by a few States.

This is the one thing that Gov. M. Q. Sharpe, of South Dakota, says Congress has no right to do. "Congress can't vest any rights in irrigation or in any other class of users," he pointed out to a Senate Commerce Subcommittee.

Now Governor Sharpe represents a State that has a deep interest in the development of irrigation in the Missouri River Basin. It is quite willing to trust to the legitimate supervision of river uses that can and must be exercised by Congress in the future. But that is quite a different matter from attempting to tie up the whole future of the Missouri River with a priority for irrigation, no matter how remote or uneconomic the irrigation projects may be. It is very different from one Congress attempting to say that the Missouri River is no longer to be regarded as a navigable stream. Governor Sharpe speaks reasonably when he says only a constitutional amendment could make such a grant of power.

The attack on the omnibus flood-control bill must be interpreted as a blocking move to gain an unprecedented commitment from Congress. Otherwise it simply doesn't make sense.

The bill backing the Pick plan for the development of the whole river basin contains nothing to jeopardize legitimate irrigation interests. It is an over-all Army engineers' plan. It attempts no commitments of any kind.

The authorization of post-war lakes on the tributaries of the Missouri River is a step forward to serve irrigation as well as flood control and the impounding of water to assure an even flow of the river. Irrigation interests certainly can have no objection to the lakes. South Dakota leaders assume that the existence of the lakes should be a boon to irrigation in South Dakota. They have a legitimate claim and they are ready to trust Congress to make good on it when the supply of impounded water and the proper demands on it are known.

One point of attack is the $6,000,000 that the bill provides for the completion of the 9-foot channel between the mouth of the Missouri River and Sioux City. This sets up no new policy. The Federal Government is already committed to the 9-foot channel and has spent $170,000,000 virtually completing it. The additional 6 million would only fill in the few short gaps where construction was held back by engineering problems. To oppose removing the last remaining obstacles to river navigation is pure obstruction that can only be motivated by aggressive special interests, either extremist irrigation interests or competing transportation interests (railroads), or both.

The spearhead of the irrigation opposition comes from the Red River Valley of North Dakota, which is entirely outside the Missouri River basin. Apparently that group has the backing of the Reclamation Bureau and Secretary Ickes. In order to move the Missouri River water out of its own basin across the divide to the Red River Valley basin would require a perpendicular lift of 250 feet, a tremendously expensive undertaking. Once that is accomplished, the Reclamation Bureau reports that Red River Valley farmers could use all the water that now flows from the Upper Missouri. Follow such a precedent for unlimited irrigation priority and the Missouri could be drained off for irrigation projects anywhere and everywhere, all the way down to its mouth. Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa have their drought years when they, too, could use every last drop of water in the river and leave nothing but mud banks.

In recent months, various charities and hospitals of Kansas City have received some 10 carloads of excellent potatoes from the Red River Valley of North Dakota—the gift of the Federal Government. It is part of a program to hold down surpluses and maintain prices. They are excellent potatoes and gratefully received; but they hardly argue for a desperate plight that would warrant lifting the Upper Missouri River from its basin to grow still more potatoes at any cost.

The Pick plan was built on the American conception of navigable streams that stands to this day. It represents years of careful engineering study. In no way is it hostile to legitimate irrigation demands. The omnibus bill follows through on the Pick plan to develop the Missouri River and its tributaries. It would leave to future Congresses the allocation of water when the supply and the need will be known. No one has a right to ask more.

Amendment of the Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the people should know the truth about the O. P. A. They are being told that this is merely a war measure; that possibly it may be necessary to continue its operations for a short period following the war, after which it is to be abandoned.

From what I can see I am convinced that the administration forces in control of the O. P. A. intend to make the program of price and wage fixing, as well as rationing, permanent. The intention is to fasten this bureaucracy permanently upon the Nation. If it has its way hereafter—war or no war—you and I are to be told by it how much our day's toil shall fetch, how much and what we may eat.

The O. P. A. is using its powers to destroy what is left of free economy and private ownership of property. Although the Price Control Act contains provisions which strictly prohibit it from doing this, it disregards the law and arbitrarily sets up schemes of its own to take the place of long established practices and procedures. With these new devices the O. P. A. has harassed business, agriculture, manufacturing and has driven many concerns to the wall, especially small ones. Nor is this agency sparing labor, as it would have us believe, as witness what happened in the railway employees wage dispute.

My record is already made on the need of price control. Having got ourselves into this fix, some control of prices and some rationing are necessary. That is one thing, but when the O. P. A. uses its powers to build itself up into a perpetual governmental bureau where it can permanently boss us around, that is quite another thing.

Champing at the Bit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Clinton (Mass.) Daily Item of May 25, 1944:

CHAMPING AT THE BIT

Without question Democratic and Republican voters will welcome the test of the political power of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, which has injected into the coming State primaries, July 11, a candidate who will contest for the Democratic nomination for Congress in the Third Massachusetts District, now represented by Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN.

Without question the Democratic voters of this district, once given the opportunity, will register their emphatic disapproval of the tactics of the C. I. O. in the coming primaries.

The committee, which calls itself the Political Arm of the C. I. O., expects to stage the biggest registration drive in history, has one additional step in its program.

Members of the committee, headed by Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, believes that the larger the registration for the November election the greater will be the chances of changing the present political complexion of Congress.

For these tasks the committee has a fund of $700,000, contributed largely by a group of the largest C. I. O. affiliates. Nearly $500,000 of this fund remains in the hands of the committee, the remainder having been spent on organization work and in primary elections held since the committee's formation, July 7, 1943.

Together with funds which C. I. O. affiliates plan to spend for political purposes this year on a local level in their respective communities, it is estimated that the total which may be thrown into the Presidential campaign and the congressional contests by the C. I. O., will be well over $2,000,000.

Apart from its plans for this year's electoral contest, the C. I. O. Political Action Committee will seek to demonstrate on a national scale the effectiveness of concerted political action by C. I. O. labor.

Basically, the C. I. O. Political Action Committee believes in organization of labor as a political pressure group and in evaluating candidates for office not only on the criterion of their stand on labor problems, but also of their policies on social, political, and international problems.

Friends of Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN are already champing at the bits for an opportunity to register their approval of his service in the lower House.

No man has gone from Massachusetts who, in the short space of time that he has served, has taken so prominent a place in the lower House as the Clinton Congressman.

The political writers in Washington serving the Boston daily newspapers are unanimous that he has gained a position in the House that stamps him as one of the most aggressive, forceful, militant, and conscientious legislators that the Bay State has sent there in a generation.

Federal Aid for Readjustment of Veterans in Civil Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 9), 1944

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The G. I. Bill of Rights," written by my colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and published in the Democratic Digest of May 1944.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE G. I. BILL OF RIGHTS

(By Senator BENNETT C. CLARK of Missouri)

(The servicemen's aid bill—known popularly as the G. I. bill of rights—has passed both houses of Congress and is now in conference. Senator CLARK, who as chairman of the Veterans' Subcommittee of the Finance Committee, introduced and piloted the bill through the Senate, tells here about this important measure to assist our fighting men and women in their readjustment to civilian life.)

In the course of the last year the President has sent to the Congress several messages making recommendations which, taken together, constitute a comprehensive plan for the restoration of the veterans of the present war to a civilian status under the most favorable condition.

As chairman of the Veterans' Subcommittee of the Finance Committee, it has been my privilege to draft and introduce legislation to implement and make effective the program outlined in the President's messages. On March 18 I reported to the Senate the Servicemen's Aid Act of 1944, more familiarly known as the omnibus G. I. bill of rights for the returning veterans of this war.

In the last week of March this fundamental bill of rights to facilitate the reintegration of our fighting men into civilian life passed the Senate unanimously.

Since that time a substantially different version of the bill has passed the House and the matter is now in conference between the two Houses. All who are interested in the subject hope and believe that an agreement may be speedily reached.

In completing legislative action upon the G. I. bill of rights, we felt that the Senate did a common justice for the men and women who are offering their lives for the preservation of our Republic. But it has done more than that. It has struck a powerful blow for the preservation of the very future of our Nation.

THE BARE BONES OF WAR COSTS

The bill of rights will be costly—yet its cost is trivial compared to the billion of dollars that we have spent upon the shooting end of the war and we view the cost of the veterans' bill of rights as true economy. None can deny that it forms a part of the bare bones of cost of the war itself.

We regard it as the best money that can be spent for the future welfare of this Nation. The men and women who compose our armed forces not only hold the safety of our Republic in their hands on the battle fronts today—they will hold its destiny for a generation to come.

The consummation of all of our hopes and our prayers for national security, stability and prosperity depend on the extent to which these men and women can be speedily reintegrated into the civilian population.

B. the time this war is over, we are told, more than 13,000,000 of our finest men and women will have seen service in our armed forces. They represent the cream of our human resources, the very backbone of our Nation. This Republic can ill afford to lose their skills and their leadership.

Yet that leadership and those skills have been rudely interrupted by war. Education has been halted, the men to whom we must look for the future of business, commerce, industry, and agriculture have been torn from their civilian posts at the formative time—at the time when they were beginning to assume the characteristiss that have made America great.

WE'RE MAKING OUR FUTURE TODAY

We must recapture those skills and their leadership. If the trained and disciplined efficiency and valor of these men and women of our armed forces can be directed into proper channels, we shall have a better country to live in than the world has ever seen. If we should fail, disaster and chaos are inevitable.

These men will be a potent force for good or evil in the years to come. They can make our country or break it. They can promote permanent world order or World War No. 3. But in a very real sense, the responsibility rests not on their shoulders, but on ours. If we do not fail them, they will not fail us.

And that is why I regard the G. I. bill of rights, passed by the Senate in March and now in conference between the Houses as one of the most important measures that has ever come before Congress. This bill—which is in all respects in line with the President's program—will go far to solve this very pressing and immediate problem. I do not contend that it is the last word on the subject. But I do assert that it is a fundamental bill of rights for service men and women in facilitating their return to civilian life. And I assert that it represents as little as we can properly do, both in justice to the veterans and in enlightened self-interest for the remainder of the country.

In this measure, we have attempted to state comprehensively and clearly the rights and benefits to which our veterans will be entitled, and to state clearly and simply the way in which these rights may be obtained.

THESE ARE THE G. I. GOALS

As I see it, there have been two basic goals which we have achieved in this bill.

The first has been to throw every possible protection about the veteran, to bridge the awkward gap between the release from the armed services and reintegration into civilian life. We recognize that the burden of war falls heavily upon the citizen soldier.

We seek to preserve his rights, to see that he gets a square deal, that he is not imposed upon; to protect him against the injustices which result from errors and human failures inherent in a large-scale, mass demobilization; and to protect the community as well, insuring its stability, which widespread confusion and dissatisfaction would destroy.

And the second goal is to see that the veteran is not penalized by reason of his services; that he is given a fair break, winning for himself those traditional American opportunities which he has defended and preserved for all of us here at home.

His most immediate need, perhaps, is the first classification, the "bridge the gap" part of the program. He must be guided as he leaves the service. He must be apprised of his rights, and aided in obtaining them. He may need hospitalization. He most certainly needs money to carry him until he can find suitable employment. And he needs a single place, one concentrated agency, to which he can go for the solution of his problems.

And in the G. I. bill of rights we have provided all this for him. We have, first, declared the Veterans' Administration to be an essential war agency, and armed it with the priorities in personnel and material so badly needed to enable it to meet all of the veterans' needs.

ONE AGENCY FOR ALL BENEFITS

And, having strengthened the Veterans' Administration, we have given it over-all control of all the activities and benefits affecting the veteran. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs will channel through existing agencies in administering the program; but his will be the responsibility for its success both to the veteran and to the Congress.

We have authorized and directed the Veterans' Administration to construct $500,000,000 in additional hospital beds, which will be badly needed when the flood of human casualties flows back home. We have provided that he may use suitable Army and Navy hospitals when they become available.

As I have said, this bill does not represent the last word on the veterans subject, but it is certainly as little as can be done at this time, and America may well congratulate herself when this measure of justice to our fighting men and women has been accomplished.

WHAT THE BILL DOES

A conference committee is now working to compromise the differences between the House and Senate versions of the G. I. bill of rights. This is what the two bills provide:

SENATE VERSION

Education

All honorably discharged veterans with 6 months' duty may apply for grants of from 1 to 4 years (depending on length of service) of schooling. Grants range up to $500 a year for tuition for full-time students, with $50 a month for subsistence.

Unemployment Compensation

Allows payments of $15 to $25 weekly for 52 weeks out of a 24-month period for all honorably discharged veterans.

Loans

Guarantees loans up to $1,000, free of interest the first year, and at 3 percent thereafter for the purchase of homes, farms, or small businesses.

HOUSE VERSION

Education

Grants available only to veterans inducted before they were 24, but provides that veterans who were over 24 may secure grants if they can prove war service interfered with schooling or that they need a refresher course.

Unemployment Compensation

Allows payment of a flat sum of $20 a week for 26 weeks out of 24-month period.

Loans

Guarantees loans up to $2,500.

Both versions of the bill provide for a new Veterans' Placement Bureau devoted to finding jobs for veterans, aided by the facilities of the United States Employment Service.

Both versions also recognize the Veterans' Administration as second only to the War and Navy Departments in priority rights, and give it the job of supervising relief and other veterans' benefits, including disability payments and hospitalization.

Both versions appropriate $500,000,000 for additional hospital facilities.

In the messages he has sent to Congress asking for legislation to help take care of the special problems of service men and women, President Roosevelt has emphasized strongly the Nation's debt to these men and women. In his message of November 23, 1943, he said:

"All of us are concentrating now on the one primary objective of winning this war. But even as we devote our energy and resources to that purpose, we cannot neglect to plan for things to come after victory is won.

"The problem of reconverting wartime America to a peacetime basis ie one for which we are now laying plans to be submitted to the Congress for action. As I said last July:

" 'The returning soldier and sailor and marine are a part of the problem of demobilizing the rest of the millions of Americans who have been working and living in a war economy since 1941. * * * But the members of the armed forces have been compelled to make greater economic sacrifice than the rest of us, and are entitled to definite action to help take care of their special problems.'

"At that time I outlined what seemed to me to be a minimum of action to which the members of our armed forces are entitled over and above that taken for other citizens."

Radio Address to the People of My District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over station WNBI on June 10, 1944:

Dear friends of the Triple Cities and my congressional district, many mothers and wives of servicemen have asked me during the past few months to find out why they did not hear from their sons and husbands. I have endeavored to find out in each case where the trouble was.

I think that in the future it will work out better if you will first make absolutely certain that there is no chance of your loved one's letter being mislaid. I have discovered most cases of the boys seeming failure to write home were brought about by delay in mail deliveries. This, of course, is unavoidable and no one is to blame.

So, in order not to involve the young man with his commanding officer for something he is not to blame for, will you please write to me and ask me to get in touch directly with the soldier himself. I will, in turn, ask him why he has failed to write you. We will not go to his superiors until we are sure he is not available. That will speed up things and save a roundabout course.

Last week another Hall Furlough Club was organized. This event was a real milestone. Mrs. Dominick Virgilio, chairman of the Central Council of Hall Furlough Clubs tells me she has long wanted to see a club in Binghamton's first ward. She had her wish come true when Club No. 6 was formed by an enthusiastic young lady, Miss Sally Pragac, 41 Sowden Street, Binghamton.

I wish to congratulate Miss Pragac and her fellow officers, Miss Mary Fiala, 8 Longview Avenue, who was elected vice president and Miss Pearl Bocinski, 55 Sowden Street, elected treasurer. I wish them every success in their patriotic work and feel sure they will have a splendid group in the first, Binghamton's largest ward.

A few days ago I sent out a number of petitions to Republican county committees and several hundred posters to loyal friends in the counties of Broome, Chenango, and Madison. These petitions are beginning to come back filled out and signed by ever-increasing numbers.

To the Republican committee men and women as well as other friends who are so kindly getting signatures for me, I give my sincere thanks. I want to file several thousand names with the secretary of state in Albany before the dead line, June 27. So I urge you all to mail me your petition as soon as it is filled or leave it with County Clerk Bill Flook at the Broome County Court House.

Naturally, it helps a man get reelected when people see a lot of his friends displaying his poster in their front windows. When I was home Memorial Day weekend, I saw many of these posters all over the triple cities. This constitutes a tremendous boost for me when I start to campaign. So if you received my poster, won't you please put it in your window or on your property somewhere. Remember you are helping me so much when you do this. It will encourage others to do the same.

Write me if you want me to send you more posters. Perhaps you know some others who will display them likewise. Let me know and I will see they get one. Thank you again.

Since I talked to you last on this program, the Allied invasion has started. At the moment, things seem to be going according to plan. What the future will bring only time can tell. We hope, we pray that those heroes struggling on the shores of France for a foothold in Europe will push on to victory. We are confident of the ultimate result and our prayers go out for the welfare of our boys.

I know you join with me in approval of the following appropriate lines by Miss Fannie Pendleton, instructress at Union-Endicott High School, entitled "A Tribute":

"To you who bear the Stars and Stripes
In many foreign lands, and far;
To you who serve, nor count the cost
That peace may reign instead of war.

"To you whose memories homeward turn
As prison days go slowly by,
To keep alive within your hearts
That spirits that shall never die.

"To you who gave the greatest gift,
In sky, on battleground, or sea,
That brotherhood may rule the world,
And men may everywhere be free.

"Your footsteps echo through these halls,
As we a solemn tribute pay;
And, for you all, our grateful hearts
We lift in silent prayer today."

We Have Less Instead of More Milk Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the following resolution was adopted by the Wisconsin Farm Bureau Federation at their meeting June 5 and 6, 1944:

Whereas there are indications on the horizon that certain self-seeking interests having the welfare neither of agriculture, the consuming public nor the Nation as a whole at heart are developing propaganda to the effect that a surplus exists or is approaching in dairy products; and

Whereas we are aware that any surplus which does or might exist or be created would be wholly artificial, caused by a combination of seasonal production increases and governmental restrictions in the form of ration points, marketing quotas, and lower quality restrictions, which prohibit the consuming public from absorbing anywhere near its actual wants; and

Whereas similarly artificially induced surpluses brought about a market glut in other agricultural commodities, such as pork, eggs, grain, and so forth, and consequent chaos, which can be avoided by the use of a little ordinary foresightedness: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, for the benefit of all, the consuming public as well as agriculture, that the responsible governmental agencies be requested to take such steps as will preclude the possibility of a repetition of the above-mentioned market obstacles by such actions as reducing the ration-point values on butter and cheese, eliminating marketing quotas on fluid milk, cream, and ice cream to the consumer, etc., which will immediately absorb any surpluses and at the same time give the consumer the opportunity to purchase in more nearly adequate amounts these vital health-giving dairy products which he both needs and wants.

The Board of Directors of the Wisconsin Farm Bureau Federation: Curtis Hatch, president, Spring Green; Ralph E. Peterson, vice president, Berlin; Ed Brewin, Jefferson; John Budzien, Milwaukee; Carl Doeringsfeld, Fennimore; R. J. Douglas, Juda; A. C. Murphy, Chilton; L. E. Jewett, La Crosse; Henry Wieland, Beloit.

Mr. Speaker, the national production figures for the first 5 months of 1944 in comparison to the corresponding months of 1943 and 1942 show that the total national milk production is less in 1944 than in either of the 2 previous years. This is shown by the following figures obtained from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics:

National milk production by months

[Million pounds]

	1942	1943	1944
January	8,739	8,773	8,634
February	8,299	8,380	[1]8,288
March	9,641	9,734	9,780
April	10,305	10,245	10,230
May	12,124	11,873	[2]11,904
Total	49,108	49,005	48,836

[1] For first 28 days of February 1944.
[2] Estimated.

There are two facts to be taken into consideration in regard to this milk situation: One, production is not being maintained in spite of the subsidies paid and, two, there is no evident abnormal seasonal surplus to contend with at this time. Propaganda which pictures great milk surpluses, whether issued by one of the 2,800 New Deal propaganda agents or whether issued by some commercial milk company, is not giving a true and factual picture of the situation.

One more fact is very evident and that is that the War Food Administration should not allow milk to be poured down sewers after the War Food Administration has paid a subsidy to get it produced. This applies to a cooperative in Georgia as well as a corporation in any other part of the country. These Georgia producers received 60 percent greater subsidy than the producers in the natural milk-producing areas.

Let us not be misled by any individual, or by any group that does not lend every energy to a successful war-food program. The dairymen of our country should be complimented for their efforts in maintaining milk production as well as they have in the face of the ever-increasing handicaps.

From Bad to Worse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MAURICE J. SULLIVAN
OF NEVADA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post, Washington, D. C., of June 12, 1944:

FROM BAD TO WORSE

From present indications the House is going to follow the bad example set by the Senate and pass an amendment to the price-control bill tying textile ceiling prices to parity prices for raw cotton. The House has already displayed a reckless disregard of warnings not to upset price-control balances by accepting amendments that favor particular classes of producers. It has, for example, passed an amendment prohibiting O. P. A. from requiring retailers to limit stocks and sales to the highest priced lines offered during a given period. It has also approved an amendment requiring recomputation upward of price ceilings on oil and oil products, allegedly for the benefit of small independent producers. This is the type of special-interest legislation that encourages other groups to demand concessions. If incorporated in the price-control measure, such amendments would constitute a dangerous precedent likely to wreck the entire structure.

For many weeks both House and Senate Banking and Currency Committees held hearings on the bill to extend the life of the O. P. A. Both in the committees and in Congress there appears to be strong support for continuance of price control as well as a widespread conviction that Price Administrator Bowles is doing a very hard job unusually well. Nevertheless, the prospects for securing acceptable legislation empowering Mr. Bowles to carry on the good work have steadily deteriorated since acceptance of the Bankhead cotton amendment by the Senate. Between them the Senate and House appear to be bent on sabotaging the present system of price control by yielding to pressure groups that complain about the hardships of O. P. A. rulings.

There is no denying that many such complaints are justified. Moreover, excellent arguments can be advanced in support of some of the controversial amendments that O. P. A. officials consider destructive in their ultimate effects. Notwithstanding these facts, Congress shows poor judgment in trying to set up legislative safeguards to meet special situations, without considering the consequences to the country as a whole. If it really trusts Administrator Bowles and desires to give him a fair chance to do a good job, it must not tie his hands by throwing his program out of balance through raising the prices of specified commodities and giving preferred treatment to specified classes of producers.

Chairman SPENCE, of the House Banking and Currency Committee, warned his colleagues of the consequences of passing this kind of particularistic legislation. Complaints, though often just, he pointed out, are incident to the enforcement of emergency price-control laws. In considering the O. P. A. extension bill, therefore, Congress should view it in the light of the great national emergency that now confronts us. And Mr. SPENCE added a warning against acting upon the "complaints or desires of every individual who wants relief." The result would be, he prophesied, that the President would veto the bill. The House seems bent on inviting that veto by ignoring Mr. SPENCE'S sound advice.

The States Can Handle This

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of June 11, 1944:

THE STATES CAN HANDLE THIS

Should the Federal Government furnish subsidies or supplements for State unemployment insurance systems as part of its post-war program?

Directors of the unemployment compensation systems of New York, Wisconsin, and Nevada, appearing before a Senate committee, say "No." They point to the fact that State unemployment compensation reserves now total nearly five and a half billions of dollars. They assert that no State will have any difficulty meeting its obligations to workers thrown out of employment by post-war upheaval. They suggest that Federal supplementation of State programs might well lead to a class of industrial pensioners drawing "rocking chair money."

Congress should weigh well the arguments of these admitted experts in the unemployment compensation field. The places where Federal money will be needed in the adjustments which will follow this war are legion; surely it would be folly to throw unneeded money into the State systems if these are fully prepared to meet the load which will fall on them.

There has been a persistent effort on the part of some to federalize unemployment compensation through one excuse or another. It may be supposed that the present idea of Federal subsidy to the States is another step by these partisans.

The Federal Social Security Board people have always preferred the pooled-fund system which some of the less fortunate States now have. That is the kind of system federalization would force on us. Director Paul R. Raushenbush is working for the interests of every Wisconsin worker when he combats such federalization movements.

The Wisconsin plan pays those who lose employment on quite as generous standards as does the pooled fund plan, but it has an advantage which the other system does not possess. Our system makes it profitable for the employer to keep workers steadily employed and so encourages employment stability. It has a double rather than a single social purpose.

The other system—the system which federalization would make universal—is not interested primarily in keeping workers employed; its only interest is in indemnifying them when jobs are lost. It is a system with a minimum of constructive elements. As such, its encroachments should be fought by those States that have a better plan.

Post-War Air Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, some time ago a very interesting article by Al Williams, relating to post-war air power, appeared in the public press. I believe the views of this author on this subject are worthy of serious consideration by those who are interested in post-war international aviation.

I believe the policy of appropriating billions of dollars in aid of foreign nations without a definite understanding with reference to some of the more acute post-war problems is a short-sighted policy on the part of the Roosevelt administration, and one which, in due time, can easily furnish provocation for another war.

To furnish a vast fleet of ships, an air armada such as the world has never before seen, and property of all kinds involving billions of dollars, and millions of the finest of young men to be sacrificed on the world's battlefields to preserve or establish—what? This can be answered later when the smoke of battle clears and the motives of men and nations have been revealed!

But to permit the nations which have cried out for help to now serve notice on the American people that they may build airports on foreign soil but with the distinct understanding that under no condition shall these American financed airports be used for commercial purposes by the United States is an affront to every citizen of this country who believes in a square deal.

It is about time for the United States, even though somewhat late, to insist upon some of its post-war rights in consideration for the sacrifices it has already made and will have to continue to make before this war is concluded.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the article by Al Williams, as follows:

POST-WAR AIR POWER

(By Al Williams)

The future of American air power in the post-war era is a vital question.

Whether this Nation will have adequate air bases, in strategic places, for the development and growth of air power should not be left to chance.

The time to consider this problem is now. Others of our allies have not failed to take the long-range view of this subject. Russia has told us what land she is going to liberate. If liberation means control of these areas for her protection or development, that is something else again. Recently Mr. Churchill reassured Parliament that no British lands would be ceded and that England specifically would not relinquish air bases to the United States.

So, the question arises, What about the future and preservation of the United States?

Air power, like sea power, is limited in its scope of action by bases for refueling.

How did England become the world's No. 1 sea power? Did she just build excellent warships and keep them near the British Isles? Certainly not.

British sea-power planners saw the strategic value of the eastern entrance to the Mediterranean—and took Gibraltar. They did the same thing with the Suez Canal. It is also true of Aden, the eastern bottleneck of the Red Sea. They took Bathurst, on the western coast of Africa, and Capetown, at the southern tip of that continent.

The Straits of Malacca—controlled from Singapore—govern the passageway between the Indian Ocean and the Pacific. And let's not miss the Falkland Islands, which control shipping around Cape Horn, South America's southern tip, or South Georgia, supporting the Falklands. And, going up north, we find control points in British Guiana, then Trinidad, and even farther north to Barbados and Santa Lucia. Next come Jamaica, the Bahamas, and the strong sea-power control point of Bermuda.

Control of such bottlenecks of the sea's highways means sea-power control. And control of strategic air bases means air-power control—which for the United States may mean safety and preservation from aggression.

To those people who told us that if the British Fleet fell into the hands of an enemy America's fate would be sealed, I ask: "What if those islands close to the United States fall into some strong air-power aggressor's hands?"

Now is the time to settle the vital question of air bases. Those who stall on it are gambling with America's security.

"Water" Is a Fighting Word

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, it is heartening to note the fine and impartial attitude of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch concerning the problem of the Missouri. We, of the upper Missouri States, owe this newspaper our sincere thanks for its efforts to bring about an equitable solution of the use of the resources of a great river, a resource which belongs, not to one State, but to all States through which the Missouri flows.

This is a time for clear thinking, and while naturally we will seek to protect our sectional interests we can, I believe, recognize the rights of other areas along the river, and then, through logic and necessity, evolve a plan which will work for the benefit of all.

It is time for all of us to act together and to trust one another.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD a fine editorial concerning this matter from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 4, 1944:

BARRIER TO A UNIFIED VALLEY

The Army engineers, the Mississippi Valley Association, and the Missouri River States Committee may be able to jam the inequitable flood-control bill through Congress in the final testing which will begin with Senate Commerce Committee hearings scheduled for Wednesday. But if they do it, the price of the victory will be the Upper Valley people's anger and suspicion and flaming sense of wrong.

"Water" is a fighting word in the great plains of the Dakotas, Montana, and Wyoming, and it is a word which in the present struggle has just begun to fight. If the partisans of navigation succeed in grabbing the bulk of the Missouri River's water by act of Congress, they need not suppose that the issue will be settled. Only one thing would perhaps be settled, and that would be the animosity and distrust of the Upper Valley toward the Lower Valley forever.

The presumption to priority would by no manner of means be settled. The irrigation States would still possess many devices in their constitutions, ratified by Congress, reserving to them the control of streams within their borders.

It needs to be said that the Pick plan has become the very symbol by which a real unification of the aspirations, the thoughts and the efforts of this vast valley will either rise or fall. If it is steamrollered through Congress, all hopes that the Missouri Valley may some day be able to function as a whole, for its infinitely greater future, will very likely be crushed beneath it.

It seems altogether probable that we are now at a turning point at which what is done will decide whether we can act together, whether we can deserve one another's trust—and decide it for some important time to come.

Let us face the inevitable fact: If, to gain a navigation channel, the people of the Lower Valley permit special interests, purporting to represent them, to preempt water which should be irrigation's, it will be a channel costing far and away above its worth; costing our future.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much spoken and printed about the shortage of farm machinery that, perhaps, a statement by the head of one of the greatest farm equipment producing concerns of the Nation would be interesting at this time. Subjoined is a statement entitled "Both jobs have been done" by Fowler McCormick, president of the International Harvester Co.:

BOTH JOBS HAVE BEEN DONE—A STATEMENT CONCERNING INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.'S FARM EQUIPMENT PRODUCTION

(By Fowler McCormick, president)

Everyone knows of the tough problems American industry had to meet in converting from normal production to war production. The record industry made speaks for itself.

Everyone hears much these days of the tough problems industry will have to face in reconverting from war production to normal production.

This is the record of one company, International Harvester, which has already had to do both these tough jobs since Pearl Harbor; a company which was largely converted to war work, which is now partly reconverted to normal work; which is carrying both loads, meeting the difficulties of each. Despite obstacles, it is a record which we are proud of, and we want our friends to know about it.

Told at full length the story would be long and complicated. But a few facts are outstanding:

Since Pearl Harbor we have furnished to farmers $326,000,000 worth of farm equipment and service parts despite the fact that Government restrictions practically put us out of the farm equipment business for months. That total includes the highest volume of service parts ever built. The figure is on the basis of prices which are frozen, most of them at the pre-war level.

Since Pearl Harbor we have built $550,000,000 worth of war products for the fighting services.

Three of our tractor plants have won the Army-Navy E, and our oldest and largest implement factory, McCormick Works, has just been awarded the Army-Navy E for outstanding achievement in the delicate and extremely precise production required by the Navy's aircraft torpedo.

In the first 6 months of our 1944 fiscal year we have built approximately the same amount of farm tractors and parts, as we produced in all of 1943.

In the first 6 months of 1944 we have provided for American farmers more farm equipment—tractors, implements, and parts—than we did in the same period of 1940; almost as much as we did in the same period of 1941; and more than twice as much as we did in the same period of last year.

We are not getting rich out of the war. In 1943 our total sales were $83,400,000 more than in 1941. But our 1943 profit was $4,921,000 less than our 1941 profit. Our 1944 profit will be still smaller.

The history of our war production and our farm-equipment production is closely interwoven. In 1942, the first year of the war, the Government permitted farm-equipment production at about 80 percent of the 1940 levels. Farmers generally did not feel that reduction much, for we had large inventories of machines manufactured in earlier years, which were sold along with current production. Our farm-equipment plants remained fairly busy on farm equipment. War work was undertaken in our motor-truck plants and in available areas of tractor plants. Implement plants generally were not suited to war work, either in type of buildings or equipment, but did do their part when they could.

Then in the fall of 1942 the Government issued Farm Equipment Limitation Order L–170, governing production for the year from November 1, 1942, to October 31, 1943. Under the terms of L–170, our company was cut back to about 14 percent of 1940 production. On more than half the items we normally make, we were allowed no quotas.

This took place simultaneously with the period of greatest need by the armed services for new sources of war production. Naturally, this company, and other large companies of the farm equipment industry, undertook extensive war contracts in those plants which could handle the type of manufacture required. Since many implement factories could not handle a great amount of the work, they were almost shut down, except for minor war production jobs and except for production of farm equipment service parts. In our implement plants, thousands of trained employees had to be laid off. The great majority immediately sought and obtained work elsewhere.

The situation in late 1942 and early 1943, therefore, was that large manufacturers were practically out of production on farm equipment. Inventories of finished machines no longer existed. They had been sold out during 1942. The food production program imposed greater demands on farmers and the attractions of war industry and the inroads of the draft had stripped farms of labor.

The protest of farmers against order L-170 was immediate and vigorous, since their need for farm equipment was enormous. Farm equipment producers, who had protested against the order before its issuance, continued to present their views to the Government. In March 1943 the War Production Board issued an amendment, enlarging the quotas for some machines. Finally, in June 1943 the War Production Board issued a new order, L-257, which replaced L-170 and covered the period from July 1, 1943, to June 30, 1944.

Order L-257 contained greatly increased quotas for farm equipment, the quotas being different for different machines. The War Production Board, appreciating farmers' large needs, allotted to the industry an amount of materials estimated by the War Production Board to be about 80 percent of the amount used in 1940. In addition, the industry was told to carry on along with L–257 production, the remainder of L–170 production which had been planned for the period between July 1 and October 31, 1943. This had to be done with no interference with production of much-needed war materials.

In July 1943, therefore, less than a year ago, our situation was that farm-equipment production was very low, the normal flow of materials and purchased parts and supplies had been broken. Plants or parts of plants had been converted to other production. Many trained employees had scattered to the four winds. Yet we had suddenly received orders to greatly increase farm-equipment production and to do it right away.

The flow of materials and parts had to be reestablished. Plant rearrangement had to be carried out. Employees had to be recalled and many new employees had to be trained. In addition, it was the period of greatest scarcity in the supply of manufacturing materials and parts. Between the placing of an order on a steel mill and the actual receipt of steel at a plant, months had to intervene.

This company and the others of the industry nevertheless bent every effort to the reestablishment of farm-equipment production, realizing at the same time our obligation not to take steps which would damage the flow of war production which we had promised the armed services. As always in manufacturing, progress was slow at first and we were criticized for "failing to meet schedules." But materials finally began to flow, production lines were reestablished, employees were trained and production began to move upward, slowly at first, then with a rush. By early 1944 machines were moving out to hard-pressed farmers in real quantities.

A job has been done, and the figures show it. The figures below represent daily production of certain important machines, as between the low point under Order L–170 and the situation in May of 1944:

Daily production

	L–170 low	Present
Tractors	46	511
Hay loaders	23	50
Hay rakes	29	76
Mowers	122	289
Hammer mills	0	45
Peg harrows	32	377
Corn planters	31	117
Grain drills	8	55
Combines	51	59

Several facts should be noted about the figures shown. In the first place, the hammer mill is typical of the many machines which we were not allowed to produce at all under L–170 as first issued. The combine represents the other extreme. There were higher combine quotas under the low period of L–170 than was the case with other machines. Finally, practically all the figures in the column showing our present situation would be higher if it were not for the shortage of labor.

We have already noted that when we started to increase production of farm equipment materials presented the most pressing problem. That situation changed for the better as time went on, partly due to cutbacks in war production and partly due to assistance rendered our industry by the W. P. B. Unfortunately, as the materials situation grew brighter, the manpower situation grew steadily worse.

The manpower problem comes in two forms: First, the difficulty of getting enough employees to man plants adequately and achieve all the production that machinery and facilities make possible; second, the problem of keeping the employees who are hired. The most acute of all our employment problems has been that of trying to find adequate foundry labor, both for gray-iron foundries and malleable-iron foundries. This particularly affects production of farm implements, which require large supplies of both types of iron castings.

What do we mean by a manpower problem? Some figures will show:

In the 4 weeks ending April 15, 1944, our company hired a total of 3,259 new employees, but our total employment went down by 702 persons. For in that same 4 weeks 3,961 had left. Or take some specific plants. In the period ending April 15 our East Moline works, which makes combines and corn pickers, hired 123 persons and lost 143. Our most important farm-tractor plant, Farmall works, hired 301 new employees, but lost 390.

Part of this manpower problem is due to the requirements of the armed forces, for there are 16,500 Harvester men in military service. (Our total employment now is about 72,000.) And a very large part of it is due to the restlessness of employees who are new to industry, who get a job, work a month or two, hear of another job they would like to try, and drift on.

We are doing everything we can think of to meet this problem and our production is still going up. Despite lack of manpower, we have completed or will complete within the period scheduled by order L–257 our full quotas of all but 3 of the 60 general classifications of farm machines which we build. These 3 classifications are grain drills, corn pickers, and combines.

By July 31, when our W. P. B. authorization to manufacture grain drills expires, we expect to have built 92 percent of our grain drill quota. By September 30, when our authorization to make corn pickers expire, we expect to have built 96 percent of our corn picker quota. The lag will affect only one model, the one-row mounted picker. By September 30, when our combine authorizations expire, we expect to have built 84 percent of our combine quota. The lag in combine production represents a shortage of self-propelled models (a new type, never in production before) and also represents our inability to make a number of combines which were not part of our original L–257 quota but were authorized later as a supplemental quota.

One thing we have done that we are pretty proud of. We have balanced our production of farm equipment. We have not been shipping out tractors with no implements to work with them. Generally speaking, we have been able to see that the implements went along with the tractor.

Recently the Government issued the quotas for farm equipment for the year beginning July 1, 1944. These are known as schedule B of order L–257. Schedule B provides quotas somewhat larger than those we have been operating under. And unless the manpower situation gets even worse than it is now that will mean considerably more farm equipment for farmers.

Even more important, however, is the fact that schedule B gives us a running start on production for the first time since the Government began to limit production. The W. P. B., War Food Administration, and other interested Government agencies have told us what the quotas are, and have told us far enough ahead of time so that production can be planned intelligently instead of being a wild scramble for materials. This will be particularly helpful in the production of highly seasonal machines.

At present our war production is diminishing, because of cancelations of contracts, cutbacks in schedules, and completion of contracts which are not renewed. This reflects the general cutting back of most types of war production. If that trend continues, and our information at present indicates that it will, we should be able to transfer more employees and more manufacturing facilities to farm equipment production.

Meantime, we will keep on doing what we have done from the first day of the war, making both war products and farm equipment products, doing both jobs, and doing them both the best we know how.

The Livestock Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRITZ G. LANHAM

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with leave granted me to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial which appeared on June 6, 1944, in the Kansas City Daily Drovers Telegram:

REDUCTION IN OPERATIONS

There are so many conflicting factors holding sway in the livestock and meat-packing industries these days that no matter what way the farmer turns to figure his way in planning future operations of his feed lots he runs into a blank wall.

Should he buy replacement stock and forget about the 15 to 20 percent rise in costs since January and give more consideration to the fact that there has been a persistent upturn in the prices paid for slaughter stock? The farmers' answer to date is mostly not in favor of buying replacement stock. When uncertain, do nothing. This seems to be the policy of many cattle feeders struggling with the problem of future feeding.

During the month of April farmers of 8 Corn Belt States purchased only 84,000 replacement cattle, one of the smallest April purchases in many years. This was a reduction of 40 percent, compared with the 142,000 cattle bought in April of 1943, and a reduction of 45 percent from the 154,000 purchased 2 years ago. In April 1941 farmers in the 8 States bought 138,000 cattle.

This restricted buying has gone on a long time, in face of lower costs than in 1943, when replacement cattle brought the highest prices on record.

During the first 4 months of 1944 farmers of the 8 States bought a total of 320,000 head, compared with 468,000 in 1943, with 459,000 in 1942, and 468,000 in 1941.

Cattle feeders are not alone in this urge to temporarily get out of an industry so important to the war. It needs no telling of how important such products as hides and wool are to supporting an army on the move. Yet their production is being discouraged one way or another.

Lamb feeders of the 8 States bought during April only 66,000 sheep and lambs, less than half the 139,000 they purchased in the same month of 1943. Two years ago their purchases totaled 159,000.

The 4 months' buy was one of the smallest in many years, at 386,000 head, which compared with 729,000 in 1943 and 502,000 in 1942.

The same feeling extends into the hog raising business. Feeding pigs in some parts of the country are worth less than half what they were bringing at this time last year.

Of primary importance, of course, is the feed shortage. This in itself would limit production. However, it is not this alone which has turned the production trend. Under it all is that feeling of uncertainty and discouragement, and in almost all instances the causes are traceable to the unfortunate experiment in price control by inexperienced administrators.

A feeder asked how one can have confidence when Federal bureaus are putting out so many conflicting reports and rules that they confuse each other. Another makes the point that while the Government can change its collective mind overnight, the farmer, once he plants a field of corn, has to stick to that decision for at least a year.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD J. McMURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a letter from the George Lafbury Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., in regard to the reenactment of the Price Control Act:

GEORGE LAFBURY CO.,
Pittsburgh, Pa., May 23, 1944.

The Honorable HOWARD J. McMURRAY,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I was a very interested listener to your radio talk last Saturday evening on the subject of price control. I agree with you as to your conclusions but do not agree with your remarks which had reference to fruits and vegetables and, by implication, the representations of the trade organizations presumably representing the fruit and vegetables industry. However, the statements submitted to your committee on behalf of the fruit and vegetable industry do not fairly represent the fruit and vegetable industry, as there are numerous members of our industry who favor price control of our products.

The purpose of this letter is to let you know that the fresh fruit and vegetable receivers and distributors of western Pennsylvania, eastern Ohio, and West Virginia favor price control of fresh fruits and vegetables, and we are taking this means of placing ourselves on record with the House of Representatives.

Your remarks on the radio with reference to our industry were no doubt based on the statement submitted to your committee by Harold M. Buzek, president of the National League of Wholesale Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Distributors, a copy of which is in my possession. This statement was misrepresentative in many particulars and contained many distortions and gross exaggerations. To read Mr. Buzek's statement, one would conclude that the respectable elements in the industry were out of business and that nearly all the trading was in the hands of the "black marketeers." This is far from the truth. The great bulk of the business is transacted by the legitimate factors and according to law. True, there has been "black marketing," but even so, the ceilings were there all the time, acting as an estoppel, and the prices realized by the "bootleggers" were far short of the prices that would have been realized under unrestrained competitive conditions.

I have been in trade organization work for many years, having been elected to every office of the National League of Wholesale Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Distributors, twice serving as national president. Naturally, it is with some hesitancy that I now criticize its present position, but in all fairness I feel impelled to submit the following proof that Mr. Buzek's statement was not the unanimous opinion of the members of the fruit and vegetable industry.

The Pittsburgh branch of the National League of Wholesale Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Distributors is the largest branch in the league; its 97 members includes nearly every important receiver and jobber in western Pennsylvania, eastern Ohio, and West Virginia. Under date of April 14, 1944, Mr. Chester Franzell, II, president of the Pittsburgh branch, wrote Mr. Buzek as follows:

"We have your circular of April 12 asking for ideas and suggestions as to the attitude you should take when appearing before congressional committees regarding Government agencies.

"I know very well that you will be disappointed in the small response you will get to your request for ideas and suggestions. However, as president of the Pittsburgh branch, I feel that you should know the consensus of opinion from our territory. This has not changed in the least from our attitude at French Lick in January. At that time I believe we made it rather clear that we were for cooperation with the Government agencies, which we honestly felt were trying to do a job. We realize that price control is just as necessary in our business as in any other, and are not antagonistic toward the idea. Naturally, we are for simplification of regulations as well as absolute fairness in the distribution of mark-ups.

"If you will read the resolution which emanated from the French Lick convention again, you will have a clear expression of Pittsburgh's attitude and recommendations in the whole matter."

Apparently the opinion of wholesale factors representing some 3,000,000 consumers was totally ignored.

In explanation of the French Lick convention resolution, the executive committee submitted a resolution calling for elimination of price control of fruits and vegetables. After considerable discussion and debate, the "elimination" clause was deleted, and the resolution as passed called for cooperation of the trade with O. P. A. on enforcement of its regulations.

Last fall I was asked to serve as special consultant to the Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Division of the O. P. A. without salary. I entered upon this work with pronounced inhibitions, mostly antagonistic. After attending many conferences in Washington, I want to go on record here and now with the statement that the Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Division is ably managed by experienced and practical men; that every effort is being made to write and issue practical directives affording full protection and reasonable profit to the producer, distributor, jobber, and fair prices to the consumer. Practically every request and recommendation submitted by the consultants were accepted and made a part of the directives, with consequent and lasting benefit to the fruit and vegetable industry. On the other hand, a number of impractical or burdensome regulations were eliminated when consultants submitted adequate proof of their impracticability. Summarizing, I am absolutely "sold" on the Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Division of the O. P. A.

In conclusion, I call your attention to an editorial appearing in the May 13 issue of the Packer, the national weekly trade paper of the fresh fruit and vegetable industry. The Packer has a very large circulation in every commercial production section and read by almost 100 percent of the receivers, jobbers, brokers, etc. The editorial is captioned "Price stabilization must continue." Probably the last paragraph is controlling, as it is the considered opinion of the editors who are in intimate contact with the industry over these many months of price control, and which reads as follows:

"The measure is again before Congress. It should be continued, with amendments to the end that every factor in the industry be treated fairly and black markets in fresh fruit and produce made an impossibility. Price stabilization must continue, and every measure necessary to bring this about must be extended if America is to plow to the end of the row and achieve victory."

Yours very truly,

GEORGE LAFBURY CO.,
GEO. LAFBURY, President.

St. Lawrence Seaway Project

REMARKS
OF

HON. FRED J. DOUGLAS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

June 12 and 15, 1944

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, since Pearl Harbor it has become evident that the developed water-power sources in northeastern United States are not sufficient to supply either the demands of the war or the demands which will follow the war. Proof of that statement is furnished by the fact that it was necessary to transport hydroelectric power all the way from New York City to Massena, N. Y., in order to operate the aluminum plants, which were so vital to our war effort. It is clearly evident that industry in the post-war era will migrate to that section of the country which can provide cheap power. Proof of this can be shown by the action of the Government in closing aluminum plants where such cheap power is not available, while those plants located near a source of cheap power have been continued.

The war has brought the United States and the Dominion of Canada very closely together, and it has further demonstrated that the interests of the two nations, particularly along industrial and economic lines, are identical. I, therefore, believe that the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and the development of the St. Lawrence power would accomplish, so far as our post-war economy is concerned, the very thing that close cooperation between the two nations has already accomplished in our joint war effort.

The war has changed many of our opinions with regard to international affairs, and the part America must play in the world from now on, and, along with that, viewpoints with respect to the necessity for international cooperation in the fields of economics and commerce and industry will likewise change.

The matter of the St. Lawrence seaway and power development will probably be an issue during the present session of Congress, but, if not, certainly during the next session. For that reason I feel that I should make clear my stand on this important issue.

Prior to Pearl Harbor I was opposed to this project, as I did not feel that the expenditure necessary to complete it would be warranted by the results obtained. However, the present war has caused many changes in our economic structure, and I now believe that the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway as an international project, the expense to be shared by the United States and Canada, should go forward to completion. I am in favor of the development of the St. Lawrence power as a public project and for the benefit of the people of the State of New York.

The St. Lawrence seaway proposal is not a New Deal project, as some people have erroneously assumed. It has been endorsed by every Republican President since and including President Taft. Its leading advocates throughout the years have been Republican Members of Congress. It has been endorsed on several occasions by the United States Board of Army Engineers. Governor Dewey of this State is on record in favor of it and the New York State Legislature at its last session unanimously went on record in favor of the St. Lawrence power development. The pending St. Lawrence seaway bill is sponsored by a Republican Senator, Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN, of Vermont.

New York's industrial prosperity in the post-war era depends in large measure on the ability of this State to furnish the cheap hydroelectric power to attract industries. Such cheap power is available already in the Tennessee Valley and it is available in the Pacific Northwest, which accounts in no small measure for the migration of industry to those sections.

The development of the St. Lawrence power and the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway should be a fundamental phase of New York State postwar planning. Not only will the successful completion of this great undertaking provide the cheap hydroelectric power to attract and to retain industry in New York State, but it will likewise provide cheap power for the municipalities of New York State and for the host of rural residents who are now denied the benefits of electricity because of high cost.

All northeastern United States will benefit materially from the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and the development of the St. Lawrence power. The benefit will particularly be felt, however, in central New York because of its nearness to the development itself. No post-war project which has been so far proposed will result in greater value to a greater number of people than the St. Lawrence seaway and power development. For that reason I am heartily in favor of it and will do everything in my power to see that the seaway measure passes the House of Representatives.

Tribute to Members of Draft Boards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, at a thankless, unpleasant task, members of hundreds of selective service, or more commonly called draft, boards are distinguishing themselves as real patriots in this great time of crisis. It is no pleasant task to sit on these boards and make decisions as to the induction of one boy and the deferment of another—both in the same community, both from the same school, and perhaps both from the same church. The task is made doubly hard because these draft-board members are from the community whose boys they are sending into the armed forces. Theirs is the job of hearing the heart-rending pleas of those about to be left at home.

These members, as you know, serve without remuneration in any form. Yet there is seldom praise for them. But there is occasional criticism on their decisions.

An editorial in one of our newspapers very well expresses the honor and respect which I feel is due these fine, patriotic, unselfish people. It follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of May 31, 1944]

TRIBUTE TO DRAFT BOARDS

(The Reno (Nev.) Evening Gazette)

A Wisconsin Senator's proposal that local draft board members throughout the country be remunerated for their services has elicited the observation from an Arizona board that "there is not enough gold in Fort Knox to hire us to do the unpleasant tasks we are doing today."

That statement, in a telegram to the Senate Military Affairs Committee, probably expresses pretty well the attitude of selective service board members everywhere. The pride they derive from performance of a vital patriotic service is the only remuneration they want.

Few persons outside the draft boards realize the arduousness of the task confronting the men responsible for filling the manpower needs of the armed forces. It isn't altogether a matter of spending long hours on a thankless job and sacrificing personal interests. The knowledge that their acts—even when equitably performed—inevitably cause heartaches in many homes, makes it a depressing job. Yet thousands of men have served since the establishment of the selective service boards.

As the Arizona board suggested, "To offer these men cash compensation, no matter how well intended, constitutes the prostitution of patriotism and is far more insulting than flattering."

If You Would Ever Be Alert

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. F. NORRELL

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I have today received a poem written by my friend, E. R. Robinson, of Lonoke, Ark., brother of the late Senator Joe T. Robinson, of Arkansas, which I feel my colleagues will appreciate as much as I do.

IF YOU WOULD EVER BE ALERT

If you would keep your mind alert,
Would constant vigilance exert,
Calm when emergencies arise,
Unmoved by perils or surprise;
If you would watch the road ahead
And keep a skillful, level head
With threatened death on ev'ry side,
You would through dangers safely ride.

If you would stay so wide awake
That accidents could never shake
And so no obstacles could daunt
Or ghosts of failures ever haunt,
Would keep your nerve at sudden curve,
Ready to stop or safely swerve,
With steady mind on wheel and brake,
No fatal errors would you make.

If you would heed the warning calls
And thus avoid the dire pitfalls
Where others who have passed this way
Found death in lanes that led astray,
Noting each signal warning sign
To guard and guide you on the line,
Scan your guidebook and comprehend,
You'd safely reach your journey's end.

If you would calmly—quickly think
When you come on impending brink,
Would have presence of mind and tact
When crossed by rash or brutal act,
Well poised, you'd never be alarmed,
You'd cross the narrow bridge unharmed
And in ev'ry crisis you would stand
The one who holds the mast'ring hand.

If you were only free
From hatred of alien race,
Had the philanthropy to see
God's image in each stranger's face
And love him just the same
No matter what his color be,
How low his tribe or name,
Nor yet how wide and deep the sea
Between your tribe or state,
You would be great—you would be free.

If you could cast away
The superstitious myths and shams
That blight your faith today
So you could crush the false that damns
And find a saner way
To search for truth amid false creed
And cults long in decay,
You would be great and free indeed.

Office of Dependency Benefits Doing Outstanding Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to take advantage of this occasion to call to the attention of Members of Congress the fine work being done at the present time by the Office of Dependency Benefits of the War Department.

When we enacted the various laws affording benefits to members of the families of men and women in our armed forces, I am sure few of us realized the tremendous proportions of the undertaking. It is without question the broadest program of its type ever undertaken in the history of the world.

You will appreciate the scope of this undertaking when I tell you that at the close of business last Saturday, the total pieces of work received by this section of the War Department since the start of the program amounted to 30,070,323. This includes allotment and allowance applications and authorizations, letters from the soldier or WAC, or from their family or from Members of Congress regarding a case.

Last week, for example, the Office of Dependency Benefits received a total of 290,170 pieces of work and during the same period of time the office had acted upon and returned to the file a total of 354,665 cases. Many of us were concerned, some months ago, because of delays we were experiencing in the processing of cases for our constituents.

The opening of a liaison office here on Capitol Hill has proved a distinct service to Members of Congress and to our constituents. I am sure that any Member of the House who has presented a case to Maj. Charles S. Solit and his staff is convinced that they lose no time attempting to get action. Of course the outcome of that action is governed wholly by the laws we have made and due to circumstances not all applications can be approved because we have not provided benefits in all cases.

For those who are unacquainted with the splendid services of this office, I might say that Major Solit and his staff are located in room 1727, the seventh floor of the New House Office Building, and all of the employees there are thoroughly trained for this special work and are highly competent and courteous.

The main headquarters of the Office of Dependency Benefits is located at Newark and is under the direction of Brig. Gen. Harold N. Gilbert. I feel that they have made a remarkable record in tackling this Herculean task.

For your information I desire to present a few statistics concerning the work that has been accomplished since we first put this dependency-benefit program into operation and also concerning the amount of work done each week.

As I previously stated, as of May 26 the Office of Dependency Benefits had handled a total of 30,070,323 pieces of work between that date and the date the program started July 31, 1942. Of these 4,825,368 have been family-allowance applications, 2,753,065 class E allotment authorizations, 202,076 matters relative to dependency allotment, and 22,289,814 pieces of correspondence relative to changes of status and documentary evidence.

Since December 19, 1942, the Office of Dependency Benefits has acted upon 35,679,599 cases and of these 18,057,361 were family allowances including changes in status, 1,629,099 class E allotments, 200,792 dependency allotments and all involving 5,792,167 pieces of correspondence.

You will be interested in knowing, I am sure, the amount of money involved in the program to date. Since July 31, 1942, a total of 75,654,380 checks have been issued for a total of $4,348,493,678. Of this, $2,637,577,995 represents family allowances and $1,710,915,683 is class E allotments.

I should probably state at this point that these class E allotments that I have referred to on two or three occasions are voluntary allotments made by the soldier to some member of his family. It is an outright contribution on his part and is over and above the family allotment he may have made under the dependency benefit provisions. I am advised that there is a total of 2,501,999 of these in effect. This speaks well for our armed forces in providing this additional amount out of their Army pay check to some member of the family.

The Office of Dependency Benefits has approved 4,323,642 family allowance applications, has disapproved only 81,200, and has temporarily disallowed 192,924 because of incomplete or insufficient evidence. The office has 48,405 applications for family allowance applications in progress but considering the number being taken into the armed forces each week and the fact that in one week alone the agency processed 28,683 of this type application, the work appears to be about current.

Last week alone, the Office of Dependency Benefits received 290,170 letters concerning cases and sent out 317,462 letters relative to allotments and allowances. These letters went to soldiers, their dependents, and to many Members of Congress. I know several of them came to my own office and I am very well pleased with the manner in which these matters are now expedited.

If you could see a copy of the weekly work sheet together with its cumulative total of work, you would readily realize the strides this agency has made in getting its work current and I congratulate those in charge on the fine job they are doing.

Political Conventions in Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOWARD J. McMURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a series of editorials from the Milwaukee Journal, Wisconsin's largest and most independent newspaper, on the subject of the political conventions recently held within the State.

The titles and dates of these editorials are as follows: May 4, 1944, "An Awful Republican Speech"; May 5, 1944, "The Dead Convention" and "Wisconsin Republicans Afraid"; May 8, 1944, "Progressives Go Isolationist"; and May 9, 1944, "The Democrats Stand Up."

These editorials accurately reflect the attitude of the great mass of patriotic Wisconsin voters in all political parties:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of May 4, 1944]

AN AWFUL REPUBLICAN SPEECH

If Wisconsin Republicans meeting in convention in Milwaukee want to redeem themselves, they will find some way of repudiating the speech made to them at their dinner Wednesday night.

For if the name of Charles F. Smith, of Wausau, be remembered at all in connection with the Republican Party, it will be because of the speech he made attacking the President of the United States in language which affronted not political opponents only but which should affront every loyal, decent American.

No one would mind, and few take note of, Mr. Smith's long account of his grievances with the New Deal. The convention had listened in the afternoon to the bellowing voice of Congressman HALLECK, saying much the same things. No one should pay much attention even to Mr. Smith's designation of all who are not Republicans as "the pinks and the punks." It is an old dodge to lump political opponents with villians and nitwits.

But Mr. Smith turned in apostrophe to the President. He said:

"No, Mr. President, we are not satisfied with you as either President or Commander in Chief. We aren't satisfied with your conduct of the war.

"You lost the Philippines. You caused our boys to be murdered there and at Pearl Harbor through your bungling as Commander in Chief.

"You have made a fizzle in the Italian campaign through your bungling as Commander in Chief. * * *

"Although the country as a whole, agriculture, labor, and industry, have done a wonderful job and have given you billions of dollars more than ever before, have given you a stupendous production of war materials, have given you over 10,000,000 of our boys * * * yet in 2½ years you haven't begun to equal what was done in the First World War in half that time."

And further fixing exact blame, Mr. Smith said the generals and admirals "have and will do a good job, much better though if the commander on the home front would do his job and stop thinking about buying votes."

So Mr. Roosevelt is accused of destroying the lives of our boys to buy votes. Republicans of Wisconsin are asked to applaud that statement, as Adolf Hitler surely would applaud it if he could hear of it.

An answer to the indecency of this attack would go beyond printable words. If untruthfulness and scurrility can win a campaign, this ought to win. But what about Republicans who do not like falsity and scurrility?

Of little importance as it is, something must be said about Mr. Charles F. Smith's absurdity as a supermilitary critic. All the people at home have done a good job. The generals and admirals have done a good job. Yet the job done has been very bad, proceeding from "murder" to a "fizzle."

For all this only one man, the Commander in Chief, is to blame. How did the generals and admirals get in position to do their good job? How did it happen that supplies and reinforcements were sent? Did someone bypass the President? If so, the President cannot be blamed.

But it dignifies a man to speak of his misstatements, his absurdities, his self-contradictions, when his greater offense is against the loyalty, the patriotism, the decency of every true American father and mother.

[From the Milwaukee Journal of May 5, 1944]

THE DEAD CONVENTION

Why did Wisconsin Republicans have a convention? All a party convention can do is name candidates and State principles. This convention ducked both jobs.

Is any Wisconsin Republican or independent wiser as a result of the convention? Better able to decide his vote?

Small attention was given to the need or the interests of Wisconsin. The speakers were intent on talking about the Nation, not about the State. The keynote by Congressman HALLECK fell flat; it was old Landon stuff. The speech of C. F. Smith of Wausau, if spoken by a man of national reputation, would have reelected Mr. Roosevelt in every State of the Union.

There was still the platform. As is to be shown below, that opportunity, too, was muffed.

"We're on Easy Street" was the keynote of the convention. Like the wise monkeys of Nippon, it saw nothing, heard nothing, and said nothing. It had no convictions on candidates. It had none on principles.

Otherwise the convention was notable for the lack of youth. Young men are away at war. Young women are too busy to come to a talkfest.

Why did Wisconsin Republicans hold a convention? They endorsed no candidates. They committed their party to no principles. Confident of success this year, they invited disgust and humiliation hereafter.

A small group of men met at Ripon in 1854 and sounded a keynote which fired the Nation. A smug group of comfortable, well-fed men and women met in Milwaukee 90 years later and said: "We'll carry Wisconsin in 1944 and what the hell do we care after that?"

WISCONSIN REPUBLICANS AFRAID

The platform committee of the Wisconsin Republican convention had before it this plank submitted by the subcommittee on platform of the State executive committee:

"The Republican Party favors a clear-cut, realistic foreign policy which will promote world peace and protect the American ideals. We do not believe in isolating America from the rest of the world to the detriment of permanent peace and a firm relationship between nations. We believe that the American people should be informed as to what our foreign policy and commitments are. We do believe that any negotiations with other powers should be conducted by realistic Americans who believe that our principles of government are sound and that they must be preserved for us. On such a basis America can enter world negotiations with assurance that the result will be beneficial to all concerned."

What did the platform committee do with this? It cut out the two sentences indicated above in bold-faced type. It cut out the only sentences which said something. It left the plank as nearly meaningless as it could be. If the committee members had not had these sentences before them, the case would not have been so damning. But they read the sentences and perhaps feared some isolationist might not like them. They preferred the isolationist's vote to that of fathers and mothers who do not want another war.

After that, perhaps by way of showing that a platform didn't mean much to them anyhow, they said:

"We affirm that plank adopted at our State convention held in Wausau in July of 1942, as follows: 'We Republicans of Wisconsin also declare our belief that when the victory is won and the Axis Powers are utterly crushed and their military power destroyed, there should be set up some kind of an international organization that shall provide a just method of settling international disputes and shall have the power to preserve the peace of the world.'"

They thus achieved by their meaningless resolution of this week and the reaffirmation of their wishy-washy resolution of 2 years ago a position almost as strong and manly as that of the Republican national convention of 1920—the convention that nominated Warren G. Harding. But they are not as strong as Harding himself when he was on the stump. He declared for "a society of free nations or an association of free nations or a league of free nations." Neither Harding nor his party did anything about it.

Why did the Wisconsin Republicans shy away from their shadows? To woo isolationists? But the isolationists have nowhere else to go. They'll vote Republican because they won't vote for Rooseveit. Because the platform committee was isolationist? That may or may not be true. The more reasonable interpretation is that it didn't have any heart or sincerity in what it was saying, and the more meaningless it could make the thing the better.

[From the Milwaukee Journal of May 8, 1944]

PROGRESSIVES GO ISOLATIONIST

Senator LA FOLLETTE tied his party to the dead horse of "isolationism" in his speech at the Progressive convention. And the tragedy is that the party stayed tied.

We know that it will be subtly argued that the La Follette speech and the Progressive platform were not utterly isolationist. But in the convention were scores of men and women who could not avoid the thought that they were.

It is a peculiar property of truth that when you mean a thing you don't need a thousand words to say what you mean. Mr. LA FOLLETTE's speech was long enough for a simple sentence saying that isolationism is out and American fathers and mothers want assurance against another war in another 25 years. He didn't say it.

The 5,000 word Progressive platform didn't have space enough to include the simple sentence offered by Assemblyman Mullen: "We favor an international organization dedicated to carry out these principles of peace." Mr. Mullen was backed by State Senator Risser and by Norris E. Maloney, district attorney of Dane County. It couldn't go in because it didn't get the green light from Senator LA FOLLETTE and Herman Ekern.

And the party was still the LA FOLLETTE personal party. That is the tragedy of it. It never has become a Wisconsin party or a national party.

In the convention were hundreds of men and women, as good citizens, as good Americans as can be found anywhere in the country, more earnest delegates than can be found at most conventions. But they were afraid of something. The real hero of the day was Roy Samb, of La Crosse, who voted "No" to the platform because it was isolationist. And if anyone doesn't think it takes courage to vote "No" with 600 yes men crying "Yes," let him try it sometime.

Why Senator LA FOLLETTE takes the reactionary road, we do not know. It should not be from any sense of loyalty to his late father, who in 1919 opposed the League of Nations, as did HIRAM JOHNSON and Senator Borah, along with the reactionary Republicans they formerly had so bitterly opposed. A man might honestly think in 1919 that isolation was our proper course. But ask fathers and mothers who have seen their boys leave for war if they think what we did in 1919 was right.

[From the Milwaukee Journal of May 9, 1944]

THE DEMOCRATS STAND UP

Wisconsin Democrats meeting at Wausau challenged the isolationism which is so thinly veneered in the State Republican platform and so thinly disguised in the Progressive platform. They said:

"We thoroughly condemn the principle of isolationism and demand that the United States of America assume a position in world affairs equal to its importance and greatness as a nation."

This is an answer to the formula invented recently that Stalin fights for Russia, Churchill fights for Britain—and why shouldn't the American Government stand for America? This formula has been eagerly parroted both by partisan politicians who have given no real thought to prevention of war and by isolationists who want to pose as American.

Further the Democrats declared:

"We condemn the pre-war isolationism as dangerous and detrimental to the welfare of this country.

"We favor the joining of an international organization of nations backed by organized force with power to keep the peace, and the creation of such control against the aggressor nations of the world as will compel peace and guarantee, insofar as our responsibility goes, safety of Americans, their property and lives wherever they may be.

"In the name of liberals we condemn the stand taken by Senator LA FOLLETTE yesterday in Milkaukee as a reversion to isolationism."

The Democratic delegates also endorsed a slate of candidates.

Voters of Wisconsin who put the prevention of future war first thus have an opportunity of expressing themselves. That some may not do this because of the feeling that the Democratic Party has not been strong in Wisconsin in recent years is likely. But its convention, alone of the three Wisconsin conventions held, went on record firmly.

President Roosevelt has himself to thank that the only convention which endorses his record and his candidacy is the smallest of the three and that the party ran a poor third in the elections of 1942. He did not help build the party in Wisconsin; he showed plainly his preference for the LA FOLLETTE family party, which was still clinging to his coattails as late as the election of 1940, but now turns from him to go its own way.

The Democrats stood up for something important to this Nation. They stood up for the President, too. And they stood against the charge brought against Wisconsin that it is an "isolationist" center.

The Control of Bureaucracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD P. GALE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. GALE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Minneapolis Star Journal of February 26, 1944:

THE CONTROL OF BUREAUCRACY

One of the most popular whipping boys in Government, particularly on the Federal level, is bureaucracy, but few critics make constructive proposals for lessening the evil.

Congressman HERTER, of Massachusetts, is a welcome exception. He admits that the octopus of Federal bureaucracy is here to stay, but says we can improve and control it. Here are his recommendations:

Prohibit Executive orders which create administrative agencies and commission administrative agents with autocratic authority.

Permit existence of bureaus or bureaucrats only under specific congressional mandate and on a statutory basis.

Insist that every act of Congress creating an administrative or regulatory agency of the Federal Government precisely define and limit the area of authority and the means of its exercise, and contain specific yardsticks that permit no uncertainty.

Require that members of every board and commission and every bureau chief be appointed for a specified term of years and that the appointments be subject to Senate confirmation.

Stop the present practice of putting administration and enforcement into the hands of the same agencies and permitting them to be their own judges and juries with respect to alleged violations of their own decrees.

Provide for appeal to the courts and judicial review of all bureaucratic orders and decrees if they pertain to personal or property rights.

Congressman HERTER is more realistic in his approach to the problem than those who talk about "eliminating Federal bureaucracy" as if there could be government without bureaucracy. He realizes Federal controls have grown up over a period of many years, largel, in response to public demand, and never can be, nor should be, eliminated.

Even in 1776, the founding fathers were worried about bureaucracy. They lashed out at the bureaucrats of King George, declaring: "He has erected a multitude of new offices and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat their substance. He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution and unacknowledge by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation."

Despite those words of defiance, bureaucracy continued to flourish. The early bureaus and commissions—like the Bureau of the Census, the Bureau of Reclamation, the Bureau of Mines, the Bureau of Standards, the Bureau of Labor Statistics, etc.—were established to meet specific needs.

Under the New Deal, a multitude of new bureaus and commissions was founded to relieve the distressed, promote social security, regulate business and labor, etc. And after the war broke out, new and further controls over production, prices, commodities, etc., brought dozens of new Federal bureaus into being.

When the war ends, production and price control will have to be exercised for some time to come. Social security, post-war public works, Federal aid to education, etc., will necessitate continuance of many bureaus.

Wartime controls, like those of peacetime, are onerous, but are recognized to be the lesser of two evils; without them, we would be in more serious troubles than those caused by the controls in question. Some peacetime regulations, like those imposed by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, are highly popular. So the chances of elimination of controls are slim indeed.

Whether we agree with all of Congressman HERTER'S conclusions or not, his approach is the only realistic one; we must get along with bureaucracy, but we must restrict its authority and make it satisfy present needs. That would end the paradox of the public demanding services and controls and then calling for abolition of the very bureaus which perform them.

Churchill and Fascism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, our policy of appeasement, with respect to Spain, has depressed intelligent Americans. For years I have been attempting to arouse my colleagues in Congress and the country generally to an appreciation of the need for a realistic attitude toward fascism everywhere and particularly toward Fascist Spain.

Our diplomatic flirtation with fascism in Spain has discouraged the underground residents of occupied Europe, who believe in democracy, despite their observation of what they regard as two-timing, double-dealing deception, and hypocrisy.

On the part of those democratic nations, who profess to believe in democracy and to oppose fascism, millions of potential friends of the United States, living in Latin America, are questioning the good faith of our devotion to democracy and our ostensible idealism, hurt by the way we deal with Fascist Spain.

It is of the utmost importance to the future of our policy in Latin America and to the future of our friendship and good relations with these republics to the south of us that we sever diplomatic relations with Fascist Spain.

One of the Nation's eminent commentators on national affairs is the distinguished correspondent, editorial writer, and essayist, Mr. Barnet Nover. On May 27, in the Washington (D. C.) Daily Post appeared a column by Mr. Nover in which he discussed Spain and the foreign policy of Great Britain and the United States.

I commend its reading to my colleagues and to the country:

CHURCHILL AND SPAIN

(By Barnet Nover)

REJOICING OVER ONE SINNER SAVED

Many of Winston Churchill's admirers, and they are legion, will find it more than a little difficult to swallow his kindly words about Spain.

Those words were decidedly out of character with the Churchill the world has come to know since 1940. They seem to be the echo of another and different Churchill—the Churchill who once proclaimed Mussolini a great man, the Churchill whose normally acute vision was so blinded by surface appearances and class prejudices as to lead him, at the outset of the Spanish civil war, to proclaim his approval of the Mussolini-inspired and Axis-aided rebellion in the peninsula.

Churchill changed his mind about Mussolini and he changed his mind about the Spanish civil war. He may change his mind on Spain again. In casting up the balance of the contributions the Franco regime has made to the Allies as against those it has made to the Axis he may reach a very different conclusion from what he reached in his last speech.

The British Prime Minister went completely overboard in expressing his gratitude to Spain. But except for the recently concluded agreement regarding wolfram shipments to Germany and the closing of the German consulate at Tangier, the Spanish acts of good will which he cited were negative rather than positive.

Spain did not go to war with the Allies. She did not permit a German occupation. She remained "tranquil and friendly" during the days when the north African landings were being planned and Gibraltar was crowded with ships and planes.

These items are written in black ink in the Spanish ledger of the United Nations. But there are many red-ink entries about which Mr. Churchill says nothing.

He says nothing about the seizure of Tangier in violation of Spain's treaty commitments. He says nothing about the Blue Legion through which Franco actively participated in the war against Russia and added to the overwhelming difficulties which the Red Army had to contend with during the most critical period of the war on the eastern front.

Furthermore, Mr. Churchill turns a Nelson eye on the continuous campaign of abuse, inspired by the Spanish Government and directed against the Allies. He says nothing about the German agents who, until only just the other day were permitted to use Spanish Morocco as a base of espionage. He says nothing about the pro-Axis, anti-American, and anti-United States activities of the Falange in Latin America.

These actions constitute a far truer reflection of the Franco government's attitude than those for which Mr. Churchill is so warmly grateful. And some credit for what Spain did not do when the going was hard for the Allies, certainly belongs not to Franco but to the Spanish people.

Mr. Churchill gives his case away when he says that Spain's entry into the war against the Allies would have been accompanied by the German occupation of Spain. It is possible, although the British statesman does not once suggest the possibility that it was the unwillingness of the Spanish people to have their nation overrun by the Nazis far more than the generalissimo's objections that made Hitler think twice before crossing the Pyrenees.

Secretary Hull recently said that Fascism and free government cannot exist together in the world.

One would have imagined, in view of what happened in the world, that this was axiomatic. Certainly if this war is not a struggle against fascism it is purposeless.

But the menace, if Mr. Churchill is to be believed, is not against fascism as such but against German and Italian and Japanese fascism. We are determined to extirpate the wolves but intend to feed the cubs. They are so little, so friendly, so harmless. Yet cubs have a way of growing up.

Mr. Churchill also expressed the hope that "she (Spain) will be a strong influence for the peace of the Mediterranean after the war." With all due respects, this sounds like the late unlamented Neville Chamberlain speaking of the Fascist Italy that was.

If Spain becomes a strong influence for peace in the Mediterranean, and one can only hope that she will, it will not be the Spain of Francisco Franco. It will be a Spain of free men.

Inflation Is More Than a Bogey-Man To Frighten Little Children

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, as we today consider the extension of the price-control legislation in this House, it is well to hold in mind the danger confronting the Nation. I find it difficult to convince myself of the frightful consequences of inflation. Perhaps I am much like the average American citizen in regard to inflation as in regard to war, I have not actually seen enough of either one to understand thoroughly their ravages. Maybe that is because I have too much the feeling "It can't happen here." What I need—and I wonder how many others need the same thing—is a greater awareness of the consequences of war and of inflation in order to fear them sufficiently.

At the opening of the session today, in the customary 1-minute periods allowed the Members, I spoke of having received a letter from a young man of Arizona, Arthur E. Way, now in Istanbul, Turkey, who wrote concerning inflation in that and other neutral countries where he has recently resided. Below I wish to quote paragraphs from his letter and follow the quotations by some index numbers showing comparative prices of 1938 and 1944 on twenty articles in common usage:

Regarding inflation, I am attaching, for your information, a copy of an excerpt from the Turkische Post of May 10, which gives you some idea of the comparative prices between 1938 and 1944. The index figure gives you some idea of the percent of increase. In the States we grumbled a great deal about our Office of Price Adjustment, without realizing what a wonderful job they did, in comparison with what one sees in other countries. There is no question that some of the prices at home are a little out of line, but just a quick glance at this table—and the folks at home can appreciate what has been done for them. Prices are high here, about five or six times as high as the States at present; for example, a pair of ordinary shoes will cost about $30; a pair of socks, from $5 to $7; a suit of clothes, $200 to $300; a hat, approximately $20. This is not only true here, but I found similar conditions in Leban, Syria, Egypt, and some of the South American countries.

The excerpt follows:

COST OF LIVING IN ISTANBUL

In the economic section figures are cited from a report of the Chamber of Commerce of Istanbul for cost of living up to the end of March 1944.

The report says: If the food prices of March of this year are compared with 1938, they show an increase of about four and a half times the peacetime prices. A family with a low standard of living which would have required £T39.73 for their food in March of the last year of peace, today for the same purpose would require £T170.98 a month. The cost of heating and light has not changed substantially in recent months. Their prices today approximate three times the prices of 1938. The other groups do not show considerable changes recently. Prices for clothing and shoes are still extremely high. The following is a table of comparative figures:

Goods	Prices		Index figure, March 1944
	1938	March 1944
Soap	£T34.76	£T172.50	496.3
Bread	10.05	30.00	298.5
Mutton	45.52	229.00	503.1
Fish	10.30	60.00	582.5
Fresh vegetables	7.51	30.00	399.5
Beans	18.61	85.00	456.7
Peas	17.62	91.00	516.5
Cooking butter	98.82	450.00	455.4
Olive oil	51.85	287.00	553.5
Sugar	28.00	208.00	742.9
Rice	26.64	148.00	555.6
Potatoes	8.32	32.00	384.6
Cheese	48.78	182.00	373.1
Olives	39.57	92.50	233.8
Eggs	1.71	7.25	424
Milk	14.79	60.00	405.7
Yogurt	20.00	96.00	480
Coffee	120.49	600.00	497.9
Coal	5.33	14.75	258
Wood for fuel	370.08	1,400.00	378.8

As more detailed comparisons have shown, the minimum prices have been listed in the above statistics, so that the prices for products of better quality will be substantially higher.

Price Control Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me, I include as part of my remarks an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 10 entitled "Against Tinkering With O. P. A." and an editorial from the St. Louis Star-Times entitled "Tampering With O. P. A." They follow:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

AGAINST TINKERING WITH O. P. A.

Price control would be seriously weakened if two amendments, passed by the Senate, were actually made into law.

The amendment proposed by Senator BANKHEAD, of Alabama, to increase prices on some cotton textiles, would, if made law, be only the entering wedge for a host of exceptions to price control. Many persons are inclined to favor control for everything except the few items in which their personal interests call for increases. Since these exceptions, en masse, would probably cover the entire field of price control, the way to them should be kept firmly closed.

Another amendment adopted by the Senate, making it an adequate defense against consumer suits for merchants to prove that their price violations were unintentional, is persuasive in theory. But it would do material harm to price control, in the opinion of Majority Leader BARKLEY and Senator TAFT, of Ohio.

The price-control laws are working, on the whole, not too badly. Now is a good time for Congress to give them its support and to avoid dangerous tinkering.

[From the St. Louis Star-Times]

TAMPERING WITH O. P. A.

There is grave danger to the entire price-control system in the type of amendment which the Senate yesterday patched into the fabric of the Control Act at the behest of Alabama's BANKHEAD. It is to be hoped that House opposition to this scheme prevails.

Its surface purpose, to lower the excessive cost of cotton goods, seems laudatory enough, even though the obvious real intent is to raise the price of raw cotton by increasing the demand for it. But the fact is that all measures attempting to set the ceilings for specific articles by congressional action should be rejected flatly as an interference with the flexibility essential to good legislation and sound administration.

Set the price of cotton in the law, and you open the way to setting the price on carpets, cabbages, calsomine, and corn—all in the same rigidity of a statute dictated by conflicting interests. You destroy completely the possibility of month-by-month adjustments in ceilings that permit the erasures of mistakes, the balancing of specific items against the changing Nation-wide need, the spurs to production that experience reveals are necessary.

The whole system of our administration much as it has been berated by those who fancy there is a bogey in every bureau, rests on a sound, efficient, logical principle that business itself constantly applies: The board of directors shall determine broad policy, and the most competent manager it is possible to select will devise the means of putting that policy into effect.

No business in the world could function if its board had to sit in on the momentous decision of whether the janitor in plant B should have red hair or black, should be paid $17.50 a week or $18. Yet it is precisely this procedure that is suggested by the Bankhead amendments.

Taken in conjunction with the open hostility of many Congressmen to the whole system of the O. P. A., almost every one of the amendments suggested so far to improve the Office is revealed as actually designed to produce in it the paralysis and atrophy akin to death.

Virgin Islanders Ask Larger Share of Self-Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include herewith a resolution adopted May 11, 1944, by the Fourth Municipal Council of St. Thomas and St. John, Virgin Islands, petitioning for a larger share of self-government for these islands. As we look to the post-war period it seems only fair that now we should be setting in motion those programs designed to bring maximum well-being for the people in all of our territorial possessions. A vital part of such planning must include the largest use of the natives of these territories in the management of their own affairs. It is for this reason that the accompanying resolution deserves the prompt and favorable consideration of all to whom it is addressed:

Resolution petitioning the President of the United States and the Secertary of the Department of the Interior to appoint natives to important positions in the government of the Virgin Islands.

Whereas the Organic Act of the Virgin Islands, approved by His Excellency, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President of the United States of America on June 22, 1936, is the basic law of the American Virgin Islands, conferring on the people of those islands certain duties, responsibilities, and privileges as American citizens; and

Whereas the people of the Virgin Islands are, and will always be, grateful to the Congress and President of the United States for the noble and democratic attitude displayed in the adoption and approval of this act; and

Whereas section 23 of said act indicates that natives are qualified to hold important positions in the government of the Virgin Islands, where it states that the Secretary of the Interior "shall give due consideration to natives of the Virgin Islands" when making appointments; and

Whereas in section 21 of said act the President of the United States is given the authority and responsibility to appoint a Government Secretary; while in sections 22 and 23, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint Administrators for St. Croix and St. John and "such other executive and administrative officers as may, in his discretion, be required"; and

Whereas it is indisputable that qualified natives of the Virgin Islands who have lived in the islands and are acquainted with the people and their needs, if appointed to important positions in the Government by the President or the Secretary of the Interior, will make good and capable officials thus improving the status of the government of the Islands; and

Whereas there is evidence of the ability of natives to fill responsible positions as characterized by the outstanding achievements of natives now in the service of the government of the Virgin Islands, which achievements have redounded to the credit and astuteness of the President and Secretary of the Interior in displaying their ability to choose competent and efficient officials; and

Whereas it is believed that official positions in the government of the Virgin Islands are not lucrative enough to be controlled by national politics and thus disastrously affect the economic and social well-being of approximately 30,000 patriotic and loyal American citizens; and

Whereas it is also believed that even if the positions were controlled by national politics, the President and the Secretary of the Interior have a record of selecting only capable and qualified persons for official positions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, and it is hereby resolved by the Municipal Council of St. Thomas and St. John in session assembled, That the President and the Secretary of the Interior be, and are hereby petitioned, to have made a review of the executive and administrative positions in the government of the Virgin Islands, with the view of giving "due consideration to the natives of the Virgin Islands"; and it is further

Resolved, That the President and the Secretary of the Interior be, and are hereby, petitioned to appoint natives to fill whatever executive and administrative positions are now vacant in the government of the Virgin Islands; and it is further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to all members of the Senate and House of Representatives, the Under Secretary of the Department of the Interior, the Director of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions, the Governor of the Virgin Islands, the Chairman of the Fair Employment Practice Committee, the President of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the President of the Civil Liberties Union, the President of the Virgin Islands Civic Association, and all insular business, labor, civic and political organizations, with the request that these officials and organizations grant whatever aid possible to carry through the policy advocated by this resolution.

Growth of San Francisco

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS ROLPH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, the Richmond Banner of San Francisco publishes interesting data regarding San Francisco's outstanding growth. Our city is second only to New York among the Nation's financial centers. The article as appearing in the Richmond Banner is quoted in full as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE COLLECTS FIGURES ON WARTIME BOOM IN SAN FRANCISCO

San Francisco is the Nation's second largest financial center based upon a study of the 1943 deposits of the 100 largest commercial banks. Seven of the banks in San Francisco, including the Bank of America, American Trust Co., Wells Fargo Bank, Anglo California National Bank, Crocker First National Bank, Bank of California, and San Francisco Bank (order according to bank deposits), rank among the first 100 banks of the Nation with total deposits amounting to $5,598,187,000, or 10.1 percent of the total deposits. Only New York exceeded this figure. Among the first 10 banking centers following San Francisco in order were Chicago, Detroit, Boston, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and St. Louis. During the past year the west coast section continued to lead other sections of the Nation in bank deposit gains reflecting the great industrial expansion taking place in this section of the Nation.

The study further revealed that the Bank of America, N. T. & S. A. of San Francisco made a spectacular gain of $912,000,000 in deposits during the year 1943, carrying its totat deposits to $3,498,153,210, jumping it from fourth into third place among the Nation's 100 largest banks.

The study revealed that the Bank of America has also another distinction, ranking highest among the first 10 banks of the Nation in ratio of deposits to capital, which amounted to 24.1 times; the First National Bank of Chicago was second with 19.4 times, while the Nation's largest, the Chase National Bank, showed a ratio of 16 times.

The expeditious handling of financial transactions of all kinds has helped to maintain sound industrial and trade relations between San Francisco and the western region markets. The trend of big money interests in the Hawaiian Islands, Philippines, and East Indies which started in the pre-war period in the late '30's to utilize the local financial resources and facilities, including the San Francisco Stock Exchange, for marketing their securities, will in all probability continue in the post-war period when normal trade relations are re-established in these markets.

The Bay area population reservoir on April 1, 1944, was remarkably near the same level as on November 1, 1943, 5 months earlier, according to the official census reports for these dates. Presumably, the number of inductions and voluntary outbound migrants has been about equaled by the number of inbound migrants.

Currently, however, there is reported a shortage of about 27,500 workers in critical war industries, indicating that Bay area activity is operating at near capacity for the manpower available. Shipbuilding, ship repairing, and shipping activities' manpower needs are greatest.

Local housing centers indicate a steady flow of requests for housing, but only a small percent can be placed under existing regulations. The importance of the "civilian backstop" to the Bay area war economy and his housing needs have not received any official recognition, although prominent groups in the Bay area initiated a movement to gain official approval for a private building program privately financed as a practical approch to the housing shortage which is handicapping the labor supply.

General business activity in San Francisco in April measured by our index at 171.1 settled seasonably compared to the March level. April business was 10.5 percent below the preceding month, but 3.1 percent above last April. Activity during the first 4 months was 13.2 percent above last year. Placements during April in San Francisco totaled 10,361 persons, of which 9,248 were industrial and 1,113 commercial. This is a slight gain over the total March placements and an increase of 32.6 percent over April last year with the 4 months' cumulative up 11 percent.

April living costs represented by the index for San Francisco-Oakland at 128.1 were up 0.5 percent above March, but were 0.3 percent under April last year. Food costs showed a 5.0 percent drop compared to last year, while clothing costs rose 5.4 percent. Living costs average for the first 4 months was up 1.3 perent above the same period last year, but food costs were off 0.8 percent, while clothing costs rose 5.7.

H. R. 4617 and H. R. 4990—Providing for the Sale of Certain Surplus Military Vehicles and Equipment to Farmers and to Servicemen Who Intend to Engage in or Resume Farming

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 12, 1944

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, following World War No. 1 our surplus war supplies were bought up by large, well-organized and well-financed groups of the country in large quantities at ridiculously low prices for the sole purpose of taking care of their own interest in the way of unreasonable profits at the expense of the consuming public.

This should not happen following World War No. 2.

I am inserting herewith a statement issued by the Sumter County U. S. D. A. War Board signed by Mr. J. M. Eleazer concerning this important matter.

On April 17th, I introduced H. R. 4617 and on June 9, H. R. 4990, copies of which I am inserting herewith, which if passed by Congress will take care of same in line with the statement issued by the Sumter County U. S. D. A. War Board.

I agree with Mr. Eleazer that the farmers of this country have done the greatest job on the home front of any group in connection with our war effort.

They, including their families, have had to work long hours, being short of labor and farm implements.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRCULTURE,
U. S. D. A. DEFENSE BOARD,
Sumter, S. C., May 29, 1944.

PLANS FOR DISPOSING OF SURPLUS WAR MATERIALS TO FARMERS

To CONGRESSMAN FULMER: The Sumter U. S. D. A. War Board at its meeting today instructed that I write you and others on the above subject as follows:

That a movement be started now toward perfecting plans for disposing of surplus war materials in such manner as to make it possible for a farmer to get a needed truck, ditcher, jeep, or the like direct from the Government rather than pay several times what the Government gets for it after it passes through some salvage man's hands.

We have just been told by a farmer of his experience. The Army advertised and sold a lot of used trucks in a nearby town. No one except a large dealer could bid on that many trucks, and he got them for an average of $150 each. This farmer went there to see if he could get a badly needed truck, and they priced him one of the average ones for $1,600. And, we know from past experience, that this is the way that present methods of disposing of such materials work. No farmer can use a thousand trucks or a hundred ditchers, but maybe he could use one to mighty good advantage.

The farmer has done the greatest job on the home front of any group in this war. He alone has through "spirit, skill, and hard work" produced more and more with less and less, and he will continue to do so. This being a fact, it would be showing a bit of gratitude if our Government could arrange for him to get these needed machines and equipment at the rock-bottom price that the Government gets, anyway. This will avoid making some new millionaires, and at the same time it will make the Nation infinitely richer with the improved agricultural plant it will help create.

We see no great difficulty in handling this. The equipment could be assembled at convenient points, as it will be, anyway. Instead of making one man rich by letting him have all of it at the low price at which such things go, why not mark them with that same low price and let farmers get what they need? This could be easily controlled by a permit system similar to that used for getting rationed farm machinery at this time.

The Sumter County United States Department of Agriculture War Board earnestly asks that the United States Department of Agriculture war boards and other leaders who receive this do their part to impress our authorities with the righteousness of this thing. It will result in a securer nation, with more drainage, terraces, cleared swamp and pasture lands, better hauling facilities, greater productive power, and so on.

Respectfully submitted.

SUMTER COUNTY U. S. D. A. WAR BOARD,
By J. M. ELEAZER.

H. R. 4617

A bill to empower the Secretary of Agriculture to requisition certain material, equipment, and supplies not needed for the prosecution of the war and for the national defense and to use such material, equipment, and supplies in soil and water conservation, drainage, irrigation, grazing, and other districts, and to distribute such materials, equipment, and supplies by grant or loan to public bodies, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to requisition from the War Department and from the Navy Department and from any other Government agency, any war materials, equipment, and supplies that are or may hereafter be surplus and not required for the prosecution of war and for the national defense but are suitable for use in carrying out erosion control and soil and water-conservation works and operations in furtherance of the act approved April 27, 1935, entitled "An act to provide for the protection of land resources against soil erosion, and for other purposes." Upon receipt of such requisition from the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the head of any other Government agency shall transfer without reimbursement any and all such surplus material, equipment, and supplies as may be requested by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 2. Such material, equipment, and supplies shall be distributed, through the Soil Conservation Service, by grant or loan, to soil conservation, drainage, irrigation, grazing, and other districts and public bodies organized under State laws with powers to promote and carry out soil- and water-conservation operations and related public purposes. Such distribution shall be made in accordance with such standards, conditions, rules, and regulations as to use and disposition as may be recommended by the Soil Conservation Service and may be established for such purpose by the Secretary of Agriculture.

H. R. 4990

A bill providing for the sale of certain surplus military vehicles and equipment to farmers and to servicemen who intend to engage in or resume farming

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy declares any military vehicles, bulldozers, tractors, jeeps, Army wagons, graders, ditchers, or other similar vehicles or equipment, surplus to the needs of the Department of War or the Department of the Navy, as the case may be, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to requisition from the War Department and from the Navy Department and from any other Government agency, such war materials, equipment, and supplies that are or may hereafter be surplus and not required for the prosecution of war and for the national defense but are suitable for use in carrying out farming operations. Such vehicles shall, before being transferred to other agencies of the Government or being sold or otherwise disposed of in quantity lots at public auction, be offered for sale singly to persons having purchase preference rights, as provided in section 2. The price at which any such vehicle or item of equipment shall be so offered for sale shall be fixed on the basis of its cost to the United States less a reasonable allowance for depreciation.

SEC. 2. (a) The following persons shall have purchase preference rights with respect to vehicles and equipment described in section 1:

(1) Persons who are regularly engaged in farming operations.

(2) Persons who served for not less than ninety days in the military or naval forces of the United States during the period beginning September 16, 1940, and ending with the date of the termination of hostilities in the present war, as proclaimed by the President, have been discharged therefrom or released from active duty therein under conditions not dishonorable, and intended to become regularly engaged in farming operations. The manner of evidencing a purchase preference right shall be prescribed by regulations issued by the Secretary of Agriculture.

(b) In order to carry out the provisions of section 1, the Secretary of Agriculture shall provide for the concentration of vehicles and equipment described in section 1 in the various rural areas of the United States, may utilize the services of local merchants in the sale of such vehicles and equipment, and pay a reasonable commission for such services.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.
